

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PREFACE TO THE AMERICAN EDITION.

THE Epistle to the Romans is the Epistle of the Epistles, as the Gospel of John is the Gospel of the Gospels. It is the heart of the doctrinal portion of the New Testament. It presents in systematic order the fundamental truths of Christianity in their primitive purity, inexhaustible depth, all-conquering force, and never-failing comfort. It is the bulwark of the evangelical doctrines of sin and grace against the obscuration of the gospel, whether by judaizing bigotry or paganizing licentiousness. Addressed to the Christians at Rome, and unfolding to them the gospel as a spiritual power of God unto salvation far exceeding in effect, and outlasting in time, the temporal power of the Imperial City, it prophetically anticipates and positively overthrows every essential error of Romanism, and is to this day the best antidote against popery. No wonder that it was so highly prized by the Reformers. Luther, whom Coleridge regarded "the only fit commentator on Paul," called the Romans "the chief part of the New Testament, and the purest gospel, well worthy to be committed to memory word for word by every Christian man, and to be pondered daily and enjoyed as the daily bread of the soul. It can never be too often nor too well read and considered, and the more it is understood, the better it tastes." Those who have studied it most carefully, are most likely to fall in with the judgment of Coleridge, that it is "the most profound work in existence."

But it is certainly also the most difficult book of the New Testament, unless we except the Gospel of John and the Revelation. Meyer, the ablest philological exegete of the age, humbly confesses, in the preface to the fourth edition of his commentary, to a growing sense of our inability to do justice to "the grandest, the boldest, and, in all its depths and heights, the most complete composition of the greatest apostle." If St. Peter did not hesitate to state that there are "some things hard to be understood" in the Epistles of his "beloved brother Paul," we need not be surprised that even such divines as occupy the same general platform widely differ in their interpretations. The Epistle to the Romans, more than any other, is a battle-field; and every chapter, especially the third, the fifth, the seventh, and the ninth, is contested ground. Not a few commentators deal with it as Procrustes dealt with his victims, in adapting them to the length of his iron bedstead—either stretching out or cutting off their legs. But after all, vast progress has been made, especially within the last fifty years, toward an impartial and thorough understanding of this wonderful production of a wonderful man.

Among the many noble contributions of German learning and industry to this end, Dr. Lange's Commentary—which is here presented, with many additions, in an English dress—will occupy an honorable and useful position. It appeared first in 1865, and in a second edition in 1868, in a small but closely-printed volume of 389 pages, as part of his Bibelwerk. It is evidently the result of much earnest labor and profound research, and presents many new and striking views. These, however, are not always expressed with that clearness demanded by the practical common sense of the English reader; hence the difficult labor of translation has been occasionally supplemented by the delicate task of explanation.

Dr. Lange prepared the Exegetical and Doctrinal parts, the Rev. F. R. Fay, his son-in-law, and pastor at Crefeld, Prussia, the Homiletical sections.

The English edition is the result of the combined labor of the Rev. Dr. Hurst, the Rev. M. B. Riddle, and the General Editor. Dr. Hurst is responsible for the translation (which was an unusually difficult task), and for the valuable Homiletical selections from the best English sources. The General Editor and the Rev. M. B. Riddle, besides carefully comparing the translation with the original, prepared the text, with the Critical notes, and the additions to the Exegetical and Doctrinal sections. The initials indicate the authorship of the various additions in brackets, which increase the volume of the German edition nearly one half. Upon no other book, except Matthew and Genesis, has so much original labor been bestowed.

I am responsible for the General and Special Introduction, and the first six chapters (exclusive of the last few verses of chap. vi.), which cover about one half of the volume. I examined nearly all the authorities quoted by Dr. Lange, from Chrysostom down to the latest editions of Tholuck and Meyer, and also the principal English commentators, as Stuart, Hodge, Alford, Wordsworth, Jowett, Forbes, &c., who are sublimely ignored by continental commentators, as if exegesis had never crossed the English Channel, much less the Atlantic Ocean. The length of some of my annotations (e. g., on chaps. i., iii., and v.) may be justified by the defects of the original, and the great importance of the topics for the English and American mind.

I had a strong desire to complete the work, and to incorporate portions of a German Commentary on Romans which I prepared years ago in connection with my lectures as professor of theology, as well as the results of more recent studies. But a multiplicity of engagements, and a due regard for my health, compelled me to intrust the remaining chapters, together with my whole apparatus, including my notes in manuscript and a printed essay on the ninth chapter, to my friend, the Rev. M. B. Riddle. As an excellent German and Biblical scholar, and as editor of the Commentaries on Galatians and Colossians in the Bibelwerk, Mr. Riddle has all the qualifications and experience, as well as that rare and noble enthusiasm which is indispensable for the successful completion of such a difficult and responsible task.

It is hoped that, by this combination of talent and labor, the Commentary on Roman has gained in variety, richness, and adaptation to the use of English students.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL

TO THE

R O M A N S .

INTRODUCTION.

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATION.

As the Epistle to the Romans is the most important and prominent of the Pauline Epistles, we must here discuss first the general preliminary questions connected with the life, doctrine, and writings of the Apostle. This introduction, therefore, divides itself into a general and a special introduction. The first connects with the general introduction of the "Bible-Work" on Matthew [p. 20 ff. Am. ed.] for the New Testament, and on Genesis [p. 1 ff. Am. ed.] for the Old; the second corresponds with the introductions to our commentaries on the remaining Epistles of Paul.

I. GENERAL INTRODUCTION TO THE EPISTLES OF PAUL.

§ 1. THE PAULINE PORTION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

The apostolic activity of the great Apostle to the Gentiles was so comprehensive and fruitful, that the greater portion of the labors of the original twelve apostles was merged into the historical current of his work. It is only the Coptic Church, and a few other isolated Oriental sects, that, as a portion of the original apostolic territory, have continued isolated from Paul's great field of labor. Since the second century, Paul's peculiar type of teaching began indeed to give way more and more to the forms of ancient and mediæval Catholicism; though Catholicism cannot be termed Petrine in that sense, and much less in that degree, in which the Church of Rome claims to be built on Peter. Yet Paul's spirit continued to exert its influence through the middle ages, not only in the heretical form of Paulicianism and other sects, but also in the orthodox type of Augustinism, until it broke forth from the innermost life of the Church as the chief organizing power of Evangelical Protestantism.*

* (Dr. LAMEN (Das Apostol. Zeitalter, vol. II. p. 649) adopts substantially the ingenious view, first suggested by JOACHIM FLORIS, and recently more fully developed by the great philosopher SCHELLING, and favored by eminent German divines, such as NEANDER, ULLMANN, TREKSCHE, that the three representative apostles, Peter, Paul, and John, are the types of three successive ages of Christianity: Peter the apostle of law and Catholicism, Paul the apostle of freedom and Protestantism, John the apostle of love and the church of the future which is to harmonise authority and freedom, unity and variety. Schelling, shortly before his death, at Ragatz, Switzerland, Aug. 1854, in a very interesting conversation with the writer of this note, emphatically affirmed his unabaken belief in this view, to which he had given repeated and profound reflection. It is certainly no mere accident that Catholicism professes to be founded on Peter, while Protestantism has at all times mainly appealed to Paul, the apostle of faith, of freedom, of independence, and of progress. Even the

As far as the Pauline portion of the New Testament is concerned, it constitutes not only the greatest part of the apostolic epistles, but also a large share of the entire New Testament, especially when we include both the writings of Luke and the Epistle to the Hebrews, which were evidently written under the influence of the Apostle of the Gentiles.

An eternal triumph of Christianity, an imperishable sign and pledge of its world-conquering power, lies in the fact that the greatest part of the Christian Church, the greatest portion of the New Testament, and the most powerful expression of Christian doctrine, proceeded from a man who, endowed with a lofty genius and a heroic energy of will, had cast all the enthusiasm of his youth into a fanatical hatred of Christianity, and who had made it the great object of his life to exterminate that religion from the face of the earth. With the conversion of Paul, the noblest prince of Pharissæism was changed from an arch-enemy of Christ into his most active apostle and witness. This was a prelude to the world-historical change by which the eagle of the heathen power of Rome was converted from the work of a vulture that vexed the fold of Christ, into the service of a dove of peace for the nations of the earth. SAUL became PAUL. In this one word all the past triumphs of Christianity over its foes are embraced, and all its future triumphs are described in advance. To bend or to break—that is the question; to bend, like Paul, or to break, like Julian the Apostate. The cause of this wonderful power of conversion and of judgment lies in the universal triumph of Christ, against whom a Paul was not too great an enemy, nor a Julian too crafty a politician and emperor.

Concerning the signification of PAUL in the New Testament, CALMET thus speaks in the introduction to his commentary on the Epistle to the Romans: "Post sacrosancta evangelia venerabile maxime ac ceterorum omnium pretiosissimum monumentum Pauli epistola habende sunt. Omnia in illis continentur, quas formandis moribus, sive ad mysteria et religionem constituendam a Jesu Christo tradita sunt. Tamquam supplementum et interpretatio eorum, quas Jesus Christus docuit, ac veluti alterum evangelium Jesu Christi e mortuis rediit jure meritoque reputantur." [H. EWALD, the great orientalist, commences his Commentary on the Pauline Epistles (Göttingen, 1857), with the following striking and truthful eulogy: "Considering these Epistles for themselves only, and apart from the general significance of the great Apostle of the Gentiles, we must still admit that, in the whole history of all centuries and of all nations, there is no other set of writings of similar extent, which, as creations of the fugitive moment, have proceeded from such severe troubles of the age, and such profound pains and sufferings of the author himself, and yet contain such an amount of healthfulness, serenity, and vigor of immortal genius, and touch with such clearness and certainty on the very highest truths of human aspiration and action. . . . The smallest as well as the greatest of these Epistles seem to have proceeded from the fleeting moments of this earthly life only to enchain all eternity; they were born of anxiety and bitterness of human strife, to set forth in brighter lustre and with higher certainty their superhuman grace and beauty. The divine assurance and firmness of the old prophets of Israel, the all-transcending glory and immediate spiritual presence of the Eternal King and Lord, who had just ascended to heaven, and all the art and culture antagonism of Protestantism and Romanism has its typical antecedent in the temporary collision of Paul and Peter at Antioch, and the earnest protest of Paul against any compromise with judaizing principles or customs. The idea of Schelling furnishes a fruitful hint for a comprehensive evangelical Catholic philosophy of Church history. But it must be wisely defined and qualified, and, as Lange intimates, it holds good only with regard to the elements of truth, and not to the extremes, contradictions, and defects, in the various historical types of Christianity. For in the Epistles of Peter there is not the faintest trace of hierarchical pretension and judaizing legalism and ritualism; on the contrary, a striking substantial agreement with the system of Paul. Nor do we find, on the other hand, that Paul gives the least countenance to that unhistorical and unchurchly individualism and one-sided intellectualism into which much of our modern Protestantism has degenerated. It must also be admitted, that in no age or section of Christianity was the spirit of any of the three leading apostles entirely wanting. There were truly evangelical men and tendencies at work in the bosom of mediæval Catholicism, and they are not wholly extinct even in the Roman church of the present day; while the tendency to legalism, formality, intolerance, and exclusivism may be found also in the bosom of Protestantism; and the lovely harmonising spirit of John is alive more or less among true believers in all sections of Christendom. So in a similar way the law and the promise, the sacerdotal office and the prophetic spirit, accompanied the Old Testament dispensation through the stages of its development to John the Baptist, the immediate forerunner of the first advent of Christ Comp. below, p. 13, and SCHARR's History of the Apost. Church, pp. 674-678.—P. 81 of a ripe and wonderfully excited age, seem to have joined, as it were, in bringing forth the new creation of these Epistles of the times which were destined to last for all times." Upon the whole, St. Paul is, perhaps, the most remarkable man, and his Epistles, next to the Gospels, the most important literary production of all ages. Dr. WORDSWORTH strongly recommends the reading of the Pauline Epistles in their chronological order, so as to accompany the Apostle, with the help of the Acts, in his missionary career from the call at Damascus to the martyrdom in Rome, and his development of Christian doctrine from the elementary truths of the Thessalonians to the farewell instructions of the Pastoral Letters. The reader will thus trace with growing delight this spiritual river of Paradise from its fountain-head, through Syria, Asia Minor, and Greece, to Rome, diffusing purity and health, flowing onward in a majestic and ever-widening flood, fertilizing the banks, that they may bear the flowers and trees of Christian graces, and terminating at last in the ocean of eternity.—P. S.]

§ 2. PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE GENTILES. HISTORY OF HIS LIFE.*

The history of the life of the Apostle Paul divides itself, according to great crises, into the following periods: I. The time of his youthful development to his conversion; II. The time of his apostolic training, his impulsive and enthusiastic beginnings, and his purifying retreats; III. The period of the three great missionary journeys recounted in the Scriptures, down to his capture in Jerusalem, and his transportation from Cæsarea to Rome; IV. The termination of his career to his martyrdom.

A. The History of the Youth of Paul to his Conversion.

Paul appears first before us at the place of execution of the protomartyr Stephen, under the Jewish name of SAUL (שָׁאוּל), Acts vii. 57. He is a young man, who pursues his studies in Jerusalem in the school of the conservative Pharisee, Gamaliel (Acts xxii. 3; comp. Acts v. 34); but in consequence of his fanatical enthusiasm for the Pharisaic law, which he identified with the ancestral faith (Phil. iii. 5, 6), he became, while a student, the most bitter persecutor and disturber of the youthful Church of Christ; for he considered that Church a fatal Jewish heresy, and one which, by virtue of the rights of zealots for the law, he designed to combat, and hoped utterly to destroy. Probably Moses, Phinehas, and Elijah were his imaginary prototypes; while he adjudged Christ to be the greatest of those false prophets against whom destruction was prophesied and appointed (Deut. xviii. 20). From an accomplice who, being present at the execution of Stephen, took charge of the clothes belonging to his witnesses and executioners (Acts vii. 58), he soon became a servant of the Sanhedrin†; and having become excited by the martyr-blood of Stephen, he not only continued the persecution, and scattered the congregation in Jerusalem, but, being clothed with extraordinary authority, he entered upon a journey to Damascus for the purpose of destroying the Christian congregation in that city. The Sanhedrin did not at that time possess authority over the life and death of the Jews (John xviii. 31), but it was nevertheless at liberty to exercise, in matters of religion, the Jewish authority to imprison, to scourge, and to arrange all the preliminaries of a trial for capital punishment. The execution of James the Just, as recounted by Josephus (in his Antiq. xx. 9, 1), explains the martyrdom of Stephen and the subsequent threats against Paul's life (Acts xxiii. 80), and shows that a tumultuous occasion could lead to the infliction of capital punishment. (On the laws of punishment, comp. WINER, art. Synhedrium [ii. 551, and SMITH, iii. 1186, art. Sanhedrin]).‡

* In the following section I have borrowed considerably from my own article on Paul, in HERBES' Real-Encyclopædia (vol. xl. 1866, pp. 239–269.—P. S.); but I have enlarged it according to necessity. Compare also the respective sections in the works of NEANDER, SCHAFF, LANGER, THIERSCHE, on the History of the Apostolic Church (SCHAFF, pp. 239–267), and CONYBEARE and HOWSON: The Life and Epistles of St. Paul. London, 1853, republished in New York.

† [The proper spelling is not Sanhedrim, but Sanhedrin (Talm. סַנְהֶדְרִין, formed from synedrion), but there is no uniformity in this even among scholars.—P. S.]

‡ [The reader will meet in this and all other parts of Dr. LANGER's Commentary very frequent references to WINER'S Biblical Dictionary (Biblisches Realwörterbuch zum Hundgebrauch für Studierende, etc., 3d ed. Leipzig, 1845, 2 vols.

Saul had already taken the lead in Jerusalem in the work of incarcerating the Christians but the apparent result of his efforts, which was only the wider promulgation of the gospel by means of the scattering of the congregation (Acts viii. 4), exasperated him still more. Therefore he solicited those fatal letters of authority which directed him toward Damascus. A proof of the confidence reposed in the fiery zeal of the young Pharisaic student may be seen in the fact that the Council not only gave him full authority, but also an obedient escort. The enterprising youth designed to destroy the whole Christian flock in Damascus, and to drag back to Jerusalem even women, and all who were at his mercy.

But the Divine visitation came upon him when near Damascus. Saul, by a sudden miracle, became a Paul, as we are accustomed to say; the greatest and most dangerous of all the persecutors of the Christians (for he persecuted the Church in its infancy), was transformed into the greatest promulgator of Christianity in the world.

Paul was a descendant of the tribe of Benjamin, and a native of Tarsus, the polished and venerable capital of Cilicia, situated on the river Cydnus, the home of the great naturalist, Dioscorides, and of other distinguished men, and the burial place of Emperor Julian the Apostate. JEROME (De viris illustrib. cap. v.) mentions the report that Paul had emigrated with his parents from Gishala, but he afterwards declares, in his commentary on Philemon, that it is a fable. As the stock of Levi became gloriously resplendent in John the Baptist, so, under the new dispensation, did Benjamin, the son of Rachel, receive higher honor than any other tribe save Judah, which had previously risen to the greatest glory. And the same mighty energy which the blessing of Jacob ascribed to the character of Benjamin (Gen. xlix. 27), and which was confirmed by later events (Judges xx. 21), found its perfect expression in Paul. He was first a ravenous wolf in the midst of the flock that ate his prey in the morning; but in the evening he combined the strength of the wolf and the mildness of the lamb; and though he sprang like a wolf into the metropolitan cities of heathendom, his purpose was to "divide his spoil in the evening." His parents appear to have been in good circumstances. They were "Roman" citizens, though not as inhabitants of the city of Tarsus (for that city had not then obtained its freedom), but by special conditions with which we are not acquainted. Notwithstanding their high social standing, they strictly adhered to the Jewish faith, and designed their son to be a Pharisaic Rabbi. According to Jewish custom he had learned a trade; he was a tent-maker (that is, a weaver of a kind of cloth which was applied to tent-making; σκηνοποιός, Acts xviii. 3). The great talents of Saul could be early developed in the schools of cultivated Tarsus, if we may suppose that the rigid Pharisaic sentiment of his parents (which, however, was often mollified in heathen cities far away from Palestine) permitted him to visit those schools. From Paul's philosophic analysis of heathendom (Rom. i. and ii.), from his discourse at Athens (Acts xvii.), and from other similar expressions, we may very readily infer that his acquaintance with sentences of heathen philosophers and poets (Acts xvii. 28; Tit. i. 12 sq.), is not attributable to mere popular intercourse, but to reading and study. When in Jerusalem, he became familiarly acquainted with the Old Testament, rabbinical traditions and dialectics, and probably also with the doctrines of the Jewish Alexandrian school. It is probable that he found there some family connections; at least, he was subsequently supported very earnestly by a nephew (Acts xxiii. 16). As King Saul of old is said to have gone forth to seek she-asses, but found a crown, so with the Apostle; but he took better care of his crown.

which is justly prized in Germany as a masterwork of ripe scholarship and critical accuracy. The English and American student who has no access to it, may in nearly all such cases profitably consult the same articles in W. SMITH'S Dictionary of the Bible, large edition, London and Boston, 1863, 3 vols.; large American edition, with many improvements and additions, by Prof. H. B. HACKETT and ESRA ARBON, New York, 1868 ff., to be completed in 4 vols.; and the superb third edition of KITTO'S Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature, prepared by W. LINDSEY ALEXANDER, D.D., etc., London, 1865, 3 vols. These English works, being the result of the combined labor of many contributors, have less unity and symmetry than that of WISSE, but are more extensive and embody the latest information (especially HACKETT and ARBON'S edition of SMITH unabridged, now in course of preparation and publication, with the help of a number of American scholars). A new German Dictionary of the Bible has been recently commenced with a considerable array of collaborators by SCHWENKER of Heidelberg, and will represent the liberal, semi-rationalistic school of German theology.—P. 8.

greatest miracles of conversion in the kingdom of grace. The fact especially that the most earnest zealot for Pharisaic legalism became, by Divine appointment, the chief apostle of a free gospel and faith, and the most successful destroyer of Pharisaism in Judaism, and in the Christian Church through all ages, is without a parallel in history. True, some of the greatest opponents of Jesuitism have come out of Jesuit schools. Luther, the former monk was the strongest antagonist of monastic righteousness; and Luther, the Augustinian, the strongest antagonist of intolerance, which St. Augustine unfortunately first established in theory in opposition to the Donatists; but not one of these contrasts reaches that miraculous transformation in which the glorified Christ, as with an ironical smile, changed the most formidable power of the enemy into His most victorious agency for conquest.

And yet this miracle, too, was conditioned by justice and truth. We must not ignore for the miraculous manifestation of Christ all connecting points of preparation in the unconscious spiritual life of Saul (as BAUMGARTEN has again done). This would be as partial and untenable as the opposite extreme of rationalistic writers, who vainly attempt to explain his conversion by psychological antecedents and extraordinary natural phenomena (see WINER, Real-Wörterbuch, art. Paulus). The history declares positively that the glorified Christ appeared to him; and we cannot interpret it in any other light. But Paul's own accounts show that the objective manifestation of Christ was mediated by a visionary or ecstatic elevation of Saul himself (Acts ix. 7; xxii. 9).

[The rationalistic interpretation, after having exploded in Germany, has been ingeniously renewed in France by E. RENAN, Les Apôtres, Paris, 1866, p. 181. There is a third view on the conversion of Paul, not mentioned by Dr. LANGE—the mythical—which resolves the event into a purely subjective process in Paul's own mind, and explains the supernatural light to be simply the symbolical expression of the certainty of the real spiritual presence of Christ in the Church and the believer. This view was ably defended by the late Dr. BAUR, of Tübingen, in his work on Paul, 1847, p. 68. But after a renewed investigation of the subject, the celebrated historian arrived at the conclusion that the conversion of Paul was an enigma, which cannot be satisfactorily solved by any psychological or dialectical analysis. See the second and revised edition of his work on Christianity and the Christian Church in the first three centuries, which appeared shortly before his death, a. 1860, p. 45, and the second edition of his Paul, edited by ZELLER, 1867. The character and apostolic life of Paul, and the very origin and continued existence of the Christian Church, is an inexplicable mystery without the miracle of the actual resurrection of our Saviour.—P. 8.]

OBSERVATIONS.—1. On the splendor of the city of Tarsus in culture and institutions of learning, see WINER, article Tarsus. Also the particulars concerning Gamaliel, by the same author [and in KITTO's and W. SMITH's Bible Dictionaries].

2. On the life of Paul in general, compare the article Paul in the various Bible dictionaries; the relevant chapters in NEANDER, SCHAFF, THIERSCH, and LANGE, on the Apostolic Age; the work, Die Biographien der Bibel, Stuttgart and Leipzig, 1838; and REUSS, Die Gesch. der heil. Schriften Neuen Testaments [4th ed., 1864], p. 45 ff., where a comprehensive catalogue of literature may be found. For particular references, see below.

3. The literary education of the Apostle has been much discussed. Comp. NIEMEYER, Charakteristik der Bibel; THALEMANN's treatise, De eruditione Pauli Judaica non Græca (and WINER, Real-Wörterbuch, ii. 218). The parents of Paul may have been prevented, by their religious prejudices, from sending their son to the brilliant Grecian schools in Tarsus; but it does not therefore follow that the vigorous mind of the youthful Paul did not become acquainted privately with the principles of Grecian learning. Possibly his parents may have sent him to Jerusalem for the very reason that they discovered in him a dangerous susceptibility for the charms of Grecian literature.—“Paul received a learned Jewish education in the school of the Pharisaean Rabbi, Gamaliel, not remaining an entire stranger to Greek literature, as his style, his dialectic method, his allusions to heathen religion and philosophy, and his occasional quotations from heathen poets show. Thus, a ‘Hebrew of the Hebrews,’ yet at the same time a native Hellenist and a Roman citizen, he combined in himself, so to speak, the three great nationalities of the ancient world, and was endowed with all the natural qualifications for a universal apostleship. He could argue with the Pharisees as a son of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin, as a disciple of the renowned Gamaliel, surnamed ‘the G'ory of the Law,’ and as one of the strictest of their sect. He could address the Greeks in their own beautiful tongue, and with the force of their strong logic. Clothed with the dignity and majesty of the Roman people, he could travel safely over the whole empire with the watchword: 'Civis Romanus sum.'" From PH. SCHAFF, History of Ancient Christianity, vol. i. p. 68. Comp. also CHARLES HODGE, Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, revised edition, first section of the Introduction: "His (Paul's) natural character was ardent, energetic, uncompromising, and severe. How his extravagance and violence were subdued by the grace of God, is abundantly evident from the moderation, mildness, tenderness, and conciliation manifested in all his epistles. Absorbed in the one object of glorifying Christ, he was ready to submit to any thing, and to yield any thing necessary for this purpose. He no longer insisted that others should think and act just as he did. So that they obeyed Christ, he was satisfied; and he willingly conformed to their prejudices, and tolerated their errors, so far as the cause of truth and righteousness allowed. By his early education, by his miraculous conversion and inspiration, by his natural disposition, and by the abundant grace of God, was this Apostle fitted for his work, and sustained under his multiplied and arduous labors."—P. S.]

5. On the conversion of the Apostle in particular, see the Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles, chap. ix. [p. 161, Am. ed.] The objectivity of the appearance of Christ is there justly maintained. But we should, in addition to it, make proper account of the element of a vision as the medium of the appearance of Christ. Here belongs also the treatise of C. P. B. The Preparation of Paul for the Apostolic Office, and his Apostolic Missionary Journeys to the time of his First Captivity in Rome.

A man of such mighty genius, notwithstanding his apostolic call, was not qualified for an evangelist immediately after his conversion. His first zeal would have been too stormy, too powerful, and too much the outburst of immoderate excitement. After his first attempt in Damascus, he had to withdraw to Arabia for a quiet stay of about three years (Gal. i.)—a period over which a veil is drawn. He probably spent it, not in missionary labor, but to greater advantage in contemplative life, although he may have made some single missionary efforts during this time (see LANGE's History of the Apost. Age, ii. p. 124). After his first attempt in Jerusalem, also, where Barnabas introduced him to the apostles, Paul was again required to retire to private life. But this time he chose Cilicia, his native country. We may infer from his character that he did not remain absolutely passive, but that he occasionally testified of Christ; yet he did not engage in apostolic labors in their strictest sense.

Barnabas sent for him to come from Cilicia to Antioch, to coöperate with him in that newly-arisen metropolis of Gentile Christianity (Acts xi. 25). Paul entered into the most intimate relations with the congregation of Gentile Christians living there, and the destination that he had received at his call to become the Apostle to the Gentiles (Acts ix. 15), now approached its fulfilment. But it was in accordance with the apostolic spirit that the Gentile Church should remain in perfect unity with the Jewish-Christian Church. This tendency toward unity was strengthened by the first mission of Paul to Jerusalem, in company with Barnabas (Acts xi. 30). We may therefore consider this mission as the introduction to the apostolic labors of the Apostle; and since it also constitutes one of the strongest chronological links in his career, we will now speak of the chronological relations of his life.

We pass over, as unreliable points of connection, the government of Damascus by the Arabian king Aretas (Acts ix.; 2 Cor. xi. 32), and the meeting of Paul with Aquila in Corinth, in consequence of the banishment of the latter from Rome by an edict of the Emperor Claudius (see WIESELER, Chronologie des Apostolischen Zeitalters, p. 167, and p. 125). The safest date at the beginning of the apostolic career of Paul is the year of the death of Herod Agrippa, A. D. 44 (JOSEPH., De bello Jud. ii. 11, 6); and the safest one at the end of the same is the recall of the procurator Felix from Judea in the year 60. The execution of James the Elder took place shortly before the death of Herod Agrippa (Acts xii. 2). About the same time, Paul and Barnabas went to Jerusalem as bearers of the collection taken at Antioch. If, according to the usual method, we reckon backward from this date, the year 44 (one year spent in Antioch, about one year in Jerusalem and Tarsus, three years in Arabia and Damascus), the conversion of Paul occurred about the year 39. Then, reckoning forward, let us fix the time of the Apostolic Council, under the supposition (which has been vainly contested)* that the journey described in Acts xv. is identical with that of Gal. ii. (see my Gesch. des Apost. Zeitalters, i. 99), and that the fourteen years which Paul reckons as occurring previous to this journey are to be numbered from his conversion. This being the case, the Apostolic Council occurred about the year 58.† The first missionary tour of the Apostle therefore took place between the years 44 or 45 and 52 or 53. The second and third were made between the years 53 and 59–60.

In reference to the more particular dates, compare the already mentioned work of WIESELER (whose parallel of Paul's journey mentioned in Acts xviii. 22, with that in Gal. ii., does not seem to be warranted); the article Paul in WINER; G. W. AGARDE, Von der Zeitrechnung der Lebensgeschichte des Apostels Paulus, etc., Stockholm, 1847. On the time of the ecstasy narrated in 2 Cor. xii. 7, compare my Apost. Zeitalter, ii. p. 8.

In regard to the credibility of the account of the Acts on the apostolic life of Paul, SCHNECKENBURGER maintained the hypothesis, that the author of that book converted the life of Paul from real historical materials into a parallel to the life of Peter. BAUR has outdone this hypothesis, and endeavored to carry out the hypercritical notion that the narrative of the Acts of the Apostles is an unhistorical production, written for the purpose of bringing about a compromise between Jewish Christianity and Gentile Christianity. On this vain attempt to convert the history of the Acts into a myth, or rather a conscious fiction, compare LECHLER, The Apostolic and Post-Apostolic Age, p. 6 ff.

There was no doubt a gradual approach of the two sections of apostolic Christianity, in harmony with the first fundamental principle of the Word made flesh and the working of the spirit of the apostolic history. Conscious of the essential unity of faith and hope, the Gentile Church moved towards the Jewish Church, as the Jewish Church sought and found the Gentile Church. It is from this point of view that we must study Paul's journeys to Jerusalem as they alternated with his missionary tours. Every new missionary journey to the heathen world was followed by a renewal of the bond of union with the parent society in Jerusalem; and the more deeply the Apostle penetrated the heathen world, and the more fully he kept the Gentile Church free from Jewish ordinances, the more decidedly did he afterward show, by his own conduct in Jerusalem, his respect for Jewish customs. Only those who are unable, like Paul, to distinguish between dogmatic and ethical rules, can find a contradiction in this fact, and especially in the diversity of requirements between Gal. ii. 16 and Acts xv. 20.

The farthest limit of the first missionary tour of the Apostle was Derbe, in Lycaonia, Asia Minor. The appointment of Barnabas and Saul in Antioch by the direction of the Holy Spirit, their ordination by the united act of the congregation and its leaders, the voyage to Cyprus, the triumph of Paul over the false prophet Bar-jesus, his change of name, the journey to Pamphylia, and the return of Mark, the apostolic attendant, the missionary address of the Apostle in the synagogue at Antioch in Pisidia, the persecutions on the part of the Jews in Antioch and Iconia, Paul's miracle at Lystra, and his success in Derbe: these are the prominent points of the first missionary tour. We must observe especially, 1. That the apostolic men at that time, as well as later, always directed their first attention to the Jews, and consequently entered the synagogue, although at Antioch, in Pisidia, an important crisis occurred in their zeal for Gentile missions (Acts xiii. 46); 2. that Paul, the younger messenger, appears more and more decidedly in the foreground; 3. that on their return the societies of converts were organized into fixed congregations, especially by the appointment of elders (Acts xiv. 23); 4. that the free spirit with which Paul carried on the missionary work among the Gentiles produced, in all probability, that reaction of the more rigid Jewish Christians which led to the first Apostolic Council, and Paul's journey to Jerusalem in connection therewith; 5. that the enmity of the Jews against the preaching of the two men, especially of Paul, became more intense from his expulsion (in Antioch) to the attempt to stone him (in Iconium), and to his real stoning (in Lystra).

* [By WIESELER who, in his very learned and able chronology of the Apostolic Age, identifies the visit mentioned, Gal. ii. 1, with the fourth journey of Paul to Jerusalem mentioned Acts xviii. 21, 22. He has defended his view in an Excursus to his Commentary to the Galatians, p. 532 ff. Compare against his view and in favor of the identity of the journey of Gal. ii. 1 with that to the Apostolic Council, Acts xv., my History of the Apost. Church, p. 245 ff.; and the Commentary on Gal. ii. 1.—P. S.]

† [The chronologists of the Apostolic Church differ in the date of the Council of Jerusalem from 47–53. WINER DE WETTE, WIESELER, SCHAFF, and ALFORD, put it in 50 or 51; OLSENHAUSEN, MEYER, EWALD, in 52.—P. S.]

On the change of Paul's name, various views have been advanced (see WINER, article Paul; SCHAFF, History of the Apost. Church, p. 226; comp. Com. on Ch. i. 1.). We are of the opinion that Saul, as a Roman citizen, was already in possession of a Roman name, but that, while at Cyprus, he was induced, not only by the friendship of Sergius Paulus, but especially by his antagonism to the false prophet who called himself Elymas the Sorcerer, the mighty magician, to term himself, as that man's conqueror in the name of the Lord, Paul the small man (so far as David's victory over Goliath had repeated itself here in a New Testament character); and particularly, also, because the Apostle, being now about to enter into active intercourse with the Grecian and Roman world, could travel more conveniently under a Roman name.

The second missionary journey passes over Asia Minor to Europe, and finds its farthest limit in Corinth. It is specially characterized by the following events: (1.) The separation of Paul and Barnabas on account of Mark, and the beginning of a separate and independent mission of Paul, in which he was followed at first by Silas, and later by Timothy and Luke; (2.) the tour of visitation into the earlier missionary field (Cyprus being passed over, and left to the care of Barnabas), which was changed into a new mission of colossal proportions; (3.) the harmonization of the body of Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians by means of the ethical principles established by the Church in Jerusalem (Acts xvi. 4); (4.) the new stations: Cilicia (before the repeated visit of the elder stations), then Phrygia, Galatia, Troas; after this in Europe: Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth; also the persecutions, which varied in strength in proportion to the greater or less results of the preaching of the gospel; (5.) the miraculous aid and manifestation of the Spirit, which led Paul to Europe (Acts xvi. 6, 7, 9); (6.) the contrast between the ministrations of the Apostle in Athens and in Corinth; but we err if we suppose that Paul corrected his learned discourse in Athens by his exclusive preaching of the Cross in Corinth; (7.) the meeting of Paul with Aquila and Priscilla in Corinth, which so greatly affected his subsequent mission; (8.) the longer stay of the Apostle in Corinth, and the importunities of the Jews against him in the presence of the deputy, Gallio; (9.) the new journey of the Apostle to Jerusalem for the accomplishment of a vow, during which he touches at Ephesus, and there makes preparation for his mission by leaving behind Aquila and Priscilla.

The third missionary tour is so far an enlargement of the second, as that Paul at this time makes Ephesus, in Asia Minor, his great object, which city he had been compelled to pass by in his journey, and which he could only touch at on his return. Apollos was his pioneer here, and the silversmith Demetrius became his principal opponent. His victory was, on the one hand, a triumph over the nocturnal magic of this city dedicated to Diana, the goddess of the Moon; and, on the other, over idolatry. This journey, which was at first supplementary in its design, assumed the character of a visitation; for Paul departed from Ephesus, and again visited the congregations in Macedonia and Greece. The supposition of a third missionary visit to the Corinthian church between the second and third missionary tours has been shown, in a variety of ways, to rest upon a misunderstanding (see my Apost. Age, i. p. 199). The third missionary journey is characterized by the more decided prominence of the missionary calculation and self-determination of the Apostle (see 1 Cor. xvi. 5; 2 Cor. i. 15); by his miraculous works, especially in Ephesus and Troas (Acts xviii. 11; xx. 10); by the establishment of a metropolis of the church of Asia Minor, which was destined to become the home of John, and the maternal city of Christian speculation; by the founding of a larger association and Pauline school; and finally, by the decided premonition of his captivity which the Apostle felt, as he drew his missionary journey to a close, and entered upon his pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

The performance of a Nazarite vow in Jerusalem (a step counselled by James) grew, from a measure of accommodation to the narrow views of the Jewish Christians, into an offence on the part of the Jews. It led to the persecution of the Apostle in Jerusalem, his abduction and imprisonment in Cæsarea, his appeal to the judgment-seat of Cæsar, and his transportation to Rome (in the year 62; according to AUGER and WINER, in the spring of 61). From this captivity he was released (in the year 64), not only according to the testimony of tradition (EUSEB., ii. 22: λόγος ἔχει, CYRILL. HIEROS., HIERONYMUS, etc.; see WINER), but also according to certain hints of the Scriptures, yet only, after a new journey for missions and visitation, to fall into a second imprisonment, and to suffer martyrdom under Nero.

OBSERVATIONS.—1. For a statement of relevant literature, see REUSS, l. c., p. 54, 55, 56 sqq. [SMITH, Dict. of the B., art. Paul, at the close, vol. iii. 768].

2. Ananias at Damascus, a predecessor of Barnabas for the introduction of Paul into the Church of Christ, as Stephen had been a predecessor of Paul himself.

3. Paul's three years of instruction in the quiet solitude of Arabia, a counterpart and parallel to the three years of instruction spent by the twelve apostles in intercourse with the Lord. The latter was an external and historical communion; that of Paul was undoubtedly of a mysterious and internal character, and kindred to the great mysterious fact of his conversion. See my Apost. Age, ii. p. 123. [SCHAFF, H. of the Ap. Ch. p. 236; and Com. on Gal. i. 17.]

4. The development of the Apostle's consciousness of his specific call to the Gentiles was gradual, and commensurate with the gradual definiteness of his call to the apostolic office in general. This may be seen from Acts ix. 15, 29; comp. xxii. 21; xiii. 46; xix. 9; xxviii. 17 sqq.; Gal. ii. But this call to the Gentiles did not exclude a purpose to convert the Jews; for not only must he first seek in the synagogues those heathen who were susceptible hearers of his message, especially the proselytes of the gate (Acts xiii. 48), but Paul also recognized the conversion of the Gentiles, apart from their personal salvation, as a means for the conversion of Israel (Rom. xi. 13, 14). The gradual development of his apostolic knowledge by virtue of continued revelations and illuminations, was not precluded by the Apostle's preparation, derived from a historical knowledge of the Holy Scriptures and of the life of Jesus, and by his great miraculous illumination when his call occurred.

5. On the person of Barnabas; on Cilicia, Antioch, Asia Minor, etc., see the relevant articles in the Biblical dictionaries. Also the introductions to the respective parts of this Commentary. On Antioch in particular, see my Apost. Age, ii. p. 158.

6. The reciprocal action between the three missionary journeys of the Apostle, and his pilgrimage to Jerusalem at the close of each of these journeys, are in themselves sufficient to overthrow as an untenable fiction BAUR's hypothesis above alluded to.

7. On the identity of the fact related in Gal. ii. with that narrated in Acts xv., see REUSS, p. 55, and SCHAFF's History of the Apost. Church, p. 245 ff.

8. The relation of the apostolic deliberations in Acts xv. to the so-called Noachian commands, is also maintained by REUSS, l. c., p. 56. See thereon my Apost. Age, ii. p. 184. REUSS maintains that Acts xv. 21 avows the validity of the law for the Jewish Christians. But the absence of all dogmatic obligation in the same passage is very plain from the transactions of the apostolic council. Yet, as far as the national and ethical validity of the same is concerned, it was in perfect harmony with the apostolic spirit that the continuance of the law should not be violently abrogated. For the relevant literature, see REUSS, p. 56.

9. For a catalogue of the friends and followers of the Apostle, see the same, p. 58.

10. The Apostle's missionary method and policy: (1.) A prudent adjustment of his universal mission to the Gentile world, even to Rome, and the western limit of the Old World (Spain), to the primitive historical trunk of Christianity in Jerusalem—that is, the incorporation of the missionary spirit with the vital power of the Church. (2.) Perception of the historical links for communicating the gospel to the world. Therefore he first turned his attention to the Jews, and rose in their synagogues, but made full account of the prejudices of the Jews, and the receptibility of the heathen for Christianity. Therefore he embraced in his view, and also seized upon, the points of connection in the Gentile world (see his address at Athens on the inscription of an altar), and with equal clearness he discovered and opposed all real barriers to the truth (righteousness by works among the Jews; luxurious life in Corinth, 1 Cor. i. 2; and the gloomy sorcery of superstition in Ephesus). (3.) Most careful observance of Divine guidance to go forward or to hold back (Acts xvi. 6, 9; xxv. 10; Rom. i. 13, etc.). (4.) Careful consolidation of his missionary work, by instituting congregational offices, and the organization of congregations (Acts xiv. 22, 23), and promoting the inner unity of the churches by their community of prayer and love (see especially the Epistle to the Philippians). (5.) A comprehensive and free use of all chosen companions in faith for coöperation in the form of helpers, evangelists, messengers, and pioneers in a general sense. He is surrounded by his helpers; he sends them out upon new paths; he leaves them behind in churches already organized. That they may be strengthened and encouraged, the spirits of the gospel come and go in his presence, just as the messengers come and go at the court of a prince; he sets all the powers of faith in motion, in order to set all the world in motion. (6.) He greatly advances the personal usefulness of himself and of his coadjutors, by his apostolical epistles. (7.) The marvellous concentration, development, and elaboration of his doctrine in a manner adapted to the necessities of the congregations, and in perfect harmony with a most careful preservation of the fundamental character of his doctrine. The rock-like steadfastness and adherence to the doctrine of free grace, united with that most faithful development which is exhibited also in his style as a progressive creative power, producing a rich treasure of ἀπαξ λεγόμενα. (8.) The supplementing of his burning activity by sacred retreats, when he sank even into the depths of visionary contemplation; likewise his union of apostolic consecration to the demand of the moment (see his Epistle to Philemon) with his all-embracing care for the whole Church and for its whole future.

11. On the three missionary tours and the life of the Apostle, and the particular events of the same, compare the Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles, and the well-known works of NEANDER, SCHAFF, THIERSCH, and EWALD, on the Apostolic Age, and the literature referred to by REUSS, p. 59 sqq.

C. The Second Imprisonment and the Martyrdom of Paul.

The second imprisonment has been lately discarded even by theologians who accept the authenticity of the Pastoral Epistles, such as WÆSELER, EBRARD, SCHAFF, THIERSCH (see my Apost. Age, ii. p. 374). Yet we still hold to the testimony of the old ecclesiastical tradition for the following reasons: (1.) because the Acts of the Apostles concludes at the time when the first imprisonment of Paul must have come to an end, without taking any cognizance of his death; (2.) because the Apostle himself, about the end of this period, anticipated his deliverance (Phil. ii. 24); (3.) because the Pastoral Epistles—whose Pauline character cannot be doubted if we take into the account an advanced development of Christianity of some years' duration—cannot be comprehended in the early career of Paul down to the year 64, without great violence; and the same is the case still more with the Apostle's stay in Crete (Tit. i.); (4.) because the development of the germs of Ebionism and Judaizing Gnosticism, which are taken cognizance of in the Pastoral Epistles, is clearly indicated by the Epistles of the Apostle written some years earlier, during his imprisonment from 62 to 64, but had not gained the strength which they possessed at the time when the Pastoral Epistles were composed; (5.) because the tradition of the Church distinguishes positively between the judicial execution of Peter and Paul, and the first great persecution of the Christians as a body under Nero; (6.) the testimony of the Roman Clement (1 Cor. v.), that Paul came ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα τῆς δίσεως καὶ μαρτυρήσας ἐπὶ τῶν ἡγουμένων, having been written in Rome, cannot refer to Rome, and supports the tradition, harmonizing with the purpose of the Apostle (Rom. xv. 24), that Paul visited Spain after his deliverance (comp. my Apost. Age, ii. p. 386).*

* [The passage of Clement of Rome, which has given rise to different interpretations, must be translated thus "Paul . . . having come to the limit (ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα, not: before the highest tribunal, ὅπου τὸ τέρμα) of the West, and having died a martyr under the rulers (others: having borne witness before the rulers), he departed from the world and went to the holy place, having furnished the sublimest model of endurance." The dispute about the true reading in the passage (somewhat obliterated)—ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα or ὅπου τὸ τέρμα τῆς δίσεως—is now settled in favor of ἐπὶ by the testimony of Professors JACOBSON and TISCHENDORF, who have carefully re-examined the only extant and defective MS. of the

If we may judge from intimations in the Pastoral Epistles, Paul hastened, after his deliverance, first to Ephesus, where the Christian truth was threatened by the first development of Christian heresy. We cannot decide whether he was permitted to visit Jerusalem once more on this journey, as was anticipated by the Epistle to the Hebrews, and might be expected from the three visits of his earlier missionary tours. From Ephesus he went to Macedonia and Greece; then over Troas and Miletus to Crete. Afterwards he proceeded to Epirus, where he spent the winter in Nicopolis, and subsequently left Titus. He then directed his course westward, to the τέρμα τῆς δίοσεως, where he was probably seized and taken a prisoner to Rome, before being able to found another permanent organization [in Spain].⁴ Meanwhile, Peter either came or was brought to Rome, and both suffered martyrdom there together (according to Clement of Rome, Irenæus, Tertullian, etc.; see the article Peter, in HERZOG's Real-Encyclopædie). The Roman Church celebrates the death of Peter and Paul on the same day—the 29th of June.

[The views on the year of Paul's martyrdom vary from 64 to 68. This question depends, of course, mainly on the question of the second captivity. WIESELER contends for the year 64, shortly before the great Neronian persecution (the only one properly authenticated by historical evidence), which broke out, according to Tacitus, Annal., xv. 44, in consequence of the conflagration, July 19th, 64; but the general tradition of the Church connects Paul's and Peter's martyrdom with this persecution, which probably gave rise to several isolated executions afterwards. If we adopt the hypothesis of a second imprisonment, we may arrive at a more definite result by referring the ἡγούμενοι in the famous passage of Clemens Rom. (1 Cor. v., μαρτυρήτους ἐπὶ τῶν ἡγουμένων, sub præfectis martyrium subiens), either (with HUG, Intr. ii. 828, HEFELE, Patres Apost., p. 61, 4th ed., and DÖLLINGER) to Tigellinus and Nymphidius Sabinus, or (with PEARSON) to Helius Cæsarianus and Polycletus, who in the last years of Nero, especially during his absence in Greece, A. D. 67, had charge of the government in Rome. In this case we get the year 67 or 68 for the martyrdom of Paul; and this agrees with the Catholic tradition based upon EUSEBIUS and JEROME (who, in his Catal. Script., says most explicitly of Paul: "Hic ergo decimo quarto Neronis anno—i. e., A. D. 68—eodem die quo Petrus Romæ pro Christo capite truncatus sepultusque est, in Via Ostiensis"). The Basilica of St. Paul, in commemoration of his martyrdom, now stands outside the walls of Rome (San Paolo fuori de' muri), on the road to Ostia, and the Porta Ostiensis is called the gate of St. Paul. The traditional spot of his martyrdom, however, is a little distance from the Basilica, where there are three chapels, called The Three Fountains (Tre Fontane), in commemoration of the legend that three fresh fountains miraculously gushed forth from the blood of Paul's head as it was cut off by the executioner, and leaped three times from the ground

Clementine Epistle to the Corinthians in the British Museum. See JACOBSON, Patres Apost. in loc. (Oxon., new ed., 1863), and THOMENDORF, Appendix codicum celeb. Sin. Vat. Alex., etc., Lips. 1867. This sets aside WIESELER's interpretation of τέρμα—supreme power, highest tribunal of the West (i. e., the Emperor of Rome), into which I myself was betrayed in my History of the Apostolic Church, p. 342 (Am. ed.), and which I now retract. Although τέρμα in itself may mean supreme power, it can hardly do so in connection with the geographical term δίοσις. At all events ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα τῆς δίοσεως must here be rendered: to the limit of the West; and this, in the mouth of Clement who wrote from Rome, points more naturally, though by no means necessarily, to Spain (or Gaul or Britain) than to Rome, especially in view of the fact that Paul intended to visit Spain, Rom. xv. 24 ff. Clement therefore may be quoted with tolerably good reason as the first witness to the ancient tradition (first clearly stated by EUSEBIUS, H. E. ii. 25: λόγος ἔχει, etc.) of a second Roman captivity of Paul; for before his first captivity there is no room for a journey to Spain.—P. 8.]

* [There is not the slightest historical trace of the labors of Paul in Spain, much less in Britain. The early tradition of his journey to Spain is inferred from Clement's τέρμα τῆς δίοσεως, and seems to be obscurely implied in the mutilated Muratori fragment on the Canon; but it may have originated in a premature conclusion from the Apostle's desire to visit that country, Rom. xv. 24, 28. Nevertheless such a journey, which was certainly intended, may have been executed, and rendered comparatively fruitless by difficulties thrown in his way, or by a speedy return. EWALD (Apost. Zeitalter, 2d ed., 1858, p. 681) suggests that Paul, on hearing in Spain of the terrors of the Neronian persecution, hastened of his own accord back to Rome to bear testimony to Christ, and being seized there, was again brought to trial and condemned to death in 68. HOWSON (The Life and Letters of St. Paul, ii. 460 ff., 482 ff.; Lond. ed.), in following and extending the combinations of NEANDER, assumes that Paul, after his liberation in 63, first visited the East (Philem. ver. 22; Phil. ii. 21), then Spain by an unknown route, after about two years again returned to the East (Ephesus, Macedonia, Crete) was arrested at Nicopolis, forwarded to Rome for a second trial, probably on the charge of having instigated the Roman Christians to their supposed act of incendiarism (!) which caused the terrible persecution in 64, and suffered martyrdom early in June, 68, shortly before the death of Nero.—P. 8.]

("abscisso Pauli capite triplici saltu sese sustollente," Acta Sanct., vol. vii., sub June 29th.) This legend is less credible than the beautiful legend connected with Peter's death and perpetuated in the little church of Domine quo vadis, on the Appian Way. OBSERVATIONS.—1. On the treatises for and against the second captivity of Paul, see WINER, Real-Lexic., ii. p. 221, and SCHAFF, Hist. of the Apost. Church, § 87, pp. 828–848. The second captivity is also advocated by the work of L. RUFFET, Saint Paul; sa double captivité à Rome, Paris, 1860; and by GAMS, Das Jahr des Martyrtodes der Apostel Petrus und Paulus, Regensburg, 1867. He puts the martyrdom of Peter in the year 65; that of Paul in the year 67. [VAN OOSTERZEE (Com. on the Pastoral Epistles), EWALD (History of Israel, vol. vi., or Hist. of the Apost. Age, 2d ed. of 1858), BLEEK (Introd. to the N. T., 1862), HUTHER (Com. on the Epp. to Timothy and Titus in MEYER's Com., 8d ed. 1866), CONYBEARE and HOWSON, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, WORDSWORTH, and most of the English commentators on Paul, likewise favor the second Roman captivity. (WORDSWORTH, in the interest of Anglicanism, defends even Paul's journey to Britain as well as to Spain). On the other hand, C. W. OTTO (in his learned and astute work, Die historischen Verhältnisse der Pastoralbriefe, Lips. 1860), NIEDNER (Kirchengeschichte, 1866, p. 114), MEYER (Rom. p. 13 ff.), and again WIESELER (in his learned article on the Epistles to Timothy and Titus, in the last supplementary vol. of HERZOG's Encycl., 1866, vol. xxi. p. 276 ff.), oppose the hypothesis of a second Roman captivity of Paul. Adhuc sub iudice lis est.—P. S.]

2. Further on the necessity of admitting a second captivity of Paul, see in the Bible-Work, The Pastoral Epistles, by Dr. VAN OOSTERZEE, 2d ed., Introduction (Am. ed. vol. viii.), and my Apost. Zeitalter, ii. p. 386. Critical prejudices are often propagated, while the original motives and reasons are lost sight of, although such reasons, sprung, as they frequently are, from original misconceptions, have lost their apparent importance in the course of time. For example, the criticism against the second part of Zechariah has very clearly arisen from a misunderstanding. Thus many negations in the department of New Testament exegesis have arisen from some caprice of SCHLEIERMACHER, some fancy of DE WETTE, some rationalistic short-sightedness or some fixed idea of BAUR, produced by the Hegelian theory of an officious construction of history.

[The question of the second Roman captivity of Paul is simply a historical problem, which has no doctrinal or ethical bearing, and which, in the absence of sufficient data, can never be solved with mathematical certainty. Those who, like WIESELER, THIERSCH, NIEDNER, OTTO, and others, hold fast to the Pauline origin of the Pastoral Epistles, lose nothing by denying a second captivity and trial; they save the whole extent of Paul's known labors, and only compress them into a smaller number of years, thus intensifying rather than diminishing his activity. It must be admitted, however, that the hypothesis of a second captivity offers a considerable advantage in the defence and exposition of the Pastoral Epistles; for it is much more difficult to find a suitable place before than after the first Roman captivity of Paul for the composition of these epistles, and a number of historical facts therein assumed (such as a missionary journey of Paul to Crete, Tit. i. 5; a visit to Troas, 2 Tim. iv. 13; a pretty advanced state in the development of church organization, and of heresy, 1 Tim. iii.–vi.), and to understand their farewell tone and general spirit, as compared with the earlier writings of the Apostle.—P. S.]

D. The Character of the Apostle.

The character of the Apostle reflects itself in his work, as in his Epistles, and appears before us in the energetic and harmonious contrasts of a great apostolic spirit. He was as frank in his deep humility as the sincerest penitent (Phil. iii. 6), and equally joyous in his acclamations over the all-prevailing faith unto salvation (2 Cor. xii. 10); steadfast in adherence to his convictions (Gal. i. 16), and at the same time cautious, considerate, and master of the finest and purest policy (Acts xxiii. 6, 7); full of enthusiasm, able to speak wondrously in tongues, and to rise to visionary and ecstatic states of mind (1 Cor. xiv. 18 comp. my Apost. Zeitalter, i. p. 199 sqq.), and yet unwearied in active practical labors; speculative, profound, and at the same time a man of the people and a servant of the congregation; heroically strong and outspoken, and yet as tender and refined in feeling and taste as a virgin (comp. his Epistles to the Philippians and to Philemon); eagle-like in his universal view and work, but not less considerate in his regard and care for the smallest details; an imperious and commanding character, and yet the most dutiful servant of the Church; a cultivated rabbinical theologian, and at the same time a modest workman at a trade; burning in his love for the Lord and his brethren, and for this very reason overpowering in his moral indignation and rebuke of all that was opposed to the honor of his Master; a great Jew inflamed by a tragic sympathy with the Jewish people (Rom. ix. 2 ff., comp. 2 Cor. xii. 7), and nevertheless the most bitter opponent of all Pharisaism, old and new; of all the apostles the most hated, and yet the most beloved and popular; the most misinterpreted and misconceived (by Antinomians, Marcionites, Paulicians, etc.), and at the same time the most studied and expounded. Thus Paul has developed the most magnificent life of a hero, whom the world could neither bend nor conquer, but whom Christ overcame with a miraculous glance of his glorious revelation. (Comp. SCHAFF's Hist. of the Apost. Church, p. 441 f.)

Concerning the apostolic position of Paul, two points are to be observed in particular. First of all is the fact that he did not belong to the apostles of the first foundation of Christianity, but that he was charged with the apostolate of the first historical growth and expansion of Christianity into a universal character as the religion of the whole human race. He therefore has become, in an emphatic sense, the Apostle of evangelical reform in all succeeding periods of the Church. Secondly, the great opposition presented by the Pauline apostolate to all external legalism and stagnation in Christianity, is expressly declared in his call. He was not of the number of the historical disciples, witnesses, and chosen ones of the historical Christ; not a member of the apostolic college established by Christ during his pilgrimage on earth. Hurling down as an enemy by the risen Lord in a heavenly vision, he arose at once as a witness of faith and as one of the apostles, and received his apostolic authority only in heavenly voices from the Church (Acts ix. 15); in his visions (Acts xxii. 21); in his commission from Antioch, the mother church of Gentile Christianity; in the living epistles which the Holy Spirit wrote in the form of vigorous churches of his planting (2 Cor. iii. 2 ff.); and in the decided recognition by the first apostles of the Lord (Acts xv.; Gal. ii.).

His apostolate remained doubtful to a great number of traditional Jewish Christians; the most rigid Jewish Christians rejected it, and persecuted him; and the later Ebionites loaded his memory with scorn, as an errorist and a heretic. The legalistic Christianity of the Middle Ages, while professing the highest respect for the name of Paul, has persecuted his doctrines as they have been exhibited in the principles of the Reformation, in the form of Jansenism, in the history of Port Royal, and in many other ways. Even in the Protestant evangelical Church there obtains a legalistic high-churchism, which, while it adheres to external legitimacy, traditionalism, and legalism, is opposed to the principles of Christianity, and especially to the apostolate and doctrine of Paul.

But, on the other hand, the antinomianism of all Christian ages has been based on a misunderstanding and misinterpretation of his doctrines. Amid these opposite extremes, there courses the mighty stream of pure blessings with which the Lord, by His Spirit, has sealed the testimony of the great Apostle to the Gentiles, and with which He will seal it to the end of time.

Thus Paul will still maintain his position with the other apostles in the Church of Christ. Yet we would not deny the measure of truth in the view of SCHELLING, that, as far as the prevailing type of the Church is concerned, the Petrine Church of the Middle Ages was followed by the Pauline Church of Protestantism, and that the perfection will hereafter appear in the Church of the Johannine type. It would be a great misunderstanding, however, to conceive of this type as a syncretism of Judaizing legalism and Pauline freedom. The higher synthesis of the genuine Petrine and the genuine Pauline theology can only be found in the deeper ideal development of the revelation of the law and the Spirit, as set forth by John.

OBSERVATIONS.—1. The natural disposition of the Apostle must be characterized as an even harmony of various temperaments and gifts in genial fulness and strength, and inspired by a heroic energy and vitality of soul. By virtue of this energetic vitality the same man could always remain consistent and true, and yet become all things to all men; he could stand and shine first in this and then in that pole of his wonderful endowments; at this moment in ecstasy, at the next as a practical man of action; now reminding us of the contemplativeness of a John, then of the fiery energy of a Peter; now musically lyrical in style, then acutely dialectical even to the subtlest distinctions; though possessing a tragical national sympathy for his people in his heart—the depth where his natural melancholy was reflected and transformed—he was as susceptible of joyous sentiments as a child, or rather as a man in Christ, in whom the freshest impulses of a sanguine temper were consecrated to God. And how powerful he was in holy indignation and wrath! If the phlegmatic temperament consisted in cold indifference and dulness of spirit, Paul would be entirely free from it; but if we understand by it a natural disposition to perseverance, and tough tenacity, we must see that in this respect also he was richly endowed. His endowments reciprocally equalized and attempered themselves in his person as charismata, or gifts of the Spirit, as he himself desired (1 Cor. xii.) that all the various endowments should harmonize and concentrate in the Church.

2. The rich literature in connection with Paul and his theology is enumerated in the bibliographical works of WALCH (Bibl. Theol., iv. p. 662 sqq.); WINER (Handbuch der theol. Literatur, i. p. 252 ff., pp. 294, 567; Supplement, p. 39); DANZ (Universalsörterbuch der theol. Literatur, p. 740 ff.; Supplement, p. 30); in the well-known Introductions to the New Testament [by DE WETTE, CREDNER, REUSS, BLEEK, GUERICKE, DAVIDSON], as well as the appropriate commentaries. Besides, we must also compare the works on the Apostolic Age by NEANDER, SCHAFF, THIERSCH, LANGE, LECHLER, RITSCHL, EWALD; also the works [of SCHMIET, VAN OOSTERZEE, etc.] on the Biblical theology of the New Testament. Against BAUR's Apostle Paul [2d edition, by ZELLER, 1867, in 2 vols.] is especially directed the work of LECHLER, already referred to [also, in great part, WIESELER, on the Chronology of the Apost. Age]. Of the many practical works on the Apostle Paul, we may mention: MENKEN, Glances into the Life of the Apostle Paul and the First Christian Congregation (Bremen, 1828); AD. MONOD, The Apostle Paul, Five Sermons (2d ed., German, Elberfeld, 1858 [also in English]); NAUMANN, Paulus—The First Victories of Christianity (Leipzig); BESSER, Paul (Leipzig, 1861); M. KÄHLER, Paul, the Servant and Messenger of Jesus of Nazareth (Halle, 1862); OSWALD, The Missionary Work of Paul (2d ed., Stuttg., 1864); HAUSRATH (semi-rationalistic), The Apostle Paul (Heidelberg, 1865). The life of the great Apostle has also been illustrated by poems, songs, and dramas. [Of English works, besides those already mentioned, PALEY's Horæ Paulinæ, Lord LYTTLETON on the Conversion of St. Paul, and JAMES SMITH's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul (London, 1848), deserve special mention as illustrating particular points, and strongly corroborating the historical character of the Acts and the Epistles. The instructive and entertaining descriptive work of CONYBEARE and HOWSON is generally known in America as well as in England, and admirably adapted for the theological lay reader. Comp. also the literature at the close of the article Paul in SMITH's Dictionary of the Bible.—P. S.]

§ 3. THE EPISTLES OF PAUL.

A. Their Historical Order.

If we except the Pastoral Letter of the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem about the year 53 [50], the two Epistles to the Thessalonians are the oldest New Testament epistles. They were written from Corinth in the year 54 or 55, not long after the establishment of the congregation, and in consequence of the chiliastic excitement of the same during the second missionary journey of the Apostle. The Epistle to the Galatians was written about 56–57, in Ephesus, during the third missionary journey. The two Epistles to the Corinthians were written by Paul from Ephesus and Macedonia, about the year 58; and soon afterwards, about the year 59, he composed the Epistle to the Romans, from Corinth. Between the years 62–64, if not a little earlier, the Epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon were written; and toward the close of the first Roman captivity, the Epistle to the Philippians. A little later still, the Epistle to the Hebrews proceeded from the company of Paul, about contemporaneously with the Gospel of Luke and the Acts of the Apostles. The First Epistle to Timothy and the Epistle to Titus must be assigned to the interval between the first and second captivity, 64–66. The last of the Pauline Epistles, the Second to Timothy, was written about the year 67. As to the untenableness of the hypothesis of a Third Epistle to the Corinthians, as well as of an Epistle to the Laodiceans, different from the Epistle to the Ephesians, comp. my Apost. Zeitalter, i. p. 205 [and Dr. WING, in Com. on 2 Corinthians, p. 7—P. S.].

OBSERVATIONS.—1. Compare the Introductions to the commentaries on the various Pauline Epistles.

2. Several critics (SCHULZ, SCHNECKENBURGER, SCHOTT, WIGGERS, THIERSCH, REUSS, MEYER, SCHENKEL) are of the opinion that the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, and that to Philemon, were written during the captivity of Paul at Cæsarea. The principal argument is made to lie in the circumstances relating to the slave Onesimus, who ran away from his master. Onesimus, it is assumed, could more easily have escaped from Colosse to the neighboring Cæsarea, than to distant Rome. But why did not, then, Onesimus flee to some place which lay still nearer at hand? We could well imagine that a slave in Colosse would have a more decided disposition to escape to the world's metropolis—the refuge of fortune-seekers and adventurers—than to Cæsarea. Besides, in a sea-voyage it makes little difference whether the distance be long or short. It is easier for a German fugitive to flee by sea to America, than by land to Spain. All remarks on the probably greater expenses of the voyage to Rome, and on the probably greater strictness in Rome, are as inconclusive as the principal argument. The other argument is derived from the following circumstance: If Tychicus, according to the usual supposition, had made the journey from Rome to Colosse with Onesimus, then the two travellers must first have arrived at Ephesus. But now the Apostle, in Eph. vi. 21, where he recommends Tychicus to the Ephesians, makes no mention of Onesimus, while the same Onesimus is mentioned and heartily recommended, Col. iv. 9. But the latter fact admits of a simple explanation. The poor Onesimus was at home in Colosse, and must now be received as a Christian by the congregation there. To this end he certainly needed the recommendation of the Apostle. But of what use could be the recommendation of the Colossian slave to the Ephesian church, for which he had no signification whatever? If we maintain that the Epistle to the Ephesians was an encyclical letter to those congregations of Asia Minor which were subsequently grouped definitely in a cycle, then the strange assumption that Onesimus must have been introduced to all the seven churches, will appear still more strange. In the first argument we miss all traces of the sea-breeze; in the second, all evidence of apostolic decorum. Moreover, it would be very difficult to prove that the way from Cæsarea must have led by Colosse to Ephesus, and not vice-versa, if one will only remember the advantages of a sea-voyage. We will direct attention to only one of the reasons for the composition of the already-mentioned Epistles in Rome. The Apostle, before his imprisonment, Rom. i. 10, had informed the Romans that he was just then about to come to them;—now, should he have forgotten this solemn promise in Cæsarea, under delusive hopes of a speedy deliverance, and engaged lodgings among the Colossians (Philemon, ver. 22)? But the chief argument, in our opinion, lies in the very advanced development of the churches of Asia Minor both in sin and righteousness, as it is reflected in those Epistles. Such a development presupposes at least a period of from three to four years.

B. Their Contents.

Every Epistle of the Apostle bears the imprint of a historical occasion, by which the contents of the same are shaped.

The congregation at Thessalonica was misled, amid its persecutions, into a chiliastic excitement; hence the Epistles addressed to it partake of an eschatological character.

The Epistle to the Galatians is chiefly soteriological, or an exposition of the righteousness of faith, in opposition to the Judaistic righteousness of works, which was urged by the false Galatian teachers.

The Epistle to the Romans is also soteriological, but in view of the more general antagonism between grace and the righteousness of faith, to the general corruption which we observe in the mutual self-boasting of heathen Christians and Jewish Christians.

The Epistles to the Corinthians possess an ecclesiastical character, since the First Epistle indicates the true Church, with polemical reference to the disturbances and corruptions in the life of the congregation; while the Second establishes the true ministerial office, in apologetic self-defence against the attacks of his personal opponents.

The Epistles to the Colossians and to the Ephesians bear a decidedly christological impress; the former brings out chiefly the ante-mundane (pre-existent) and exclusive mediatorship and glory of Christ, in opposition to the Colossian errorists; the latter establishes mainly His subsequent exaltation over all things, in opposition to dogmatic perversions and dimensions.

The Epistle to the Philippians has a christological-pastoral and prominently ethical charac ter, in so far as the Apostle makes the favorite congregation of Philippi his special co-workers in his apostolic office; and in order to make that congregation ethically complete, he holds up for its imitation the life of Christ.

The Epistle to Philemon is decidedly pastoral, with special reference to the care of souls.

Of the three Pastoral Epistles, properly so called, the First to Timothy, as well as that to Titus, were above all designed as the apostolic regulation for pastoral church government; and the Second Epistle to Timothy was prominently designed as the apostolic rule for the pastoral conduct and call.

OBSERVATIONS.—1. The specific fundamental thoughts that control every one of the Pauline Epistles (as of the Biblical works in general), are still very much neglected, to the injury of a truly organic, anatomical, synthetical and analytical exegesis. These writings are often not only treated as dead objects, but they are dissected in every direction, as if they were destitute of all organic structure.

2. Dr. BAUR is not only frequently surprised when he finds a new Pauline Epistle containing something new, but he makes this point a means of suspicion.

C. Their Genuineness.

On the verifications of the Pauline Epistles by the testimony of Church history, compare the passage in the New Testament, 2 Peter iii. 15, and the testimonies of the Fathers, as KIRCHHOFFER has collected them in his Quellensammlung for the history of the New Testament Canon, down to Jerome (Zürich, 1842), and as they have been treated in the introductory works of OREDNER, REUSS, GUERICKE, and others, as well as in the respective commentaries. On the apocryphal literature connected with the name of Paul, see WINER, ii. p. 222.

Among these pseudo-Pauline works, deserve especial mention the spurious correspondence between Paul and Seneca the philosopher, which is contained in the apocryphal collection of FABRICIUS, ii. p. 880 ff.; and an imaginary third Epistle of the Apostle to the Corinthians, composed as a substitute for one which was imagined to be lost (see my Apost. Zeitalter, i. p. 205), together with a spurious epistle of the Corinthians to Paul, which therefore proceeded from a misunderstanding (see DE WETTE, Einl., p. 271). The false conjecture of a special Epistle to the Laodiceans, on the ground of a misunderstanding of Col. iv. 16 (where we are to understand rather the Epistle to the Ephesians as intended also for Laodicea, the last of the Ephesian cycle of congregations), has given rise to a fictitious Epistle to the Laodiceans (see my Apost. Zeitalter, ii. p. 211). Certain critics have missed also another Epistle to the Philippians (DE WETTE, p. 271). Compare the article in HERZOG's Real-Encyclopædie, Pseudepigraphen des Neuen Testaments. The false Acts, which have been attributed to Paul, are: Acta Petri et Pauli; Acta Pauli et Thecla. The Ebionites, moreover, have caricatured the portrait of the Apostle Paul in the most shameful manner, and stamped him with the likeness of a heresiarch (see NEANDER, Kirchengesch., 8d ed., i. 198).

APPENDIX.—The criticism of the school of BAUR proceeds really on two pre-suppositions, with which the founder has alienated himself from the Christian standpoint, and surrendered himself fully to a pantheistic philosophy. BAUR has evidently designed to compensate for his want of respect for the matter and spirit of revelation, by a superstitious yielding to the masters of science; and his success was facilitated by the fact that his great learning and subtle acuteness, or his mere scholarly attainments, have served to hide his far greater incapacity of judgment concerning the phenomena of actual life; and that gravity of his inquiry and method has blinded the readers to his frivolous undervaluing of the religious and even of the moral spirit of the Biblical writings. His superstitious veneration for the mere method and forms of science was already apparent in his Symbolik und Mythologie, which he wrote while yet a follower of SCHLEIERMACHER, in the years 1824-'25. To whom else than to him could it ever have occurred to divide such a historical work after the scheme of SCHLEIERMACHER's Dogmatics, and to describe, first, "the pure and universal feeling of independence," and then "the antithesis of sin and grace which enter into the religious consciousness?" Such a disciple of SCHLEIERMACHER, after he had become a follower of HEGEL, must, with the same slavish superstition for science, and with the same want of perception of the peculiarity of the object pervert, by his Ebionitic hypothesis, the evangelical and apostolic history, according to the Hegelian misconception of the development of life and history. Under such circumstances there could, of course, be no proper discrimination of the different conceptions of imperfection and perfection, nor any true appreciation of original and new historical principles and factors. But his yielding was only a partial one, so long as he was not fully immersed in the pantheistic view of Hegel; or rather, it appeared only partial so long as he did not, with STRAUSS and his school, apply this view to the evangelical history and its witnesses, in order to judge them upon the principle that miracles are impossible. In the end, his superstition, which he had transferred from SCHLEIERMACHER to HEGEL, led him to the belief that his own science and school were infallible.

Such a spirit of scholastic superstition, which gradually arose to fanaticism, was naturally connected with a great want of practical common sense, and an incapacity of judgment concerning the real facts of life. We pass by the first indication of the same, the entire absence of faith; for "faith is not given to every man." We do not speak, therefore, of a defect of religious, but of scientific and moral judgment.

As far as the scientific appreciation of objective facts is concerned, we ask once more: How can a scholar write a history of mythology and religion according to the classification of SCHLEIERMACHER'S Dogmatics? Further, how can a scholar, endowed with sound judgment, write a history of the Christian Gnosis, and make an unheard-of leap from the old Gnostics clear over the whole Middle Ages (Scholastics and Mystics), down to Jacob Boehm, with a very superficial touch on Manichæism and on Augustine? How can one write a history of the doctrine of the atonement, which should have its point of departure in the Gnostic dualism, and its aim in the Hegelian system? If this can be accomplished, then truly can the history of the doctrine of the Trinity, as well as of the incarnation of God, be made to run out into the desert of Hegelian pantheism. If this be possible, then can one easily interpret historical deeds allegorically (the Epistle to Philemon, for example), and, on the other hand, explain literally what is really an allegorical composition (the Apocalypse).

The worst of all inadequacies are moral ones. It betrays a very perverted taste, when one can regard the Gnostics as a central force of development in the conflict between the Pauline and Johannine theology; and likewise, when one so far misconceives the old distinction between apocryphal and canonical writings as to think that a religious romance of later date, falsely called the Clementine Homilies, is made a proper standard for the adjudication of the Biblical writings. But it is worst of all to attribute to the Biblical books studied and intentional tendencies of human parties, and even crafty fabrications. In this respect, BAUR and his school have far transcended even STRAUSS. This is a psychological phenomenon, which can only be saved from the charge of immorality by the largest stretch of charity, and the assumption of an excessive scholastic fanaticism in the treatment of difficult critical problems.

On these premises the value and probable fate of BAUR'S criticism of the New Testament writings, which has spread like an avalanche in Eastern Switzerland, France, and Holland, is easily determined. This false system has arisen from a diseased, superstitious worship of modern philosophy and criticism, and developed into maturity. But it is doomed to utter destruction, since it has no root in the objective facts of revelation and of the kingdom of God, but is chiefly grounded in the pantheistic and abstract idealistic conceptions of modern culture. We do not say, in the sound culture itself. The only plausible occasion and excuse of this false system is the fact that the ideality and the universality of the historical Christ, together with His roots and ramifications throughout the whole human race, have not always been sufficiently appreciated in the orthodox theology of the Church. The beginning of a better appreciation does not certainly belong to the school of BAUR, but only the heretical perversion and defacement of the same.*

§ 4. THE CHARACTER OF THE PAULINE EPISTLES.—HERMENEUTIC HINTS.

According to THOLUCK (Epistle to the Romans, p. 22), strength, fulness, and fire are the spiritual characteristics of the Apostle, and they are reflected in his style. He adduces two statements from the early Church concerning the Apostle's manner of speech. The first is by ST. JEROME, Epist. 48 ad Pammachium,* c. 18: "Paulum proferam, quem quotiescumque lego, audeo mihi non verba audire sed tonitrua. Videntur quidem verba simplicia, et quasi innocentis hominis ac rusticani, et qui nec facere nec declinare noverit insidias, sed quocumque respexeris, fulmina sunt. Haeret in causa; capit omne, quod tetigerit; tergum vertit, ut superet; fugam simulat, ut occidat." The second statement, from CHRYSOSTOM, De Sacerdotio, i. 4, 7, compares the Apostle to an iron wall, which surrounds, with his Epistles, the churches of the whole world; and to a noble military chieftain, who leads captive all modes of thought, and brings them into subjection to faith, etc. THOLUCK adds, that Paul is lauded as a master of eloquence in a fragment of the heathen critic LONGINUS, though critics have declared the passage doubtful (see HUG, Einl. in's N. T., ii. p. 384).

* [This appendix is condensed in the translation, with unessential omissions. In the preface to the second edition, and in self-defence against SCHENKEL, Dr. LANGE supports this severe judgment by a number of quotations from BAUR'S work on Paul, which it is unnecessary to insert here. BAUR and the Tübingen School are not likely ever to acquire the importance which they enjoyed in Germany for a brief period. This school is simply a modern phase of Gnosticism (φωτισμὸς γνῶσις, 1 Tim. vi. 20), and, like the Gnosticism of the second century, it has been overruled for a good purpose, in stirring up the Church to a deeper investigation and defence of the primitive records of Christianity, which have already come out triumphant, with new gains of knowledge, of this as of every other trial. I say this with all due respect for the genius and learning of BAUR, and the value of his masterly historical criticism, where it does not touch matters of faith which he did not understand (1 Cor. ii. 9-16).—P. 8.]

THOLUCK then proceeds to say: "With these oratorical gifts there are connected also defects; namely, an excessive conciseness and pregnancy of expression, and carelessness in the formation of sentences, which produce those numerous anacolutha (?). This leads us to the hermeneutical question, which has an important doctrinal bearing, whether these peculiarities of form are at all detrimental to the clearness and definiteness of the thought. In this respect, no commentator has uttered more severe complaints against the Apostle than RÜCKERT (comp. his Christliche Philosophie, ii. p. 401, and the introduction to the first edition of his Commentary on the Romans)."† THOLUCK very justly remarks against RÜCKERT, that defects of style do not necessarily arise from obscurity of thought on the part of the author, "least of all with intuitive, and at the same time fervid characters. The thinking of Paul is intuitive, but coupled with acute penetration, which was refined and sharpened by rabbinical culture almost to the excess of subtlety; therefore, when there is a want of logical clearness in his writings, we must seek the cause partly in the overflow of his abundant ideas, and partly in the impatience of his vivacity." We must distinguish, he says, difficulty from obscurity. But when THOLUCK advances the opinion, that no writer of later times stands so near the Apostle in excellencies and defects as HAMANN, we must hesitate to accept the conjunction. Paul's obscurity proceeds from a fulness of vital energy, and is really only the result of a quick movement, of a clear profundity, and of a perfect originality; and must certainly be distinguished from the obscurity of a one-sided scholastic taste and defective and perverted style. THOLUCK maintains the perfection of the Pauline thought, while he acknowledges an imperfection of expression.

Against this view, R. ROTHE, of Heidelberg [died 1867], has raised his voice in his acute essay, New attempt to elucidate the Pauline passage, Rom. v. 12-21. "According to ROTHE, the apparent irregularity of Paul's style arises solely from the depth and acuteness of his thoughts, from the carefully-wrought elaboration of his purpose, and from that preciseness of expression which, the more studied it is, the more easily it approaches abruptness." THOLUCK cites a similar expression of BAUR (p. 24), but endorses, on the contrary, the view of CALVIN: Quin potius singulari Dei providentia factum est, ut sub contemptibili verborum humilitate altissima hæc mysteria nobis traderentur, ut non humana eloquentia potentia, sed sola spiritus efficacia miteretur nostra fides. In favor of this interpretation, THOLUCK makes use of the Apostle's own declaration, 1 Cor. ii. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 6. The second passage does not belong here at all, and the first has an ironical sound, and does not prove what THOLUCK designs to establish by it.

In the treatment of this question the following points must be especially taken into consideration:

1. The New Testament idiom generally is now no longer regarded merely as the 'lowly

* [The original Pammachium, even in the second edition, is evidently a double error of the printer; the one is borrowed from THOLUCK, i. e. Pammachius was a Roman senator and friend of Jerome.—P. S.]

† [In this presumptuous disposition to criticise St. Paul, RÜCKERT has found an English imitator in Professor JOWETT, who thinks it necessary to qualify what he considers to be a blind and indiscriminating admiration of the apostle, and who misrepresents him as a confused, though profound thinker, who uttered himself "in broken words and hesitating forms of speech, with no beauty or comeliness of style." But such paradoxical views are quite isolated, especially in England and America, and are not likely to unsettle the established estimate which Christendom, Greek, Latin, and Evangelical, has set upon the great apostle of the Gentiles for these eighteen hundred years.—P. S.]

"form of a servant" (Phil. ii. 7), compared with the classic language; hence there is no more reason why the Pauline expression and style should be regarded in this light when compared with the classic method of composition; provided we do not apply here the standard of the taste and judgment of the world. The New Testament idiom in general is a pneumatic development or transformation of the Grecian language. The apostolic expression has thus the prerogative of its special peculiarity, conditioned by its new spiritual life. This peculiarity may be regarded in the main as the free commingling of Hebrew directness and Hellenic accommodation; or, in other words, as the primitive Christian style, whose characteristics are the highest simplicity and vivacity in conjunction with the highest penetration and consecration of soul.

2. Down to the present time the comprehension of the Biblical books has been essentially retarded by regarding them too little as original creations, and by inquiring too little into their fundamental thoughts. Several critics have applied to them the conception of ordinary book-making and book-writing, and even of book-patching—a conception which is utterly antagonistic to all understanding of the historical books of the Old Testament and of the New Testament Gospels, and which also prevents a proper comprehension of Biblical inspiration. We should conclude thus: The fundamental thought of the book is inspired by the Spirit of revelation, according to the measure of the degree of revelation in the Old Testament, and of the link of revelation in the New Testament; but all the single portions of the book are immediately inspired—that is, animated and controlled by its fundamental thought; therefore, also mediately inspired by the Spirit of revelation. But among the prevailing conceptions, the Rabbinical, lifeless, atomistic, scholastic view of the book, is reflected in the picture of the book. The dead conception casts its dark, spiritless shade upon the living object. So long, therefore, as we do not here apply the conception of single spiritual organisms, we cannot distinguish the whole from the parts, nor the parts from the whole. Most of our definitions, divisions, and anatomical dissections of Biblical books furnish the proof that our theology has not yet reached the scientific standpoint which CUVIER attained in natural science (palæontology); for he knew how to construct the whole figure of the animal from a single fossil bone. In support of this opinion, we need only to recall the opinions of SCHLEIERMACHER on the Epistle of James, DE WETTE's view of the Epistle to the Ephesians, and BAUR's representation of the Epistle to the Romans, which he made to lie comprehended in chapters ix., x., and xi. RÜCKERT likewise professes to find in the Epistle to the Romans, and in other books, certain obscurities and confused statements—in which charges FRITZSCHE justly recognizes the obscurities of the critic himself. The acceptance of numerous digressions on the part of Paul is well known; and even THOLUCK does not regard the Epistle to the Romans quite free from them.

As far as the organic unity of the Pauline Epistles is concerned, we would make the following statements as a guide:

(a.) Every Pauline Epistle has a clearly-defined fundamental idea which controls the entire contents of the Epistle.

(b.) This fundamental thought shapes not only the division, but also the introduction and conclusion, and even pervades all the slender threads.

(c.) The introduction is determined by the Apostle's method, which seizes the appropriate point of connection with a congregation or a person, in order to develop the argument into its full proportions.

(d.) The introduction is followed throughout by a fundamental or didactic theme (proposition), which the Apostle proceeds dogmatically to elaborate.

(e.) This elaboration arrives at a final theme, from which the practical inferences are carefully drawn.

(f.) The conclusion corresponds so exactly to the fundamental thought of the Epistle, that it is reflected in all the single parts.

We shall illustrate these principles by presenting our analysis of the Epistle to the Romans. But we must first be allowed to make some observations on the remaining Pauline Epistles.*

The fundamental theme of the FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS is a determination of the proper condition of a Christian congregation, as made one by the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, in opposition to the character and shades of partisanship; chap. i. 9-12. The final theme is, accordingly, a recommendation of stability and of a sound growth in conscious hope; chap. xv. 58. In the first part of the execution Paul shows that he, with his fundamental preaching, would yet not have the church become Pauline in any sectarian or partisan sense; chap. i. 13-iv. 20. He furnishes at the same time, in an apologetic form, a polemical argument against the partisan attachment to Apollo. The second part opposes the different forms of antinomianism that arose mainly from a misconception of the Pauline doctrine of freedom, chap. v. 1-xi. 1. (Disorderly marriages. Heathen tribunals. Whoredom. Mixed marriages. Meals made of idolatrous offerings. True and false freedom. Meat offered to idols.) In the third part those errors are discussed which prevailed chiefly among the Petrine Judaizing Christians, chap. xi. 2-chap. xiv. (The dress of the synagogue in the congregation. Separatism at the communion. Jewish self-boasting, especially with regard to the gift of tongues.) The fourth part teaches the real resurrection in opposition to the spiritualism of the "Christ-Party" (οἱ τοῦ Χριστοῦ, 1 Cor. i. 12), chap. xv. 1-57. The final theme is a demand that the sentiment of unity become practical: a. In the collections for the Jewish Christians in Palestine. b. In the active sympathy with Paul's labors among the Gentile Christians. c. In the proper recognition of the friends of Paul, Timothy, Apollos, Stephanas, etc. The point of connection in the introduction is the rich charismata or spiritual gifts of the congregation, placed in the light of grace, and of their necessary preservation until the coming of Christ. In the conclusion we find, together with abundant greetings of brotherly communion, an admonition to salute one another with a holy kiss, and an anathema pronounced against declension from the love of Christ; which, without doubt, applies to separatism or sectarianism, especially that of a spiritualistic character.

Having set forth, in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, the true unity of a Christian congregation endowed with the gracious gifts of the Spirit, he portrays, in the SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS, in form of self-defence, the proper official functions in relation to a congregation. The fundamental theme, chap. i. 6, 7. The unity of the Apostle with the congregation in all his official sufferings and joys with reference to the visit which he designed to make to them. The final theme is a demand that the congregation should be so built up by the Apostle's word, that his visit to them might be a source of joy and not of sorrow, chap. xii. 19-21. 1. The Apostle's official sufferings, chap. i. 8-chap. ii. 13. (His sufferings in Ephesus, and their prayers for him. His distress at being prevented from visiting the Corinthians forthwith to do them good. His affliction at the previous letter, an evidence of his love. Removal of the sorrow by the restoration of the penitent. His care for them.) 2. The Apostle's official joys, chap. ii. 14-chap. iv. 6. (His triumphs in Christ. His epistle of commendation, the Corinthian Church. The splendor of the New Testament office, and its glorious strength which supports the official incumbents themselves. The enjoyment which his office afforded.) 3. Official sufferings and joys in close conjunction, chap. iv. 7-chap. vii. 16. (The life of the apostles in its contrasts. Their death the life of the Church. Their pilgrimage below, their home with the Lord. Their zeal in the love of Christ. Their condition in the new life. Their message of reconciliation. The conduct of the Apostle in his service of God should bless the Church by awakening and encouraging it to holiness. Certainly this should be the case, after the cheering report that the Apostle had received from Titus of the effect of his First Epistle.) 4. The common sufferings and joys of the office and the congregation, and their effect in creating sympathy and benevolence, chap. viii. 1-chap. x. 1. (The example of the Church in Macedonia. Official tenderness and prudence in suggesting and encouraging a collection, and in the institution of the diaconate. Encouragement and promises.) 5. The defence of the office in opposition to the charges made against it which threatened to sunder the office and the congregation, chap. x. 2—chap. xii. 18. (Prudence in the official or self-defence of the Apostle. The epistolary form is the expression of forbearance, but not of cowardice or inequality in conduct. Enforced expression of self-respect in contradistinction from vain self-praise. The liability of congregations to be misled by false apostles. The unselfishness of the Apostle in contrast with their selfishness. The painful self-defence that was wrung from him. His works and his weakness. His contemplation and ecstasies, and the thorn in his flesh. His signs and wonders in the midst of them. His self-denial and readiness to be offered for the Church. Also in the sending of Titus.)—The final theme, chap. xii. 19, 20. The execution: a demand of the congregation that they be so equipped as not to need the painful exercise of his official discipline, chap. xiii. 1–10. The introduction: the point of connection. Praise to God for a common comfort in a common sorrow. The conclusion: a reminder to reciprocal consolation in harmonious action.

The fundamental theme of the Epistle to the GALATIANS is the solemn establishment of the Pauline gospel for the Galatian Church, in view of its departure from the same, by a conditional anathema pronounced against those who preach a heterogeneous gospel, chap. i. 6–9. The admonition made in the final theme corresponds to this—chap. v. 1—to stand fast in the liberty, and not to be entangled again in the yoke of legal justification. Development of the fundamental theme. The Apostle proves the worth of his gospel: 1. By his divine apostolic call and independence, chap. i. 10–24. 2. By the recognition of the congregation at Jerusalem, and of the “pillar” apostles, chap. ii. 1–10. 3. By the yielding of Peter to his evangelical principle, chap. ii. 11–21. 4. By the personal experience of the Galatians, chap. iii. 1–5. 5. By the character of the Old Testament itself, namely, by the relation between Abraham with the promise, and Moses with the law, chap. iii. 6–24. 6. By the proof that the law, as a schoolmaster, has been abrogated by the coming of Christ, chap. iii. 25—chap. iv. 7. Paul then makes an application of these arguments: 1. To the aberration of the Galatians, chap. iv. 8–16. 2. To the false teachers, vers. 17, 18. 3. To himself, and his disturbed relation to them, vers. 19, 20. 4. His address to the sticklers for the law, and his conviction of them by the law, chap. iv. 21–27. 5. His address to the brethren in the faith. Reference to the contradiction between the bond and the free, vers. 28–31.—Development of the final theme: Stand fast in the liberty of Christ. a. The consequences of legal circumcision maintained as a doctrinal principle, chap. v. 2–13. b. Warning of a misconception and abuse of freedom. The law, in its truth, is transformed into the law of love and of the Spirit, chap. v. 14–24. c. The evidence of the life in the Spirit as the law of freedom, in the practice of the virtues of love, humility, meekness, etc., for the restoration of true conduct by all. The antagonism between sowing to the flesh and sowing to the Spirit, chap. v. 25—chap. vi. 11. The conclusion, vers. 11–18: A reminder of his grief which expressed itself also in a repeated warning, preaching of the cross, and a conditional invocation of blessing. Reference to the last word, ver. 17. Appeal to their spirit, ver. 18. There is no need of showing how perfectly the short exordium—where the point of connection significantly disappears or is clothed in the expression of surprise, ver. 6—corresponds to the whole epistle.

The Epistles to the EPHESIANS and COLOSSIANS represent the absolute unity in Christ, to which all the faithful, and with them all humanity and the world, are called. Their difference, however, consists in this: the Epistle to the Colossians derives this unity from the fact that Christ is the principle, the ἀρχή, of all life, as well of creation as of resurrection; and this is done in opposition to the Colossian errorists who, with Christ, would also honor the angels as vital agents and mediators, and who constructed a dualistic antagonism between spirit and matter. The Epistle to the Ephesians, on the other hand, represents Christ as the ῥόδος, the glorified head, in whom all things are comprehended after the eternal purpose of God. Accordingly, these Epistles, though possessing great external resemblance, yet stand in an internal harmonious contrast, as the Alpha and Omega in Christ, which is highly adapted to explain the relation of the elementary points of agreement and disagreement among the synoptical evangelists.

The Epistle to the COLOSSIANS institutes as its fundamental theme, the truth: Christ, as the image of God, is the ἀρχή, the πρωτότοκος, the author both of the first creation and of the second—the resurrection, chap. i. 15–18. To this the final theme corresponds: Having risen with Christ, look forward toward the heavenly riches in the glorified Christ, chap. iii. 1, 2. Development of the fundamental theme: In Christ there is all fulness. Absolute reconciliation, even of the heathen, for the evangelization of whom the Apostle suffers and labors, being deeply concerned that they might become one in Christ. Consequently, he warns them against false teachers who make divisions between Christ and the angels, Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians, spirit and body, and who, by a false spirituality, fall into carnal lusts, chap. i. 19–chap. ii. 23. The final theme: Looking for the unity with the heavenly Christ in expectation of the revelation of his future glory. Inferences: Laying aside of fleshly lust. Unity in the life of the new man. The virtues of the life in Christ. Sanctification of the domestic life, of a home to the unity in Christ. Communion of prayer, also with the Apostle and his work. The proper course toward the world in accordance with this prayer, chap. iii. 1–chap. iv. 6. Conclusion: Sending of Tychicus. Recommendation of Onesimus. Greetings. Occasion of community of life with the Ephesian circle, vers. 7–18. The conclusion as well as the introduction is also here in full accordance with the fundamental thought. The connecting point of the introduction lies in chap. i. 4, 5, together with the praise of Epaphras and the invocation of blessing, as well as the common thanksgiving for the redemption which has established a new standpoint.

The fundamental theme of the Epistle to the EPHESIANS represents the risen and glorified Christ as the object eternally appointed, and openly declared such by the calling of the faithful, and as the head of the congregation for the comprehension and unity of all things, chap. i. 20–23 (a truth designed to console and cheer the Church of Asia Minor). To this the final theme corresponds, chap. iv. 1–6. The unifying power of Christ declared in the fundamental theme has shown itself: (a.) In the heathen becoming with the Jews one household of God. (b.) It exhibits itself in the joy with which Paul, in conformity with the manifestation of the eternal mystery of their election, invites them to the gospel salvation and suffers for them. It should, therefore, manifest itself also in the joy and hope of the Ephesians. Accordingly, the Ephesians, chap. iv. 1–6, should preserve the unity of the Spirit. (a.) The gracious gifts of the individual, as an assigned endowment, is a bond of unity and not a ground of separation, vers. 7–10. (b.) The official organism is appointed to train up all to the perfect manhood of the body of Christ, vers. 11–16. (c.) This unity requires the separation from the heathen sinful lusts by the renewal of the life, chap. iv. 17–chap. v. 14. (1. Proper conduct toward every man, truth, meekness, justice, chastity of speech, spirituality, freedom from passion, kindness and philanthropy, love. 2. Avoiding of heathen vices.) (d.) It demands prudence, redemption of the time, caution, and a zeal which does not come from exciting stimulants, but by spiritual songs and thanksgiving, chap. v. 15–20. (e.) It demands reciprocal submission and a sacred harmony of domestic life, chap. v. 21–chap. vi. 9. (f.) It demands watchfulness, energy, equipment, self-defence, and war against the kingdom of Satan, chap. vi. 10–17. On the other hand, the advancement of the kingdom of God in all saints and in the work of the Apostle by prayer and intercession, vers. 18–20. The conclusion characterizes this sermon on Christian unity as a message for solace and encouragement by Tychicus, in connection with the sufferings of the Apostle. And in the same sense must we understand the magnificent doxology of the introduction, with its invocation of blessings.

In the Epistle to the PHILIPPIANS the difference between the didactic and parenetic word appears but slightly, since the entire Epistle is pervaded by the feeling of the personal community of the Apostle with the Church at Philippi. Nevertheless, even here it may be observed. In the words, chap. i. 8–11, he speaks of his heart's desire that his dear Church should become perfect in every respect unto the day of Christ; that it might abound more and more, be purified, and be filled unto the glory of God. To this the final theme corre spondia, chap. iv. 1. The call: that they might continue to be his joy and crown in the Lord. The fundamental thought, the principal theme, discloses itself first in the communication of his experience at Rome, and of his state of mind in consequence thereof, because he designed that the Philippians, by virtue of their wider unity with him, should avail themselves of it in their own experience, chap. i. 12-30. Then he exhorts them to improve their unity by means of the humility of every individual, in imitation of the example of the humble self-humiliation of Christ—a passage which gives this Epistle a specifically christological character, though it is viewed in its ethical aspect and bearing, chap. ii. 1-11. Next to humility, the Church should increase its inner spiritual tension and efforts, vers. 12-16, stimulate the members to rejoice with him,—for which purpose he will also send Timothy to them, as he sends Epaphroditus, chap. ii. 17—chap. iii. 1. But then, too, the experience which he had made in Rome concerning the opposition of the Judaizers (chap. i. 15) causes him to warn them decidedly,—after the intimation of chap. i. 28,—against their plots, with reference to his own relation to them, chap. iii. 2-6. Then follows the declaration how far he had left the legalism of these opponents behind in his knowledge of Christ, his faith in justification by free grace, and his struggle after perfection, unto the resurrection of the dead and the life in heaven; in which respect they, too, should be his companions against the enemies of the cross of Christ, chap. iii. 7-21. The explication of the final word indicates pointedly to that which the Apostle had occasion to censure. A disagreement between Evodias and Syntyche must be removed; elements of oppression, bitterness, anxiety, and division must disappear; the members must be like the Apostle in continual striving after what is good, chap. iv. 2-9. With this reminder the Apostle also connects a high recognition of the Church's Christian life of love, which it had shown, now as before, by contributing to his support—a privilege which he, in his keen sense of independence, granted to no other congregation, vers. 10-20. The conclusion corresponds, with his invocation of blessing (ver. 19), to the fundamental thought, and with his greeting, to the key-note, of the Epistle. The connecting point is found in ver. 6.

THE EPISTLES TO THE THESSALONIANS.—The First Epistle is pervaded by the fundamental thought: The Lord will come speedily; the Second, by the thought: The Lord will not yet come speedily. Both of these are in accordance with the truth; because, in the first part, the question is concerning the coming of the Lord in his dynamic rule in a religious sense; and in the second part, concerning the coming of the Lord in a definite historical and chronological sense.

The theoretical theme of the FIRST EPISTLE is contained in the words, chap. i. 9, 10 (comp. chap. ii. 12, 16, 19, etc.). Accordingly, the whole of Christianity, particularly that of the Thessalonians, is eschatological: a waiting for the coming of the Son of God from heaven, as the Saviour from future wrath. (a.) The labors of Paul among them have corresponded to this waiting, and their conduct amid the persecutions of the times should also correspond to it, chap. ii. 1-16. (b.) The Apostle has been careful of the condition and steadfastness of the Church, as he was so soon separated from it. His propositions to visit them again. The sending of Timothy. He has been encouraged by the account of Timothy, chap. ii. 17—chap. iii. 13. (c.) Admonition of the true course of conduct in that expectation (the true "saints of the last day"). No polygamy, or lust of the flesh; no separation; no excited wandering about, instead of quiet labor, chap. iv. 1-12. (d.) Instruction concerning the relation of those who are asleep to the coming of the Lord, chap. iv. 13-18. (e.) The question after the times and seasons. Answer: As a thief in the night, chap. v. 1-3. The practical theme: Watch, chap. v. 4. Development: According to your spiritual nature; your daily life; your calling; your relation to Christ. Inferences: chap. v. 5-22. Conclusion: The invocation of blessing in harmony with the fundamental thoughts, ver. 23. Connecting point of the introduction. The Thessalonians are successors of the apostles and of the Lord by the joy of their faith, according to their hope amid many tribulations, chap. i. 3-6.

In the SECOND EPISTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS the fundamental thought appears: that the judgment of the Lord upon the world will first be matured—in consequence of the persecution of the Christians; and the worthiness of the faithful must be assured before the Lord will come for the execution of the final judgment and for the redemption of his children, chap. i. 5-8. (a.) Fuller declaration as to how the maturing of the judgment is connected with the maturing of the faithful, chap. i. 9-12. (b.) Warning against chiliastic delusions, as if the day of the Lord were at hand in a chronological sense, chap. ii. 1, 2. (c.) How the whole development of unbelief and apostasy must precede the appearance of Antichrist (comp. Matt. xxiv. 24; the Revelation), chap. ii. 8-14. The final word, chap. ii. 15: Steadfastness, according to his instructions. Inferences: Prayer for the mission of the gospel; love and patience, discipline, industry, beneficence, and stability. The handwriting of Paul himself as a warning against chiliastic delusions. The connecting point of the introduction: The endurance of the Thessalonians in their faith, in the midst of the persecutions, chap. i. 4.

The PASTORAL EPISTLES constitute so far a parallel to the Epistles to the Corinthians, as that the First Epistle to Timothy, and the Epistle to Titus, teach, according to the analogy of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, how the congregation should be officially watched, directed, and further developed. In the Second Epistle to Timothy, on the contrary, Paul, in anticipation of his martyrdom, instructs his pupil to become, in his official work, his spiritual successor, and thus to reproduce the life-picture of the apostolic office which is portrayed in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians.

The theme of the FIRST EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY is the renewed scriptural transmission of the Divine commission which the Apostle received when he was called to establish the real life of faith and of the Church, to Timothy, his substitute in Ephesus for that special sphere, chap. i. 18. According to the measure of this commission he expresses a wish in the greeting that he might possess a rich measure of grace, chap. i. 1, 2. Accordingly, he should remain in Ephesus and watch over and protect the pure doctrine against Judaistic errors and the germs of Gnosticism. The object of the preservation of orthodoxy was the edification of the Church in piety and pure love. The pure doctrine should maintain a pure heart, a pure conscience, and a pure faith, ver. 5. The immediate occasion was chiefly the Judaizing Christian zealots for the law. Therefore the Apostle characterizes his relation to the law. If he lays great stress on the fact that he, too, had once been a blasphemer and a persecutor, he at the same time gives his true estimate of that zeal for the latter, and declares how he has been led beyond it, by the mercy of God, to become an example of faith, whose defence he now gives over by letter to Timothy. This official call is a call (a.) to conflict, because the apostates oppose the faithful, vers. 18, 20. (b.) To the demand for universal love and intercession for all sorts and conditions of men (in opposition to Jewish particularism), chap. ii. 1-7. (c.) To the furtherance of universal custom, according to which the women should not dare to announce themselves as (Judaizing) prophetesses, vers. 8-15. (d.) To the promotion of the true organization of the congregation. 1. The bishop, or, which is the same thing, the presbyter and his house. 2. The deacon and the deaconess. 3. The management of the house of God in general, according to its divine nature, chap. iii. (e.) For the settlement and fighting of the germs of error which might ripen in the future. Gnostic errors and principles, chap. iv. 1-11. (f.) For the self-guidance of the ecclesiastical officer, chap. iv. 12-16. (g.) For the proper conduct toward every one, especially according to the distinction of old and young with reference to the service of the congregation (the men, women, and widows). Special direction on the treatment of the widows in general, especially on the employment of the old widows for the good of the congregation. Special direction on the proper treatment and distinction of the elders, as well as on the proper prudence at the appointment and ordination for offices. Care over his own deportment and health (chap. v. 24, 25, is said with reference to the trial, ver. 22). Care of the servants in the Church, chap. v. 1-vi. 2. The final statement, chap. iv. 3-5. Inferences: Doctrinal disputes, and their worldly motive, vers. 5-10. Renewed inculcation of the command (commission), vers. 12-16. Concluding word, vers. 17-21.

The EPISTLE TO TITUS. The commission which the Apostle gave to Titus for Crete, is differently expressed from that given to Timothy for Ephesus. His chief task was the appointment of presbyters in the single congregations, together with a further development of the Church at Crete, chap. i. 5. Accordingly, the Apostle describes first of all the requisites of elders, with reference, no doubt, to the new experiences at Crete, and also the intrusion of Judaizing seducers, chap. i. 6-16. Then the proper care of the congregation, and pastoral work of Titus, with reference to special relations, ages, and classes of society, chap. ii. 1-15. Finally, the guidance of Christian Cretans into proper conduct, especially in regard to the avoiding of a disturbing, quarrelsome, and passionate spirit with reference to the goodness of God in Christ, chap. iii. 1-7. The Apostle confirms this direction by his final theme, chap. iii. 8. It is in accordance with his statement of the requisites of the presbyters, chap. i. 9, 10, that he forbids him from meddling with the scholastic controversies of the errorists, especially the legalists; and admonishes him first to deal practically with sectarian men, and then to avoid them, vers. 9-11. The concluding word: The sending of Tychicus, special appointments, and greetings. The introduction is an expression of the Apostle's authority, and of the authorization of Titus.

The SECOND EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY was designed, as has been already said, to conduct Timothy further into his official life, so that he, as the favorite spiritual son of the Apostle, might enter into the footsteps of the latter after his departure from this world. This is expressed by the fundamental thought, chap. i. 6-8. The Apostle strengthens this fundamental thought, first, (a.) By God's call to be saved, vers. 9, 10. (b.) By his own call to be the Apostle to the Gentiles, vers. 11, 12. (c.) By Timothy's relation as a scholar to him, vers. 13, 14. (d.) By reference to the unfaithful and the true, vers. 15-18. He then develops the fundamental thoughts. (a.) He must be strengthened by faithful co-workers, chap. ii. 1, 2. (b.) His readiness to suffer, and his endurance, after the example of Paul in imitation of Christ, vers. 3-13. (c.) Shunning the spirit of controversy. The injurious fruits of the same must be perceived (Hymenæus, Philetus); and oppositions and distinctions in God's house must be rightly understood. Timothy must avoid impure persons, and all lusts and fruitless scholastic controversies; he must honor, instruct, and restrain in the proper spirit, chap. ii. 14-26. The Apostle exhibits, finally, the fundamental thought by contrasting the future condition of the errorists and that of the apostolic disciple. The latter shall stand fast in the tradition of Paul—that is, in the New Testament, and in the Holy Scriptures—that is, the Old Testament, chap. iii. The final proposition, chap. iv. 1, 2, is a solemn transfer of his commission to the beloved disciple. Exposition: The future of the errorists and of the errors requires true apostolic men. Timothy must stand firm in the critical times, because his teacher is about to depart, vers. 3-9. But Timothy must soon come to him, since he is almost isolated. Account of his condition, vers. 9-18. Concluding word, invocation of blessings, supplements, and greetings. The introduction is in harmony with the Epistle; an expression of intimate relationship between the teacher and the disciple, and of reliance on the inner call of the latter. As a legacy in anticipation of early death, the Second Epistle to Timothy is related to the Second Epistle of Peter.

The single portions of the EPISTLE TO PHILEMON group themselves about the recommendation that Onesimus be received again, vers. 10-12. The preceding parts are chiefly introductory to this central point; the subsequent verses are the amplification. The conclusion, like the introduction, refers to the call of Paul and the congregation at Colosse.

The directness of the Apostle, which is peculiar to him as a religious and also as a truly Hebrew genius, may be regarded as resulting from an intuitive state of mind; yet, in this respect, he stands below the festive contemplation of John, for the reason that he, being endowed with greater energy, exhibits a more fervent zeal and a more practical turn. The style of John reminds us, therefore, of the most spiritual poetry; that of Paul, on the other hand, of the most fiery eloquence. The culture of the latter conforms to this view. Already in the school of the rabbis he had learned the rabbinical, reflective form of thought—a system of dialectics which proceeds by questions, objections, and answers, and by deductiones ad absurdum from the history of theocracy. But by his intercourse with the Greeks he had also learned the Grecian method of reasoning, which meets us, for example, in 1 Cor. xv. His own manner of expression was, however, modified by two elements, which must be taken into proper account, if one would get rid of the unfounded prejudice concerning the alleged burdened periods and obscure abruptness of the Apostle.

The first element is the liturgical, which arose in part from devotional reminiscences, and in part from prayerful attitudes of unusual depth, and from a lofty, adoring condition of his heart. The liturgical form frequently transcends the historical and dialectical structure of the periods, and this, too, in consequence of that continuity of devotional feeling which moves through a succession of rhythmic pauses. We may refer to Psalms cvii. and cxxxvi. as specimens.

The most important form of this character is the long sentence at the beginning of the Epistle to the Ephesians, vers. 3-14, which has often been misjudged by the Grecian standard, and caused so many glosses. We read it liturgically as follows:

Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ:
 Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places (things) in Christ:
 According as He hath chosen us in Him, before the foundation of the world:
 That we should be holy and without blame before Him in love:
 Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to Himself:
 According to the good pleasure of his will—to the praise of the glory of his grace—
 Wherein (in which grace) He hath made us accepted (called) in the Beloved:
 In whom (the Beloved) we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins:
 According to the riches of his grace (—justification—);
 Wherein (in which grace) He hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence (—the glorification on the intellectual side—);
 Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure—
 Which (good pleasure) He hath purposed in himself, in the dispensation of the fulness of times (epochs, καιροί):
 That He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which (all things) are in heaven, and which (all things) are on earth, even in Him:
 In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will:
 That we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ:
 In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation:
 In whom also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise (—which was effective also in the Old Testament promise—):
 Which is the earnest of our inheritance (—the common inheritance of God's people—) until the redemption (full liberation) of the purchased possession (—from among the Jews and Gentiles—):
 Unto the praise of his glory!

In the exposition of the Epistle to the Romans, we shall make the observation that the difficulty in its concluding words can only be solved by viewing them as a liturgical form (already indicated in our statement of its contents); just as the difficulty in Rom. ix. 5 can only be explained by the assumption of a liturgical reminiscence.

In the place of the burdened periods, therefore, we substitute lyrical expressions which are liturgically simple, and in place of most of the supposed anacolutha, vital and vigorous brevities. As the former arose from the religious school and sentiment of the Apostle, so the latter came from his fervid vivacity and his rapid, ecstatic feeling in the midst of his daily work. In the preceding doxology we must supply a brief statement in place of an apparent want of connection (ver. 13). Such abridged sentences are especially noticeable in the second chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, where, in vers. 28 and 29, the expressions Ἰουδαίους and περιτομή have to be repeated. Therefore, with Cocceius, in Rom. v. 12, we simply take the ἐλάβομεν from ver. 11, and put it into ver. 12, in order to explain the much-discussed anacoluthon (διὰ τοῦτο ἐλάβομεν); whereby it is to be observed that Paul used the word λαμβάνειν emphatically in the sense of a personal, moral appropriation, to which the ἐφ' ᾧ πάντες ἡμαρτον in ver. 12 corresponds.

We can, in the main, only repeat here the characteristics already referred to. As far as the Apostle's method of representation is concerned, the peculiar feature of the so-called Pauline rhetoric must be found in the union of the strictest methodical progress of thought with the richest concrete expression; the union of a wonderful, intuitive depth with the most versatile dialectics, of an exalted contemplation with the most mighty practical tendency, of the most comprehensive view with the most minute observation, of a flight of diction often lyrical and festive with the severest didactic distinctions, of the most original power of creating language (vid. the ἀπαξ λεγόμενα of the Apostle) with the most felicitous use of conventional expressions.

On the style of Paul much has been written, from St. JEROME down to C. L. BAUR's Rhetorica Paulina, 1782, and later works. Comp. the literature in GUMRICKE, Isagogik, p. 389 [p. 278 of the 3d ed., 1868.—P. S.]; REUSS, p. 64; SCHAFF, History of the Apost. Church § 158, p. 611 ff., and BERN. ALB. § 5. THE PAULINE THEOLOGY.

The doctrinal system of the Pauline writings, as to its traditional or retrospective side, is connected with the system of James through that of Peter; and, as to its universal and prospective side, with the doctrinal type of John through the Epistle to the Hebrews. We must maintain at the outset, on the one hand, the essential identity of the Pauline doctrine with that of all the apostles (against the view of BAUR and the Tübingen School); and, on the other hand, the most marked peculiarity of the Pauline manner of contemplation and form of expression. We agree with NEANDER that Paul gives us a more fully developed system of theology than any other apostle; but we confine this to the form merely. For, as regards the matter of thought, John evidently represents the perfection of New Testament theology.

The peculiar character of Paulinism has been diversely construed. We find it in the idea that Christ, as the Son of God and Saviour of the world, who finished His historical work by His atoning death and glorious resurrection, is the absolutely new man, and, as such, the principle of a new spiritual creation in man (καὶνὴ κτίσις); that He is, retrospectively, or in His relation to the past, the principle of the election of the faithful as it began to be actualized in the creation of the world, in their appointment to salvation, and in their holy calling; and that He is, prospectively, or in His relation to the future, the principle of a new justification before God, of a new law of the soul, of a new life, of a new humanity, which, in and with Him, died because of the universal guilt of the old race, but which, being reconciled to God by the atoning death of Christ, rose with Him to a new and heavenly life.*

NOTE.—It is utterly foolish to assign to Paul, as some have done, a middle position between the recognition of the Old Testament—with the Jewish apostles—and the Gnostic Marcion. Paul, in his own way, is just as much a believer in the Old Testament as James (comp. Rom. iv., Gal. iii., and other passages). Only his special calling was the apostleship to the Gentiles, with its antithesis to Pharisaism and to the letter of the law, as well as with its principle of the perfect freedom of the gospel in Christ. Christ was, to the Apostle, the religious law—the law of the Spirit. The external law was to him, in a religious relation, only a pedagogic or educational symbol, and was ethically limited by the religious principle—Christ. For this reason he spiritualized the Old Testament word (Gal. iii. 24), the Jewish theology, and even the Jewish rabbinical dialectics, and converted them into an instrument of Christian doctrine and instruction. He did the same thing with the fundamental forms of Grecian and Roman culture (see Acts xvii.; Rom. xiii. 1 ff.)

§ 6. THE LITERATURE ON THE EPISTLES AND ON THE THEOLOGY OF PAUL.

Comprehensive lists of the literature in question are given at the close of § 2 (p. 14). The works on New Testament theology, and on the doctrines and writings of the apostles, by LUTTERBECK (The New Testament Systems), by NEANDER, SCHAFF, MESSNER, LECHLER, and others, belong in this place. [Among English works of this class, THOS. D. BERNARD, The Progress of Doctrine in the N. T. (Bampton Lectures for 1864), 2d ed. Lond., 1866, is especially deserving of notice.—P. S.] Then come the prominent writings on the Pauline system in particular, by MEYER, USTERI, HEMSEN, SCHRADER, DÄHNE, and relatively KÖSTLIN (The System of the Gospel, and the Epistles of John, and kindred New Testament Systems). BAUR, The Apostle Paul [2d edition, by ZELLER, 1867]. Also, EWALD, The Epistles of the Apostle Paul, Translated and Explained, Göttingen, 1857. SIMAR, The Theology of St. Paul, Freiburg, 1864 (Roman Catholic). Next come the works on the Acts of the Apostles, especially the Commentary by LECHLER and GEROCK [translated for the Am. ed. of this "Biblework," with additions by CHARLES F. SCHAEFFER]. The treatises on Paul and his theology, in a broad and narrow sense, are extremely numerous. We may mention SCHARLING, De Paulo Apostolo ejusque adversariis, commentatio, Havniæ, 1836; TISCHENDORF, Doctrina Pauli de vi mortis Christi satisfactoria, Lips., 1837; RÄBIGER De Christologia Paulina contra Baurium, Vratislav., 1846; HOLSTEN, On the Word $\alpha\rho\tau\acute{\iota}\varsigma$ , Rostock, 1855; HEBART, The Natural Theology of the Apostle Paul, Nürnberg, 1860; LIPSIVS, The Pauline Doctrine of Justification, etc., portrayed according to the four chief Epistles of the Apostle, Leipzig, 1853; LAMPING, Pauli de prædestinatione decreta, Leuwarden, 1857; BEYSCHLAG, On the Christology of Paul; BLEEK, Lectures on the Colossians, etc. Berlin, 1865. HOMILETIC AND ASCETIC LITERATURE ON THE EPISTLES OF PAUL.—BENGEL, Periphrasis of the 14 Epp. of Paul; SCHALCH, Practical Exposition of the Acts of the Apostles, in Sermons, Schaffhausen, 1839; STIER, Discourses of the Apostles, 2 parts, Leipzig, 1829 and 1830; THIESS, The Journey from Jerusalem to Damascus; Gallery of Pauline Sermons, Schleswig, 1841; COUARD, Sermons on the Conversion of the Apostle Paul, Berlin, 1833; BLUNT, The Life of the Apostle Paul, 24 Treatises, translated from the English, Meissen, 1861. Comp. also the serial sermons on the pericopes, or Scripture lessons, many of which are selected from the Epistles of Paul. Among these we may mention the collections of HARMS, L. HOFACKER, KAPP, MYNSTER, RANKE, STIER, NITZSCH, DEICHERT, etc. Finally, we must remember the Repertoires by BRANDT, LISCO, SCHALLER, and others.

II. SPECIAL INTRODUCTION.—THE EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE ROMANS.

§ 1. ROME, AND ITS SIGNIFICANCE.

As the light and darkness of Judaism was centralized in Jerusalem, the theocratic city of God (the holy city, the murderer of the prophets), so was heathen Rome, the humanitarian metropolis of the world, the centre of all the elements of light and darkness prevalent in the heathen world; and so did Christian Rome become the centre of all the elements of vital light, and of all the antichristian darkness in the Christian Church. Hence Rome, like Jerusalem, does not only possess a unique historical significance, but is a universal picture operative through all ages. Christian Rome, especially, stands forth as a shining ideal of the nations, which is turned into an idol of magical strength to those who are subject to its rule.

The old heathen Rome, as the residence and centre of the universal Roman monarchy, came, as HEGEL says, like the destroying tragical Fate upon the glory of the ancient world. But the same Rome which, as the unconscious instrument, executed the Divine judgments upon all the centres of ancient civilization, became also the spiritual heiress, the emporium and centre of all the secular culture of antiquity, and the preliminary condition and basis for the universal development of the congregation of Christ into the Catholic Church.

Rome was the end of the old heathen world, and for this reason it became the beginning, the universal home and point of departure of the new Catholic Christian world—a Janus temple on a large scale. It was Rome's appointed mission to effect the union of the Gentile and Jewish churches, the union of theocratic faith and humanitarian culture, the union of the Christian East and West, the union of the old civilized nations and the wandering barbarians; and (in historical reflection of the pedagogic Mosaism of the Old Testament (Gal. iii.) to carry on the pedagogic, legal, and symbolical office of training the nations of young Christian catechumens into a ripe age of faith.

But as the Roman genius was unable to thoroughly appropriate and reproduce the ancient culture, especially in its Grecian glory, so was it unable to comprehend Christianity in all its fundamental depth, and to give it ecclesiastical shape and form. Its calling was, to popularize the old literary treasures, as well as the treasures of Christian faith, according to the necessity of the barbarians, and to adjust them to their dawning intellect. As soon as Rome had succeeded in bringing its pupils to a point of maturity, its status of culture was surpassed, in a secular sense, by the revival of Grecian letters [in the fifteenth century], and in a spiritual sense, by the evangelical confession [in the sixteenth]. Rome, however, has never recognized its bounds, nor the limits of its endowment and mission. In the same proportion in which it has been eclipsed, it has resisted every progressive movement with the fanaticism of contracted egotism, and has thus incurred the judgment of history.

Rome appears first within the horizon of the Old Testament apocalyptic prophecies as a dismal picture of the future, in the prophet Daniel, chap. vii. 7 ff. The fourth beast of Daniel's vision—notwithstanding all modern objections—can only be the universal Roman monarchy. This is evident certainly from the fact, among others, that the third universal monarchy, the Macedonian (Daniel, chaps. vii. and viii.), is marked by the same symbolical number four; apart from the consideration that the portrayed antichristianity, chap. vii., is eschatological, while the antichristianity of chap. viii. 9 can only be a typical prelude—the antitheocracy of Antiochus Epiphanes. And as Rome appears first in the Bible in a prophetic light, so does it appear last in a prophetic light, in the Apocalypse (chap. xvii.). There, it destroys every thing as the instrument of judgment; here, it is destroyed as an object of judgment. The first historical connection of Israel with Rome was a friendly one, 1 Maccab. viii. and xii. In the apocryphal period, Judea was made a dependence of Rome by Pompey; and the same man laid the foundation of the Jewish colony in Rome, which, though in :

pitiable condition, yet had the high and universal mission to mediate the transition of Christianity from Jerusalem and Antioch to Rome (see Acts xxviii.).

§ 2. THE ROMAN CONGREGATION.

The first beginnings of the congregation of Roman Christians cannot be historically determined. The primitive Christian tradition has placed the first existence of the Church, or, at any rate, the first preaching of Christ in Rome, even as far back as the days of the earthly life of Christ. It is said that the wonderful career of Jesus in Judea was first made known by rumors, then by various eye-witnesses, and then by Barnabas (see CLEMENS ROM., Recognit. i. 6 sqq.)*

This old Christian legend is closely followed by the Romish ecclesiastical tradition, according to which the Apostle Peter founded the church of Rome. Peter is said to have gone to Rome in the second year of Claudius (A. D. 42) for the overthrow of Simon Magus, and to have resided twenty-five years in Rome as the first bishop of the church established there by him.†

The grounds against this tradition are well known: (1.) When Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, about the year 59, Peter was not yet in Rome, and had never been there (comp. Acts xix. 21; Rom. xv. 20 f.; 2 Cor. x. 16). [For it was the principle and practice of Paul not to interfere with the labors of the Jewish apostles, or to build on another man's foundation.—P. S.] (2.) When Paul, according to the Acts of the Apostles, came to Rome, about the year 62, he found no trace of Peter there. (3.) There was likewise no trace of Peter in Rome when he wrote from that city his Second Epistle to Timothy, which we must safely assign to his second captivity—about the year 66. On the contrary, we find (4.) Peter still in Jerusalem at the time of the Apostolic Council, about the year 58 [50]. We meet him, (5.) still later, in Antioch, according to Gal. ii.—about the year 55. And latest, (6.) in Babylon (in Assyria), where he wrote his First Epistle to the Christians of Asia Minor.‡

But the Second Epistle of Peter, composed in anticipation of his approaching death, seems to have been written from a prison, and that a prison in Rome; and the ecclesiastical tradition of Dionysius of Corinth (EUSEB., Histor. Eccl., ii. 25), which affirms that Peter died a martyr in Rome simultaneously with Paul, cannot be set aside by any weighty arguments. Yet MEYER makes the excellent remark, that the Epistle to the Romans—which implies the impossibility of Peter's presence in Rome before it was written—is a fact which destroys the historical foundation of the Papacy, so far as it pretends to rest on that Apostle's establishment and episcopal government of that church.

* [The Barnabas spoken of by Pseudo-Clemens, Recognit., i. i. c. 7, is called a Hebrew by birth, and one of the disciples of Jesus, sent by Him to the West to announce the glad tidings. But this and other pseudo-Clementine legends are of no historical value whatever. It is certain, however, that the Jews of Rome were represented on the day of Pentecost in Jerusalem (Acts ii. 10), and it is highly probable that they brought the first report of Christianity to Rome, possibly as converts, and in this case forming the nucleus of a Jewish Christian congregation. See below.—P. S.]

† On the gradual rise of this legend, see WUSELER, Chronologie des Apostolischen Zeitalters, p. 562 ff.; and SCHAFF, History of the Apost. Church, § 93. p. 362 ff. The historical value of this tradition has been given up, even by some Roman Catholic writers (e. g., HUE, FREILMOER, KLEE, and others mentioned by TROLUCK in his Comm. on the Romans, p. 1, who do not, like BAUR, deny that Peter was ever at Rome, but only that he founded the church of Rome.—P. S.] But, on the other hand, there are Protestant divines, such as BERTHOLDT, MYNSTER, and THIERSCHE (The Church in the Apost. Age, 1852, p. 97), who have endeavored to sustain it, and it is easy to see why the Romanists of the present day return to the support of the legend (see HAGEMANN, Die römische Kirche, Freib., p. 658 ff.).

‡ On the untenability of the hypothesis that Babylon means Rome, see my Apost. Zeitalter, ii. p. 360.

The tradition which transfers the Roman church back to the days of Jesus, has been carried out to an extreme in several fictions.*

Yet there is an element of truth at its root, viz., the fact that the Messianic hope of the Jews in Rome was early excited, perhaps during the earthly life of Jesus, by a historical knowledge of His appearance; for among any considerable number of Jews there were pious individuals waiting for the Messiah's coming. "It is now admitted on all hands," says THOLUCK, "that the seeds of the gospel could be brought to Rome by the Jews who were present at the feast of Pentecost (Acts ii. 10), and by the Jewish Christians who were scattered in different directions after the martyrdom of Stephen (Acts viii. 1). Such an early period is substantiated by the mention of such Christian teachers in Rome as had been converted before Paul (chap. xvi. 7); by what the Apostle says of the wide-spread renown of the Church (chap. i. 8), and its wide extent, since they met together in various places of the metropolis, chap. xvi. 5; xiv. 15; and finally by the probability that, in consequence of the great influx of foreigners to Rome, Christians from a distance were early found among the number."

The Jewish population in Rome was one of the larger colonies, like those in Assyria, Babylon, Alexandria, etc. Its parent stock were the Jewish slaves that had been brought by Pompey to Rome. It increased from the beginning by Jewish travellers, and afterwards by numerous proselytes. The enslaved Jews had, for the most part, received their freedom under AUGUSTUS.†

The Emperor TIBERIUS (SUETON., Tib. 36; JOSEPH., Antiq. xviii. 3. 5), and subsequently CLAUDIUS, drove them from the city (Acts xviii. 2; SUETON., Claud. 25); but they soon returned in great numbers, and dwelt under the rule of later emperors, although severely oppressed by taxes (SUETON., Domit. 12), and, in part, miserably poor (JUVENAL, iii. 14; vi. 542). "Under the reigns of AUGUSTUS, TIBERIUS, and NERO, there were Jews even in the imperial household; and POPPÆA, NERO's wife, was herself attached to the Jewish faith. So great was the number of Jews in Rome, that the Jewish embassy sent to AUGUSTUS after the death of HEROD, was joined by eight thousand Jews in Rome (JOSEPH., Antiq. xvii. 11, 1)." (THOLUCK.) ‡ [The edict of CLAUDIUS de pellendis Judæis, mentioned by SUETONIUS, Claud. c. 25, and in Acts xviii. 2 (comp. DION CASSIUS, Hist. Rom. lx. 6), is usually understood to embrace the (Jewish) Christians as well as the Jews, on the ground that Chrestus is a corrupt spelling for Christus, and that tumultuantes refers to the controversies excited by the introduction of Christianity. To this may be objected, (1.) that SUETONIUS (whom PLINY, Epist. x. 95, calls virum eruditissimum) must have known the name of Christ as well as TACITUS (Annal. xv. 44), and PLINY (x. 96); for he called His disciples Christiani (Nero, c. 16); (2.) that an internal religious controversy of the Jews would require inter se after tumultuantes; and (3.) that such a controversy would hardly have justified an edict of expulsion. Hence MEYER (ad Act. xviii. 2) and WIESLER (Chronology of the Apost. Age, p. 12; and art. Römerkrieg, in HERZOG's Encyclop., vol. xx. p. 585) understand by Chrestus a Jew who stirred up a political rebellion in Rome during the reign of Claudius. But I prefer the usual opinion, for the following reasons: (1.) There is no trace of such a character, who must have been a false Messiah, and could hardly have remained unknown; (2.) the use of the vulgar misnomer Chrestus (Χρῆστος), for Christus, is established by the testimony of TERTULLIAN (Ad nat. l. 3; Apol. c. 3: "Sed et cum perperam CHRISTIANUS pronuntiatur a vobis—nam nec nominis veritas est notitia penes vos—de suavitate rei benignitate compositum est"), and LACTANTIUS (Inst. div. iv. 7: "... propter ignorantium errorem, qui cum immutata littera CHERESTUM solent dicere"). But it seems that the law of CLAUDIUS was no rigorously executed, from apprehension of bad effects in view of the large number of the Jews; and that only the public assemblies were closed. This is stated by DION CASSIUS, lx. 6, who probably refers to the same edict, as LIEHMANN and WIESLER assume (τοὺς τε Ἰουδαίους πλεονέσαντας αὐτοῖς, ὥστε χαλεπῶς ἀν' αὐτοὺς παραχρῆς ὑπὸ τοῦ δόχλου σφῶν τῆς πόλεως εἰρηθῆναι, οὐκ ἐξήλασε μὲν, τῷ δὲ δὴ πατρίῳ νόμῳ βίῃ χρημαίνοντες ἐκένευσεν μὴ συναθροίζεσθαι), unless we assign this decree (with MEYER and LECHLER, ad Act. xviii. 2) to an earlier date. At all events, the edict, if it applied to the Christians at all, can only have had a temporary effect; for we find, a few years afterwards, a large Christian congrega-

At the time when the Apostle wrote his Epistle to the Romans, there were in Rome many converts who openly professed Christ (chap. i.), and met for worship in several houses (chap. xvi.). [The congregation, moreover, must have already existed several years before 58, since Paul "these many years" (ἀπὸ πολλῶν ἐτῶν, Rom. xv. 23, comp. ver. 22 and i. 13) had a desire to visit them, and since he mentions, among the Christian teachers in Rome, such as had been converted before him, xvi. 7.—P. 8.] The stock of this Christian community was no doubt of Jewish descent (iv. 1); but the Gentile Christian element also was considerable (Rom. xi 13 ff., 25), as we may expect in view of the large number of Jewish proselytes in Rome. We may safely assume that the Church was just as much founded by Gentile Christians from Antioch, as by Jewish Christians who witnessed the first Pentecost at Jerusalem. We learn, moreover, from chap. xvi., that the most prominent members of the Church were adherents of Paul. And there is every probability that Paul, in a comprehensive church policy, had prepared the way for the proper founding and organization of a united congregation in Rome, as in Ephesus, by previously sending out faithful disciples—Aquila and his wife Priscilla. As these were his pioneers in Ephesus, so were they in Rome. Says MEYER [on Rom., p. 21, 4th ed.]: "As Paul had been so eminently successful in Greece, it was very natural that apostolic men from his school should bear evangelic truth further westward, to the metropolis of heathendom. The banishment of the Jews from Rome under Claudius (SUTTON., Claud. 25; Acts xviii. 2) was a special occasion made use of by Providence for that end. Fugitives to neighboring Greece became Christians, and disciples of Paul; and, after their return to Rome, were heralds of Christianity, and took part in organizing a congregation. This is historically proved by the example of Aquila and Priscilla, who, when Jews, emigrated to Corinth, lived there over a year and a half in the company of Paul, and subsequently appeared as teachers in Rome and occupants of a house where the Roman congregation assembled (Rom. xvi. 8). Probably other individuals mentioned in chap. xvi. were led by God in a similar way; but it is certain that Aquila and Priscilla occupied a most important position among the founders of the congregation; for among the many teachers whom Paul greets in chap. xvi., he presents his first greeting to them, and this, too, with such flattering commendation as he bestows upon none of the rest."

The much-disputed question concerning the national and religious constituents of the Roman Church is intimately connected with the question as to the occasion and aim of the Epistle to the Romans.

In discussing this point, we must start with certain clear distinctions. The difference between Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians must not be confounded with the difference between non-Pauline and Pauline Christians. Aquila and Priscilla, for example, were Jewish Christians, but they belonged decidedly to the school of Paul. On the contrary, there were in the Galatian congregation Gentile Christians who permitted themselves to be estranged from the Apostle Paul by the Judaizing party spirit. Likewise, those weak brethren or Jewish Christians who were entangled in legalistic anxiety (ἀσθενεῖς), must be distinguished from the false brethren, or heretical Ebionites, who gradually come into view; and so must we distinguish, among the Gentile Christians, those who were genuine disciples of Paul from those who proudly advocated an antinomian freedom of conscience. Even among the rigidly legalistic Christians there arose very early an antagonism between the adherents of Pharisaic legality and Essenic holiness.

It is clear, not only from historical relations, but also from the present Epistle, that the national Jewish element in the Roman Church must have been very important, and that it constituted the first basis of the Church; see chap. ii. 17 ff.; iv. 1 ff.; vii. 4 ff.

tion at Rome, composed of converts from the Jews and Gentiles, as is evident from the Epistle to the Romans, from the return of AQUILA and PRISCILLA (Rom. xvi. 8), from Acts xviii. 17 ff., and from TACITUS's account of the Neronian persecution in July, 64. CLAUDIUS issued several edicts concerning the Jews, first favorable ones in the year 42, mentioned by JOSEPHUS, Antiq. xix. 5, 2, 3; then the edict of expulsion, A. D. 52 (SUTTON., Claud. 25; Acts xviii. 2), with which probably the one mentioned by DION CASSIUS, ix. 8, is identical. The silence of JOSEPHUS concerning the latter edict is the more easily explained from the fact that, like the contemporary edict de mathematicis Italia pellendis (noticed by TACITUS, Annal. xii. 52), it was never fully executed, or else speedily recalled.—P. 8.]

At the same time, however, the Gentile Christian element in the Roman Church had become very strong, and was perhaps predominant. This we must infer from the historical relation. "Christianity, which took root first among the Jews, found an easier entrance in Rome among the heathen, because, in Rome, the popular heathen religion had already incurred the contempt of both the cultivated and ignorant classes (see GIESELER, Ch. Hist. i. § 11-14); therefore the inclination to Monotheism was very common, and the multitude of those who came over to the Jewish faith was very large (JUVENAL, Satyr. x. 96 ff.; TACIT., Ann. xv. 44; Hist. v. 5; SENECA in AUGUSTINE, De Civ. Dei, vii. 11; JOSEPH., Antiq. xviii. 3, 5). But how much more must this liberal religion, so elevated above all the bonds of a repulsive legal rigorism, as it was preached by Aquilas and other Pauline teachers, receive attention and support at the hands of those Romans who were discontented with heathendom." (MEYER.) That this was really the fact in the Roman church, is evinced by the many appeals addressed to the Gentile Christian portion, chap. i. 5, 6, 13; chap. xi. 18 ff.

Both elements in the Church must have been strong, as appears from the fact that the Apostle places together, throughout the Epistle, Jews and Gentiles, Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians, in order to bring them into union and harmony, as, from a different fundamental thought, he did in the Epistle to the Ephesians. In the greetings and introduction we find Jewish and Gentile Christians spoken of with equal regard. The theme of the Epistle, chap. i. 14-17, expressly applies the gospel alike to Jews and Greeks. In the exposition of the unrighteousness of the human race, the Gentiles and Jews are placed together in the light of searching truth, chap. i. 18; iii. 20. Likewise, justification by faith is applied in the most positive manner to Jews as well as Gentiles, chap. iii. 21-v. 11. Also the participation in the death of Adam and in the new life in Christ, chap. v. 12-viii. 39. So, likewise, the two economies of judgment and mercy in the history of the world, chaps. ix.-xi. Even in the exhortation the distinction again appears; the weak in faith and the free; the severe and the scornful; the weak and the strong, chaps. xiv.-xv. 7; yet here the other opposition between the non-Pauline and the Pauline Christians is also taken into account.

Though we cannot say with absolute certainty that the Gentile Christian portion of the Roman church was predominant, yet it is plain that the Pauline type did predominate in such a measure that the Apostle looked upon the church, in spirit, as his church. If we look at the single congregations in private houses, which the Apostle greets in chap. xvi., we find Aquila and Priscilla at the head of the first mentioned, which was probably the most prominent; and these were Jewish Christians, and yet decidedly Pauline. Likewise the warm and friendly terms with which he greets the most of the others, prove that he could regard them as his spiritual companions in the strictest sense of the word. This can be seen here and there from the contents of the Epistle. As the Apostle regarded himself, with justice, in the most specific sense, as the chosen Apostle to the Gentiles (chap. i. 5—a consciousness which, according to Gal. ii., involved neither a conflict with the apostles of the Jews, nor a neglect by Paul of the Jewish synagogues), he must have looked very early to the Roman metropolis as a sphere of labor designed for him. Accordingly, he designed at a very early period to establish a mission in Rome (Acts xix. 21; Rom. i. 18). He also made timely preparations for the execution of this design by sending in advance his friends Aquila and Priscilla, and many other companions—among them the deaconess Phoebe, of Corinth—to Rome. For this very reason he could depart, with regard to the Romans, from his usual practice of making his personal apostolic labor precede a written communication. This time he could send an epistle first, and write to the Roman Christians τοληροτέρως ἀπὸ μέρους (chap. xv. 15) without being embarrassed by the thought that he was entering upon a foreign field of labor (chap. xv. 20). Nevertheless, that delicacy with which he regarded the rights and independence of others, especially of believers, induced him to characterize his visit to Rome merely as a journey through that city to Spain. He could expect, with tolerable certainty, that Rome would be his principal station; but in case the prevailing peculiarities of the church should prevent this, he could not be denied in Rome the rights of Christian hospitality, by the aid of which he could proceed further. But the Judaizing element in the church was not important nor far advanced, as appears from the fact that he found it necessary only to oppose legalistic anxiety in reference to fast-days and the eating of food—not arrogant Judaistic dogmas.

The congregation being composed of Jewish and Gentile Christians, it could easily occur that the theological opinions at one time leaned to one side, and then to another.

According to PALEY, HENKE, KOPPE, KREHL, BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS, and THIERSCH, the Jewish Christian element predominated in the church; and BAUR, favoring his well-known Ebionitic hypothesis, has attributed to the church a mild form of Ebionism.* For an extended refutation of this view, which is sustained by a distortion of different passages, see THOLUCK's Romans, p. 8 ff. MEYER, in his introduction, passes lightly over the attacks of BAUR. We have no right to judge the character of the congregation at the time of Paul by the Judaizing tendencies which subsequently gained the ascendancy there in conformity with the constitutional proclivity of the Roman nationality. And even in the second century the Roman church, as such, cannot be charged with Ebionism (see THOLUCK, p. 7).

According to NEANDER, RÜCKERT, DE WETTE, OLSHAUSEN, and MEYER, the Gentile Christian element was predominant. But even MEYER confounds this view with the preponderance of Pauline Christianity in Rome. We must discriminate thus: The Gentile Christian element was strong, but the Pauline element was evidently preponderant. This was also the case still later, when Paul wrote his Epistle to the Philippians during his captivity in Rome, although here, as elsewhere in the churches after the year 60, the Jewish element increased in strength (Phil. i). Subsequently, the short stay of Peter in Rome, as well as the larger elective affinity between Jewish Christianity and the Roman nationality, gradually weakened the Pauline type, and, in fine, obscured it.

If there had been already a large number of Jewish Christians in Rome, how could the chiefs of the Jews speak to the Apostle when he came to Rome just as they did, according to Acts xxviii. 21, 22? Their answer was plainly evasive, in which they adhere to two points: that no writing of complaint against Paul had been sent to them from Jerusalem; and that the Christians were everywhere opposed by the Jews as a sect. BAUR and ZELLER have endeavored to derive from this apparent "contradiction" between the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistle to the Romans, a decisive proof of the unhistorical character of the Acts. For a refutation of this argument, see KLING, Studien und Kritiken for 1837, p. 301 ff.; THOLUCK, Comment., p. 10 ff.; MEYER, p. 20; my Apost. Zeitalter, i. p. 106, and others.

[The argument of the late Dr. BAUR, and ZELLER (his son-in-law), is this: The flourishing condition of the Christian Church at Rome, as described in the Epistle to the Romans (i. 8, 11, 12; xv. 1, 14, 15; xvi. 19), is irreconcilable with the tone used by the leading Roman Jews (οἱ πρῶτοι τῶν Ἰουδαίων) in their answer to Paul, Acts xxviii. 21, 22, where they plead ignorance of the antecedents of the Apostle, and contemptuously characterize the Christian religion as a sect (αἵρεσις) which met everywhere with contradiction (πανταχοῦ ἀντιλέγεται); consequently the author of the Acts must have misrepresented the real state of things in the interest of his doctrinal design, which was to effect a compromise between the Jewish Christian or Petrine, and the Gentile Christian or Pauline sections of the Church, by bringing Paul down to the Petrine or Jewish Christian standpoint, and by liberalizing Peter, and making both meet halfway. But, in the first place, the author of the Acts (which were certainly not written before 63 or 64—i. e., six or seven years after the Romans) must have known the Epistle to the Romans, and felt the contradiction, if there was any, as well as we, the more

* [The same view as to the preponderance of the Jewish element has been ably defended since by W. MANGOLD, Der Römerbrief und die Anfänge der Röm. Gemeinde, 1866, p. 35 ff.; but he justly denies the hypothesis of BAUR, that the Jewish Christians in Rome were Ebionites. SCHOTT, on the contrary, differs from BAUR and MANGOLD in assuming that the Epistle to the Romans was mainly intended for Gentile Christians. All three agree as to the aim and object of the Epistle, which was to justify Paul's apostolate to the Gentiles, by explaining the peculiar features of his doctrine and removing the objections to it, and thus to prepare the way not only for a personal visit to Rome, but also for a new missionary activity in the West, with Rome as the centre (comp. MANGOLD, l. c. p. 141). But MANGOLD objects to SCHOTT that such a justification was unnecessary for Gentile Christians, and hence he presupposes Jewish Chris-so as he himself had previously mentioned the existence of the Christian congregation in Rome (xxviii. 15). Hence, the apparent contradiction, far from exposing a wilful perversion of history, only proves the simplicity and veracity of the narrative, and tends, like so many similar instances, to confirm rather than to weaken our faith. (2.) The very manner in which the Jews speak of Christianity as a sect everywhere spoken against, implies its general spread at that time, and so far corroborates the statement of Paul. (3.) The Jews did not say that they had never heard of Paul at all (which would be inconsistent with their own statement concerning the contradiction raised everywhere against Christianity), but only that they had received no (official) information from Palestine which affected his moral character, or was unfavorable to him personally (τι περὶ σοῦ πονηρὸν). And this was no doubt true; for the Sanhedrin of Jerusalem could have no reason to send official communication to the Jewish community in Rome concerning the case of Paul, before he had appealed to the tribunal of Cæsar, and after this appeal they could not well anticipate the arrival of the Apostle in Rome, as he left Cæsarea soon after the appeal, at an advanced season of the year, shortly before the mare clausum (comp. Acts xxv. 12, 13; xxvii. 1, 9), and, in all probability, before his enemies could even make out the necessary official papers. (4.) We must not forget the diplomatic and evasive character of the answer of the Jews, who, as prudent men, were reluctant to commit themselves unnecessarily before the trial, in view of the imperial court and authority, and the complicated difficulties of the case. The leaders of the Jews appeared on this occasion in an official capacity, and very properly (from their own standpoint) observed an official reserve.—P. 8.]

§ 3. THE CERTIFICATION OF THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS. ITS GENUINENESS AND INTEGRITY.

The Epistle of Paul to the Romans belongs to the most indisputable books of the New Testament.

Its genuineness is certified in the strongest manner by the unanimous testimony of the ancient Church, by the harmony of its contents with the historical character of Paul, by its internal weight, and its great influence upon the Church. Even the criticism of BAUR, which rejects the most of the New Testament books, acknowledges the genuineness of this Epistle (with the exception of the last two chapters), besides the Epistles to the Corinthians and that to the Galatians. But here, as elsewhere, the testimony of this criticism is not of much account. Significant allusions to the Epistle can be found in the (first) epistle of CLEMENT of Rome; in IGNATIUS, POLYCARP, JUSTIN MARTYR, etc. MARCION, the Gnostic, acknowledged it. A decided testimony in favor of this Epistle is rendered by the three great witnesses of the Church and of the New Testament in its principal parts—IRENÆUS, TERTULLIAN, and CLEMENT of Alexandria. ORIGEN wrote a commentary on this Epistle. Even the fact that the Judaizing sects rejected it, speaks indirectly in its favor; they hated the Pauline doctrine contained in it.*

On the other hand, the integrity of the Epistle has been variously opposed. MARCION rejected chaps. xv. and xvi. on doctrinal grounds. HEUMANN, in his exposition of the New Testament, maintains that the Epistle closed, as a first epistle, with chap. xi., and that the subsequent part is a new work of Paul. SEMLER wrote: De duplici adpendice Epistola Pauli ad Romanos. According to PAULUS of Heidelberg, chap. xv. is a special epistle to the enlightened Christians in Rome; chap. xvi. is a special writing to the officers. Diverse, and, in fact, very strange conjectures have been advanced by SCHULZ and SCHOTT on chap. xvi. J. C. CHR. SCHMIDT denied the genuineness of the doxology, chap. xvi. 25–27, because it is wanting in Codex F. etc.; because it is erased in other codices; and because, in Codex J., and in almost all the Minuscule MSS., it stands after chap. xiv. 23. REICHE supposes that the public reading of the Epistle should only extend to chap. xiv. 23, because what follows is of less practical importance, and for this reason the former part has been concluded by the doxology, which subsequently was made to conclude the whole Epistle. It would have been more appropriate to reason: Since the public reading was often concluded with chap. xiv. 23, the doxology was transferred from the end of the whole Epistle to this place. This would explain the fact that it is to be found, in later codices, after chap. xiv. 23. BAUR, in his treatise on the Purpose and Occasion of the Epistle to the Romans, declares chaps. xv. and xvi. of the Epistle to be ungeniue. Certainly these chapters interfere with the application of his Ebionitic hypothesis to the condition of the Roman church. He was refuted by KLING in the Studien und Kritiken (1837, No. 2), and by OLSHAUSEN (1838, No. 4). Even the circumstance that the pseudo-Clementine Homilies seem to present a different picture of the Roman Church was made by BAUR a decisive argument against the genuineness of the last two chapters of the Epistle!

As far as the language of the Epistle is concerned, many Roman Catholic theologians have made use of the note of the Syrian scholiast on the Peshito: Paul wrote his epistle in Roman, in order to assert that it was originally written in Latin. GROTIUS, and others, with good reason, have understood the word Roman in the wider sense, as applied to the Greek language. "The Greek composition," says MEYER, "corresponds perfectly not only to the Hellenic culture of the Apostle himself, but also to the linguistic relations of Rome (see CREDERER, Einl. i., p. 383 ff.), and to the analogy of the remaining early Christian literature directed to Rome (IGNATIUS, JUSTIN, IRENEUS, HIPPOLYTUS, and others)." BOLTEN and BERTHOLD assert that the Epistle was originally written in the Aramæan language. For further information, see MEYER, REICHE, and others, especially also the Introductions to the New Testament.*

§ 4. OCCASION, PURPOSE, AND CONTENTS OF THE EPISTLE.

The origin of the Epistle to the Romans must be traced to the close connection between the call and consciousness of Paul as the Apostle to the Gentiles, and Rome as the great metropolis of the Gentile world. But the contents of the Epistle are determined by the fact that a church made up of both Jewish and Gentile Christians already existed in Rome, and that he had long ago prepared the way for his personal labors in Rome, and further west, by sending out his missionary assistants and companions. His Epistle starts with this preparation as a preliminary reflexion of his personal labors; that is, as the promulgation of the gospel both in its theocratic purpose and in its universal constitution. In other words, he exhibits the gospel in its eminent fitness to comprehend Jews and Gentiles in a common necessity of salvation, and to build them up, on the common ground of salvation, into a community of faith which would combine in perfect harmony both a theocratic purpose and a universal spirit.

It was natural that Paul, in view of his call to the Gentile world, should, very early in his career, look to the metropolis of Rome as his great aim. He longed and strove to go to Rome, ch. xv. 23; i. 11. The order of his apostolic labors required him first to exercise his apostolic office in the East, chap. xv. 19; Acts xix. 21. Accordingly, his three Oriental missionary journeys had to be undertaken first, though in them he gradually approached the West; and besides, after each of these missionary tours, he had to secure the connection of his work with the metropolis at Jerusalem by a return to this city; but, in addition to all this, he experienced many vexatious annoyances, and therefore he could well speak of the great hindrances to the execution of his design (chap. i. 13; xv. 22). Since it was his pur pose, after his third missionary journey, to proceed from Jerusalem to Rome, his arrest in Jerusalem and imprisonment in Cæsarea contributed to carry out this design, although it was for a time a new obstacle in his way; and his appeal to Cæsar (Acts xxv. 10) was not only a requirement of necessity, but a great step toward the consummation of his wishes. But in Rome, too, there had arisen a hindrance in the establishment of an important society of Christians without his coöperation. He removed this hindrance in a threefold way. First, by sending his spiritual friends, Aquila and Priscilla, in advance to Rome, in order to prepare a place of abode for him; secondly, by his letter; thirdly, by the extension of his missionary purpose to Spain; so that, at all events, he might visit the congregation in Rome without doing violence to his apostolic principle (chap. xv. 20). His imprisonment set aside the last difficulty, since it even compelled him to stay two years in Rome; although he did not give up his plan of going further to Spain.

Dr. ROBERTS endeavors to prove, from the undeniable facts of the New Testament, that even in Palestine, at the time of Christ, Greek was the common language of public intercourse, and that Christ and the apostles spoke for the most part in Greek, and only now and then in Aramaic. If this be so, we have, in the Gospels, not a translation, but the original words of our Saviour as He spoke them to the people and to the Twelve.—P. 8.]

The occasion and purpose of the Epistle to the Romans has been very much and very differently discussed both by commentators and in special treatises.*

"The dogmatic exposition of earlier times," says THOLUCK, "which was not at all interested in inquiring after the real historical purposes, mostly identified the aim and the argument of the Biblical books; in that which the Divine Spirit directed the writer to record, there lay the purpose for Christendom in all ages. The historical exposition of modern times seeks, by comparing the contents with the historical situation from which the writings arose, to disclose the nearest purpose to the original readers, although some writers of the rationalistic school put external cause in the place of the internal, and contented themselves with merely accidental causes, such as the good opportunity to send a letter to Rome by the departure of Phoebe, the Corinthian deaconess; the sight of the Adriatic sea from the high coast of Illyria, and the desire thereby awakened to go to Rome (PAULUS of Heidelberg)."

The further account by THOLUCK, however, does not fully harmonize with the assumption that earlier writers had in view only a doctrinal occasion, while the more recent commentation start from an historical one.†

* Among the essays on this subject are those by ORHRT, FRIED. SCHMID (Tübinger Weihnachtsprogramm, 1834, De Paulinus ad Romanos Epistolæ consilio et argumento); by BAUR (Zweck und Veranlassung des Römerbriefs, in the Tübinger Zeitschrift, 1836, No. 5), and his followers (see THOLUCK, p. 16); by OLSHAUSEN (in the Studien und Kritiken, 1838, p. 935); by HUTNER (Zweck und Inhalt der zwölf ersten Kapitel des Römerbriefs, 1846); and THEOD. SCHOTT (Der Römerbrief, seinem Endzweck und Gedankengang nach ausgelegt, Erlangen, 1868).—[Since then appeared D. WILHELM MANGOLD, The Epistle to the Romans, and the Beginnings of the Roman Congregation: A critical Investigation, Marburg, 1866, pp. 183; and W. BEYSCHLAG, The Historical Problem of the Epistle to the Romans, in the Studien und Kritiken for 1867, pp. 627-665. The views of the late Dr. BAUR on the Aim and Occasion of the Epistle to the Romans, were first published at Tübingen, 1836, and substantially reproduced in his work on Paul, 1845, p. 332 ff., as well as in his Church History of the first three Centuries, 2d ed., 1860, p. 63 ff.; but in this last work, and in the second edition of the monograph on St. Paul (1867), he moderates the alleged antagonism of the Jewish Christians at Rome against Paul, and no more insists on the opinion that chapters ix.-xi. constitute the doctrinal essence of the whole Epistle, to which the rest was made to serve merely as an introduction and an application. It must be admitted that Dr. BAUR, by striking critical combinations, broke a new field of investigation concerning the character and condition of the primitive Christians in Rome, and the aim and occasion of the Epistle to the Romans. THEODOF SCHOTT, of Erlangen, agreeing with BAUR as to the central significance of chaps. ix., x., and xi., but differing from his untenable assumption of the preponderance of the Jewish element in the Roman congregation, represents the Epistle as an apology of the Gentile apostolate of Paul before Gentile Christians of the Pauline school. But these did not need any such apology. MANGOLD, in the able treatise just referred to, substantially renews the view of BAUR as to the essentially Jewish Christian character of the Church of Rome, and the importance of chaps. ix.-xi., but he moderates its supposed antagonism to Paul. BAUR, SCHOTT, and MANGOLD agree in giving the Epistle an apologetic aim, viz., the defence of Paul's apostolate of the Gentiles (Die Rechtfertigung des paulinischen Heidenapostolats). In this, BEYSCHLAG differs from them, and, without denying this apologetic aim, he yet subordinates it (with THOLUCK, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, and others) to the general dogmatic aim of a systematic exhibition of the gospel salvation to a preëminently Gentile Christian congregation in the metropolis of the world. In doing this, however, the Apostle had evidently his eye mainly upon the settlement of the difficult problem touching the relation of God's ancient people to the recently-engrafted Gentile world on the broad basis of God's infinite wisdom and mercy in the unfolding of His plan of redemption. Thus, chaps. ix.-xi. receive their proper position as an outline of a philosophy of church history, instead of being merely regarded as a parenthetical section. Compare Dr. LAMER's views in the text. The English commentators do not trouble themselves much with this introductory question.—P. 8.]

† [There were attempts at historical exegesis among the Greek fathers of the Antiochian school, THEODORE of MYPÆNESTIA, CHRYSOSTOM, THEODORET, and among a few Latin fathers such as JEROME, PSEUDO-AMBRASIUS, and PELAGIUS; on the other hand, with some of the modern commentators the doctrinal and practical element predominates.—P. 8.]

As far as the historical (more properly defined, special dogmatico-historical) occasions are concerned, AMBROSIASTER, AUGUSTINE, BULLINGER, and BUCER have ascribed to the Epistle a polemical attitude against the Jewish Christians (PELLICAN likewise, though only in the way of caution); and in modern times, EICHORN, SCHMID, BAUR, SCHWEGLER, ZELLER, KÖSTLIN, LUTTERBECK, DIETLEIN, and THIERSCH have, with many modifications, regarded the Epistle chiefly as a rectification of Jewish and Judaistic principles.

CHRYSOSTOM and THEODORET would find, on the contrary, in the Epistle decided polemic references to Gentile Christian Antinomian errors such as we find among the Marcionites, Valentinians, and Manichæans.

But those are nearer right who suppose that the Epistle was designed for the conciliatory counteraction both of Jewish Christian and Gentile Christian perversions. This view has been defended especially by MELANCHTHON, DU PIN, HUG, and BERTHOLDT. MELANCHTHON says "It can be seen that Paul wrote this Epistle from this cause: that the Jews would appropriate to themselves redemption and eternal life by their own righteousness through the works of the law; and again, the heathen insisted that the Jews were cast off for having rejected Christ."

In opposition to the historical (or better, the special dogmatico-historical) view concerning the occasion of the Epistle, we find the theory of a dogmatic, or, more properly, a universal dogmatico-historical occasion. When the Apostle Paul, in this view, without special references to particular embarrassments in the Roman church, would give to this church an outline of the first elements of the whole gospel—according to his conception of it—he did it under the steady conviction of his universal calling as the special Apostle to the Gentiles, who must extend his labors to the specific city of the Gentiles. On this side belong LUTHER's Preface to his Commentary on the Romans, HEIDEGGER's Enchiridion, p. 585, THOLUCK, in the earlier editions of his Commentary, OLSHAUSEN, RÜCKERT, REICHE, KÖLLNER, GLÖCKLER, and PHILIPPI. On the different modification of this view, see SCHOTT, p. 17. That of OLSHAUSEN is the most clearly defined. "We can affirm," says he [Commentary on the Romans, Introduction, § 5, p. 58, Germ. ed.], "that the Epistle to the Romans contains, so to say, a Pauline system of divinity, since all the essential topics to which the Apostle Paul, in his treatment of the gospel, is accustomed to give special prominence, are here developed at length." PHILIPPI: "The Epistle was designed to take the place of the personal preaching of Paul in Rome; therefore it contains a connected doctrinal statement of the specifically Pauline gospel, such as no other contains."

SCHOTT declares: "I must oppose decidedly, with BAUR, all these views." Yet his protest differs from that of BAUR. By his supposition concerning the Ebionitism of the Roman church, BAUR was misled to the monstrous conclusion, that the theme of the Epistle to the Romans first appears positively in the section from chaps. ix. to xi. (in direct opposition to THOLUCK, who, in his former editions, would find in the same part only a historical corollary). "The ever-increasing number of the Gentile Christians received by Paul must have so far excited the pretensions of the Judaists, that even the reception of the heathen, on condition of circumcision, was no more acceptable to them, and the reception of the heathen was regarded by them as an usurpation, so long as Israel was not converted." SCHOTT controverts the opinion that "the cause and object of the Epistle must be determined from its entire contents," and confines himself to the introductory remarks of the Apostle concerning the purpose and cause of his Epistle. The result of his inquiry into the Proœmium is the following: "As Paul sets out to proclaim his gospel for the Gentiles to the nations of the West, he designs to visit the Christian congregation at Rome, and to enter into a closer personal relation to it by reciprocal acquaintance, with a view to make this congregation of the metropolis of the West a solid base of operation for his Gentile mission work, which was now to begin in the West." But that understanding with the Roman church could be reached in no other way than by "a full exposition of the nature and character of his apostolic office, and the principles by which he was governed in his conduct." SCHOTT finds, therefore, in the Epistle, "not an exposition of the Pauline theory of Christianity, but a description and vindication of the Pauline system of missionary labors."

We object to this view, on the whole, that it puts the historical motive and the doctrinal in a strong contrast which is untenable. Then in particular :

1. The distinction between the East and the West, by which the former is described as the sphere of Jewish Christianity, and the latter, on the other hand, is the sphere in which the Apostle's purely Gentile Christian labors began (p. 102 ff.).

2. The supposition that the Apostle desired, in his Epistle, to lay before the church in Rome a complete apologetic programme of his missionary policy, in order to gain their recognition, and thereby find in them a point of support; but not to proclaim to the church in Rome the gospel as he understood it.

3. He would place the church in Rome, by means of his admonitions, in such a condition that it could become a basis for his Western missionary labors; but he did not intend that Rome itself should be his final object, but merely serve as a point of support for his labors in the West, above all in Spain.

It is above all things improper to separate the historical and the doctrinal cause, or to bring them into opposition. The Apostle to the Gentiles was under no obligation to legitimize himself before the Roman church concerning his missionary labors in the West; yet, according to the principle of Apostolic order, he had to justify himself when he wrote to the Romans τολμησέν τις (which certainly does not mean by way of defence, but, with more than usual boldness), and proclaimed to them the gospel. Plainly, the first fundamental thought of the Epistle is this: The call of the Apostle to the Gentiles is a call for Rome, and therefore the Apostle had long made the city of Rome his object. But the second fundamental thought, which limits the first, is the idea of apostolic regulation. The Apostle cannot lay claim to the church as exclusively his own, since it had already long existed without his coöperation. Therefore he describes his anticipated journey as one to the heathen West—to Spain, the limit of the Western pagan world—in which he designs that Rome should furnish him a hospitable stay. Nevertheless, the Apostle was filled with the confidence that he could venture to address Rome as his church, and assuredly as the church in which he had to perfect the universal union of Jewish Christianity and Gentile Christianity, of Jerusalem and Antioch. Accordingly, he unfolds the religious and moral strength of his gospel, as fully adapted to save Jews and Greeks, and therefore to unite them, since, with the same evidence, it (a.) makes Jews and Gentiles sinners alike; (b.) presents salvation in Christ with equal certainty to both; (c.) leads both from the same death to the new life, as the elect; (d.) makes plain their mutual dependence in the same divine economy of salvation (chaps. ix.-xi.); (e.) the gospel proves itself to be a power of sanctification for Jews and Gentiles, which can make both capable of being reciprocally sympathetic, and of setting them free from their Jewish and pagan prejudices (chap. xii. ff.). By these combined considerations the Apostle furnishes to the Christians in Rome a real and practical proof that he, as the universal Apostle to the Gentiles, was also called to be indirectly the Apostle of Israel (chap. xi. 13, 14), and of the unity of the Jewish and Gentile Christians; and that Rome, the universal church of Gentile Christians, was called, as such, to become the union church of Jewish and Gentile Christians. And this is to be brought about by the strength of the universal gospel, which unites all the elect, and which, after first announcing it by letter, he hopes soon to present orally, so as to make Rome the point of departure for this universal Christian Church.

The matter stands, therefore, thus: The Apostle, who began his labors as the Apostle to the Jews (Acts ix. 22, 28), and who was afterwards in a special sense the Apostle to the Gentiles (Acts xxii. 21; Gal. ii.), now enters upon the third stage of his activity as the Apostle to all nations, and devotes his attention to the development of a union Church, which should embrace in one Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians.

wrote the Epistle to the Romans from CORINTH, during his stay there, while on his third missionary journey.

According to Rom. xv. 25 ff., the Apostle, when he wrote this Epistle, was about to depart for Jerusalem in charge of the collection from Macedonia and Achaia. But he brought this collection to an end in Corinth, when on his third missionary tour, according to 1 Cor. xvi. 1-8; 2 Cor. ix. This combination refers to the last three months' stay of the Apostle in Achaia (Acts xx. 2), and especially in Corinth; since this city was the metropolis of the church of Achaia, and the Apostle desired to tarry here, according to 1 Cor. xvi. 1-7; 2 Cor. ix. 4; xii. 20; xiii. 2. It is also in favor of Corinth, that the Apostle sent the Epistle by the deaconess Phœbe from the Corinthian seaport Cenchræ (chap. xvi. 1, 2); that he greets the Roman Christians for his host, Gaius (chap. xvi. 23), whom we may identify with the Corinthian Gaius (1 Cor. i. 14); and also for Erastus, the treasurer of the city, who, according to 2 Tim. iv. 20 (comp. Acts xix. 22), had his home in Corinth. Dr. PAULUS has no ground whatever for arguing from chap. xv. 19, that the Epistle was written in a city of Illyria. MEYER justly supposes that the Epistle was written before the Apostle—who first had the purpose of travelling directly from Achaia to Syria and Jerusalem—was compelled by Jewish persecution to return through Macedonia (see Acts xx. 8); for he mentions, chap. xv. 25-31, nothing of this important matter.

The TIME of the composition of the Epistle was therefore about the year 59 after Christ. The notice, Acts xxviii. 21, which seems to imply that the Roman Jews knew nothing of an Epistle of Paul to Rome, by no means justifies the inference (drawn by TOBLER) that the Epistle was written at a later time; comp. against this FLATT and MEYER.

The Epistle was dictated by Paul to Tertius, an assistant (chap. xvi. 22). "The cause why Paul did not write his Epistles with his own hand, is not to be found in his want of practice in writing Greek,—which has no support whatever,—but in the apostolic condition when others were ready to aid him." MEYER. See Gal. vi. 11, and the note of the Bible-Work in loc.

§ 6. The Meaning and Import of the Epistle to the Romans.

OLSHAUSEN divides the Pauline Epistles into three classes: First, dogmatical didactic Epistles, then practical didactic Epistles, and finally, friendly expressions of his heart. This division is untenable, as appears from the fact that he includes the profound christological Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, together with the Epistles to the Philippians and to Philemon, in the class of "letters of friendship." It is also very insufficient to say that the Epistle to the Romans belongs to the dogmatic didactic class. OLSHAUSEN remarks correctly, that the Epistle to the Romans is most nearly related to that to the Galatians; yet he does not go quite to the point, when he says: "Both Epistles treat of the relation of law and gospel; but while, in Romans, this relation is viewed altogether objectively, the Epistle to the Galatians, on the contrary, is altogether polemical against the Judaizing Christians. Besides, the Epistle to the Galatians is limited solely to this relation, and treats of the same more briefly than is the case in the Epistle to the Romans. In the Epistle to the Romans, on the other hand, the relation of the law and gospel is developed didactically, and scientifically in the strict sense of the word," etc.

We have already remarked that the two Epistles are to be distinguished as specifically soteriological in the narrower sense of the word; but as the Epistle to the Romans describes justification by faith in Christ in antagonism with universal human depravity, the Epistle to the Galatians, on the contrary, is directed against false justification from the works of the law. At the same time, the Epistle to the Romans is constructed on a broader basis than that to the Galatians, since it deals both with heathenism and Judaism. The Epistle purposes to show, that neither the Gentiles were saved by God's revelation in nature and in the conscience, nor the Jews by the written law of the Old Testament; and he extends human depravity and the counteracting redemption through three stages of development in the mos' universal and exhaustive contemplation, to which an equally comprehensive practical application must correspond.

Although the Epistle to the Romans belongs, in the chronological order, in the middle of the Pauline Epistles, yet its primacy has been recognized in manifest opposition to the alleged primacy of the Roman Bishop. The Epistle to the Romans, in its Pauline type, opposes, by its doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law, the system of Rome; as that even to-day it can be regarded as an Epistle especially directed "to the Romans."

The early Church, in its disposition of the New Testament canon, especially the so-called "Apostolos [as distinct from the "Gospel"], placed the Epistle to the Romans, because of its importance, and with regard, at the same time, to the high standing of the Roman congregation, at the head of the Pauline Epistles. Still more did the Reformation bring it into its proper light. "It was," says THOLUCK, "from the fundamental truth developed in the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians, that the Reformation took its start in its opposition to the Judaism which had crept into the Christian Church. Thus the doctrine of justification by faith became its dogmatic centre. Hence the importance attached to this Epistle by the Protestant Church. The exposition of this Epistle was MELANCHTHON's favorite course of lectures, which he repeated again and again almost without interruption; and, as DEMOSTHENES did with THUCYDIDES, he twice transcribed this Epistle with his own hand, in order to impress it more deeply on his memory (STROBEL, Literaturgeschichte der Loci Melanchthon's, p. 18). Since he here found a development of the chief articles of the Christian faith, he based on the Epistle to the Romans the first doctrinal system of the renovated Church, MELANCHTHON's Loci Communes, 1521. Henceforth the Epistle was regarded as a compendium of Biblical dogmatics, and under this point of view, OLSHAUSEN also advises to begin exegetical studies with the same. But following the succession of thought from chap. i. 11, we would rather find in it a Christian Philosophy of Universal History (comp. BAUR, Paulus, p. 657)." By the latter construction, however, the christological ἀρχή, as well as the eschatological τέλος, would receive too little attention. The soteriology is certainly pictured forth with its opposite, ponerology, in the most comprehensive way; and both heathendom and Judaism are described under a point of view which comprehends them both. OLSHAUSEN is of the opinion that LUTHER commented only on the Epistle to the Galatians, because the relation between the law and the gospel are treated exclusively in it, and because he would avoid discussion on the mysterious doctrine of predestination (Rom. ix. ff.). But LUTHER certainly expressed himself pointedly enough elsewhere on predestination. [De servo arbitrio, against ERASMUS.] The Epistle to the Galatians lay nearer to his purpose, because this Epistle brings out the doctrine of justification by faith in the strongest and clearest contrast to the false justification by works. From LUTHER's own preface to the Epistle to the Romans we learn how highly he appreciated that Epistle. On the importance of the Epistle for the Church in its inclination to legalism, and in its relation to the personal experience of Paul, and on its difficulties, see OLSHAUSEN, p. 54 ff.

[S. T. COLERIDGE, in his Table-Talk (June 15, 1838), calls St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans "the most profound work in existence," and says: "The only fit commentator on Paul was LUTHER—not by any means such a gentleman as the Apostle, but almost as great a genius."—P. 8.]

§ 7. THE CONTENTS AND DIVISION.

A. The Contents.

The Epistle to the Romans—in its sixteen chapters the most comprehensive of the Pauline Epistles—unites most intimately the character of a dogmatic epistle of instruction with the character of an ecclesiastical address in a specific, personal relation. Proceeding from the standpoint of his apostleship to the Gentiles, and after a satisfactory conclusion of his apostolic labors in the East, the Apostle designs to prepare the Christian church in Rome to be the centre and starting-point of labors reaching to the farthest West (Spain). His work in the West should be universal, not merely as it united the West and East in Christ, but also as it constituted in Rome the peculiar type for the united church of Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians. The Apostle to the heathen is, in his consciousness, perfectly ripened into the apostle for the nations; and in this sense he intends to clothe the church at Rome with the prestige of a church of the nations, which he might regard as of his own institution, and make use of as the home of his universal activity.

To this purpose, the change of the Roman church from uncertain authority into a fixed institution of Pauline authority, corresponds the universal soteriological doctrine of the Epistle, as related to the universal ecclesiastical call of Paul. All men, viewed under the antagonism of Jews and heathen, are, in consequence of the prostitution of the living Divine glory, regarded as sinners, destitute of righteousness and merit before God; and all men have a common mercy-seat for pardon in Christ; all should pass from the old life of death in sin, or in the flesh and under the law, to the new life in Christ, in the spirit and in liberty; all were included under the judgment of unbelief, and all should experience Divine compassion. On this dogmatic foundation the church at Rome should be completely based; and in accordance therewith, it should regulate its internal relation between Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians, as well as its external relation to the world; but it must also, in accordance with this principle, perceive that its call as the central city of the Western Church can only be actualized by first acknowledging the call of Paul, and committing itself to him, as a point of departure in his universal work.

This Epistle has a unique character in relation to the Apostle, since he wrote it to a church which he had not established, and had not even once visited. But the anomalous character of this fact may be thus explained: The church was, on one hand, still perfectly vacant from all apostolical authority, and it was thus far not yet fully organized as a church; and, on the other hand, it was not only naturally related to the Apostle to the Gentiles as the church of the world's metropolis, but had been long previously visited by him in spirit, and was accordingly taken possession of by his pupils and assistants as his sphere of labor (see chap. xvi.). The case was similar with the Epistle to the Colossians, though the Apostle may be regarded as the indirect founder of this church (by Epaphras).

In its dogmatic aspect, the Epistle to the Romans possesses a decidedly soteriological character. As to its form, it resembles, in its cautious tone, the Epistle to the Galatians; for the Apostle probes the former church, and asks whether it be already his church? and of the latter, he asks whether it still be his church? (Rom. xv. 15, 16; Gal. iv. 19, 20).

[The Epistle to the Romans, and that to the Galatians, treat of the same theme, viz., justification by free grace through faith in Christ, or rather, the deeper and broader doctrine of a personal life-union of the believer with Christ; but the latter is apologetic and polemic against the Judaizing pseudo-apostles, who labored to undermine Paul's authority, and to enforce the yoke of legalism upon a church of his own planting; while the former, written to strangers, opposes no particular class of men, but only the corrupt tendencies of the human heart. Both supplement each other, and constitute the grand charter of evangelical freedom in Christ.—P. S.]

The Epistle to the Romans has this in common with the Epistle to the Ephesians, that it shows how salvation in Christ transforms Gentiles and Jews into one Church of God; but in the Epistle to the Ephesians he establishes this unity on the christological principle, while in the Epistle to the Romans, it is effected by the soteriology. The relation of the Romans to the Colossians is similar to the one just described. [But with this difference, that the christological element prevails in the Epistle to the Colossians, the ecclesiastical in that to the Ephesians.—P. S.]

In its ecclesiastical and practical character the Epistle to the Romans resembles those to the Corinthians. But in the former case the Apostle has yet to establish an authority and institution, while in the latter he has to maintain them.

In the section from chap. ix. to x., this Epistle approaches the eschatological contents of the Epistles to the Thessalonians. The greetings in chap. xvi. remind us of the Epistle to the Philippians; the practical portion reminds us of the Pastoral Epistles.

In this Epistle the idea of piety or of righteousness, as a living worship of God, is peculiarly prominent; perhaps produced by the decided predominance of the practical element in the Roman conception of cultus. The fall of man commenced with the great peccatum omisit: Men, regardless of the natural revelation of God, forsook the living worship and praise of God (chap. i. 21). Therefore the development of corruption among the heathen is shown in an external symbolism, which more and more sinks into a mythical idolatry, and results in a growing perversion and decay of morals (chap. i. 22-32); but among the Jews, in the fearful caricature into which even its religious zeal is turned by its fleshly fanaticism (chap. ii. 17-24). Therefore is salvation for faith represented by the mercy-seat in the Holy of Holies (chap. iii. 25), and faith is a priestly free access to grace (chap. v. 2), which converts the whole subsequent life of the Christian into a song of praise (vers. 8-11). Therefore the crown of the new life is a revelation of the glory of the children of God, which is guaranteed by the spirit of prayer on the part of the faithful (chap. viii.). Therefore, finally, must the economically limited judgment of God on Israel, and the whole economy of salvation in reference to the dark history of the world, contribute to the glory of God (chap. xi. 36). The new life is consequently represented as the direct contrast to the fall of man. As the living service of God ceased with the latter, so now is the true spiritual service of God restored in the lives of Christians, since they dedicate their bodies as living sacrifices to God (chap. xii. 1 ff.). The temporal authority (chap. xiii. 1 ff.) stands in a subservient (ver. 4) and liturgical (ver. 6) relation to the living divine service of Christians. In its great moral significance, which also requires a moral and free recognition (ver. 5), it is unconsciously subject to the highest aim and goal of human history—the glory of God through Christ. The Church must be conformed to this glory; it must be an instrument for the object that all nations should praise God (chap. xv. 11). The Epistle is directed to this end: it is a priestly work to make the heathen an acceptable offering of God (chap. xv. 16). It finally corresponds to this conception of the kingdom of God as a restored and real worship, that the Apostle concludes with a liturgical doxology, in which faith in the promises and announcements of the gospel responds to the living God of revelation with an eternal Amen (chap. xvi. 25-27)—a passage which may be explained by a comparison with 1 Cor. xiv. 16; 2 Cor. i. 20; Heb. xii. 22; xiii. 15; Rev. iv. 10.

The church at Rome must, therefore, in accordance with its call, become a focus for the restoration of the living, real, and universal worship of God by the nations, as the institution of Paul, the universal Apostle of the nations. It must become the point of departure of the Church of the Western nations, in the sense in which the word catholic had been originally used; that is, in harmony with the religious and moral necessities of humanity, in harmony with the moral significance and mission of the state, in harmony with the free as well as with the anxious consciences of the faithful on the basis of justification by faith without the works of the law.

B. The Arrangement.

THE INTRODUCTION AND FUNDAMENTAL THEME.

The apostolate of Paul appointed for the glory of the name of God by means of the gospel of Christ, and of the revelation of the justice of God for faith throughout the whole world, among Jews and Gentiles, chap. i. 1-17.

1st Section.—The inscription and greeting. The Apostle; his call; his apostolic office; his greeting of the saints in Rome, vers. 1-7.

2d Section.—The point of connection. The fame of the faith of the Christians at Rome in all the world; and his desire and purpose to come to them to announce the gospel to them. vers. 8-15.

3d Section.—The fundamental theme. The joyful readiness of the Apostle to proclaim the gospel of Christ, since it is the power of God to save Jews and Gentiles—as a revelation of the righteousness of God by and for faith, vers. 16, 17.

Part First.

The doctrine of righteousness by faith, as the restoration of the true worship of God chap. i 19–chap. xi.

FIRST DIVISION.

Sin and grace in their first antagonism. The real appearance of corruption and salvation Righteousness by faith. The wrath of God on all injustice of men; that is, the actual corruption of the world in its growth for death hastened by the judgment of God; and the antagonistic justification of sinners by the propitiation or pardon in Christ, through faith chap. i. 18–v. 11.

1st Section.—The beginning of all real corruption in the world, and of the Gentiles in particular, and God's judgment on the same; the neglect of the general revelation of God by the creation, in the omission of the real worship of God by praise and thanksgiving, chap. i. 18–21.

2d Section.—The development of heathen corruption under the judicial abandonment on God's side (the withdrawal of His Spirit). From symbolism to the worship of images and beasts; from theoretical to practical corruption; from natural sins to unnatural and abominable ones, to the development of all vices and crimes, to the demoniacal lust for sin, and to evil maxims themselves, chap. i. 22–32.

3d Section.—Transition from the corruption of the Gentiles to the corruption of the Jews. The genuine Jews. The higher universal antagonism above the antagonism of heathendom and Judaism: striving and opposing men. The universality of corruption, and, with the universality of guilt, the worst corruption: judging the neighbor. The guilt of this uncharitable judgment is intensified by the continuance of a general antagonism of pious, striving men, and of stiff-necked enemies of the truth throughout the world, within the general corruption, over against the righteous and impartial government of God; this, too, by virtue of the continuance of God's general legislation in the conscience. The revelation of the antagonism of Gentiles true to the law, and of Jews who despised the law on the day of the proclamation of the gospel, chap. ii. 1–16.

4th Section.—The real Jews. The increased corruption of the Jew in his false zeal for the law (a counterpart of the corruption of the heathen in his symbolism). The fanatical and wicked method of the Jews in handling the law with legal pride, and of corrupting it by false application and unfaithfulness, an occasion for defaming the name of God among the heathen, chap. ii. 17–24.

5th Section.—The use of circumcision: an adjustment of the need of salvation by the knowledge of sin. The circumcision which becomes the foreskin, and the foreskin which becomes circumcision; or, the external Jew can possibly become an internal Gentile, while the external Gentile can become an internal Jew. It is not the dead possession of the law, but fidelity to the law, that is of use. It does not produce a pride of the law, but knowledge of sin—that is, of the necessity of salvation. The advantage of circumcision consists herein: that to the Jews are committed those declarations of God, that law, by which all men are represented under the penalty of sin. Sin represented as acknowledged guilt over against the law, chap. ii. 25–iii. 20.

6th Section.—The revelation of God's righteousness without the law by faith in Christ, for all sinners without distinction, by the representation of Christ as the Mediator (Propitiator) the righteousness of God as justifying righteousness, chap. iii. 21–26.

7th Section.—The abrogation of the vain glory (or self-praise) of man by the law of faith

Justification by faith without the works of the law. First proof from experience: God is the God of the heathen as well as of the Jews; which fact is shown by the faith of the Gentiles, as well as by the true renewal of the law by faith, vers. 27-31.

3th Section.—Second proof of the righteousness by faith: from the Scriptures, and this from the history of the faith of Abraham, the ancestor of the Jews themselves. Abraham is the father of faith to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews, because he had been justified in the foreskin as a heathen, and because he had received circumcision as a seal of justification by faith. David is also a witness of righteousness by faith. Abraham in his faith in the word of the personal God of revelation, and especially in the promise of Isaac, a type of all believers in the miracle of the resurrection of Christ, chap. iv.

9th Section.—The fruit of justification. Peace with God and the development of new life to the fulfilment of Christian hope. The new worship of God by the Christians. They have free access to grace in the Most Holy. Therefore they boast of their hope in the glory of God; and glory even in the afflictions they suffer, by which this hope is perfected. The love of God in Christ as the guaranty of the realization of Christian hope. Christ's death our reconciliation: Christ's life our blessedness. Its bloom: the joyous glorying that God is our God, chap v. 1-11.

SECOND DIVISION.

Sin and grace in their second antagonism (as in their second power), according to their operations in human nature and in nature generally. The sinful corruption of the world proceeding from Adam and made the common inheritance of man; and the life of Christ as the internal vital principle of the new birth for new life in single believers, in all humanity, and in the whole created world. The principle of death in sin, and the principle of the new life; as well as the glorification of all nature in righteousness, chap. v. 12-viii. 39.

1st Section.—The sin of Adam as the mighty principle of death, and the grace of God in Christ as the mightier principle of the new life in individual human nature, and in whole humanity. The law as the medium of the completed consciousness of sin and guilt, chap. v. 12-21.

2d Section.—Call to the new life in grace. The contradiction between sin and grace. The vocation of the Christians to new life, since they, by baptism in the death of Christ, are changed from the sphere of sin and death into the sphere of righteousness and life, chap. vi. 1-11.

3d Section.—The essential emancipation and actual departure of Christians from the service of sin unto death into the service of righteousness unto life, by virtue of the death of Christ. Believers should live in the consciousness that they are dead to sin, vers. 12-28.

4th Section.—The essential transfer and actual transition of Christians from the service of the letter under the law to the service of the Spirit under grace, by virtue of the death of Christ. Believers should live in the consciousness that they (by the law) are dead to the law, chap. vii. 1-6.

5th Section.—The law in its holy appointment to lead over, by the feeling of death, to new life in grace. The development of the law from the exterior to the internal. The experience of Paul a life-picture of the battle under the law as the transition from the old life in the law to the new life in faith, vers. 7-25.

3th Section.—The Christian life, or life in Christ as the new life according to the law of the Spirit, as walking in the Spirit. The fulfilment and exaltation of the law to be the law of the Spirit in Christ. The law of the Spirit as principle of the new life of adoption, and of the exaltation of the faithful and of humanity to the liberation and glorification of the creature, to the new world of life in love, chap. viii.

a. The Spirit as the Mediator of the atonement and witness of adoption, vers. 1-16.

b. The Spirit a surety of the inheritance of future glory. (1.) The subjective certainty of future perfection, or the spiritualization and glorification of Christian life, vers 17-27. (3.) The objective certainty of future perfection in glory, vers. 28-39.

THIRD DIVISION.

Sin and grace in their third antagonism (in their third power). The hardness of heart and the economical judgment on hardness of heart (the historical curse on sin), and the turning of the judgment to the rescue by the power of Divine sympathy at the progress of universal history. The historical development of sin to the execution of the judgment, and the revelation of salvation in demonstration of mercy. The intimate connection of God's acts of judgment and rescue; the latter being conditioned by the former, chaps. ix.-xi.

1st Section.—The dark mystery of the judgment of God in Israel, and its solution, chap. ix.

a. The painful contrast of the misery of the Jews in opposition to the portrayed happiness of the Christians, who, for the most part, came from the Gentiles. The sorrow of the Apostle at the evident failure of the destiny of his people, chap. ix. 1-5.

b. The ecstasy of the Apostle in the thought that the promise of God would nevertheless hold good for Israel. The proofs therefor, chap. ix. 6-23.

2d Section.—More decided explanation of the mysterious fact: The unbelief of Israel. The faith of the Gentiles, already foretold in the Old Testament, chap. x.

a. The fact is no fatalistic destiny, vers. 1, 2.

b. It rests rather on the antagonism between the self-righteousness as the supposed righteousness from the law, and the righteousness which is by faith, vers. 3-5.

c. The righteousness by faith, although proceeding from Israel, is nevertheless, according to Old Testament prophecy, accessible to all men because of its nature. Proof: The unbelief of the Jews as well as the faith of the heathen is foretold already in the Old Testament, vers. 6-21.

3d Section.—The concluding gracious solution of the mystery, or the turning of judgment to the rescue of Israel. The judgment of God on Israel is not a judgment of reprobation. God's economy of salvation in His Providence over the chosen of Israel and of the multitude—Jews and Gentiles—over the intertwining of judgment and rescue, by which all Israel should come, through the fulness of the Gentiles, to faith and happiness. The universality of judgment and compassion. Doxology, chap. xi.

a. Israel is not rejected; the elect (the kernel) are saved, vers. 1-6.

b. The hardening of the hearts of the remainder becomes a condition for the conversion of the Gentiles, vers. 7-11.

c. On the other hand, the conversion of the Gentiles became also a means for the conversion of Israel, vers. 11-18.

d. The fact itself is a conditional one. The Gentiles can yet individually become unbelieving, and the Jews, on the other hand, believing, vers. 19-24.

e. The last word, or the mystery of Divine Providence in its economy of salvation. All will contribute to the glory of God, vers. 25-36.

Part Second.

The practical theme: The vocation of the Roman Christians, on the ground of their accomplished salvation or of the mercy of God (which will be extended to all) to represent the living worship of God in the consummation of the real burnt offering, and to constitute a universal Christian church-life for the realization of the call of all nations to praise and glorify God; so that they may also acknowledge and maintain the universal call of the Apostle. The recommendation of his companions, assistants, and friends, in the sending of his greetings to them for the purpose of the true development of the Church, and as a com-terpart, his warning against Judaizing or paganizing errorists. Greetings, invocation of blessings, chap. xii. 1-xvi. 27.

FIRST DIVISION.

The call of the Roman Christians to a universal Christian deportment, chap. xii. 1-xv. 18.

1st Section.—The practical theme, vers. 1, 2. The proper conduct of the Christians toward the community of the brethren for the establishment of a harmonious church life, chap. xii. 1-8.

2d Section.—The true conduct of the Christians in all personal relations. For their own life, toward the brethren, toward everybody, and even toward enemies, chap. xii. 9-21.

3d Section.—Christian universalism (Roman Catholicism in Paul's sense) in the proper conduct toward those in authority (the heathen state), which also possesses an official and liturgical service in the household of God. The object and aim of government, chap. xiii. 1-6.

4th Section.—Proper conduct toward the world in general. Legal fellowship with the world. The recognition of the rights of the world in the justice and also in the strength of the love of our neighbor. The separation from the ungodly nature of the old world (the dark character of heathendom). The universality and its sanctification by the true separation, vers. 7-14.

5th Section.—The true practice of the living worship of God in the management and adjustment of the differences between the weak or perplexed (the slaves of the law) and the strong (inclined to disregard, and Antinomian transgression in freedom). The Christian universality of social life (to take and give no offence), chap. xiv. 1-xv. 4.

a. Reciprocal regard, forbearance, and recognition between the weak and the strong. Special warning against giving offence to the weak, chap. xiv. 1-18.

b. Of giving offence, and despising forbearance to the weak, chap. xiv. 18-xvi.

a. Reciprocal edification in self-denial after the example of Christ, chap. xv. 2-4.

6th Section.—Admonition to the harmony of all the members of the congregation to the praise of God on the ground of the grace of God, in which Christ has accepted Jews and Gentiles. Reference to the vocation of all nations to praise God even according to the Old Testament, and encouragement of the Roman Christians to an unbounded hope in this relation, in agreement with their call, chap. xv. 5-18.

SECOND DIVISION.

The call of the Apostle to a universal apostleship, and his consequent relation to the Roman church, as the point of departure for the universal apostleship in the West, chap. xv. 14-38.

a. The Apostle declares, almost apologizingly, that his writing to the Romans was the result of his call to make the heathen in priestly operation an acceptable offering to God; and he gives information on the general completion of his work in the East (to Illyria), and the results of the same, vers. 14-19.

b. His principle not to invade the sphere of others (a conduct opposite to that of all sect-makers). The consequent impediment to come directly to Rome, where Christian congregations already existed. Nevertheless, his desire to labor for them, which was in harmony with his call. His hesitation not being completely removed, he describes his anticipated visit to Rome as a temporary stay for the better prosecution of his journey through Rome to Spain; that is, to the limits of the West, without doubt in expectation that the church will welcome him and commit itself to his direction, vers. 20-24.

a. His last hindrance from his journey to Rome. The mention of the collections, a proof of his love to the believing Israelites, an expression of the proper conduct of Gentile Christians to Jewish Christians. Another announcement of his journey through Rome and of his visit in the spirit of apostolical refinement. Forbidding reference to the animosity of the unfaithful in Judæa, and a request for prayer that he might be permitted to accomplish his purpose of coming to them, vers. 23-28.

THIRD DIVISION.

The recommendation of his predecessors, companions, and assistants, in a succession of greetings, united with a warning against separatistic heretics (Jews and Gentiles), who could hinder and even destroy Rome's destiny and his apostolic mission. Yet the God of peace will shortly bruise Satan under their feet. Invocation of blessing, chap. xvi. 1-20.

a. The deaconess Phœbe, vers. 1, 2.

b. The greetings, vers. 3-16. The warning, and the invocation of blessing, vers. 17-20.

CONCLUSION.

The greetings of the Pauline circle to the church at Rome, and the invocation of blessings by Paul himself. His doxological sealing of the gospel of the justifying grace of God in Christ for all nations, vers. 21-27.

a. The greetings.

b. The doxological sealing of the gospel for eternity in accordance with the fundamental devotional thought of his Epistle. The Amen of the Church through Christ, as the response to the gospel of Christ, vers. 25-27.

Now to Him that is of power (in the gospel) to establish you

According to my gospel, etc.

According to the revelation of the mystery, etc.

According to the commandment of the everlasting God.

To God only wise,

Be glory through Jesus Christ

For ever! Amen!

COMMENTARIES.—THOLUCK enumerates, p. 26 ff., as expositors : *

1. Among the Church fathers: ORIGEN [†251, only in the mutilated Latin version of RUFINUS, ORIG. Opera, ed. Delarue, tom. iv.—P. S.], CHRYSOSTOM [†405, Homil. xxxii. in ep. ad Rom. Opera, ed. Bened. tom. ix., an English translation in the Oxford Library of the Fathers, vols. vii., 1841], THEODORET [†457, Comment. in ep. ad Rom.], THEODORE OF AOPSVESTIA [†429, Fragments, collected by FRIED. FRITZSCHE, in Theod. Mops. in N. T. Comm., 1847], THEOPHYLACT [eleventh century], EKUMENIUS [tenth century], Greek scholiast of the Moskow Codd. in Matthæi [and in J. A. CRAMER'S Catenæ in S. Pauli ep. ad Rom., Oxon. 1844]. Among the Latin fathers: AUGUSTINE [†430],† PELAGIUS,‡ HILARIUS (the AMBROSIASTER).§

2. Expositors of the Middle Ages: HERVEUS [middle of the twelfth century], HUGO OF ST. VICTOR [†1141], ABÆLARD [†1142], THOMAS AQUINAS [†1274, ignorant of Greek, but very profound and acute].

3. Roman Catholic expositors since the Reformation: ERASMUS [†1536], W. ESTE [†1613], a number of Jesuit expositors, among whom BEN. JUSTINIAN [1612], CORNELIUS A LAPIDE [1614, 14th ed., Lugd. 1688], CALMET [†1757], are prominent. For later ones, see below.

4. Protestant expositors down to the beginning of the seventeenth century:

a. REFORMED (Calvinistic) commentators: CALVIN [new ed., Halle, 1831], "a model of simple and precise exposition" (German translation by E. W. KRUMMACHER and L. BENDER, Frankfurt-am-Main, 1837), BEZA [4th ed., 1598], ZWINGLI [Opera, tom. iii.], PELLICANUS, BULLINGER [1587], BUCER [1586], ARETIUS [1608], PAREUS [1608], PISCATOR [1601].

b. Lutherans: LUTHER (his celebrated Preface to the Epistle to the Romans), MELANCHTHON (Annotaciones, 1522; Commentarii, 1532),† BUGEHNHAGEN, BRENZ, CAMERARIUS, HUNNIUS, BALDUIN.

5. Protestant expositors to the middle of the eighteenth century:

Reformed: DRUSIUS [†1612], DE DIEU [†1642], HEINSIUS [†1655], the two CAPELLUS, HAMMOND [1653], CLERICUS [1698], COCCEIUS [†1669], (very prominent).

† [St. AUGUSTINE has only commented on the first seven verses of the Epistle to the Romans, in his Inchoata expositio ep. ad Rom. Opera, ed. Bened., tom. iii. p. 926 sqq., and on some select passages, in expos. quarundam propositionum ex ep. ad Rom., i. c. p. 903 sqq. It is a remarkable fact that AUGUSTINE, who, of all the fathers, came nearest the Protestant evangelical doctrines of sin and grace as taught by St. Paul, held essentially the Roman Catholic view of justification as being identical with sanctification, while his antagonist, PELAGIUS, like the Reformers, explained Paul's justification as a forensic act that consists in the remission of sins. Comp. my History of the Christian Church, vol. iii. p. 812, 846. In his anti-Pelagian writings, AUGUSTINE makes frequent use of the Epistle to the Romans, and the other Pauline Epistles, which contributed much to his conversion. But he was a profound theologian rather than a learned commentator, and had a very imperfect knowledge of the Greek, and no knowledge whatever of the Hebrew. Upon the whole, the Epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians in their true genius and import remained a sealed book to the Church at large till the Reformation of the sixteenth century. The sense of the Scriptures unfolds itself gradually to the mind of the Church, and every book has its age in which its peculiar power is felt in the life, and brought out in the knowledge and exposition of congenial divines more clearly and forcibly than ever before.—P. S.]

‡ [The commentary of the heretical PELAGIUS on the Pauline Epistles is brief and superficial, but betrays no mean talent for plain, popular, and practical common-sense exposition of the Scriptures. By a singular irony of history, the commentaries, together with some other writings of PELAGIUS in which he develops his heretical system (the Epistola ad Demetriadem, and his libellus fidei addressed to Pope Innocent I.), have been preserved as supposed works of his bitter antagonist, St. JEROME (in the eleventh tome of Vallart's edition; comp. my Church Hist., iii. p. 791 and p. 965). The commentaries, however, have undergone some emendations by the hand of Cassiodorus (comp. Cass., De institut. divot. Necr., c. 8).—P. S.]

§ [The commentary of AMBROSIASTER, so called, or PSEUDO-AMBROSIUS, on the Pauline Epistles, is incorporated in the works of AMBROSE, and is generally ascribed to a Roman deacon, HILARY, of the fourth century (about 380). Augustine refers to it twice under this name, Contra duas Epp. Pelag. iv. 7, Opera, x. p. 472. AMBROSIASTER exhibits some talent for historical exposition (like PELAGIUS), but is obscure and inconsistent. Upon the whole the patristic exegesis was not grammatical and historical, but dogmatical and practical.—P. S.]

† [English translation of CALVIN on the Romans, by CHRISTOPHER ROWDELL, F. SIBSON, and JOHN OWEN. Edit. Calvin Transl. Soc., 1844 and 1849.—P. S.]

‡ [MEYER (Preface to the 4th ed. of his Com.) calls MELANCHTHON'S "Enarratio" of 1556, "his ripest exegetical fruit." The "Commentaries" of MELANCHTHON appeared also in 1640, and in a new edition by NICOLAI in 1861. Likewise following THOLUCK, refers to older editions.—P. S.]

Lutherans of the seventeenth century: ERASMUS SCHMID [†1637], CALIXTUS [Posthumous Lectures, 1664], CALOVIUS [†1688, author of the Biblia Illustrata, 1672, against GROTIUS] SPENER [†1705], CHRIST. WOLF [Opera Philologica et Critica, 1732], BENIGL's Gnomon N. T. (1742); "on account of its great worth, lately edited several times, both in the original Latin, and in German and English translations."*)

Arminians: GROTIUS [Annotationes in Nov. Test., 1645], LIMBORCH [†1712], TURRETINE [†1787], (numbered by THOLUCK in this school, though perhaps unjustly), WETSTEIN (in his edition of the Greek Testament, with parallel passages from the classical authors, 1751).

Socinians: CRELL [†1683], SCHLICHTING [†1661], PRZYZOV.

6. Evangelical expositors, from the middle of the eighteenth century down to the present time:

Period of transition: HEUMANN [†1764], MOSHEIM [†1770], JOH. BENJ. CARPZOV ("the fourth of this name," 1758), MORUS [†1794], CHRISTIAN SCHMID [†1774]; above all, SEMLER [1791]. KOPPE [3d ed., 1824] also belongs here.

Latest period: THOLUCK (1st ed., 1824),† FLATT [1825], STENERSSEN (Danish, 1829), KLEE [Roman Catholic, 1830], BENECKE [1831], RÜCKERT [2d ed., 1839], PAULUS, MOSES STUART [Andover, Mass., 1832], CHARLES HODGE [Princeton, New Jersey, 1835], REICHE [1834], KÖLLNER [1834], GLÖCKLER [1834], OLSHAUSEN [2d ed., 1840, English translation, Edinburgh and New York, 1860], DE WETTE [4th ed., 1847], STENGEL [Roman Catholic, 1836], FRITZSCHE [8 vols., in Latin, 1836-'43, very thorough and critical], H. A. W. MEYER,† OLTAMARE (French), NIELSEN (Danish, in German by MICHELSEN), [1848], BAUMGARTEN-CRURIUS [1844], REITHMAYER [Roman Catholic, Regensb., 1845], A. L. G. KREHL [Leipzig, 1849], ADALB. MAIER (Roman Catholic), PHILIPPI [a strict Lutheran, 1848, 2d ed., revised, 1856; 3d ed., 1867].

On the merits of the most important later commentators, see THOLUCK, pp. 32, 33.—[FRITZSCHE and MEYER are the best philological commentators; DE WETTE excels in power of condensation and good taste; THOLUCK, OLSHAUSEN, PHILIPPI, and HODGE in doctrinal exposition.—P. 8.]

This catalogue may be enlarged, among others, by the following commentaries: BISPING (Rom. Cath.), Der Brief an die Römer, 2d ed., Münster; BEELEN (Rom. Cath.), Commentarius in Ep. St. Pauli ad Romanos, Lovani, 1854; VINKE, De Brief van den Apostel Paulus an den Romeinen, 2d ed., Utrecht, 1860; MEHRING, Der Brief Pauli an die Römer, Stettin, 1859; SCHOTT, Der Römerbrief, seinem Endzweck und Gedankengang nach ausgelegt, Erlangen, 1858; VAN HENGEL, Interpretatio Epistolæ Pauli ad Romanos, Leyden und Leipzig, 1 vol. 1854; 2d vol., 1859; HALDANE, Auslegung des Briefes an die Römer, mit Bemerkungen über die Commentare Macknight's, Stuart's, und Tholuck's, from the English, Hamburg, 1839-'43; UMBREIT, Der Brief an die Römer, auf dem Grunde des Alten Testaments ausgelegt, Gotha, 1856. † [The first edition of THOLUCK's Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, which appeared in 1824, when the author was but twenty-five years of age, created quite an epoch in the exegetical literature of Germany, by breaking the way for a return to a reverent treatment of the New Testament as the revealed word of God, and by reopening the exegetical treasures of the fathers and reformers. In the subsequent editions it has been repeatedly rewritten and gained in ripe scholarship. The last edition is the fifth, Halle, 1856. Between the first and the fifth edition, about forty commentaries on the same Epistle have made their appearance. An English translation of THOLUCK by the Rev. ROBERT MURRAY was published in London, 1842, 2 vols.; but this is superseded by the later editions of the original.—P. 8.]

‡ [Fourth edition, 1865, improved and enlarged (by thirty pages). Dr. LANGE has used the third, which appeared in 1860. The American editor has throughout compared the last edition of this important work.—P. 8.]

PRACTICAL COMMENTARIES AND HOMILETICAL LITERATURE.*—Among these we mention the works on the Romans by ANTON (1746), SPENER (new ed., by SCHOTT, 1839), STORR (1828), KRAUSSOLD (1830), GEISLER (1831), LOSSIUS (1836), KOHLBRÜGGE (1839), ROOS (new ed., 1860), WINKEL (1850), DIEDRICH (1856), BESSER (Bibelstunden, vol. vii., 1861); the Bible Works of GERLAUGH, LISCO, CALW., and BUNSEN (vol. viii., 1863); HEUBNER's Practical Exposition of the N. T.; ORTLOPE, Epistle to the Romans, Erlangen, 1865-'66.

[This list of commentaries on the Romans, by Drs. THOLUCK and LANGE, is almost exclusively Continental, and must be supplied by Anglo-American works, of which only three are mentioned by Dr. THOLUCK—the commentaries of HAMMOND, STUART, and HODGE. Comp. DARLING's Cyclopædia Bibliographica, London, 1859, p. 1286 ff. We notice the most important:

I. General English commentaries on the whole Bible: MATTHEW POOLE (Synopsis Criticorum, etc., 4 vols. in 5 fol., Lond. 1669-'76, and Francof. ad M. 1712, 5 vols. f.; Annotations upon the Holy Bible, 4th ed., 1700, new ed., Lond. 1840, reprinted by R. CARTER in N. Y.); PATRICK, LOWTH, ARNOLD, WHITEY, and LOWMAN (Critical Commentary and Paraphrase on the Old and New Testaments, and the Apocrypha, a new ed., Philad. 1844, in 4 vols.); M. HENRY (in many editions of 3, 4, and 6 vols., the most original, interesting, and edifying among the popular and practical commentators); JOHN GILL (first ed., Lond. 1763, in 9 vols., full of rabbinical learning and ultra-Calvinism); THOS. SCOTT (several editions, in 6 vols. or less); A. CLARKE (new ed., Lond. 1844, in 6 vols.); D'O'LY and R. MANT (Lond. 1845; gives the comments of the Anglican bishops and divines); Comprehensive Commentary (compiled from HENRY and SCOTT, and other sources, by W. JENES, Philad. 1855, in 5 vols.).

II. Commentaries on the New Testament, including the Epistle to the Romans: H. HAMMOND (4th ed., Lond. 1675); D. WHITEY (4th ed., Lond. 1718, and often since); W. BURKITT (Lond. 1704, and often since; very good for practical and homiletical use); P. DODDRIDGE (Family Expositor, Lond. 1739, in 7 vols., and often); ALBERT BARNES (Notes Explanatory and Practical, New York and Lond. 1850, and often, 11 vols., prepared for Sunday-school teachers, and circulated in many thousands of copies); S. T. BLOOMFIELD (The Greek Testament, with Notes Critical, Philological, and Exegetical, first published in 1829, 9th ed., Lond.

* (We have omitted or abridged the German titles of these books.—P. S.)

1855); H. ALFORD (Greek Testament, with a critically revised text, a digest of various readings, marginal references to verbal and idiomatic usage, prolegomena, and a critical and exegetical commentary; first published in 1849, 5th ed., Lond. 1865, in 4 vols.; in the 5th edition, the Codex Sinaiticus has been collated. Dean ALFORD follows in the track of TISCHENDORF as to the text, and DE WETTE and MEYER in the exposition, yet with independent judgment, good taste, and reverent spirit); WEBSTER and WILKINSON (N. Test. Gr., with brief grammatical and exegetical Notes, Oxon., 1851, in 2 vols.); CHR. WORDSWORTH (canon of Westminster, high-Anglican, patristic, devout, and genial, but given to excessive typologizing and allegorizing, and avoiding critical difficulties: Greek Testament, with Notes, 1st ed., Lond. 1856; 4th ed., Lond. 1866, in 2 large vols.). Of these English commentators the American editor has especially compared the latest editions of ALFORD and WORDSWORTH. ELLICOTT, who is more critical than either, has not yet reached the Romans.

III. Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul: W. PALEY (Horæ Paulinæ, or the truth of the Scripture history of St. Paul evinced by a comparison of the Epistles which bear his name with the Acts of the Apostles, and with one another, in many editions); JOHN FELL (A Paraphrase and Annotations upon all the Epistles of St. Paul, 3d ed., Lond. 1708); JOHN LOCKE (A Paraphrase and Notes on the Galatians, Corinthians, Romans, and Ephesians, Lond. 1742, and in LOCKE's Works); G. BENSON (Lond. 1752-'56, 2 vols.); JAMES MACNIGHT (A new literal translation, from the original Greek of all the apostolical Epistles, with a commentary, etc., Lond. 1795, and other editions of 1, 4, or 6 vols.); T. W. PEILE (Annotations on the Apostolical Epistles, Lond. 1848-'52, 4 vols.); Abp. SUMNER (Apostolical Preaching considered in an Examination of St. Paul's Epistles, 9th ed., Lond. 1845); CONYBEARE and HOWSON (Life and Epistles of St. Paul, Lond. 1852, reprinted in New York in several editions); B. JOWETT (The Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians, Galatians, Romans, with critical notes and dissertations, Lond. 1855); VAUGHAN (The Epistles of St. Paul, for English Readers, Lond. 1864).

IV. Special commentaries on the Epistle to the Romans: A. WILLET (Hexapla: that is, a sixfold commentarie upon the most divine epistle of the holy Apostle St. Paul to the Romans, etc., Lond. 1620); Bp. TERROT (Lond. 1826); R. ANDERSON (3d ed., Lond. 1837); Bp. PARRY (Lond. 1832); MOSES STUART (Congregationalist, 1st ed., Andover, 1832; 2d ed., 1835, 6th ed., Lond. 1857); CHARLES HODGE (O. S. Presbyterian, 1st ed., Philad. 1835, new edition, enlarged and revised, 1866); THOMAS CHALMERS (Lectures on the Epistle to the Romans, Glasgow, 1837, 4 vols. 12mo.); R. HALDANE (new ed., Lond. 1842, in 3 vols.); Abp. SUMNER (A Practical Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans and 1 Corinthians, Lond. 1843); W. WALFORD (Cursus Romana, Lond. 1846); W. W. EWBank (Commentary, etc., Lond. 1850-'51, 2 vols.); S. H. TURNER (Episcopalian, The Epistle to the Romans, in Greek and English; with an analysis and exegetical commentary, New York, 1853); ROBT. KNIGHT (A Critical Commentary, etc., Lond. 1854); E. PURDUE (Dublin, 1855); A. A. LIVERMORE (Boston, 1855); JOHN CUMMING (Sabbath Evening Readings on the Romans, Lond. 1857); JOHN BROWN (Analytical Exposition of the Epistle of Paul to the Romans, Edinb. 1857); JAMES FORD (St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, illustrated from Divines of the Church of England, Lond. 1863); JOHN FORBES, LL.D. (Analytical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, tracing the train of thought by the aid of Parallelism Edinb. 1868). The work of FORBES is based upon the discovery that Parallelism is not confined to the poetry of the Bible, but extends also to many portions of its prose. It is not a full commentary, but an illustration of those passages alone which Parallelism seems to place in a new and clearer light.—P. S.]

[SAINT PAUL.]

CHRIST! I am Christ's! and let the name suffice you;
Aye, for me, too, He greatly hath sufficed;
Lo, with no winning words I would entice you;
Paul has no honor and no friend but Christ.

Yea, without cheer of sister or of daughter—
Yea, without stay of father or of son,
Lone on the land, and homeless on the water,
Pass I in patience till the work be done.

Yet, not in solitude, if Christ anear me
Waketh Him workers for the great employ;
Oh, not in solitude, if souls that hear me
Catch from my joyance the surprise of joy.

Hearts I have won of sister or of brother,
Quick on the earth or hidden in the sod;
Lo, every heart awaiteth me, another
Friend in the blameless family of God.

Yea, thro' life, death, thro' sorrow and thro' sinning,
He shall suffice me, for He hath sufficed;
Christ is the end, for Christ was the beginning,
Christ the beginning, for the end is Christ.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL

TO THE

R O M A N S .

THE INSCRIPTION, INTRODUCTION, AND FUNDAMENTAL THEME.

CHAP. I. 1-17.

THE APOSTLESHIP OF PAUL, APPOINTED FOR THE GLORY OF THE NAME OF GOD THROUGH THE GOSPEL OF CHRIST, AND FOR THE REVELATION OF THE RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD FOR FAITH IN ALL THE WORLD, AMONG THE JEWS AND GENTILES, AND ESPECIALLY ALSO IN ROME.

I.

Inscription and Salutation.

CHAP. I. 1-7.*

TO THE ROMANS.¹

- 1 Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ,¹ called to be an apostle [a called, chosen apostle, κλητὸς ἀπόστολος], separated [set apart, ἀπερισμέτος] unto the gospel of 2 God (Which he had promised afore [which he promised beforehand, προσηγγεῖλατο] by [through] his prophets in the holy Scriptures²) [omit parenthese],
3 Concerning his Son Jesus Christ our Lord [omit here the words: Jesus Christ our Lord, and transfer them to the close of ver. 4], which [who] was made [born³] of [from,
4 ἐκ] the seed of David according to the flesh; And [omit And] declared to be [who was installed]⁴ the Son of God with [in] power,⁵ according to the Spirit of holiness, by [from, ἐξ] the resurrection from [of] the dead⁶ [—Jesus Christ our
5 Lord] By [through] whom we have received [we received] grace and apostleship, for [unto, εἰς, i. e., for the purpose of, with a view to, in order to bring about] obedience to the faith [of faith]⁷ among all [the] nations, for his name [name's sake]:
6 Among whom are ye also the called [, the chosen ones] of Jesus Christ:⁸
7 To all that be in Rome,⁹ beloved of God [To all the beloved of God who are in Rome], called to be [chosen] saints: [.]¹⁰
Grace to you,¹¹ and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

TEXTUAL.

¹ [Ἰπὸς Ῥωμαίων. This is the oldest and simplest title of Codd. N. (Sin.) A. B. C., and has been adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford, Lange, &c., in the place of the title of the testus receptus: Ἰσταντων τοῦ ἀποστόλου ἐν Ῥώμῃ. For other titles, see the apparatus criticus in Tischendorf—P. 8.]

* [It was thought best to separate the three distinct sections embraced in chap. I. 1-17, viz.: I. The Address and Salutation, vers. 1-7. II. The Epistolary Introduction, vers. 8-15. III. The Theme of the Epistle, vers. 16, 17. Dr. Lange presents them as one whole, which, with our numerous additions, would make it too long and inconvenient for abridgement.—P. 8.]

² Ver. 1.—The reading Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ is confirmed by most authorities [Codd. N. A. E. G., and adopted by Lachmann, Alford], against the reading, Christ Jesus (Cod. B., Tischendorf).

⁴ Ver. 3.—(γενόμενον can only be said of the human nature of Christ which began in time, while His divine nature is without beginning and without end. Mark the difference between ἐγένετο and ἦν in John i. 1, 3, 6. Comp. also Gal. iv. 4: ἐγένετο ἵνα δὲ θεὸς τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ, γενόμενον ἐκ γυναικὸς, γενόμενον ὑπὸ νόμον. Some Minuscule MSS. read γεννημένον for γενόμενον.—P. S.]

¹⁰ Ver. 6.—[The E. V. and Dr. Lange make a comma after ὅμοις, and regard καὶ οἱ ἄλλοι 'I. Xp. as being in apposition to ὅμοις. So also the New Testament of the Am. Bible Union, which, however, omits the article before καὶ, and renders: among whom are ye also called of Jesus Christ. But Lachmann, Tischendorf, De Wette, Meyer, Alford, omit the comma and connect καὶ οἱ ἄλλοι as the predicate with ἐστί: "Among whom ye also are called of Jesus Christ;" Meyer: "Unter welchen auch ihr Berufene Jesu Christi seid." Alford thinks that the assertion among whom are ye, with a comma after ὅμοις, would be flat and unmeaning. This, however, is not the case. See Exeg. Notes.—P. S.]

¹³ Ver. 7.—[Grace to you, without be, is in accordance with the Greek and the Vulg. (gratia vobis et pax) and preferable. The E. V. is inconsistent, sometimes inserting be and sometimes omitting it. The verbal form to be supplied after χάρις in this case would not be the annunciative or mandatory estote, be, but the optative εἰ, may be; for the χάρις ὑμῖν is not an elliptical doxology, nor an authoritative benediction, but a prayer or earnest wish; comp. 1 Pet. i. 2, χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη πληθυνθείη; Jude 2, ἐλεος . . . πληθυνθείη.—P. S.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

FIRST SECTION.—Inscription and greeting.—Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an Apostle, set apart for the Gospel of God.—His gospel in harmony with the Old Testament (of the Jews): A gospel of Christ, who, in His human nature and His historical pedigree, is the Son of David; but who, in His spiritual glory, appears as the principle of the resurrection of the dead, and as the one appointed to be the Son of God in power (majesty). By this glorified Christ the Apostle has received his Christian and apostolic call, for the purpose of calling all nations to obedience to the faith.—All the believers in Rome belong to this totality. He accordingly greets the Christians in Rome with the apostolic salutation.

[GENERAL REMARKS ON THE APOSTOLIC SALUTATIONS.—On the grammatical structure of the two sentences, vers. 1-7, see textual note * to ver. 7. St. Paul opens his Epistles with his name and official title, by which he challenges respectful attention to his inspired teaching, and with the assurance of his brotherly regard and love for the readers, by which he wins their affections. The ancient epistolary style unites in a brief inscription what we now distinguish as address, greeting, and subscription. Paul combines the heathen and the Hebrew form of salutation, and inspires both with a deep Christian meaning.

The Greek and Roman epistolary inscription contained simply the name of the writer in the nominative, and the name of the receiver in the dative (e. g., Μιλῶντος Διονυσίου, Cicero Attico), frequently with the addition of the wish for health and prosperity, by the words εἰς πρᾶττον, more usually χαίρειν, or χαίρειν λέγει, salutem, or salutem dicit. This form we find in the New Testament three times: once in the heathen sense, in the letter of Lysias to the Roman governor Felix, Acts xxiii. 26 (Κλαύδιος Αἰσίας τῷ . . . Φήλικι χαίρειν), and twice in the Christian sense, namely in the circular letter of the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem, which was probably written by James, Acts xv. 23 (οἱ ἀπόστολοι . . . τοῖς . . . ἀδελφοῖς τοῖς ἐξ ἐθνῶν χαίρειν), and in the Epistle of James, chap. i. 1 (Ἰακώβος . . . ταῖς δώδεκα φυλαῖς . . . χαίρειν).^{*} From 2 John, ver. 10 (χαίρειν αὐτῷ μὴ λέγεται), it appears that Greek Christians were in the habit of greeting one another with the usual χαίρει (Vulg., ave, comp. Matt. xvi. 49; xxvii. 29; xxviii. 9; Mark xv. 18; Luke i. 28; John xix. 3). But the heathen formula, as implying a prayer to the gods, had in it a taint of idolatry, or, at all events, it referred only to temporal prosperity, and had to give way before long to a change in accordance with Christian feeling.

The Hebrew (and Arabic) form of salutation is שלום, ειρήνη, Peace, or לך שלום, LXX., ειρήνη σοι, Peace be with you; comp. Gen. xxix. 6; xliii. 28; Ex. xviii. 7; Judges vi. 23; 1 Sam. x. 4; Dan. x. 19; Luke x. 5, 6, &c. (With the later Jews the usual formula was יריבך). The risen Saviour greeted thus the assembled disciples, John xx. 19, 26, bringing the true peace of the soul with God, which He, the Prince of Peace, had bought by His atoning death and triumphant resurrection (comp. John xiv. 27; xvi. 33; Matt. x. 12, 13).

Combining the Græco-Roman inscription and the Hebrew salutation, we would have this form: "Paul to the Romans. Health and peace be with you."

But Paul transforms the Greek χαίρειν and the Hebrew shalom from the prevailing idea of physical health and temporal comfort, into the deep meaning of the saving grace and peace of God in Christ, and comprehends in the two words χάρις and ειρήνη the richest blessings of the gospel; χάρις being the objective cause of the Christian salvation, and ειρήνη its subjective effect in the soul of man. At the same time, there is, no doubt, a reference in this epistolary greeting to the Mosaic, or rather Aaronic benediction, Num. vi. 25, 26: "The Lord make His grace shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee (יְהוָה יְבָרֶכְךָ, from בָּרַךְ, gratious fruit, hence בָּרַךְ, χάρις), the Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace (וְיָשִׁיב לְךָ שָׁלוֹם, ειρήνην)." We find this salutatory grace and peace not only in the Epistles of Paul, but also in those of Peter and of John in the Apocalypse. In the Pastoral Epistles, 1 Tim. i. 2; 2 Tim. i. 2, and Titus i. 4 (text. rec.), Paul, with reference probably to the Greek version of the Aaronic benediction, Num. vi. 25 (עֲלֶיךָ שֵׁשׁ: for שָׁלוֹם), adds to the prayer for grace and peace that of mercy (ἐλεος), which ministers of the gospel need more than any other class of men. This threefold blessing, corresponding to the threefold Aaronic benediction, we find also in 2 John 3.*

In the Epistle to the Romans, where Paul, contrary to his habit, addressed a congregation which he had not founded, or even visited, he amplifies the Græco-Hebrew inscription and salutation still more, and inserts parenthetically some of the fundamental doctrinal ideas of the Epistle, as suggested by the mention of "the gospel of God," namely: (1.) The connection of the gospel with the Old Testament revelation, ver. 2; (2.) the divine-human nature of Christ, who is the subject of that gospel, vers. 3, 4; (3.) his call to the apostleship of all the Gentiles by Christ, which gives him a right to address himself also to the Romans, ver. 5. In the richness of this salutation we see the overflowing fulness of Paul's mind, and the importance he attached to this Epistle. Calvin: Epistola tota sic methodica est, ut ipsum quoque exordium ad rationem artis compositum sit.—P. S.] †

familiar to the Greeks; while SAUL, as a proper name, was unknown to them. The name Saul—the most distinguished name in the genealogy of the tribe of Benjamin, to which Paul belonged (Rom. xi. 1; Phil. iii. 5; comp. Acts xiii. 21)—the Apostle used among the Jews, the name Paul among the Gentiles, and in the later part of his life exclusively. The Jews and early Christians often had two names, either similar in sound and identical in meaning, as Silas and Silvanus (the former occurring uniformly in the Acts thirteen times, the latter four times in the Epistles), Lucas and *Lucanus (Col. iv. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 11; Philem. 24); or similar in sound but different in meaning, as Jesus and Justus (Col. iv. 11), Saul and Paul, Hillel and Pollio; or different in sound but identical in meaning, as Cephas (Hebrew) and Peter (Greek); or different both in sound and meaning, as Jacob and Israel, Simon and Peter, Bartholomew and Nathanael, John and Mark (Acts xii. 12, 25), Simoon and Niger (xiii. 1), Barsabas and Justus (i. 25). It is possible that the Apostle Paul, as a Roman citizen, received this name in early youth in Tarsus (Lightfoot), or inherited it from some ancestor, who may have adopted it in becoming a freedman, or in acquiring the Roman citizenship; Paul being the well-known cognomen of several distinguished Roman families, as the gens Amilia, Fabia, Julia, Sergia, &c. It is more probable, however, that he chose the name himself after he entered upon his labors among the Gentiles, as a part of his missionary policy to become a Greek to the Greeks, in order to gain them more readily to Christ (1 Cor. ix. 19-23). At all events, the name Paul is first mentioned during his first great missionary journey, when he, taking henceforth precedence of Barnabas in words and in acts, struck Elymas the sorcerer with blindness, and converted Sergius Paulus, the pro-consul of Cyprus, to the Christian faith (Acts xiii. 8). After this striking fact, he is uniformly called Paul in the latter chapters of the Acts, and in all the Epistles. But we have no right, for this reason, to infer (with Jerome, Olshausen, Meyer, Ewald, and others) that the name Paul was a memorial of the conversion of Sergius Paulus as his first-fruit. For (1.) he may have converted many Jews and Gentiles before that time; (2.) pupils are called after their teachers and benefactors, and not vice versa; (3.) Luke gives no intimation to that effect, and connects the name Paul, not with that of the proconsul of Cyprus (xiii. 7, 12), but with that of Elymas the sorcerer (ver. 8). The last circumstance favors the ingenious hypothesis of Dr. Lange, that the name expresses the symbolical significance of the victory of Paul, the small man of God, over Elymas, the mighty magician of the devil, as a New Testament counterpart of the victory of David over Goliath, or of Moses over the sorcerers of Egypt. Dr. Lange, however, admits the probability that Paul had his Roman name before this occasion. At all events, the change of name has nothing whatever to do with his conversion; and all allegorical interpretations of Chrysostom, Augustine, Wordsworth, and others, which go on this assumption, are merely pious fancies, which are sufficiently refuted by the fact that the Apostle is repeatedly called Saul long after his conversion, as in Acts ix. 25, 30; xii. 25; xiii. 1, 2, 7, 9; and that it is said of Saul in one passage (xiii. 9), that he was "filled with the Holy Ghost."—P. S.]*

A servant of Jesus Christ.—עֲבָד יֵהוֹשֻׁעַ. This is not merely the general designation of the pious man (Fritzsche: Christi cultor, Eph. vi. 6), but the designation of his office (Tholuck; 1 Cor. iv. 1; Phil. i. 1; James i. 1. Reiche: The word implies unlimited obedience. Schott: "δούλος denotes the Christian, so far as he, in the discharge of a special Christian calling, surrenders himself completely to God's will, and excludes his own preference." Here the Christian call in its universal character is meant, just as it appears in the apostleship, after the absolute service of the one great servant of God, Is. liii. Nevertheless, there is no tautology in the addition: called to be an apostle. Calvin: Apostolatus ministerii est species. The same office, related to Christ, makes the δούλος, in the absolute sense (comp. Is. liii.); but, related to the world, it makes the ἀπόστολος. [A servant, literally bondsman (δούλος, from δέω, to bind), denotes generally, like the corresponding Hebrew עֲבָד יֵהוֹשֻׁעַ, a relation of dependence on God, and cheerful obedience to His will. Paul glories in this service, which is perfect freedom. The more we feel bound by the authority of Christ, the more we are free from the bondage of men. Deo servire vera libertas est (Augustine). In a wide sense, the term applies to all believers, who are both children and servants of God (Is. lxxv. 13; Dan. iii. 26; Rom. vi. 22; xiv. 4; Eph. vi. 6; 1 Cor. vii. 22; 1 Peter ii. 16; Rev. xix. 2, 5); in a special and emphatic sense, it is used of the chosen office-bearers in the kingdom of God, as Moses, the prophets, and kings in the Old Testament (Deut. xxxiv. 6; Josh. i. 1; Is. xlix. 6; Jer. xxv. 4), and the ministers of the gospel in the New, particularly the apostles (so here; Phil. i. 1; Tit. i. 1; Col. iv. 12; James i. 1; 2 Pet. i. 1; Rev. i. 1). Hodge: "Servant is a general official designation, of which, in the present case, apostle is the specific explanation." Paul "rejects all human authority in matters of faith and duty, and yet professes the most absolute subjection of conscience and reason to the authority of Jesus Christ." Wordsworth: "Other men, in the beginning of their epistles, especially those which they addressed to the Roman people, recited their own titles as rulers, kings, or conquerors; but the apostles claim to be heard as δούλος, bondsmen,

* [Lucanus does not occur in the Greek Testament, but in several Latin MSS. the third Gospel is inscribed: Evangelium secundum Lucanum. The Greek Λουκάς is, no doubt, a contraction of the Latin Lucanus, as Λίας is of Silvanus. Some commentators, however, identify the names Lucas and Lucius (Acts xiii. 1; Rom. xvi. 21).—P. S.]

* [I add, as a curiosity, a quotation from Dr. Wordsworth, who, in his Com. on Acts xiii. 9, unartificially combines all the various interpretations of the name (except Dr. Lange's, which was then not yet known to him), and assigns no less than eight reasons for the change of Saul into Paul: (1.) Because Σαῦλος was a purely Jewish name. (2.) Because among the Greeks it might expose him to contempt, as having the same sound as σαῦλος, wanton (see Homer, Hymn. Mercur., 28, and Ruhnken in loc.). (3.) To indicate his change and call to a new life; from a Jew to a Christian; from a persecutor to a preacher of the gospel. (4.) But in the change much of the original name was left and commemorated what he had been. The fire of zeal of Σαῦλος still glowed in the heart of Παῦλος, but its flame was purified by the Holy Ghost. (5.) His new name denoted also his mission to the Gentiles, the Romans being familiar with the name Paulus. (6.) It was a token of humility, Paulus-parvulus (1 Cor. xv. 9). (7.) It commemorated the cognomen of Paul's first (?) convert, Sergius-Paulus, and was a good augury of his future success in the Roman world. (8.) It indicates Paul's intended supremacy in the Roman or Western Church as distinct from the Aramaic name Cephas, and the Greek name Peter.—P. S.]

bondsmen of Jesus Christ." Comp., however, my annotation on ἀπόστολος, which is a title of dignity and authority.—P. S.]—Jesus Christ. That is, Jesus is the Christ. Dealing with the Roman Christians, the Apostle had no ground for saying the reverse: Christ Jesus, i. e., The Christ is Jesus.

Called to be an apostle.—As he had had to defend his call before the Corinthians and Galatians on account of opponents, he does it here because he was not yet personally known to the Roman Church. [Called; chosen, appointed, not self-called, but called by Christ, in opposition to an arbitrary self-constituted authority (αὐτόκλητος, self-appointed), and called directly by Christ, without the intervention of church authority, comp. Gal. i. 1: "Not of men (ἀπὸ ἀνθρώπων), nor by any man (δὲ ἀνθρώπου), but by Jesus Christ," &c. The word refers to the historical call, not to the eternal election. Calvin: Negus enim is assentior, qui eam de qua loquitur vocationem ad eternam Dei electionem referunt.—P. S.] The expression, apostle, has here its widest significance. Christ, the Risen One, has called him; he is therefore, in the most positive sense, a witness of His resurrection, and this implies the apostolic witness of the whole of His miraculous person and work. [Apostle is a title of dignity, signifying the highest order of servant; every apostle being a servant of Christ, but not every servant an apostle of Christ. The one brings out the dependence of Paul on Christ, the other his authority over the congregations, and the latter is conditioned by the former. The term apostle may designate, etymologically, any delegate, commissioner, or missionary, but more particularly, as here, and in most passages, a chosen eye and ear witness of the life of Christ, who was personally instructed and selected by Him for the work of laying the foundation of the Christian Church, and teaching her through all subsequent generations. The apostles were inspired messengers of Christ, not to a particular charge, but to the whole world. The term is therefore generally restricted to the twelve (Luke vi. 13), and to Paul, who was likewise directly called by the Lord (Gal. i. 1, 12; Acts ix. 15; xxvi. 17). The sudden call of the persecuting Paul to the apostleship of the Gentiles corresponds to the sudden call of the Gentiles to Christianity, just as the gradual instruction of the Jewish apostles accords with the long training of the Jewish nation for the gospel.—P. S.]

Separated, set apart.—Not equal to chosen of God (De Wette), nor to appointed by the Church (with reference to Acts xiii. 2; Olshausen),* but directed to and appointed for this particular calling, through the whole providential course of his life (comp. Gal. i. 15). An ἀφορίσθαι first took place with him [at his birth, comp. Gal. i. 15: ὁ ἀφορίσθαι με ἐκ κοιλίας μητρός μου, καὶ πατέρας, κ.τ.λ.; then.—P. S.] when he was sent from Tarsus to Jerusalem [?]; a second [third], at his conversion and retreat into Arabia; and a third [fourth], at his special appointment as the Apostle to the Gentiles (Acts xiii. 2 ff.; Gal. ii.). The biblical ἀφορίσθαι must be distinguished from προγινώσκειν or ἐκλέγεσθαι, as well as from καλεῖν; it denotes the Divine determination of the historical career of the man (see Acts xvii. 26). [Meyer refers ἀφορισμένος to the historical call at Damascus, and compares σκίθος ἐλογής, Acts ix. 15; xxvi. 16 ff. The word is an explanation of κλητός ἀπόστολος, and gives us the additional idea of destination. It implies that Paul was selected from the world, singled out, consecrated to, and destined for the gospel service, at the time of his conversion. It refers to the Divine appointment for the apostolic office in general, while ἀφορίσθαι, in Acts xiii. 2, refers to a special mission. ἀφορίσθαι, like καλεῖν, looks to the historical call, προορίσθαι to the eternal decree, but the former is only an execution in time or actualization of the latter.—P. S.]

Unto the gospel of God.—That is, not the gospel having God for its object (Chrysostom), but the gospel given by God (2 Cor. xi. 7) for promulgation. [It is the genitive, not of the object, but of origin and possession; God's gospel, whose author is God, and whose theme is Christ and His salvation by free grace; comp. vers. 8, 4; xv. 16; 1 Thess. ii. 2, 8, 9.—P. S.] Gospel. Without the article.† According to De Wette and Schott, it is here not the internal matter or contents of the gospel, but the εὐαγγελίζεσθαι. [De Wette: zur Verkündigung des Evangeliums.—P. S.] Tholuck, on the contrary: "Εὐαγγέλιον does not stand for the infinitive εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, as we learn from the relative ὁ, but it is only an indefinite method of expression, as 2 Cor. ii. 12; x. 14." We would say, rather, that it is the concrete method of expression, implying that the knowledge of salvation cannot be without preaching, and preaching cannot be without the matter of the gospel.

Ver. 2. Which He promised before by His prophets in the holy Scriptures.—[So that God stood pledged, as it were, to reveal the gospel.] The second verse must not be read, with Beza [and the authorized English version, which often closely follows Beza], as parenthesis. The same expression occurs, 2 Cor. ix. 5 [τῇ προκηγγελμένῃ εὐλογίᾳ ἡμῶν, your bounty before promised.—P. S.] The mention of the Old Testament promise of the gospel must not only authenticate the Apostle to the Jewish Christians, but it must also enforce the gospel for the Gentile Christians. This preceding promise lay specifically in the Messianic passages (De Wette); and, at the same time, according to the New Testament view, in the meaning of the whole of the Old Testament, which promised the universal Pauline gospel (see ch. x.). The expression γράφαί, without the article, does not denote passages of Scripture (Dr. Paulus [Meyer]), but γραφαὶ ἁγίας has become, according to De Wette, a nomen proprium.‡ [The second verse teaches that the gospel is no abrupt innovation or afterthought, but the forethought of God, the fulfilment of His promise, and "the desire of all nations." This harmony of the New and Old Dispensations should be a con-

* [Wordsworth, also, explains the word from Acts xiii. 2, where the Holy Ghost says: 'ἀφορίσθαι (the word here used by Paul) ὁ μὲν τὸν βασιλεὺς καὶ τὸν λαόν ἐκ τοῦ ἔργου ὁ προκηλῆσαι αὐτόν, so that he was both κλητός and ἀφορισμένος. Paul was not only called by God, but was also visibly set apart for the apostolic office by an outward mission and ordination at His command. But Acts xiii. 2 evidently refers to a special and joint mission of Barnabas and Saul.—P. S.]

* [The Anglo-Saxon gospel, i. e., either good spell, or God's spell, is the precise equivalent for the Greek εὐαγγέλιον, i. e., good news, glad tidings (of salvation). Geo. P. Marsh, in his Lectures on the English Language, New York, 1860, p. 30, has a note on the two derivations, either from the name of the divinity God, or from the adjective good, and leans to the latter.—P. vincing proof of the Divine origin of Christianity, not only to the Jews, who already believe in the Old Testament, and need only be convinced that Jesus of Nazareth was really the promised Messiah, but also to the heathen, who well know that it is the exclusive prerogative of God to foresee and prearrange the future. In this view, Christianity is the oldest as well as the latest religion, going back to the first promise in Paradise, and even beyond the beginning of time, to the eternal counsel of God. Augustine says: "The New Testament is concealed in the Old; the Old Testament is revealed in the New." By his prophets, is not to be confined, of course, to the sixteen prophetic books, but extends to the whole Old Testament Scriptures, as far as they contain the gospel, from the promise of the serpent-bruise, Gen. iii. 25, to Mal. iv. 2. In fact, the entire Scripture is one organic system of prophecies and types bearing testimony to Christ; John v. 39. —P. S.]

Ver. 3. Concerning his Son.—This refers to εὐαγγέλιον, gospel, ver. 1,* and not to promised, ver. 2, as Tholuck, Meyer [Alford, Hodge], and others would have it. For the question further on is concerning the gospel in its complete New Testament development, and not merely in its Old Testament outline. Meyer says that the connection of περι with εὐαγγέλιον [instead of the gen objecti] does not elsewhere occur in the New Testament. But it must be noticed that here the act of preaching the gospel of evangelization is connected with the gospel itself. Besides, the parenthesis has its influence upon the expression.

Ver. 3, 4. Who was born, &c.—The words from γενόμενον to νεκρῶν (vers. 3 and 4) are not an abrupt parenthesis (according to Griesbach and Knapp), but part of the sentence.* They characterize the Son of God, not according to the antithesis of the human and divine nature of Christ in itself, but according to the revelation of this antithesis in the national Old Testament limitation, and in the universal New Testament expansion and elevation of the person of Christ to heavenly majesty, in accordance with the analogy of Phil. ii. 6. Yet that ontological antithesis is reflected in this historical antithesis. The historical Christ has a double genealogy and history, which is represented in the following analogies and antitheses:

ὁρισθεὶς υἱὸς θεοῦ ἐν δυνάμει

ἐκ σπέρματος Δαυὶδ
ἐξ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν

κατὰ σάρκα.
κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιασμένης.

[This antithetic parallelism, already hinted at by Bengel, is also brought out by Forbes (Analyt. Com. p. 97), and may be more clearly and fully set forth in this way:

"Concerning His Son,
Who was born (Son of Man in weakness)
from the seed of David,
as to the flesh,
Who was installed Son of God in power from the resurrection of the dead, as to the Spirit of holiness,— Even Jesus Christ our Lord."—P. S.]

The γενόμενος denotes not merely the being born, but, in a wider sense, the genealogical procession from the seed of David (see Matt. i. 1 ff.). [The house of David represented the flower of the Jewish nation, and foreshadowed the kingdom of Christ. That the Messiah was to proceed from this royal family, was predicted in the Old Testament, Is. xi. 1; Jer. xxiii. 5; Pa. cxxxiii. 11; and generally expected by the Jews, Matt. xxii. 42; John vii. 42; Acts xiii. 23. Meyer, without good reason, confines ἐκ σπέρματος Δαυὶδ to the male line of descent, and refers both genealogies of Matthew and Luke to Joseph; Melancthon, on the contrary, identifies ex semine David with ex virgine Maria; and Wordsworth infers from the words that Mary, as well as Joseph, was of the lineage of David. Comp. Com. on the genealogies in Matt. i. and Luke iii. Alford: "The words ἐκ σπέρματος Δ. cast a hint back at the promise just spoken of. At the same time, in so solemn an enunciation of the dignity of the Son of God, they serve to show that, even according to the human side, His descent had been fixed in the line of him who was Israel's anointed and greatest king." —P. S.]

In distinction from this appearance of Christ in human nature, the idea of the exalted Christ is expressed by the words, ὁρισθεὶς υἱὸς θεοῦ ἐν δυνάμει, established as Son of God in power. The attempt to analyze and divide this one conception (for example, in Luther's German translation) has obscured the passage very much. The Son of God, in distinction from His Old Testament origin, is absolutely destined (ὁρισμένος, Acts x. 42) to be the Son of God in majesty, or in the majestic exercise of his power (see Phil. ii. 6 ff.) The ὁρίσιν of God constitutes the central point of all kindred conceptions—of the ὁροθεσία, Acts xvii. 26; of the προορίσιν, Rom. viii. 29; and of the ἀπορίσιν, Gal. i. 15. It expresses here God's absolute determination or establishment concerning Christ as the centre of all the historical developments of the new world, the Head of all things (Matt. xviii. 18; Eph. i. 20 ff.). The expression refers not to the Son of God as such simply, but to the Son of God as exalted to heavenly majesty. As such, He is ὁρισθεὶς, not merely προορισθεὶς, prædestinatus (Ambrose, Augustine,† Vulgate, &c., according to the Greek fathers, and the gloss προορισθέντος). But as He is the γενόμενος ἐκ σπέρματος Δαυὶδ, his descent from David being the human and historical antecedence for his higher dignity; so is He ὁρισθεὶς υἱὸς θεοῦ ἐξ ἀναστάσεως

* [Grotius: "Hoc refertur ad illud quod præcessit evangelium; explicat nempe, de quo apud ille sermo non habetur." So also Calvin, Bengel, the E. V., and all who regard ver. 2 as a parenthesis. The sense in either case is the same. Christ is the great subject of the gospel.—P. S.]

* [So Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford, who, in their editions, omit the parenthesis, and Meyer in loc. Comp. Winer: Grammar N. T. p. 525, 7th ed.: Viele längere Einschaltungen sind nicht Parenthesen, sondern Digressionen, sofern sie nur den Gedankenfortschritt, nicht der Lauf der Construction aufhalten.—P. S.]

† [De præd. sanct. c. 25. Augustine had but a superficial knowledge of Greek, and was here, as in Rom. v. 13 and in other passages, misled by the translation of the Vulgate, which reads: prædestinatus (προορισθέντος).—P. S.]

νεκρῶν. The ἐκ, according to the analogy of ἐκ σπέρματος, cannot merely mean since the resurrection, or through (by) the resurrection, but it indicates the origin: out of the resurrection. The σπέρμα Δαυὶδ is the whole genealogy, or "the root of Jesse" (ch. xv. 12), as it became manifest by the birth from the Virgin. Thus, likewise, the resurrection is not merely the fact of the resurrection of Christ, but with the fact of the resurrection there are brought to light the strength and root of the resurrection of the dead in the world, (Eph. i. 19 ff.). It is in accordance with this that Christ can say: "I AM the resurrection and the life." Deep in the heart of the first world—for which Christ is the first-born of every creature (πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, Col. i. 15)—there is at work the power, proceeding from the Logos, of a new world (Rom. viii. 23), for which Christ is the first-born from the dead (πρωτότοκος ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν, Col. i. 18). And this world of the resurrection, which became manifest in His personal resurrection, continues now to operate dynamically, and will continue to do so until the flower of the new world appears in the first resurrection of the elect (1 Cor. xv. 23), and the fruit in the last general resurrection. The Apostle therefore means here the power of the resurrection as the christological principle of life in the world, which has become manifest by the resurrection of Christ, and acts and works as the historical principle of the universal resurrection of the dead. Christ arose from his death and resurrection as the fixed and established, or instituted Son of God in power. (Comp. the Messianic passage, Ps. ii.: "This day have I begotten Thee;" which denotes the very day of the seditious rebellion against the Messiah as the grand day of his glorification). The destination which Christ had from the beginning, became inauguration or institution at His resurrection. The ἀποδείξει therefore, does not merely mean "shown," "declaratively established" (Meyer, according to Chrysostom, δειχθέντος);* the ἐκ does not mean merely since or after (Theodoret, Erasmus, and others); and the ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν does not mean merely ἀνάστασις ἐκ νεκρῶν. And Philippi, following Melancthon, and others, has very properly connected the ἐκ διανύσεως with κατὰ σάρκα, and did not follow Luther, Meyer, and others in connecting it with ἀποδείξει. Meyer has therefore no ground for opposing the explanation of Bengel—that our resurrection is comprehended in Christ's resurrection—by remarking that the term the resurrection from the dead is only the general expression of the category.

In the third antithesis, κατὰ σάρκα, "according to the flesh," means the fleshly or physical origin of Christ, but not according to the first conception of σάρξ, i. e., the sensuous, susceptible, vital fullness of corporeity, as distinct from and subjected to the spirit, or, in a more general sense, the "earthly man," ἀνθρώπος χοϊκός (1 Cor. xv. 47; Gen. ii.). Still less has flesh here the second meaning, viz. sinful sensuousness and susceptibility, as opposed to the spirit, and without it; or, in the more general sense, the "natural man," ἀνθρώπος ψυχικός (John iii. 6; 1 Cor. ii. 14). But σάρξ has here its third meaning, and expresses the physical human nature under the influence of the spirit (John i. 13; vi. 51), yet in historical relations, or man in his historical finiteness, limitation, and qualification (Gal. iv. 4). For Christ's incarnation, and the growth of His physical nature, evidently involved no opposition to the "Spirit of holiness," but took place under its consecrating influence.

[Flesh (σάρξ, שרץ) is here, and in all the passages where it is used of the incarnation (Rom. ix. 5; 1 Tim. iii. 16; John i. 14; 1 John iv. 2), a strong Hebraizing term for human nature, with the implied idea, perhaps, of weakness and frailty, though not necessarily of sin (somewhat analogous to the occasional use of the German der Sterbliche, and the English mortal, for man). It is as correct to say: Christ became man (Menschenwerdung), as to say: Christ became flesh (incarnatio, incarnation, Fleischwerdung), but the latter expression is more emphatic; it exhibits more strongly the condescension of Christ, the identity of His nature with our own, and the universalness of His manhood. The word σάρξ, therefore, when applied to Christ, must not be understood in an Apollinarian sense, as if Christ merely assumed a human body with the animal soul, but not the rational soul, whose place was supplied by the divine Logos. It implies the entire human constitution, body, soul, and spirit, sin only excepted, which does not originally and necessarily belong to man. It is not the flesh, as opposed to the spirit, that is here intended, but the human, as distinct from the divine. The flesh, as an organized system of life, is the outward tabernacle and the visible representative of the whole man to our senses. The σάρξ of Christ was the seat of a human ψυχή, with its affections, and of a human νοῦς or πνεῦμα, with its intelligence (comp. Matt. xxvii. 50; John xi. 33; xix. 30), but not of the ἀμαρτία. He was subject to temptation, or temptable (Heb. ii. 18; iv. 15), but neither σαρκικός (Rom. vii. 14), nor ψυχικός (1 Cor. ii. 14). He appeared not "in the flesh of sin," but only "in the likeness of the flesh of sin" (Rom. vii. 2). At the same time, the limitation, κατὰ σάρκα, plainly implies the divine nature of Christ. "Were He a mere man," says Hodge, "it had been enough to say that He was of the seed of David; but as He is more than man, it was necessary to limit His descent from David to His human nature."—P. S.]

Ver. 4. According to the Spirit of holiness. κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγίωσίνης.—We accept, with Bengel, against Tholick, that the ἁγίωσίνης is certainly distinguished from the ἀγιότης—just as sanctimonia is from sanctitas—in expressing the operation of the Spirit, though in a more comprehensive relation. This is the Spirit of God, who, as the sanctifying Spirit in the world, constitutes the complete opposition and counteraction to the entire corruption of sin; who was first the cause of the holy birth of Christ, and then of His resurrection; and who now proceeds from the glorified Christ as the principle of the sanctification of humanity and the world. Bengel: *Ante resurrectionem latebat sub carne Spiritus; post resurrectionem carnem penitus abscondit Spiritus sanctimonia. We accept this statement in a wider sense. From the divina natura of Christ as sanctificationis omnis causa (Melancthon, Calov, [Bengel, Olshausen], and others), we must distinguish the expression so far as it does not denote the individual, but the universal vital principle of the new birth of humanity. And we must distinguish it from the Holy Spirit, the πνεῦμα ἅγιον (Chrysostom, and most commentators; see Meyer),† so far as it denotes this principle, not merely according to its complete New Testament revelation, but also according to the Old Testament preparation of the divine-human life. But we must not make the distinction so that the πνεῦμα ἁγιοσύνης will represent the difference between the absolute communication of the Spirit to Christ and the relative operation of the πνεῦμα ἅγιον (Tholuck, Baur). We shall be secure against confounding the ideas, πνεῦμα ἁγιοσύνης, λόγος or ἐκὼν τοῦ Θεοῦ (Rückert, Reiche), if we observe the difference between the universal and individual divine principle of life in revelation. This difference is most decidedly ignored by Baur, when he understands by the πνεῦμα ἅγ. the Messianic Spirit. When Clements Romanus, Ep. ii., terms Christ the first Spirit,‡ he means the individual designation of the divine nature of Christ, yet according to its universal relation, just as the spirit of a man is the individual himself, but according to his universal relation.

[Κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιοσύνης is evidently the antithesis or counterpart of κατὰ σάρκα, and as σὰρξ here means the human nature of Christ, πνεῦμα must mean His divine nature, which is all Spirit, and intrinsically holy. ἁγιοσύνης is the genitive of qualification, showing that holiness is the essential characteristic of Christ's Spirit, and yet it distinguishes this from the πνεῦμα ἅγιον, which is the technical designation of the third person of the Trinity. Comp. John iv. 24: "God (i. e., the divine being or nature which the three persons of the Trinity have in common) is Spirit;" 2 Cor. iii. 17, where Christ Himself is called "the Spirit;" 1 Tim. iii. 16: "justified in Spirit" (ἐν πνεύματι); Heb. ix. 14: "Who with an eternal Spirit (διὰ πνεύματος αἰωνίου) offered Himself without spot to God;" and 1 Peter iii. 18, where a somewhat similar distinction is made between the flesh and the spirit, or the human and divine nature of Christ: "Being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit," although this passage is not exactly parallel. Meyer takes πνεῦμα ἁγιοσύνης to mean the ἴσω ἀνθρώπου, the whole inner life of Christ, which was elevated above all purely human spirits, filled with the Spirit of God, sinless and perfect. De Wette: "The spiritual side of the life of Christ, yet with the attribute of holiness partly as a quiescent quality, partly as an efficacious power emanating from it." Substitute for this: "The Divine side of Christ's person with the essential characteristic of holiness," &c., and we can adopt this explanation. If flesh means the whole human nature, it implies a human spirit, but not the πνεῦμα ἁγιοσύνης, which is essentially Divine.—P. S.]

Of Jesus Christ our Lord.—[Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν, ver. 4, in apposition with τοῦ υἱοῦ Θεοῦ, anticipated in the E. V. ver. 3]. This expresses the relation of the exalted Son of God to the Apostle and the Roman Christians as the ground and bond of their union. They together accepted Jesus as the Christ of God, and served Him as their common Master. [Alford: "Having given this description of the person and dignity of the Son of God, very man and very God, he now identifies this divine person with Jesus Christ, the Lord and Master of Christians—the historical object of their faith, and (see words following) the Appointer of himself to the apostolic office." De Wette: "Ἰησ. Χρ. bezeichnet den Sohn Gottes als historisch-kirchliche Erscheinung." So Tholuck, Philippi. Jesus is the personal, Christ the official name; the former expresses His true character and mission and relation to the world, the latter His connection with the Old Testament and the promise of God. Jesus, i. e., Saviour, was the Hebrew name, announced by the angel before His birth, Matt. i. 25; Luke i. 31, and given at His circumcision, Luke ii. 21; Christ, the Greek equivalent for the Hebrew Messiah, i. e., the Anointed, exhibits Him as the fulfiller of all the prophecies and types of the Old Testament, as the divinely promised and anointed Prophet, Priest, and King of Israel, who had for ages been the desire of all nations and the hope of all believers. Lord is here, and often, applied to Christ in the same sense in which the Septuagint uses κύριος for the Hebrew מָלִיךְ and מֶלֶךְ. See the Lexica. Christ is so called as the supreme Lord of the New Dispensation, or the sovereign Head of Christendom, to whom all believers owe allegiance and obedience.—P. S.]

Ver. 5. Through whom we received.—After stating the common relation of believers to Christ, there follows the account of the special relation of the Apostle to Him. It is plain that neither ver. 5 nor ver. 6 can be parenthetical; but here is prepared the whole treatment of the Epistle on the relation between the call of the Apostle and the call of the church at Rome. δὲ οὖν. Christ is the personal means of communicating his call on God's part [or the mediatorial agent in conferring grace from God to man, comp. Gal. i. 1; 1 Cor. i. 9.—P. S.]. ἐλάβομεν (received) denotes not only the free divine gift, but also the living religious and moral appropriation by faith. It is plain that the plural here has reference to the call of Paul alone (not to the apostles in general, according to Bengel), from the following signature of his apostleship, by which he is the Apostle to the Gentiles.*

* [Bengel has a large note on πνεῦμα ἁγιοσύνης which is well worth reading in full. He regards ἁγιοσύνη, sanctimonia, as a kind of middle term between ἀγιότης, holiness, and ἁγιασμός, sanctification.—P. S.]

† [Wordsworth and Forbes also wrongly identify the πνεῦμα ἁγιοσύνης with the πνεῦμα ἅγιον, the third person in the Holy Trinity, and thereby destroy the obvious contrast of κατὰ πν. ἁγιοσύνην and κατὰ σάρκα.—P. S.]

‡ [Epist. ad Cor. II. c. 9: "Ὁς Χριστὸς δὲ κύριος, ὁ σώσας ἡμᾶς, ὃν μὲν τὸ πρῶτον πνεῦμα, ἐγένετο σὰρξ, καὶ ὥσπερ ἡμᾶς ἐκάλειν οὕτως καὶ ἡμῖν ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ σαρκὶ ἀποκληρώμεθα τὸν μυσθόν. The Clementine origin of the second Epistle to the Corinthians is very doubtful.—P. S.]

* [Comp. the note of Meyer in loco against Reiche, and of Alford against Paile, who infers that the subject of ἐλά-

Grace [in general] and apostleship [in particular.—P. S.]. Grace, as the operative call to salvation and to the full experience of salvation in justification, is the preliminary condition for every Christian office, and, above all, to the apostleship. The grand unfolding of his apostleship was therefore preceded by an extraordinary degree of grace [in his conversion]. The explanation, χάρις ἀποστολῆς, grace of apostleship (Hendiady, so Chrysostom, Beza, Philippi, and others), obliterates the force of that preliminary condition: * but when the grace is regarded merely as pardoning grace (Augustine, Calvin), the fundamental part is mistaken for the whole. Thus, also, the extraordinary apostolic gifts (χαρίσματα) to which Theodoret, Luther, and others refer χάρις, presuppose grace (χάρις) already. Meyer understands the expression to mean Divine grace in general; that is, the translation into the communion of the beloved of God.

Unto obedience of faith [εἰς ἰσχυρήν πίστιν, sum Glaubensgehorsam, comp. Rom. xvi. 26.—P. S.]. That is, for the purpose of establishing obedience to the faith. The εἰς denotes not merely the purpose, but also the operation of the apostleship;—an instance of Pauline conciseness. It may be asked here, whether the genitive πίστει indicates the object, or must be read as apposition: the faith which consists in obedience [to the Word and Will of Christ.—P. S.].† But this question is limited by the second, whether πίστις can stand in the objective sense as fides quæ creditur [quod credendum est, doctrina Christiana.—P. S.].? Meyer denies this, and asserts that πίστις, in the New Testament, is constantly subjective faith [fides quæ creditur, fides credens.—P. S.], though it is often made objective, as here, and is regarded a power, or controlling principle.‡ But this would give us the idea of obedience toward the faithful. The obedience here meant is either identical with faith (the obedience which consists in faith, according to Theophylact, Calvin §), or it is obedience to faith in its objective form. The latter interpretation is supported by the expressions ὑπακοή τοῦ Χριστοῦ, 2 Cor. x. 5 [ὑπακοή τῆς ἀληθείας, 1 Peter i. 22], and particularly Acts vi. 7 ["a great company of priests ὑπήκουον τῇ πίστει, became obedient to the faith," comp. Rom. x. 16: ὑπήκουσαν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ.—P. S.]. Comp. 1 Peter i. 2, 14. But this ἰσχυρὰ must be the same as the preceding, ἡμῶν, overlooking the formulary character of the phrase ὁ κύριος ἡμῶν.—P. S.]

* [Alford: "Keep the χάρις καὶ ἀποστολὴ separate, and strictly consecutive, avoiding all nonsensical figures of Hendiady, Hypallage, and the like. It was the general bestowal of grace which conditioned and introduced the special bestowal (καὶ, as so often, coupling a specific portion to a whole) of apostleship; cf. 1 Cor. xv. 10." Augustine: "Gratiam cum omnibus fidelibus, apostolatium autem non cum omnibus communem habet."—P. S.]

† [Or rather: the obedience which consists in faith, in the act of believing.—P. S.]

‡ [Meyer, 4th ed. 1863, p. 43: "πιστις ἢ DOCTRINA FIDELIS annehmen (Bem., Folei., Estius, Bengel, Heum., Grimmer, Rosenm., Flatt, Fritzsche, Tholuck, u. M.), ist durchaus gegen den Sprachgebrauch des N. T., in welchem die πίστις stets der subjektive Glaube ist, obwohl oft, wie hier, OBJECTIVERT, als Potens gedacht. Vrgl. xvi. 26; Gal. i. 23. Die πίστις ist, nach P., die Überzeugung und Zuversicht (ASSENSUS und FIDUCIA) von Jesus Christus als dem einzigen und vollkommenen Vermittler der göttlichen Gnade und des ewigen Lebens, durch sein Verdienstwerk."—P. S.]

§ [So also Hodge: "The obedience of faith is that obedience which consists in faith, or of which faith is the controlling principle." Wordsworth: "That I might bring all nations to that faith which manifests itself in hearkening to the Word, and in obedience to the Will, of God"—P. S.]

πίστις cannot mean only doctrina fidei. Even obedience to the gospel (Rom. x. 16) does not express the most definite form of the objective πίστις: this is Christ Himself. An Epistle, sent to Rome by the ambassador of a Lord and King, who declared himself appointed to call all the peoples of the Roman Empire to obedience or allegiance, must have been planned in full consciousness of the antithesis, as well as of the analogy, between the earthly Roman Empire and the Kingdom of Christ. Therefore the Apostle expresses the analogy when he characterizes himself as an ambassador who appeals to the nations to be obedient to his Lord. But the antithesis lies in his denoting this obedience as an obedience to the faith. We must admit that the idea of the subjective faith also has here a good sense in itself. Faith is not at all arbitrary, but an obligatory obedience incumbent upon the inmost soul and conscience; yet its obedience is not slavish, but the joyous act of free faith, as it is assensus and fiducia. And if we accept this, the expression would be an oxymoron, like the expression: law of the Spirit. But since the question is concerning a characterization of the apostleship, the fuller idea must be expected: obedience toward the object of faith, especially as the freedom of faith is thereby also declared. Even the Christian's hope can be used in an objective sense (Col. i. 5).

Among all the nations (ἐν πᾶσιν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν).—Since this expression constitutes one definition with the preceding, it is an improper alternative to refer it either to ἐλπίς (Beza) or to εἰς ἰσχυρὰ πίστιν (Meyer [Hodge]). We translate here, among all the nations (with Rückert, Reiche, Baur); not among all Gentiles (Tholuck, Meyer), because, from the following salutation, the Jews are included in the designation, and because it is in harmony with the purpose of the whole Epistle to establish a united congregation from among Jews and Gentiles. With this view, the subordinate idea of heathen nations is immediately introduced, yet not clearly before vers. 13, 14, &c. [Hodge: "The apostles were not diocesan, restricted in jurisdiction to a particular territory. Their commission was general. It was to all nations,"—yet with an amicable division of the immense field of labor; comp. Gal. ii. 9; Rom. xv. 20; 2 Cor. x. 16.—P. S.]

For the sake of his name.—(See Acts v. 41). Not for "the good" of His name; nor for the glorifying of the same (Meyer), which would have been expressed in the form of a doxology,* but for the spread of His name (Phil. ii. 10). Therefore the words are not an addition, but an explanatory parallel to the expression, "for obedience to the faith," &c., and relate, in common with this, to the antecedent. His name is the object of the faith to which the nations should render obedience in His name.

Ver. 6. Among whom are ye also.—We place here a comma, and read the words, the called, the chosen ones of Jesus Christ, as an address (with Rückert, Philippi, &c.); but not, among whom are ye also called of Jesus Christ (with Lachmann, Meyer [Alford], and others). For the principal weight rests on the thought, that the Roman Christians were included in the totality of nations to which the Apostle was sent. He did not need to say first to them that they were the called of Jesus Christ. Thus we have the beautiful antithesis: I am the chosen Apostle for all nations: you are the chosen believers in the midst of all nations: we are therefore directed toward each other.

The called of Jesus Christ.—Not, whom Christ has called (Luther, Rückert, and others); but who, as the called [by the accepted call of God through the gospel], belong to and are subject to Him (the genitive of possession; Erasmus [Calvin, De Wette], Meyer, and others).^{*} Paul refers the call (through Christ) to God (Rom. viii. 30, &c.; see Meyer). The Apostle seems, by this address, to anticipate the salutation itself; but the address must prepare the way for the salutation by the reminder that he can salute them as pertaining to him. [Hodge: "Οἱ κλητοί, the called, means the effectually called; those who are so called by God as to be made obedient to the call. Hence the κλητοί are opposed to those who receive and disregard the outward call. . . . Hence, too, κλητοί and ἐκλεκτοί are of nearly the same import; κατὰ πρόθεσιν κλητοί, Rom. viii. 28; comp. Rom. ix. 11; 1 Cor. i. 26, 27. We accordingly find κλητοί used as a familiar designation of believers." This is not quite correct. κλητοί and ἐκλεκτοί (a paronomasia in Greek, like the German erwählt and auserwählt) are clearly distinguished, Matt. xx. 16 and xxii. 14: πολλοὶ γὰρ ἔσαν κλητοί, ὀλίγοι δὲ ἐκλεκτοί, many are called, but few chosen; in the last passage they are even put in antithesis. All the members of the visible Church are κλητοί, though they may ultimately be lost; but only the members of the invisible Church, or the true believers, are ἐκλεκτοί, or κλητοί κατὰ πρόθεσιν (Rom. viii. 28). Comp. the notes on Matt. ix. 16, in vol. i. p. 352 and 354 f.—P. S.]

Ver. 7. To all that are in Rome.—The address and the salutation.† The Epistle is addressed to all Christians in Rome. Residence in Rome and connection with the body of Roman Christians are certainly presupposed (see ver. 8). But the Roman Christians are saluted according to the condition of things, as an incipient church not yet fully organized, but destined to become so—an end to which this very Epistle was directed. The Apostle expresses himself otherwise in the Epistles to the Corinthians, Galatians, and Thessalonians. There he salutes the Christians as a church, or churches. [The Christians residing at Rome, whether born there or not, are viewed as one community, however imperfectly they may have been organized at the time; but they no doubt worshipped in different parts of the city, and were thus divided into various domestic congregations, ἐκκλησίαι κατ' οἶκον, xvi. 5. The population of the city of Rome at the time of Christ is variously estimated from one to two millions. In his earliest five epistles, Paul addresses himself τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, x. 2.; in all the others, τοῖς ἁγίοις.—P. S.]

Beloved of God, called to be saints.—The root of their Christian faith is, that they know themselves beloved of God by the experience of His reconciliation; the goal and crown of their Christian faith is holiness. But they are not merely called to be saints (De Wette). As truly called, they are actually saints first in this sense: that, according to the analogy of theocratic holiness, they are separated from the ungodly world and consecrated to God; secondly, in the sense that Christ dwells in them as the principle of increasing holiness, and that they are characterized according to the ruling principle of their new life (1 Cor. vii. 14). This general designation does not imply that the Apostle could say it of every individual, still less that he should ascribe to individuals a personal holiness of life. [κλητοί has the same relation to ἁγιοί as κλητός has to ἀπόστολος, in ver. 1, and expresses the vocation of the Roman Christians to holiness, which is both an actual possession as to principle, and a moral aim to be realized more and more by daily growth in Christ.—P. S.]

Grace to you and peace.—The Greek χαίρειν (Acts xv. 23; James i. 1), and the Hebrew שָׁלוֹם, are here reflected unitedly in the infinitely richer Christian salutation. The grace which, as the cause of peace, has its source in God and Christ; the peace, as the operation of this cause, which becomes the source of new life in believers. The more definite Christian conception is destroyed if we substitute (with Meyer, against Olshausen, Philippi, and many others) salvation instead of peace, and kindness instead of grace. [Grace and peace are related to each other as cause and effect, and constitute the chief blessings of Christianity, embracing all that we need. The profound Christian meaning of χάρις—the redeeming love of God in Christ—and of εἰρήνη—the peace with God by the redemption—compared with the ordinary meaning of the Greek χαίρειν and the Hebrew shalom, affords a striking example of the transforming power which the genius of Christianity exercised over ancient language and custom. See the General Remarks on p. 57.—P. S.]

From God our Father.—The expression of the specifically Christian consciousness of God. The experience of pardon through Christ produces the consciousness of the νιοθῆσια (sonship, adoption) as a result.

And [from] the Lord.—[Κυρίου 'Ι. Χρ. is not dependent on Πατρός and parallel with ἡμῶν, but is ruled by ἀπὸ and is coördinate with Θεοῦ Πατρός. God is nowhere called "our and Christ's Father," and Christ never addresses God "our," but "My Father," owing to His peculiar relationship which is rooted in the ὁμοουσία, or equality of essence. This frequent coördination of Christ with the Father, as equally the object of prayer and the source of spiritual blessing, implies the recognition of the divinity of Christ. No Hebrew monotheist could thus associate, without blasphemy, the eternal Jehovah with a mere man. So also Philippi, Hodge, and others.—P. S.] Not of the Lord (Erasmus, Glückler). Nevertheless, we would not read, with Meyer: καὶ ἀπὸ κυρίου, and not merely view Christ as causa mediana, in distinction from the Father, as the causa principalis. For the dominion of the exalted Saviour must be distinguished from the mediatorship of Christ as causa mediana. [God the Father is the author, Christ the mediator and procurer, the Holy Spirit the applier or impartor, of

* [Alford takes ἡμεῶν Χριστοῦ not as the genit. possess., but as equivalent to by Jesus Christ. But the call of believers is uniformly referred to the Father. Alford quotes John v. 25 and 1 Tim. i. 12; but these passages are not to the point.—P. S.]

† [The salutation commences with χάρις, and should form a verse by itself. The first clause of ver. 7 connects with ver. 1 and indicates the readers. See Text. Note 12.—P. S.]

grace and peace. The Spirit takes them from Christ and shows them to the believer (comp. John xvi. 14). The latter may be the reason why the Holy Spirit is not especially mentioned in the epistolary salutations, except 2 Cor. xiii. 13, 14; 1 Peter i. 2. P. S.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The Epistle of the Apostle to the Romans on the righteousness of faith is still in a special sense a new message to the Romans, and a witness against Romanists. [It connects admirably with the concluding verses of the Acts, chap. xxviii. 30, 31, as a specimen of Paul's preaching in Rome, and to the Romans.—P. S.]

2. The significance of the Epistle to the Romans: (1.) As the first of the New Testament Epistles; (2.) in the group of the Pauline Epistles; (3.) as an original record of the missionary activity of the Apostle, and as an example for evangelical missions; (4.) as the central point of the Christian doctrine of salvation, and thus as the starting-point of the Western (Latin) Church, and especially of the Protestant Evangelical Church (see the Introduction).

3. The epistolary inscription of ancient writers contrasted with the subscription of recent ones. The former characterizes the Epistle as a substitute for personal intercourse; the latter has become an independent form of personal communication. Frankness predominates in the former, courtesy in the latter.

4. Servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle. The extent of one idea is determined by that of the other.—Gospel of God: glorious unity.—Connection of the Old and New Testaments.—The apostles, unlike the Pharisees, acknowledge no traditions in connection with the Old Testament.—Grace and office must not be separated.—Just as little can we separate the experience of God's love and the beginning of sanctification.—Neither can grace and peace be separated; nor the paternal authority of God and the authority of Christ.

5. The importance of the inscription of this Epistle. The importance of the salutation. The adaptation of the great Apostle of the Gentiles and of the Christian congregation of the great metropolises to each other. See the Exeg. Notes.

6. The antithesis: Christ born of the seed of David, and appointed the Son of God in majesty and honor (also over the Roman world), is an economical antithesis, at the foundation of which lies the ontological antithesis: that Christ is the temporal Son of David and the eternal Son of God.

7. The resurrection was historically accomplished and essentially finished in Christ. As the ideal and dynamical productive energy of the Logos, its roots and impulse pervade the whole history of the world and of man, and especially the history of the kingdom of God. The same may be said of the Spirit of holiness. See the Exeg. Notes. The Logos lighteth every man that cometh into the world (John i. 9).

8. Paul, as the ambassador of Jesus Christ, the Son of God in regal power, announces to the believers of the imperial city of Rome that it is his business to call the world to obedience to the faith and to subjection to Christ

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

An apostolic salutation: 1. From whom does it come? 2. what is its import? 3. to whom is it addressed? (vers. 1-7).—The one gospel of God: 1. Promised by His prophets; 2. fulfilled by His Son (vers. 3, 4).—The missionary preaching among the Gentiles was a preaching of obedience to the faith for the glorifying of the name of Jesus Christ (ver. 5).—Every office is a gift of grace. The servants of Christ must remember this: 1. For their humility; 2. for their elevation and encouragement (ver. 5).—How can preachers of the gospel guard against bitterness toward the members of their congregation? By considering that the congregation are: 1. Beloved by God; 2. called by Jesus Christ (ver. 7).—Grace and peace: on one side different in manifestation, but, on the other, one in origin.

LUTHER:—The Spirit of God was given after Christ's ascension, since which time He sanctifies Christians and glorifies Christ in all the world as the Son of God in power, in word, miracle, and sign (ver. 4).

STARKE:—The preachers of the gospel must preach both the law and the gospel in their respective order, and especially the gospel (ver. 1).—He who does not become a saint on earth, will not be numbered among the saints in heaven (ver. 7).

QUESNEL:—Every thing that comes to light is not therefore new: the oldest errors are continual novelties, and the newest truths are ever old.

OSIANDER Bibl.:—Christ, according to His human nature, is our brother. O great consolation! (ver. 8).

CRAMER:—Worldly peace is a great treasure, but, after all, it is not sufficient for us. When Christ communicates His peace to us (John xiv. 27), it is grace in God; and then have we peace with God (ver. 7).

BENGL: The Gospel of God is also the Gospel of Christ (ver. 1).—Jesus Christ is the Son of God (vers. 3, 4). This is the ground of all legitimate address of Christ to His Father and God, and of our legitimate address, through Him as our Lord, to His Father and our Father, His God and our God, who hath made us His own. He was Son of God before His humiliation; but His Sonship was veiled during His earthly life, and not fully unveiled till after His resurrection. On this rests His justification, 1 Tim. iii. 16; 1 John ii. 1, and this is the ground of our justification, Rom. iv. 25.

GERLACH:—According to the flesh, the Son of God belonged to the Jews alone. But by the completion of His atonement, through the resurrection, He became the universal King of the human race, Lord of heaven and earth, according to the Spirit which dwelt in Him, and has perfectly pervaded His human nature (vers. 3, 4).

HEUBNER:—Prophets and apostles had one calling, one work (ver. 2).—The apostolic benediction—of what fulness of spiritual gifts, of what a holy heart, does it give witness! It is grand to express such a wish for a church; it presupposes the personal possession and appreciation of these gifts, but also a serious zeal to apply them to the congregation (ver. 7).

ROOS:—If the theme of Paul's preaching had been only virtue, and a supreme Being whom we call God, he would have pleased the Greeks; and if he had preached on a Messiah yet to come and on the works of the law, the Jews would have been contented with him. But he preached on the Son of God. That was the voice of his gospel (ver. 4).

BESSER :—The Spirit of holiness is the very force by which Christ has taken away the power of death, and has destroyed mortality, through the triumph of His imperishable life (ver. 4).

J. P. LANGR :—How Christ exhibits His power as Lord by the Spirit of sanctification : 1. As the Risen One ; 2. as the Son of God (vera. 1-4).—The same : Like man, like salutation.—The joy with which the Apostle announces the majesty of Christ in imperial Rome : 1. How foolish this joy appeared ; 2. how gloriously it was justified ; 3. how it must be fulfilled once more.—The internal connection between the power of the resurrection and the Spirit of holiness in Christ.

[BURKITT :—Paul declares : 1. The person from whom he received authority to be an apostle, namely, Christ ; 2. how free and undeserved a favor it was ; 3. the special duty and office of an apostle ; 4. how he puts the Romans in mind of their condition by nature before the gospel was revealed to them and received by them ; hence it is the duty of both ministers and people to be mindful of what was their condition by nature.—Why is the Holy Ghost excluded in the salutation of ver. 7 ? He is not excluded, though He be not named ; but is necessarily implied in the forementioned gifts. Besides, in other salutations the Holy Ghost is expressly mentioned ; 1 Cor. xiii. 13, 14.—HENRY :—The Apostle describes : 1. The person who writes the Epistle ; 2. the gospel itself ; 3. the persons to whom it is written ; and 4. pronounces the apostolic benediction.—DODDRIDGE :—We are called to partake of the privileges of God's people ; we belong to the society of those who are eminently beloved of God, and who lie under great obligations, as they are called a holy nation, a peculiar people. May we not dishonor the sacred community to which we belong, and may we finally enjoy the important privileges of that state of everlasting glory in which the kingdom of the Son of God at all terminate !—CLARKE :—The Apostle invokes upon the Romans all the blessings which can flow from God as the fountain of grace ; producing in them all the happiness which a heart filled with the peace of God can possess ; all of which are to be communicated to them through the Lord Jesus Christ.—Comprehensive Comm. :—The Christian profession is not a notional knowledge, or a naked assent, or useless disputings ; but it is obedience to the faith. The act of faith is the obedience of the understanding to God revealing, and the product of that is the obedience of the will to God commanding.—BARNES :—From Paul's connecting the Lord Jesus Christ with the Father, we see : 1. That the Apostle regarded Him as the source of grace and peace as really as he did the Father ; 2. he introduced them in the same connection, and with reference to the bestowal of the same blessings ; 3. if the mention of the Father implies a prayer, the same is implied by the mention of Christ, and hence was an act of worship to the latter ; 4. all this shows that Paul's mind was familiarised to the idea that Christ was divine.—These seven verses are a striking instance of the manner of Paul. While the subject is simply a salutation to the Roman church, his mind seems to catch fire, and to burn and blaze with signal intensity. He leaves the immediate subject before him, and advances some vast thought that awes us, and fixes us in contemplation, and involves us in difficulty about his meaning, and then returns to his subject.—HODGE :—God is called our Father, not merely as the author of our existence and the source of every blessing, but especially as reconciled toward us through Jesus Christ.—If Jesus Christ is the great subject of the gospel, it is evident that we cannot have right views of the one without having correct opinions concerning the other.—J. F. H.]

[SCHAFF :—The epistolary addresses generally bear on the doctrine of the ministerial office and its relation to the congregation, and furnish suitable texts for ordination and installation sermons.—Ver. 1. PAUL, a model for a Christian minister : I. In his humility—a SERVANT (bondsmen) of Jesus Christ. II. In his dignity—a chosen APOSTLE. His sense of dependance on Christ (servant) precedes and underlies his sense of authority over the congregation (apostle).—Only the true servant of Christ can be a true servant of the people.—Ministers derive their authority from Christ, not from the people, but for the people.—A SERVANT OF CHRIST. The service of Christ is perfect freedom, John viii. 36. St. Augustine : "Deo servire vera libertas est."—A CHOSEN APOSTLE. The apostle and the ordinary minister : I. The unity : (a.) Both are called by God ; (b.) both are servants of Christ ; (c.) both labor for the same end—the glory of God and the salvation of souls. II. The differences : (a.) An apostle is called directly by Christ ; a minister, through the medium of church authority ; (b.) an apostle is inspired and infallible ; a minister is only enlightened, and liable to err ; (c.) an apostle has the world for his field ; a minister is confined to a particular charge.—CHOSEN, SET APART. The necessity of a Divine call for the ministry : I. The inner call by the Holy Ghost. II. The outward call by the authority and ordination of the Church.—The regularly called minister contrasted with the self-constituted minister and fanatic.—SET APART UNTO THE GOSPEL. The preaching of the gospel : I. The chief duty of the minister, to which all others must be subordinated. II. The highest work, in which Christ Himself and all the apostles engaged. III. The inconsistency of connecting any secular calling with the holy ministry.—Ver. 2. The close connection of the Old and New Testaments. Christianity a new, and yet an old religion.—The historical character of Christianity—in opposition to the Gnostic and fanatical theory of a magical, abrupt descent from the clouds.—Vera. 3, 4. JESUS CHRIST the great theme of the gospel. His double nature, the human, earthly, historical, and the divine, heavenly, eternal—both inseparably united in one person.—The importance of the RESURRECTION as an argument for the Divinity of Christ.—Ver. 5. Christ, the mediator of all grace.—Ver. 7. The Christians are SAINTS—i. e., separated from the world and consecrated to the service of God ; holy in principle, and destined to become more and more holy and perfect in their whole life and conduct.—The redeeming GRACE of God in Christ—the fountain of PEACE with God and with ourselves.—First grace, then peace.—No grace without peace ; no peace without grace.—The coordination of Christ with God the Father in the epistolary inscriptions—as indirect proof of the Deity of Christ.]

The Introduction.

СНАР. I 8-15.

8 First [of all],¹ I thank my God through Jesus Christ for [concerning]² you all, that your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world [in all the world].
9 For God is my witness, whom I serve with [in] my spirit in the gospel of his Son, that [how, ὥς]³ without ceasing I make mention of you [how unceasingly 10 I remember you;]⁴ always in my prayers; Making request, [; always asking in my prayers,]⁵ if by any means now at length [if haply now at last]⁶ I might have a prosperous journey [I may be prospered]⁷ by the will of God to come 11 unto you. For I long to see you, that I may impart unto you [share with you, μετέδοω] some spiritual gift, to the end ye may be established [in order that ye 12 may be strengthened];⁸ That is, that I may be comforted together with you, by the mutual faith both of you and me [among you by each other's faith, both 13 yours and mine].⁹ Now [But] I would not¹⁰ have you ignorant, brethren, that oftentimes [often] I purposed to come unto you (but was let¹¹ [hindered] hitherto)¹² that I might have some fruit among you also, even as among other 14 Gentiles [the rest of the Gentiles]. I am debtor both to the Greeks, and to the Barbarians; both to the wise, and to the unwise [Both to Greeks and to Barba-15 rians; both to wise and to unwise, I am debtor]. So,¹³ as much as in me is [as far as lies in me], I am ready¹⁴ to preach the gospel to you [also] that [who] are at Rome also [οὗτοι also].

TEXTUAL.

¹ Ver. 8.—(ἐπαύρον μὲν, primum quidem, subordera, first of all. The εὖ & δὲ is omitted in the pressure of thought and flow of speech, as in Acts 1; Rom. iii 3; 1 Cor. xi 18. Comp. Winer, Grammar, p. 508 (6th ed), and Alex. Buttmann, Grammatici des N. T. Sprachgebrauchs, p. 318. Alford finds the corresponding δὲ in ver. 13, and connects thus: "Ye indeed are prospering in the faith; but I still am anxious further to advance that fruitfulness." But this anxiety was already expressed in ver. 10, and the δὲ in ver. 13 is simply peraeque—P. S.]

² Var. 8.—rept is best supported in opposition to εἰς. [The prepositions rept and εἰς both occur in this connection (1 Cor. 1. 4; Col. 1. 3; 1 Thess. 1. 2; 2 Thess. 1. 3), though εἰς more rarely (Eph. 1. 16; Phil. 1. 4), with substantially the same meaning; the difference is, that rept, concerning, implies simply that the Roman Christians are the subject of thanks; while εἰς, for, in behalf of, for the sake of, gives the idea of intercession and aid. But rept has also the latter meaning. They are often confounded by the MSS., but the best codices (A. B. C. D.^e. K.) and critical editors (Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Wordsworth) are here in favor of rept against the εἰς of the lectus receptus.—P. S.]

⁴ Ver. 10.—[The translation depends here upon the punctuation, which is left to critical conjecture; the ancient MSS. having no punctuation. I make a comma or semi-colon after τοῦτο, and connect ἡρώδης, κ.τ.λ. with ἀδελφεοῖς. So Meyer, Philippi, Alford (in his notes). Dr. Lange, however, in his version and Exeg. Notes, follows Tischendorf, who makes a comma after προσφώνησέν μου, like the R.V. In this case ἡρώδης must be taken as an intensification of ἀδελφεοῖς = aspidius semper, aspidiusque; but this would require a different position of the words, viz. οἱ ἀδελφεοὶ τοῦ ἡρώδης, κ.τ.λ. As it is, ἡρώδης ἐπὶ τῶν προσφώνησέν μου ἀδελφεοῖς is better taken as an explanation of ἀδελφεοῖς ἡρώδης ὅτιν τοῦτο, so as to mark at the same time a progress of the idea, the incessant remembrance of the Romans culminating in direct prayer.—P. 8.]

* 10. etiam 38. et 38. ob etiam enclitic enimal (Meyer, Olshausen, Lange, &c.); Alford: if by any means before long. was, happy, possibly, implies the possibility of new delays and hindrances. For, already, may mean finally or at last, with reference to things long hoped for and delayed, and in connection with was, landmark aliquando. See Hartung, Particellare 1. 338. The Apostle's desire in this respect was granted about three years afterwards, A. D. 61. — P. 8.]

* Ver. 10.—(Or succeed, εὐδοκῆσθαι. The original meaning of ὁδός, way, journey, is lost in the verb. See Eng. Notes. But the parting wish in Greece to travellers is even now καλὸν κατευόδιον, as in Italy, buon viaggio, a happy journey.—P. S.]

Ver. 11.—[Dr. Lange inserts after gift: personal, peculiar grace, and after established: for your world-historical calling. See his explanation below, which I cannot adopt.—P. 8.]

⁸ Ver. 12. — συνηγαγεσθαι to ἐπι δὲ τοῖς ἐκ ἀλλήλων πίστεως, ἐμὴν καὶ ἐκ ἐμοῦ. The infinitive συνηγαγεσθαι (which compound verb only occurs here in the N. T.) is parallel with the preceding ἐκλήθησθε, the subject ἐμὴ being understood from ἐκλήθησθε, ver. 11. The συμ is generally resolved into ἐμὴ καὶ ἐκ ἐμοῦ, you and I, but Meyer, on account of ἐμὴ, makes Paul the only subject of συνηγαγεσθαι. This would require the omission of together in the E. V. The ἐμὴ (which is politely put first) and ἐκ ἐμοῦ explain ἐκ ἀλλήλων, which is a little more emphatic than ἀλλήλων, showing that faith dwelled in the hearts of the Roman Christians. The mutual faith of the E. V. suggests the wrong sense faith which each has in the other. Dr. Lange, in accordance with his specific interpretation of ἐκ ἐμοῦ, adds to converted: made joyful for the common call for the conversion of the world. — [E. S.]

* Ver. 13.—[For οὐ θέλω, Codd. D*. E. G. and Ital. read οὐκ οἶμαι.—P. 8.]

¹⁴ Ver. 13.—[The verb to let, is used here, and 2 Thess. ii. 7, by the R. V. in the same sense to hinder, to forbid, to prevent (μαλαίειν, καθέχειν), as in Tennyson's lines:

" Mine ancient wound is hardly whole,
And lets me from the saddle."

But the word is now generally used in the opposite sense, to allow, to permit. On the contrary, the verb to prevent, in the R. V. (and in the Anglo-Saxon Liturgy), means to proceed, to anticipate (pra-venire); while in modern English it signifies the reverse, to hinder, to obstruct.—P. S.]

¹¹ Ver. 13.—[The words καὶ ἕνα ἴσον ἔχει τοῦ δέου, are a parenthesis, since ἕνα must depend upon σπουδάζω, &c. It is not necessary on this account to take καὶ in the adversative sense, to which Fritzsche and Meyer object. Scilicet is only here in the N. T. a particle of time, although often in Plato and later writers.—P. S.]

¹³ Ver. 15.—οὕτως τὸ, κατ' ἐμὲ, σπουδάζω (no. 1071). On the different interpretations of this phrase which do not materially alter the sense, comp. Exeg. Notes. As may be inferred from my punctuation, I connect (with the E. V., Calvin, Philippi, Wordsworth, Meyer, in his last edition) τὸ with σπουδάζω, and take σπουδάζω as equivalent to the substantive σπουδή (as τὸ χρηστὸν for ἡ χρηστότης, ii. 4; comp. τὸ μυαδὸν, τὸ δεδεῖται, 1 Cor. i. 25), and as the subject of the sentence: This being so (οὕτως), there is, on my part, or, as far as I am concerned (κατ' ἐμὲ), quantum ad me, a willingness or desire (σπουδάζω); or I, as much as in me is, am willing (Calvin: Itaque, quantum in me est, paratus sum). Comp. τὸν κατ' ἐμὲ πιστὸν, Eph. i. 15; τὸν κατ' ἐμὲ παρακαλῶν, Acts xiii. 23; 1 Cor. iii. 8; xv. 32). κατ' ἐμὲ is more expressive than μου (after σπουδάζω) would be; the Apostle laying stress on his dependence and submission to a higher power, as if to say: As far as it depends on me, I am anxious to come and preach to you, but my will is subject to the will of God, who may have decreed otherwise.—P. S.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

SECOND SECTION.—The connecting link in the form of doxology, and the transition of the author to his designed argument in the fundamental topic. The praise of the faith of the Roman Christians known all over the world, and the desire and purpose of the Apostle to visit them.

Ver. 8. First of all, I thank.—De Wette: "In all his Epistles, with the exception of Galatians, 1 Tim., and Titus,* the Apostle pursues the natural course of first placing himself, so to speak, in relation with his readers; and his first point of contact with them is gratitude for their participation in Christianity." [So also Alford in loc. Comp. also 1 Thess. i. 2; 2 Thess. i. 3; 1 Cor. i. 4. This means more definitely that the Apostle, in his epistles, with thanksgiving to God, seizes the point of connection for his subsequent argument; and this point of connection is in general a recognition of what has been already attained, but it takes its peculiar form from the condition of the different churches. Köllner calls this, captatio benevolentia. Tholuck: The Apostle opens his way to the hearts of the church by a declaration of his love. [Wordsworth: "As usual, the Apostle begins with a sentiment by which he expresses his gratitude to God, and conciliates the good will of those to whom he writes."—P. S.] According to Tholuck [De Wette] and Meyer, we would properly expect an εἰς αὐτὸν δεῖ [or ἐν αὐτῷ δεῖ] after πρωτὸν μὲν, but not in point of fact, since the πρωτὸν marks the emphasis of the following introductory word.—My God. Not only the expression of genuine feeling (De Wette), but also of the thought that God has shown Himself as the God of his apostolic call, by opening before him a path in Rome for the cause of Christ (Acts xxviii. 15). [The language of personal application, with a corresponding sense of personal obligation: the God who, with all His blessings and promises, belongs to me, as I belong to Him, and am bound to serve Him. Comp. Acts xxviii. 23: τοῦ θεοῦ οὗ ἐμῶν, καὶ λατρίῳ, 1 Cor. i. 4; Phil. i. 3; iv. 19; Philimon 4.—P. S.]—Through Jesus Christ. [Not to be connected with μου (Koppe, Glöckler), but with εὐχαριστῶν.—P. S.] Comp. Rom. vii. 25; Col. iii. 17; Heb. xiii. 15; 1 Peter ii. 5. Origen: Christ, as the mediator of the prayer, also presents the thanksgiving. [Vetus per pontificem magnum: oportet enim scire eum qui vult offerre sacrificium Deo, quod per manus Pontificis debet offerre."] So also Calvin, who refers to Heb. xiii. 15, Bengel, Olshausen, and Hodge, who justly says that it is the clear doctrine of the Bible that, in all our approaches to God in prayer or praise, we must come in the name of Christ as the ground of our acceptance.—P. S.] Meyer objects to this view as not justified by Paul's usual method, and explains that he renders thanks for what has come to pass by Christ. [Similarly Alford.] But what is meant by giving thanks for every thing in the name of Jesus Christ? (Eph. v. 20.) The thanksgiving, as well as prayer, must be sanctified by the spiritual communion with Christ, and thus come before God; by this means, all selfish interests, and all human and passionate joy at the obtained results are excluded.—For you all. The περι and ἐν were often confounded or changed by the copyists; therefore the Recepta has ἐν here. Here, as at the beginning of ver. 7, the Apostle emphasizes the fact that he has in view all the believers in Rome, and will not appeal to or favor any partisan tendency.—That your faith is spoken of. Mention is made of it, and it has become famous among Christians in the whole world (see chap. x. 18; xvi. 19). The expression, which has the outward appearance of being hyperbolic, acquires its complete significance chiefly in consequence of the powerful position of the metropolis of Rome, by the weight which Christianity gained in all the world by the conquest of this central home of the world, and by the Apostle's views of the future of this apostolic station. See the quotations from Grotius and Calvin in Tholuck. [Meyer: "ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ κόσμῳ—a popular hyperbole, but admirably suited to the position of the congregation in the metropolis of the world, to which the eyes of all were directed." Remember the adage: Orbis in urbe continetur.—P. S.]

Ver. 9. For God is my witness. The for establishes the foregoing. Here, therefore, the thanksgiving through Christ is also explained (Phil. i. 3; Col. i. 3; 1 Thess. i. 2). The sense of the solemn asseveration is: My declaration is before the face of God. The free asseverations of this character arise in the Apostle's case from the inner character of his work and the loftiness of his position. He cannot adduce earthly witnesses of the peculiarity of the facts which he has to assure; they are of heavenly origin, and he calls on God as their witness: that is, his whole knowledge of God, and his apostolic conscience, must be pledged. Pareus: "Ignotus ad ignotos scribens jurat." Against this, Meyer quotes Phil. i. 18 [and 2 Cor. i. 23.—P. S.] as decisive. The necessities for such strong expressions of the fervent man were indeed very different; but one species of them is that adduced by Pareus. The general constraint of the Apostle to let his readers sometimes look into the sanctity of his inner life, is secured by the solemn asseveration against all danger of profanation. Meyer adduces as a mo tive "the strange fact that he, the Apostle to the Gentiles, had not yet become active in the church at Rome, although it belonged to his school." [Bengel: "A pious asseveration respecting a matter necessary and hidden from men, especially from those who were remote and unknown." Alford: "There could be no other witness to his practice in his secret prayers, but God: and as the assertion of a habit of incessantly praying for the Roman Christians, whom he had never seen, might seem to savor of an exaggerated expression of affection, he solemnly appeals to this only possible testimony. To the Ephesians, Philippians (see, however, Phil. i. 8), Colossians, Thessalonians, he gives the same assurance, but without the asseveration. The thus calling God to witness is no uncommon practice with Paul; see ref. in E. V." The Apostle's frequent appeal to God (2 Cor. i. 23; xi. 31; Phil. i. 8; 1 Thess. ii. 5, 10; Gal. i. 20) is a devout recognition of God's omniscience, and hence an act of worship. It disproves the literal interpretation of Matt. v. 33 ff., which prohibits perjury, and all useless and thoughtless swearing. Comp. Tholuck, Die Ber. predigt, p. 263 ff. (8d ed.).—P. S.]

Whom I serve in my spirit. The idea of the real service of God, which so powerfully pervades the Epistle to the Romans, first appears with the λατρεύω (see ver. 21; chap. ii. 22; iii. 25; v. 2; xii. 1; xv. 16; xvi. 25-27; comp. Acts vii. 7). As such a λατρεύω, he stands before God. But he serves Him in his spirit; that is, his priesthood is not merely external, but the living service of God by a spiritually awakened, vital, and steadfast consciousness.* Grotius and Reiche have found in the λατρεῖν an antithetical relation to the Jewish λατρεία in the law. Meyer thinks such an idea far-fetched. But we are rather of the opinion that the Apostle is still thinking of all external character of worship, and especially that of the heathen Romans. [Umbreit, approvingly quoted by Alford: "The Apostle means that he is an intelligent, true priest of his God, not in the temple, but in his spirit; not at the altar, but at the gospel of His Son." λατρεύω (לָבַד) and λατρευοῦν (לָבַד) are used in the Septuagint of the ministrations of the Jewish priesthood in the temple (comp. Luke i. 23; Heb. viii. 6; ix. 21), and in the New Testament applied to the Christian ministry, and to worship generally (Matt. iv. 10; Phil. ii. 17). The words ω λατρεύω, &c., give additional force to his solemn asseveration, and attest its sincerity.—P. S.]—In the gospel of his Son. (Genitive of the object.) His spirit is the temple, the sphere of his service; the gospel of the Son of God in the great work of evangelization, is the substance and form of his service of God.—How without ceasing. Meyer: ὡς does not stand for ὅτι (as it is usually taken, even by Fritzsche), but expresses the mode (the degree). This thanking without ceasing is not only more precisely defined, but more exactly conditioned by what follows.

Ver. 10. Always in my prayers. His spiritual longing and striving are directed toward Rome; therefore he is ever (and everywhere. Bretschneider: Ubiqueque locorum et quovis tempore. Luther: in all places) praying with his mind fixed on Rome. The thought is thus defined, if, with Tischendorf, we place a comma after προσευχῶν μου. We prefer this view to that of Meyer: Always asking in my prayers. [Comp. here my Textual Note 'in defence of Meyer's punctuation.—P. S.] There was, during his prayers, an unceasing remembrance of the Romans (the ἐνι is the determination of the time or the occasion), and this became a specific and urgent prayer.—If haply now at last I. The expression declares at the same time the earnestness of the petition, and humble resignation.—Might have a prosperous journey [better: may be prospered.—P. S.] Meyer: "The active εισοδοῦν seldom has the exact signification, to lead well, expeditum iter præbere; . . . but the passive never means via recta incedere, expeditum iter habere, but always [even in Prov. xvii. 8] metaphorically, prospero successu gaudere. [Meyer then quotes a number of passages.—P. S.] Therefore the explanation, which anyhow gives a trivial idea, prospero itinere utar (Vulgate, and others), must be rejected." [So also Alford.] Nevertheless, the choice of the word was suited to the allusion that the prosperity which the Apostle desired would consist in a successful journey to Rome; and we have sought to express this in the translation (Wohlfahrt). The affair is a subject of his prayerful solicitude, for it is not from selfishness, but only in accordance with God's will that he will come to Rome. (Schott connects the ἐν τ. θεῷ τ. θεοῦ not with ἐλθεῖν, but with εισοδοῦσθαι; but then the word would not seem to have been well chosen.)

Ver. 11. For I long to see you, Ἐπιπρόσθω. Fritzsche: simply cupio. [Not valde or ardenter cupio; comp. 2 Cor. v. 2; for ἐνι does not intensify, but simply expresses the direction of the πόθος, which itself means strong desire. So also De Wette, Meyer, and Alford.—P. S.] Schott, πόθος ἔχω ἐνι. According to Schott, the see you, ἰδεῖν ὑμᾶς, would indicate that Paul did not design to stay in Rome. But yet it constitutes an antithesis to the Epistle now about to be written.—Some spiritual gift, χάρισμα πνευματικόν. De Wette: χάρισμα is simply a gift, without special reference to Divine grace. [De Wette understands by it the παράκλησις, ver. 12, and is followed by Alford.—P. S.] But the word must be explained by Paul's use of language, especially by 1 Cor. xii. 4. The specific gift of Paul consists in his being the Apostle to the Gentiles; and without doubt this expression means not only that the Roman Church is to receive a general spiritual blessing from him, but shall also share in this special spiritual gift. [But such specific reference seems to be excluded by τι, nor was the apostolate of the Gentiles strictly communicable to a congregation. Hence I prefer, with Tholuck, Olshausen, and Philippi, to give χάρισμα a more general application: spiritual invigoration of the whole Christian life, πίστις, ἀγάπη, ἐλπίς, γνώσις, &c. So Hodge: "Any increase of knowledge, of grace, or of power."—P. S.] The adjective πνευματικόν, especially in connection with χάρισμα, can only denote a spiritual quality of the gift which proceeds from the communion of the divine Spirit. ["Springing from the Spirit of God, and imparted to the spirit of man;" Alford]. The following explanations are one-sided: Miraculous gifts (Bengel, &c.); gifts of the human spiritual life (Köllner, &c.). The τι, some, expresses not only the Apostle's modesty

(Meyer), but an acknowledgment that the Romans were already in the faith, together with an intimation that something was still wanting in them.—In order that ye may be strengthened (see chap. xvi. 25). This is the object of the charismatic communication. [Paul uses the passive στηριχθήναι, since he is simply the instrument through which God Himself strengthens and invigorates the spiritual life in man; comp. xvi. 25: τῷ ὁρωμένῳ ὑμῶν στηριχθῆναι, and 2 Thess. ii. 17.—P. S.]

Ver. 12. That is, that I may be comforted together with you, &c. The connection of the two objects serves to explain one as well as the other. The Apostle wishes that the Romans be strengthened by him (the choice of the passive is not merely an expression of modesty, but also of the information that the matter is not of human choice, but that the blessing must come from the Lord), not only in their faith in general, but also in their particular calling as Roman Christians in their central relation to the world. And the result therefrom will be, that the Apostle will be encouraged and aided in his universal apostleship. The addition, that is, &c., is therefore not a sanda adulatio (Erasmus), nor a safeguard against the appearance of presumption (Meyer),* but the statement of his whole purpose. This purpose is not to seek comfort and consolation among them, as the συμπαρακλήθηνας (ἀπαξ λεγόμενον in the New Testament) is explained by many, in harmony with the Peshito and Vulgate; but he will find Christian encouragement among them when they are strengthened (Meyer). Yet this is not only "in general," but with a view to his Western mission. The συμ does not include the readers (Fritzsche), but is related as a termination to the στηριχθήναι of the Romans. This can be seen by the following: By our common (reciprocal) faith, both yours and mine. This is a brief form of expression (Reiche, Van Hengel, and others, supply the ἐν ἀλλήλοις with an ἐνεργουμένης). He declares the fact that the communion of faith should serve for the reciprocal promotion of the faith. Fritzsche and Schott miss ἐμὲ, but this is implied in the words of the first person in ver. 11.

Ver. 13. But I would not have you ignorant. Well-known form of announcement, especially of something new and important (chap. xi. 25; 1 Cor. x. 1; 1 Thess. iv. 18).—That oftentimes I purposed, &c. Together with the Apostle's other impediments, it is of special consideration that, after every missionary journey, he found it necessary to return to Jerusalem in order to establish the unity of his new congregation with the mother church. Many delays were occasioned also by the necessary inspection and review of his organized churches, their internal disturbances, and the persecutions on the part of the Jews. The fact that he desired first to establish his mission in the East, he could not call an impediment. Meyer points to chap. xv. 22. [So does Alford.] But the Apostle seems to intimate here (according to vers. 20, 21) that he must prepare the church at Rome, as a church already existing, for his visit (by sending out his friends in advance). Meyer's remark is odd: "Therefore hindered neither by the devil (1 Thess. ii. 18), nor by the Holy Ghost (Acts xvi. 6);" for his general hinderance is specified in these terms.—

* [So also Wordsworth, who explains οὐδὲ δὲ ὁρῶν: "Think not that I am so presumptuous as to imagine that the benefit will be wholly yours."—P. S.]

That I might have some fruit. Harvest-fruit, as a laborer. The figure is frequent (Phil. i. 22) [John iv. 36; xv. 16; Col. i. 6]. The "fruit" is not the result of Paul's labor, or his reward, but the good works of the Roman Christians who have been planted to bring forth fruit to God. This fruit the Apostle expected to gather and to present to God Alford.—P. S.] The choice of the expression is evidently a new evidence of his delicacy and modesty. We cannot urge that σῶς is the antithesis of have (Meyer: gehabt hätte) and obtain (Köllner).—Among you also. The καί intensifies the comparison, in lively expression. The expression, ἐσθῆ, is used here to indicate definitely the Gentiles; first, because the Romans, as Romans, are Gentiles, from whom the remaining Gentiles are distinguished as such; then, because he has hitherto labored as the Apostle to the Gentiles. See the Exeg. Note on ver. 14. Schott: "There runs, from vers. 11–13, this thought: The Apostle Paul, in preparing himself for apostolic preaching in the midst of the Western Gentile world, regards it necessary to secure the Roman Church as a point of support and departure—so to speak, as a base of operations." While this opinion is correct enough as far as the definiteness of his aim is concerned, the Apostle was far from regarding Rome merely as the means for an end, without first having chiefly in view the purpose of edifying the Roman Church for its own sake.

Ver. 14. To Greeks and to Barbarians. What is the desire of his heart and his effort, is at the same time his calling and the duty of his office. His apostleship belongs to the whole Gentile world, and for this reason incidentally also to the Jews. Therefore, in consequence of the existing unity of Grecian and Roman culture, the Greeks and the Romans are combined under the term Greeks, in antithesis to the so-called Barbarians (Cicero, De Fin. ii. 15: Non solum Græcia et Italia, sed etiam omnis barbaria), just as the term wise comprehends Jews and Greeks (1 Cor. i. 26), and the unwise those barbarian nations who stood lowest in intellectual culture.* The antithesis of Greeks and Barbarians means, according to the original Greek usage, Greeks and non-Greeks—the latter as uncultivated Barbarians in a national sense. It is in this sense that the present passage is interpreted by Reiche and others. But at a time when Greek was written in Rome, and to Rome, the word undoubtedly indicated an historical antithesis of culture, according to the expression quoted from Cicero; and Paul, with his refined feeling, could hardly have chosen the word in the former restricted sense. (Ambrosiaster, and others.) Meyer objects that the Romans were nowhere enumerated as Hellenes. But this is certainly the case in ver. 16, where the Hellenes represents heathendom in general. Comp. chap. ii. 9, 10; x. 12; and the many antitheses of a similar character in the Acts of the Apostles, and in the other Pauline Epistles. Therefore Meyer's statement is unsatisfactory, that Paul would only express his Gentile-apostolic obligation in its universality, and that he does this in double merismatic form, as well according to nationality as according to the degree of culture. The sense certainly is, that he is pledged to all Gentiles. In this relation, he is ὀφειλέτης in the sense of indebtedness, which he assumed at his call. See 1 Cor. ix. 10.*

Ver. 15. So, as far as lies in me, I am ready. So far as it depends on him, he is not only willing, but determined; his inclination corresponds to his indebtedness (πρόθυμον = προθυμία). τὸ κατ' ἐμὲ is variously explained. 1. Οὕτως, τὸ κατ' ἐμὲ: πρόθυμον (sc. προθυμία ἔστι). 2. Οὕτως τὸ (κατ' ἐμὲ) πρόθυμον. 3. Οὕτως τὸ κατ' ἐμὲ πρόθυμον (= τὸ πρόθυμόν μου). 4. Οὕτως: τὸ κατ' ἐμὲ πρόθυμον. De Wette and also Meyer [in the third edition of 1859, but not in the fourth. —P. S.] are for the first: As far as I am concerned, there is readiness. [This explanation connects τὸ with κατ' ἐμὲ, and takes πρόθυμον as the predicate and a substantive = προθυμία. —P. S.] Reiche [Calvin, Philippi, Van Hengel, and Meyer, in the fourth edition of 1866, where he gives up his former view. —P. S.] are for the second: And so am I —as far as lies in me—ready. Fritzsche is for the third: My readiness, or desire, is. [κατ' ἐμὲ in this case is taken as a mere periphrase for ἐμοῦ, but it has an emphasis, and expresses Paul's sense of dependence on a higher will. —P. S.] Tholuck is for the fourth: So, for my part, I am ready. [Tholuck, though not very decidedly, follows Beza (Quidquid in me situm est, id promptum est), Grotius, Bengel, and Bücker, and takes τὸ κατ' ἐμὲ as the subject of the sentence = ἐγὼ, and πρόθυμον as an adjective and as the predicate: I am ready. But Meyer objects that τὸ κατ' ἐμὲ is never used as a periphrase for the personal pronoun; τὰ ὑμῶν for ὑμεῖς, and τὰ ἐμὰ for ἐγὼ not being parallel. —P. S.] I think the explanation of Reiche the correct one.† For further particulars, see De Wette, Tholuck, and Meyer. Theodore Schott explains the οὕτως, under such circumstances, and translates thus: Under such circumstances it is my present inclination. But Paul has not at all spoken of circumstances. He asserts that οὕτως, used absolutely, never means itaque, but always "under this condition, these circumstances." But as the circumstances may be attending, so they may be causative; comp. Rom. v. 12.—To you also who are in Rome. Schott thinks that by these words are meant, not the Christians in Rome, but the Gentile inhabitants of Rome! The natural conclusion from this view would be, that his Epistle also must have been designed for the Gentiles in Rome. Certainly he had in view from the start, besides the Christians, those Gentiles also who were yet to be converted [τοῖς ἐν Ῥώμῃ is emphatically added, since Rome, the "caput et theatrum orbis terrarum," could least of all be excluded from that general apostolic commission. Bengel and Meyer.—P. S.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The point of connection (ver. 8). Every Pauline Epistle has its definite point of connection. So, too, has every apostolic sermon of Peter, Paul, and John. And this is as much a vital law for proper Christian preaching, as for missions. See the connecting point in Acts xvii. The doxological character of this section. Without gratitude for what is given, there is no real continuance, still less any real progress. Gratitude must also be sanctified by working in Christ.

2. Asseverations, prayers, proofs of the Apostle's prayer. See the Exeg. Notes.

3. The difference between the longing of the Apostle for Rome, and the longing of the modern world for Rome. If the Pauline Christianity of the Evangelical Church were not so much paralyzed by the indifference of humanitarianism, by the hatred and ignorance of rationalism, and by the morbid literalism of confessionalism and sectarianism, it would be able to wield the weapons of the Spirit as heroically against mediæval Papal Rome—which is now besieged at so many points—as Paul, the poor tent-maker, combatted pagan, imperial Rome. Still, the gospel of God will triumph in the end.

4. The great missionary thought of the Apostle (vera. 11, 12). See the Exeg. Notes. Ver. 12: The Popes do not write thus to the Romans.

5. The impediments (ver. 13). Although the Apostle knew well that on the absolute height of faith all impediments are only means of advancement for believers (Rom. viii. 28), he yet speaks of impediments with a truly human feeling. But each of these impediments marks a point where he surrenders to God his desire to pass beyond those sacred limits through which an enthusiast would have violently broken.

6. How Paul subsequently attained the object of his wishes, though not according to human purposes, but according to the counsel of God; first as a prisoner, and last as a martyr.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

How the Apostle introduces himself to the Church at Rome: 1. As remembering it in prayer (vera. 8-10); 2. as desiring its personal acquaintance (vera. 11, 12); 3. as previously prevented from visiting it and fulfilling his obligation (vera. 13-15).—The truly Christian manner of introducing one's self to strange people.—Praise without flattery (ver. 8).—Under what circumstances can we call on God to witness? 1. When we are conscious that we serve Him; 2. when the matter in hand is sacred (ver. 9).—We cannot always do what we would (vera. 11-13).—For what purpose should Christian friends visit each other? 1. To give; 2. to receive (vera. 11, 12).—Paul a debtor to the Greeks and to the Barbarians, to the wise and the unwise: 1. In what did his obligation consist? 2. when did he acknowledge it? 3. how did he desire to discharge it?

* [We mention, as an exegetical curiosity, that Dr. Wordsworth finds in this passage proof of the universal gift of language for preaching the gospel: "How could St. Paul be said to owe the debt of the gospel to all the world, if he had not the means of paying it? And how could he pay it, without the coinage of intelligible words?" It would be hard for Dr. Wordsworth to prove that Paul preached in the Chinese, the Sanscrit, the Teutonic, and Celtic languages, to nations who understood no other, and whom he never visited. From Acts xiv. 11, 14, it would seem that he did not understand the popular language of Lycaonia. The knowledge of Greek and Hebrew was sufficient for his apostolic mission within the limits of the whole Roman empire.—P. S.]

STARKE: We have greater occasion to thank God for spiritual than for temporal blessings (ver. 8).—We must not always be brief in prayer, but we must continue until the heart becomes warmed (ver. 10).—Complete sovereignty over auditors does not belong to any teacher or preacher (ver. 13).—QUEST: Thankfulness is one of the most excellent, but one of the most neglected duties. Preachers must supply this deficiency on the part of their flocks (ver. 8).—The oath may be allowed, if God's honor requires it (ver. 9).—CRAMER: The presence and living voice of teachers can accomplish more than the mere reading of their writings. Therefore Christians should not think that they have done enough, when they read God's word in sermons at home; but, whenever they can, they should hear their instructors personally, and industriously attend public worship (ver. 11).—OSIANDRI Bibl.: We should do no less than our calling directs; but we should not include therein any thing that does not belong to it, lest we trespass on the office of another (ver. 15).

[BURKITT: From the Apostle's longing to see the Romans, learn: 1. The Fundamental Theme.

CHAP. I. 16, 17.

16 For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ¹ [of Christ]: for it is the power of God [God's power] unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the 17 Jew first,² and also to the Greek. For therein is the righteousness of God [God's righteousness] revealed from faith to faith: as it is written, The just [The righteous] shall live by [of] faith (Hab. ii. 4).³

TEXTUAL.

¹ Ver. 16.—The Codd. A. B. C. D., &c., read τὸ εὐαγγέλιον without the addition of τοῦ Χριστοῦ. (Codd. Sin. likewise omits τοῦ Χριστοῦ, as do nearly all the critical editors, Mill, Bengel, Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford, Wordsworth, &c. The words are found in the Complutensian Text and in Elzevir, and are defended by Weiststein and Matthæi.—P. 8.)

* Ver. 17.—The παῖς is left out by Codd. B. and G. [not A., as Lange has it]; probably because it had an offensive appearance. [MSS. N. A. C. D. K. L. have it. Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, and others retain it. Lachmann puts it in brackets.—P. S.]

* Ver. 17.—[This is a free translation of the Hebrew (Hab. ii. 4): צַדִּיק בְּאֵמָנָתוֹ יִחְיֶה, lit., the righteous shall live in (by) his faithfulness. The Masoretic accentuation, however, connects the first two words: The righteous in his faith, shall live. The Hebrew צַדִּיק בְּאֵמָנָתוֹ and the Christian πίστις both rest on the fundamental idea of trust in God. Paul follows in his rendering the Septuagint, but properly omits the πῶς which these insert: ὁ δίκαιος μὴ ἐκ πίστεως ὀφείλει. Vulgate: justus in fide sui vivet. Most commentators connect ἐκ πίστεως with the verb ζήσεται. But Dr. Lange, with Beza and Meyer, connects ἐκ πίστεως with ὁ δίκαιος, and translates: He that is righteous by faith, shall live. See the Exeg. Notes.—P. S.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

THIRD SECTION.—The fundamental theme. The joy of the Apostle to proclaim the gospel of Christ, since it is a power of God for Jews and Gentiles as a revelation of the righteousness of God—a righteousness by and for the faith.

Ver. 16. For I am not ashamed [not even in the metropolis of the heathen world.—P. S.]. Evidently, this general declaration refers not merely to ver. 15, but also to ver. 14. There could be no difficulty to the Apostle to preach to the believers in Rome; but it was difficult to preach to the whole Gentile world, especially to its wise men, who were so much inclined to despise the gospel as foolishness. And finally, it was particularly difficult to preach to the Gentiles in the proud metropolis of Rome, the central seat of the culture and pride of the ancient world. It is plain from ver. 15, you that are at Rome, that he would not confine himself to the congregation of Christians in Rome. The designation of his disposition is exact in relation to that pride of wisdom which everywhere opposed him, as he had experienced particularly in Athens and Corinth. He is not afraid of the threats of the world; he does not avoid the offence of the Jews; nor is he ashamed in view of the contempt of the Greeks and of the wise men. And this is not only expressive of his real joy in general, but of his Christian enthusiasm, by which he could glory in the cross of Christ (Rom. v. 2; Gal. vi. 14). [I am not ashamed, is an answer, by anticipation, to an objection which was readily suggested by the word Roma, with all its associations of idolatry, worldly power, pride, pomp, corruption, decay, and approaching persecution of Christians. Tacitus, the heathen historian, says of Rome, that there cuncta undique atrociora aut pudenda confluent celebranturque (Annal. xv. 44). See Chrysostom, Alford, Wordsworth, Hodge in loc. Meyer explains the term more with reference to the past experiences of Paul in other heathen cities, as Athens, Corinth, Ephesus, and to the general character of the religion of the cross (1 Cor. i. 18). It is true that human nature, as such, in its carnal pride, is apt to be ashamed of the gospel. But this carnal pride culminated at the time in Rome, and found a fit expression in the blasphemous worship of the emperors as present deities. That Paul has special reference to Rome, is also evident from his definition of the gospel as a power of God, which puts to shame the world-power of Rome (δύναμις, strength). Dealing with the Greeks, who excelled in wisdom, he defines the gospel to be the wisdom of God, which turns the wisdom of this world into folly. When afterwards a prisoner in Rome, Paul was not ashamed of his bonds (2 Tim. i. 12), in which he felt more free, mighty, and happy than the emperor on the throne.—P. S.]

Of the gospel of Christ. Here, also, we cannot separate the concrete unity of the gospel and its promulgation.

For it is a power of God.* The for announces the reason: it is the highest manifestation of the power of God—the highest manifestation of the compassionate love and grace of God; it is the blessing of salvation for faith throughout the world. The power of God. This cannot apply to the preaching of the gospel alone, but to the objective gospel itself, which combines with evangelization for complete operation. The question whether there is a metonymy † here (see Tholuck), becomes important only when that unity is dissolved. The gospel, in the objective sense, implies: 1. The revelation of God in Christ; 2. redemption by Christ; 3. the victory, the glory, and the kingdom of Christ; 4. the presentation of this salvation through the medium of the Church in word and sacrament, under the operation of the Holy Spirit. ‡

Unto salvation. Both the negative and positive sides of the idea of the σωτηρία must be elucidated, the former denoting redemption, the latter adoption. The operation of σωτηρία reaches from the depths of hell to heaven. When man is truly delivered, he is always delivered from the depths of hell, and raised to the heights of heaven; because he is saved from the condemnation of his conscience, and from the judgment of wrath, and is made a participant of salvation through the righteousness of faith which leads to righteousness of life. The expression, blessedness, denotes the highest effect and the highest aim of the σωτηρία. Comp. Acts iv. 12; xiii. 26; Rom. x. 1. The opposite is ἀπώλεια, θάνατος, and similar terms.

To every one that believeth. De Wette: "The πᾶσι is opposed to Jewish particularism, and the πιστεύοντι to Jewish legalism." § The highest operation of God's power is not at all a fatalistic or mechanical operation; it is a personal dealing of love, and presupposes personal relations. For

† [i. e., here vis per instrumentum effectus pro instrumento, as if we say, the knife cuts, while it is the hand of man that cuts with the knife. So it is the Holy Spirit that operates through the gospel as the instrumentality.—P. S.]

‡ [δύναμις θεοῦ is not to be resolved into divine power (Jowett), but the gospel is a power in and through which God Himself works efficaciously, i. e., so as to save the sinner by rousing him to repentance, faith, and obedience. θεοῦ is gen. auctoris or rather possessivus. Comp. 1 Cor. i. 18. Alford explains: "The bare substantive δύναμις here (and 1 Cor. i. 24) carries a superlative sense: the highest and holiest vehicle of the divine power, the δύναμις κατ' ἐξουσίαν." Umbreit remarks that the law is never called God's power, but a light or teaching, in which man must walk.—P. S.]

§ [Or rather: every one, implies the universality; that believeth, the subjective condition, of the gospel salvation; faith being the apprehending and appropriating organ. Paul says not: to every one who is circumcised, or baptized, or obeys the law, but, to every one that believeth. Without faith, sacraments and good works avail nothing. But true saving faith is of course a living faith, including knowledge of the truth, assent to the truth, and trust or confidence in Christ; it submits to all the ordinances of Christ and necessarily produces good works.—P. S.]

as it cannot be said, on the one hand, that faith completes objective salvation, so we cannot say, on the other, that it is a compulsory operation of salvation. It is the condition of the efficacy of salvation (John iii. 16, &c.; see Gen. xv.), the causa apprehendens.

To the Jew first. This priority is economical, as it rests upon the Old Testament revelation of God, and the faith of Abraham (chap. iv. 9); and as such it is: 1. The genetic priority. "Salvation is of the Jews" [John iv. 22]. 2. The historical priority (Chrysostom, and others). 3. A legal priority (as to form) of the nearest claim to the gospel in accordance with the direction given to the apostles, Acts i. 8 (Calov, De Wette, Tholuck). But notwithstanding all this, the Jew had no real right to the gospel, since salvation, 1. is not a product of Judaism, but of free grace; 2. faith is older than Judaism (chap. iv.); 3. faith itself is the reality and substance of which Judaism was only the symbol.*

And also to the Greek. The Ἕλλην is here the representative of all who are not Jews. [Jew and Greek here refer not to the national distinction, as Greek and Barbarian, ver. 14, but to the religious antagonism of the world at the time, so that Greek is equivalent to Gentile. Ἕλλ. κ. βαρβ. is the Greek; Ἰουδ. κ. Ἕλλ. the Jewish, designation of all mankind; comp. Acts xiv. 1; 1 Cor. x. 32.—P. S.]

Ver. 17. For therein is the righteousness of God. Proof of the previous proposition. The δικαίωμα θεοῦ εἰς σωτηρίαν is ἀποκάλυψις of the δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ, &c.

[PRELIMINARY PHILOLOGICAL REMARKS ON ΔΙΚΑΙΟΣΥΝΗ AND THE COGNATE TERMS.—These are of primary importance in Paul's Epistles, especially the Romans and Galatians. Their root, according to Aristotle (Eth. Nic. v. 2), is δίκη = twofold; hence δικάω, to divide into two equal parts, to judge; δικαστής, judge, dispenser of justice. Others derive them from δίκη (the daughter of Zeus and Themis), custom, right, judgment. At all events, the fundamental idea of δικαιοσύνη is an even relation between two or more parts where each has its due, or conformity to law and custom, a normal moral condition. According to Homer, he is δικαιοτάτος who best fulfils his duties to God and men. Plato develops the idea of righteousness in his Politeia, and identifies it with moral goodness. In the Bible, the will of God, as expressed in the written law, and more fully in the perfect life of Christ, is the standard both of morals and religion, which are always viewed as essentially connected. God Himself is righteous—i. e., absolutely perfect in Himself, and in all His dealings with His creatures, and requires man to aim at this perfection (Matt. v. 48). Accordingly, we may define the several terms (referring to the dictionaries and concordances for passages) as follows:

δικαίος, צַדִּיק, conform to the law, inwardly as well as outwardly, holy, perfect. It is used in the absolute sense of God, in a relative sense of man, also of things. Du Cange: "Δικαίος dicitur vel de re vel de persona, in qua nec abundat aliquid nec deficit, quæ muneri suo par est, numeris suis abesse ita."

δικαιοσύνη, צְדָקָה, justitia, the normal moral and religious condition. If used of man, it means conformity to the holy will and law of God, godliness, or true piety toward God, and virtue toward man. If used of God, it is one of His moral attributes, essentially identical with His holiness and goodness, as manifested in His dealing with His creatures, especially with men.

δικαίω (λογίζω εἰς δικαιοσύνην), צַדִּיק, justify, to put right with the law, i. e., to declare or pronounce one righteous, and to treat him accordingly. Etymologically, the word ought to mean, to make just (since the verbs in ω, derived from adjectives of the second declension, signify, to make a person or thing what the primitive denotes, as τιπλόω, δουλόω, ὀρθόω, φανερόω, τελειόω = τιπλόν, &c., ποιεῖν). But in Hebrew and Hellenistic, and often also in classical usage, it has a forensic sense, to which, however, when used of God, the objective state of things, either preceding or succeeding, must correspond, for God's judgment can never err, and His declaration is always effective. More of this, ad ii. 13 and iii. 21-31. Now for the particular explanation of δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ in our passage.

δικαίωσις (λογισμός τῆς δικαιοσύνης) justification, the act of putting a man right with the law or into the state of δικαιοσύνη.

δικαίωμα, a righteous decree, judgment, ordinance.—P. S.]

In view of the widely divergent explanations, it is necessary to make close distinctions. The righteousness of God, understood absolutely in its complete New Testament revelation, or ἀποκάλυψις, cannot apply immediately to righteousness before God (ἐνώπιον τοῦ θεοῦ), in which case the genitive is taken objectively in a wider relation (thus Luther, Fritzsche, Baur, Philippi). For this righteousness of faith presupposes justification. Nor can the word of itself denote the act of justification, even if we connect with it the result, the righteousness of faith, the genitive being taken in this case subjectively* in this sense: "the rightness which proceeds from God, the right relation in which man is placed by a judicial act of God" (Meyer, after Chrysostom, Bengel, De Wette, and others).† For the justification presupposes the atonement (chap. iii. 25), and the atonement is founded on the exercise of God's righteousness. To this exercise the Apostle evidently refers in chap. iii. 25, 26, and he therefore does it here also in the theme, which, from its very nature, must encompass the whole idea of the Epistle. Absolute righteousness, like absolute grace and truth, is first revealed in Christianity. It is the righteousness which not only institutes the law of the letter, and requires righteousness in man, and, in its character of judge, pronounces sentence

* [Or as genitive of origin and procession. See Meyer.

—P. S.]

† [So also Alford: "God's righteousness—not His attribute of righteousness, 'the righteousness of God,' but righteousness flowing from and acceptable to Him." He then subjoins De Wette's note. Hodge: "The righteousness which God gives, and which He approves." He also quotes the remark of De Wette: "All interpretations which overlook the idea of imputation, as is done in the explanations given by the Romanists, and also in that of Grotius, are false." M. Stuart confounds δικαιοσύνη with δικαιώσις, and explains: "δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ is the justification which God bestows, or the justification of which God is the author."—P. S.]

* Alford: "Not that the Jew had any preference under the gospel; only he inherits and has a precedence." Wordsworth: "First, in having a prior claim, as the covenanted people of God: first, therefore, in the season of its offer, but not in the condition of its recipients after its acceptance." Dr. Hodge refers πρῶτον merely to the priority in time, which is not sufficient.—P. S.] and kills, but which at last reveals itself in union with love, or as grace in the form of righteousness, and produces righteousness in man. It accomplishes all this: 1. As law-giving—that is, establishing the right—it institutes the law of the Spirit; that is, it reveals it in the life of Christ as the personal power of the atonement. 2. In the power and suffering of this personal righteousness, it satisfies the demands of the righteousness of the law, and thus changes the symbolical δικαιοσύνη into a real one. The atonement. 3. It communicates to believers the work and efficacy of Christ's righteousness, by the spirit of His righteousness, as a gift of grace and principle of the new life in creative, operative justification.

Or briefly: The righteousness of God is the self-communication of the righteousness which proceeds from God, which becomes personal righteousness in the person of Christ, which, in His passion as propitiation, satisfies the righteousness of the law (in harmony with the requirement of conscience), and, by the act of justification, applies the atonement to the believer for the sanctification of his life.

As the δόξα, which avails before God, can be none other than the δόξα, which proceeds from God, and became personal in Christ, so can the righteousness which avails before God be none other than a righteousness which comes from God. It is the δικαιοσύνη ἐκ Θεοῦ, in opposition to the δικ. ἡ ἐμὴ, Phil. iii. 9; and therefore the δικαιοσύνη ἐνώπιον Θεοῦ, Rom. iii. 21, in opposition to the δικαιοσύνη ἐκ τοῦ νόμου, chap. x. 5. Therefore it is God's righteousness also in this sense, that man can never make out of it a righteousness of his own, though the Divine justification becomes the principle of his new life. Tholuck likewise allows a combination of the objective and subjective meanings, but decidedly rejects the interpretation of δικαιοσύνη, as an attribute of God, which he considers incompatible with the prophetic passage adduced. But this quotation does not explain righteousness, but faith. The statement of Tholuck, that Hofmann (Schriftbeweis, i. 625 f.) describes the δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ as an attribute of God, is not exact; he declares it only as a righteousness existing on the part of God.* We go so far as to understand by righteousness here a synthesis of righteousness and of love—a synthesis which, as grace according to its different relations under the supremacy of righteousness, and as the grace that establishes the new and the absolute right of the Spirit, is called righteousness, but which, under the supremacy of love, as the fountain of the new life, is called love. This impartial righteousness is revealed to believers as grace, and to unbelievers as wrath. When Tholuck says that δικ. is not the righteousness of God in fulfilment of the promises (Ambrose), nor retributive justice (Origen), nor the essential righteousness which belongs to God (as Osiander once taught, and recently Hofmann), nor the goodness of God (Morus), nor impartiality toward Jews and Gentiles (Semler), he has collected into one all the disjecta membra of the central idea, that the δικαιοσύνη (from δίκη, a relation between two, according to the Aristotelian derivation of the word), establishes, maintains, and restores the relation between the personal God and the personal world according to their respective character (for the protection of personality). The omission of the article does not justify us in reading here, a righteousness of God; being inseparably connected with Θεοῦ, it means rather the proper righteousness of God (see Winer's Gramm.).*

[Upon the whole, I agree with this interpretation. The majority of evangelical commentators restrict the δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ to God's justifying righteousness; some even ungrammatically identify it with justification (δικαίωσις), or God's "method of justification." The fundamental idea of the Epistle as set forth in the theme, every expression used in vers. 16 and 17, and the contrast presented in ver. 18, point to a more comprehensive meaning, answering to the definition of the gospel as "the power of God unto salvation," full and final, from "all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." This implies a righteousness impartable as well as imputable, or sanctifying as well as justifying—a righteousness inherent in God, and manifested in Christ, which, by a living union with Christ, is to become the personal property and higher nature of the believer, so that, at the final judgment, no trace of unrighteousness will remain. Wordsworth (an Anglican) and Forbes (a Scotch Presbyterian LL.D.) independently arrive substantially at the same view with Lange. Wordsworth in loco says: "This significant phrase, the righteousness of God, is not to be lowered, weakened, and impaired, so as to mean only the method of justification by which God acquits and justifies mankind. But it is the very righteousness of God Himself, which is both imputed and imparted to men in Jesus Christ 'the Righteous' (John ii. 1), who is 'the Lord our righteousness' (Jer. xxiii. 6; xxxiii. 16), and who, being God from everlasting, and having also taken the nature of man, is made righteousness to us (1 Cor. i. 30), and does effectually, by His incarnation, and by our incorporation into Him, justify us believing on Him, and making Him ours by faith, so that we may not only be acquitted by God, but may become the righteousness of God in Him (2 Cor. v. 21)." Forbes, in a long and able dissertation (Anal. Com., p. 102 ff.), combines here the three Scripture meanings of δικαιοσύνη, when used of God, viz.: "1. God's retributive righteousness or justice (now manifested in God's condemnation of sin, shown in giving His Son to die for man's sin on the cross—to induce thereby the believer to concur cordially in its condemnation in himself); 2. God's justifying righteousness (now manifested in Christ's exhibiting in the character of man a perfect righteousness—imputable to and appropriable by the believer, for his pardon and acceptance with God); 3. God's sanctifying righteousness (also manifested in Christ as 'the Lord our righteousness,' changing the believer's heart the moment he is united by faith to Christ, and progressively mortifying within him all sin, and imparting eventually to him universal righteousness—appropriable in like manner through faith by the believer)." For further information, comp. the Exeg

* [Hofmann says, l. c., p. 626: "Einerseits bezeichnet δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ eine Gerechtigkeit, welche Gottes ist; andererseits muss nach dem Zusammenhange etwas gemeint sein, das uns zu Theil wird." He takes the word to mean, not an attribute of God, but a righteousness which God has established, and which constitutes the subject of the gospel preaching, and makes it a power of God unto salvation to every believer. Hence the apostolic office is called ἡ διακονία τῆς δικαιοσύνης, in opposition to the διακονία τῆς κατακρίσεως, 2 Cor. iii. 9.—F. S.]

Is revealed [ἀποκαλύπτται is being revealed; the present tense marks the continuous, progressive revelation of righteousness.—P. S.]. The ἀποκαλύπτται is distinguished from the φανεροῦν by being God's revelation, which proceeds from God, and addresses itself to the inward spiritual world (Gal. i. 16); while the φανεροῦν denotes the same revelation as manifested in the outward life from the inward spiritual world (John ii. 11). The revelation of wrath is also an ἀποκάλυψις (ver. 18), although the wrath is revealed in external manifestation; for it is only by the conscience, that the facts connected therewith are first recognized as the phenomena of wrath, and it is only in the light of the New Testament truth that they are recognized completely. ἐν αὐτῷ. The gospel is the medium.

From faith to faith. [It is connected with the verb ἀποκαλύπτται by De Wette, Meyer, Tholuck (ed. 5), Alford; with the noun δικαιοσύνη (sc. οὐσία or γινόμενη) by Bengel, Philippi, Hodge, Forbes. The former agrees better with the position of the words, and with εἰς πίστιν, the latter with ἐκ πίστεως, comp. Rom. ix. 30; x. 6.—P. S.] The idea of faith appears here in accordance with the comprehensive idea of righteousness, and therefore as a hearty, trustful self-surrender (to rest and lean upon, נִשְׁעָנָה), which includes both knowledge and belief, assent and surrender, appropriation and application. [Faith is neither the efficient cause nor the objective ground of justification, but the instrumental cause and subjective condition; as eating is the condition of nourishment. As the nourishing power is in the food, which, however, must be received and digested before it can be of any use, so the saving power is in Christ's person and work, but becomes personally available, and is made our own, only by the appropriating organ of faith. This appropriation and assimilation must be continually renewed; hence ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν.—P. S.] The distinction between from faith and to faith is variously explained. Origen refers it to Old Testament and New Testament faith.† Eusebius [Olshausen, De Wette, Alford, Philippi]: ἀπὸ πίστεως εἰς πιστεύοντα [for the believer; comp. iii. 22, where the δικ. θεοῦ is said to be εἰς πάντας τοὺς πιστεύοντας.—P. S.]. Theophylact and others: For the promotion of faith. Luther: From weak to strong faith.* Barmgarten-Crusius: From faith as conviction to faith as sentiment. De Wette: 1. Faith as conditional; 2. faith as receptive. For other meanings, see Tholuck (also the view of Zwingli, that the second πίστις means the faithfulness of God). [Meyer: The revelation of righteousness proceeds from faith and aims at faith, ut fides habeatur (similarly Fritzsche, Tholuck). Bengel and Hodge connect ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν with δικαιοσύνη, and take it as intensive, like the phrase, "death unto death," "life unto life," so as to mean fidem meram, entirely of faith, without any works. Ewald understands ἐκ πίστεως of Divine faith (?), εἰς πίστιν of human faith, which must meet the former.—P. S.] It may be asked, if the key to the passage may not be sought in chap. iii. 22, since the second half of that chapter is in general a commentary on this passage. Comp. Heb. xii. 2: "The author and finisher of our faith." At all events, the Apostle acknowledges, like the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the difference between degree of faith which receives the revelation prophetically and apostolically, in order to proclaim it, and a more general degree of faith, which, through the agency of preaching, extends into the world. Comp. Heb. xi. 1 f.

As it is written. The same quotation from Hab. ii. 4 is found in Gal. iii. 11 and Heb. x. 38. The Apostle will here (as in ver. 2 and chaps. iv. and x.) prove the harmony of the gospel with the Old Testament. The passage in the Prophet Habakkuk declares: The just shall live by his confidence, his faith (Is. xxviii. 16). Therefore the most of the elder expositors, and some of the recent ones (Philippi, and others), thus explained the maxim of the Apostle: The just shall live by his faith. But according to Beza, Meyer [Hodge], and others, the Apostle's expression must be construed thus: The man who is justified by faith, shall live. Meyer properly says: Paul had a good reason to put this meaning into the prophetic expression: since the just man, if he would live by faith, must have been justified by faith. We read in Habakkuk two concrete definitions: "Behold, puffed up [נִפְחָזָה], not upright is his soul [his life] within him [נִפְחָזָה בְּיָדָיו]. But the just man, he shall live by his faith." That is, as the puffed-up soul is puffed up because it is not upright, and has no sound life, so is it the mark of the just man that he acquires his life by faith. The additional profundity which the New Testament gives to this Old Testament expression, does therefore not really change even the expression, much less the sense. [I prefer the connection of ἐκ πίστεως with ζήσεται, which is more agreeable to the Hebrew (although the other is favored by the Masoretic accentuation), and this is adopted also by Tholuck,

* [This is only a modification of the preceding explanation, and is substantially held also by Erasmus, Melancthon, Calvin, Beza, Wordsworth, Forbes. The sense is: Beginning and ending with faith, from one degree of faith to another; faith is a vital principle and constant growth, receiving grace for grace, going from strength to strength, till it is transformed from glory to glory. Development is the law of spiritual as well as physical life; but in all the stages of growth of Christian life, the vital principle is the same; hence ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν, from or out of faith as the root, unto faith as the blossom and fruit; faith, as Bengel says, the prora et puppis, the fore-deck and hind-deck of a ship.—i. e., all in all. Comp. ἀπὸ δόξης εἰς δόξαν, "from glory to glory," 2 Cor. iii. 18, and "from strength to strength," Ps. lxxiv. 7.—P. S.]

* [Lipsius says, p. 22, without proof: "The general Greek significance of the word δικαιοσύνη remains justum favore, and must therefore have the preference before justum habere." To this Dr. Liebnier, and Wieseler, on Gal. ii. 16, p. 179, justly object. Lipsius admits, however, that δικαιοσύνη in Paul means justum habere, only not always, nor exclusively.—P. S.]

† [So also Chrysostom and Theodoret. A modification of this view is Tertullian's: Ex Ade legis in Ad — evangelii.—P. S.]

De Wette, Philippi, Delitzsch (ad Hab. ii. 4), Ewald, Forster. See Textual Note * above. The sense, however, is not essentially altered. The emphasis lies, at all events, on πίστις, which is, of course, living faith, ζήσους, is to be taken in the full sense of the ζήσους αἰώνιος, as revealed in Christ. The Apostle, as Delitzsch remarks, puts no forced meaning into the words of the prophet, but simply places them into the light of the New Testament. Habakkuk ends where Paul begins.—P. S.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The fundamental theme. The joyfulness of the Apostle in anticipation of preaching the gospel without shame even in Rome, the central seat of the conceit of human wisdom. The source of this cheerfulness: The gospel is the power of God, &c. The heroic spirit of faith, philanthropy, and hope, elevates him above all hesitation. But how far is the gospel a power of God? See ver. 17, and the Exeg. Notes thereon. Especially on the righteousness of God, and the two fundamental forms of faith (the faith which has established preaching, and the faith which is established by preaching).

[2. St. Bernard: Justus (a fide sua vivit, utique si vivat et ipsa: aliter quomodo vitam dabit, si ipsa sit mortua (The just man shall live by his faith, if his faith itself live; otherwise how shall that which is itself death, give life?).—P. S.]

[3. "If the subject of the Epistle is to be stated in few words, these should be chosen: τὸ ἐπαγγελίον, δι' αὐτοῦ Θεοῦ εἰς σωτηρίαν παντὶ τῷ πιστεύοντι. This expresses it better than merely 'justification by faith,' which is, in fact, only a subordinate part of the great theme—only the condition necessitated by man's sinfulness for his entering the state of salvation: whereas the argument extends beyond this, to the death unto sin and life unto God and carrying forward of the sanctifying work of the Spirit, from its first fruits even to its completion;" Alford. Forbes (Anat. Com., p. vii.) likewise denies that justification by faith, especially if presented in a bare, forensic form, is the leading doctrine of the Epistle. "The grand truth here enunciated is the warm, living reality of a personal union with CHRIST (contrasted with the previous union with Adam), by which, in place of the sin unto death communicated by the first head of humanity, Christ's righteousness and life are communicated to the believer, and become the inward quickening mover of every thought, feeling, and action. Thus is the distinction preserved, yet the indissoluble connection clearly evinced, between justification and sanctification, as being but two aspects of one and the same union of the believer with CHRIST—just as the dying branch ingrafted into the living vine is then only reckoned, and may justly be declared to be, a sound, living branch, when the union has taken place—because the assurance is then given of its being made so finally and fully, the vital juices of the vine having already begun to circulate within it."—P. S.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Whence is it that many are ashamed of the gospel of Christ? Either, 1. They do not know it fully; or, 2. If they know it, they have not the courage to confess it.—Why do we not need to be ashamed of the gospel of Christ? Because, 1. It is of Divine origin; 2. of Divine import; 3. of Divine operation.—He who is ashamed of the gospel, is also ashamed of the Lord. True shame comes from God, false shame from the devil. Shame and shame.—Christianity the universal religion.—The shades of the law vanish; the stars of Greece grow pale at the rising sun of the gospel.—The righteousness which God approves is the chief import of the gospel.—The fundamental thought of the Epistle to the Romans is also the fundamental thought of the Reformation.

LUTHER: The power of God is such a force as to elevate man from sin to righteousness, from death to life, from hell to heaven, from the kingdom of the devil to the kingdom of God; and gives him eternal salvation.

STARKE: As the gospel is a power of God, he denies it who constantly appeals to his weakness, and presents it in opposition to the gospel.—Though the gospel is the power of God, no one will be compelled to be saved, but every one possesses his own freedom to resist, and is therefore responsible.—

HEDINGER: Who would be ashamed of medicine when he is sick? or of light when he is blind, and would like to see? Wo to those who are ashamed of the words and office of Christ!

LANGKE: Many a person is not ashamed of the gospel of Christ; but yet, if he is ashamed to follow Christ, he is in reality ashamed of the gospel itself in its true application and appropriation.—Faith is like a bucket, by which we draw grace for grace from that fulness of Jesus which contains the gospel.

SPENER: Faith in Christ, confidence in the grace of God in Christ, is the beginning of our salvation, and will remain its instrument to the end. Therefore, faith must always endure and increase, and will thus grow from faith to faith—from one degree of light and power to another.

BENGEL: No one need be ashamed of what is mighty and Divine (ver. 16).

GERLACH: There is something in the gospel of which the natural man is ashamed; therefore the Apostle confesses that this shame is conquered in his own case.—The effective power of God is not merely in the gospel, but it is the gospel itself. It is not merely a strength, from God, but it is His own strength. He works in and through the gospel.

LISCO: The gospel is a power of God; that is, a power in which He operates Himself. Therefore it is a holy, mighty, creative force, capable of saving all who believe it. On our part, faith is the condition that we must fulfil, the way to which we must conform, in order to obtain real salvation and deliverance from temporal and eternal destruction by the gospel.

HEUBNER: The danger of being ashamed of the gospel is easily incurred. Yet it is a shame which is very reprehensible; for, 1. It is a miserable weakness and want of principle to be ashamed of what is best; 2. It is the grossest contempt of God to place the world higher and fear it more than Him; and, 3. It is the meanest ingratitude toward God.

FR. A. WOLFF: The more the world boasts of its unbelief, the less should true Christians be ashamed of their faith. This is required: 1. For the honor of the truth; 2. the conversion of unbelievers; 3. the salvation of our own souls.

J. P. LANGE: How sad the contrast between the shame of Christians and the boldness and shamelessness of the world.—Who should be ashamed of the gospel? i. e., 1. Of God's power and honor; 2. of the deliverance of men for their final salvation; 3. of the grand task of uniting Jews and Greeks (the law and culture) into a higher life.—The twofold confirmatory power of the gospel: 1. The first for: its Divine operation (ver. 16); 2. the second for: its Divine import (ver. 17).—The threefold for vers. 16, 17), or the three grounds of joyous, evangelizing activity.—The righteousness of faith: 1. Very old (Habakkuk); 2. eternally new (Paul, Luther); 3. always confirmed by true life.

[BURKITT: The power of the gospel is not from the preachers of the gospel; therefore do not idolize them. But they are God's instruments, and their words are the organ of the Spirit's power; therefore do not think meanly of them.—A justified man lives a more holy, useful, and excellent life than all others; but the life that a justified man lives is always one of faith.—HENRY (condensed): The reason why the Apostle made such a bold profession was, that sinner might be saved and believers edified.—MAC KNIGHT: The Apostle insinuates with great propriety that the gospel is not an institution like the heathen mysteries, which were concealed from all but the initiated. The precepts of the gospel, being honorable in themselves and beneficial to society, cannot be too openly published.—HODGE: The salvation of men, including the pardon of their sins and the moral renovation of their hearts, can be effected by the gospel alone.—The power of the gospel does not lie in its pure theism, or perfect moral code, but in the cross—in the doctrine of justification by faith in a crucified Redeemer.—Whether we be wise or unwise, orthodox or heterodox, unless we are believers, and receive "the righteousness which is of God" as the ground of acceptance, we have no share in the salvation of the gospel.—Sermons on ver. 16, by B. PART FIRST.

The Doctrine of Justification by Faith as the Restoration of the true Glorification of God.

CHAPTERS I.-XI.

FIRST DIVISION.

SIN AND GRACE IN THEIR FIRST ANTITHESIS, THE REALLY RELIGIOUS AND MORAL LIFE. THE ACTUAL ENTRANCE OF CORRUPTION AND SALVATION. GOD'S WRATH AT ALL HUMAN UNRIGHTEOUSNESS; THAT IS, THE WORLD'S REAL CORRUPTION MATURING FOR DEATH, AND HASTENED BY THE JUDGMENT OF GOD; AND THE OPPOSING JUSTIFICATION OF SINNERS THROUGH THE MERCY-SEAT, OR PARDON IN CHRIST IN RESPONSE TO FAITH. THE RIGHTEOUSNESS OF FAITH.

CHAPTERS I. 18-V. 11.

FIRST SECTION.—The beginning of all the real corruption of the world, and of the Gentiles in particular together with the judgment pronounced on it. The neglect of the general revelation of God in creation by the neglect of the real worship of God in thanksgiving and praise (chap. i. 18-21).

SECOND SECTION.—The development of Gentile corruption under God's judicial abandonment (the departure of His Spirit, and the decree of ripeness for judgment). From arbitrary symbolism to the worship of images and beasts; from theoretical to practical corruption; from natural to unnatural and abominable sins, to the completion of all kinds of crimes and iniquities, and to the demoniacal lust of evil, and even of evil maxims (chap. i. 22-32).

18 For the wrath of God [God's wrath] is revealed [in opposition to that revelation of God's righteousness, ver. 17] from heaven against all ungodliness [godlessness] and unrighteousness [iniquity] of men, who hold [hold back] the truth in unrighteous

- ness; Because^a that which may be known [which is known]^a of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed [God manifested]^a it unto [to] them. For the invisible things of him [his unseen attributes] from the creation of the world are [are, since the creation of the world,]^a clearly seen,^a being understood by the things that are made [by means of his works], even his eternal power and Godhead [Divinity,^a θεϊότης, not θεότης]; so that^a they are without excuse
- 21 [inexcusable, ἀναπολόγητους]. Because that, when they knew God [because, knowing God, or, although they knew God, διότι γινώσκοντες τὸν θεόν], they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful [they did not glorify him as God, nor give thanks to him as God]; but became vain in their imaginations [thoughts], and their foolish heart was darkened.
- 22, 23 Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, And changed [exchanged] the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man [for a likeness of an image of corruptible man], and to [of] birds, and fourfooted beasts [quadrupeds], and creeping things [reptiles].
- 24 Wherefore God also¹⁰ gave them up to uncleanness, through the lusts of their own hearts [God delivered them over, in the lusts of their hearts, to uncleanness], to dishonor their own bodies between themselves [so that their bodies were dishonored among them].¹¹ Who changed [They who exchanged].¹² the truth of God into [for] a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more [rather] than the Creator,¹³ who is blessed forever. Amen. For this cause God gave them up [delivered them over] unto [to] vile affections [shameful passions]:¹⁴ for even their women did change [exchanged] the natural use into [for] that which is against nature: And likewise also the men, leaving the natural use of the woman, burned in their lust [lustful excitement] one toward another; men with men working that which is unseemly [working the (well known) indecency, τὴν αἰσχρυσμένην], and receiving in themselves that recompense of their error which was meet [the due reward of their error].
- 28 And even as they did not like [And as they did not deem it worthy, or worth while, οὐκ ἔδοκίμασαν] to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate [worthless, ἀδόκιμος]¹⁵ mind, to do those things which are not convenient [becoming];¹⁶ Being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication,¹⁷ wickedness [malice], covetousness, maliciousness [badness]; full of envy, murder, debate [strife, ἐριδος], deceit, malignity; whisperers, Backbiters [slanderers], haters of God,¹⁸ despiteful [insolent], proud, boasters, inventors of evil things [villanies], disobedient to parents, Without understanding, covenant-breakers [truce-breakers], without natural affection, implacable,¹⁹ unmerciful: Who, knowing [although they well know] the judgment [just decree] of God, that they which [who] commit [practice, πράσσοντες] such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them [approve of those who practise them, συνευδοκοῦσιν τοῖς πράσσουσιν].

TEXTUAL.

^a Ver. 18.—[Or hinder. So Lange and Meyer: aufhalten. This is the meaning of κατέχουσιν here, as in 2 Thess. ii. 8, 7; Luke iv. 42. Comp. the Exeg. Notes, as also the note of Alford in loc.—P. 8.]

¹² Ver. 19.—[φανερόν ἐστιν ἐν αὐτοῖς, in illis (Vulg.), i. e., ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις αὐτῶν, in their hearts; comp. ii.

18; Gal. i. 16. It refers to the inborn consciousness of God which is inseparable from our reason, and it contains the germ of the ontological argument of Anselm. Dr. Lange, however, renders, with Erasmus and others: inter alia, among them. See Exeg. Notes. Luther's version (ihnen) ignores the preposition ἐν.—P. S.]

⁹ Ver. 19.—[ἡ φάραξ αὐτοῦ, the historic aorist, referring to the original creation.—P. S.]

¹¹ Ver. 20.—[Alford objects to the E. V. and translates are perceived; but this destroys the striking oxymoron, ἀόρατα καθορᾶται, invisibleta videntur, das Unschaubare wird erschaut, the invisible becomes visible, or the unseen is seen, vis, by the mind's eye (νοούμενα). The compound καθορᾶν (ἀναγλόμενον in the N. T.) means to look down from a higher place, to take a survey, and hence often intimates the simple verb = ἀπερίσβητος ὁρᾶν, perdere, perspicere, to see clearly.—P. S.]

¹⁵ Ver. 24.—[τοῖς ἀτιμάζεσθαι τὰ σώματα αὐτῶν ἐν αὐτοῖς. The reading ἐν αὐτοῖς is sustained by K. A. B. C. D^e, against the text. rec., ἐν ἑαυτοῖς, among themselves, reciprocally. Meyer defends the latter reading (referring it to the persons, αὐτῶν), in view of the frequent neglect of the reflex pronoun by the transcribers; e. g., ver. 27.—ἀτιμάζεσθαι is passive (Besa, De Wette, Meyer, Lange, Alford), and not middle (Erasmus, Luther, E. V.); and hence αὐτῶν is preferable to αὐτῶν, and ἐν αὐτοῖς to ἐν ἑαυτοῖς, which may have arisen from imagining that "they," instead of τὰ σώματα, was the subject to ἀτιμάζεσθαι. The genitive, τοῖς ἀτιμάζ., may be taken simply as gen. oppositionis, explaining ἀκαθάρτια, which consisted in their bodies being dishonored; or as implying the purpose of God: in order that (= εἰς τὸ); or as denoting the consequence: so that. I prefer the last.—P. S.]

¹⁸ Ver. 26.—[Or shameful lusts, lusts of dishonor, πάθη ἀτιμίας, "stronger than ἀτιμία πάθη, as setting forth the status, ἀτιμία, to which the πάθη belonged" (Alford). Luther: schändliche Lüste. Lange: Leidenschaften der Schande. Meyer: schandbare Leidenschaften.—P. S.]

²¹ Ver. 29.—As πορνεία has already been mentioned, it is here probably inserted for completeness's sake by Cod. L. and others, or substituted for νομία. See Tischendorf. [It is omitted by K. A. B. C. K., Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford, Meyer, Lange. It may have arisen from νομία, but may as easily have been overlooked on account of the similarity. Where the unnatural πορνεία, which was mentioned before, prevails, the ordinary νομία abounds also. Upon the whole, I would retain it.—P. S.]

²³ Ver. 31.—[ἀποδόσεις (in the text. rec. after ἀποδόσεις) is not sufficiently sustained by Cod. C. D., al. and sounds rather weak between these strong terms. [Omitted by K. A. B. D^e. G., and cancelled by Mill, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer. Alford regards it as a gloss in margin to explain ἀποδόσεις; Meyer as an insertion from the similar catalogue, 2 Tim. iii. 3.—P. S.]

GENERAL REMARKS.—The whole section, in its progress to the end of the chapter, relates more particularly to the heathen world (Tholuck, Meyer). Yet it describes the corruption in its original form as a general corruption of humanity. The antithesis: Heathendom and Judaism was a subsequent development. Ver. 24, with its causality in vers. 22 and 23, constitutes the more definite beginning of heathenism. Tholuck recommends the treatise of Adam, Exercitationes Exegeticae, 1712, pp. 501-788, on the section vers. 18-32. Tholuck remarks: "What the Apostle says of the relations of the Gentile world, and afterwards of the Jews, to God, naturally applies to their universality, but to individuals only in a greater or less degree." We add: So that a relative opposition is embraced within the general judgment (see chap. ii. 6 ff.).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

FIRST SECTION, VERS. 18-31.

Ver. 18. For God's wrath is revealed. The ἀποκάλυψις of the ὀργή θεοῦ, as the revelation which was historically earlier, is contrasted with the revelation of the righteousness of God from faith. It is therewith intimated that that righteousness denotes grace, or justifying righteousness; but that the ὀργή θεοῦ is an exercise of penal righteousness which precedes it.* The wrath of God, as an emotion of God, in His personal displeasure at sin as ἀσέβεια, as conscious transgression, as apostasy, as unbelief, and therefore as the limitation of His personal revelation in the world. It is a displeasure which is revealed by such decrees of penal justice as death and the terrors of death, especially in retribution for obstructions placed in the way of the divine life (Exod. iv. 14, 24; Ps. xc. 7, 8), by a decree of blindness in retribution for the hinderances to His truth (the present passages; Is. vi. 10; Rom. ix.; 2 Cor. iii. 14; Matt. xiii. 14; John xii. 40; Acts xxviii. 26), by the abandonment to the lusts of the flesh in retribution for the general resistance to His Spirit (Eph. ii. 8), and finally, by a decree of reprobation and condemnation in retribution for the hinderances to salvation by apostasy and unbelief (Matt. iii. 7; xiii. 18; John iii. 36; Rom. v. 9). Comp. my article, Zorn Gottes, in Herzog's Realencyklopädie. This ὀργή Θεοῦ has its ἀποκάλυψις immediately, so far as it is declared to the conscience of man as God's decree from heaven; but it becomes especially an ἀποκάλυψις by the witness of the law, and is perfected in the light of the gospel. It is revealed in a real manner from heaven, as a message from the height of the holy, supernatural world, and from the throne of Divine government. And it is revealed in an ideal way by the light of righteousness, which, like a flame of wrath from the kingdom of the Spirit, shines down into the realm of consciously guilty human life, and explains its dark fate. The older writers understood by ὀργή, punishment alone, taking metonymically the operation for the cause [metonymia causae pro effectu = κόλασις, τιμωρία]. But we must unite both. The opposite of ὀργή is not merely ἀγάπη (Tholuck), but ἔλεος (see my Positive Dogmatik, p. 109). According to De Wette [and Alford], wrath is only an anthropopathic conception of the righteousness of God in punishment; but by this interpretation its procession ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ is obliterated. The internal ἀποκάλυψις of wrath involves its external φανέρωσις, but it is one-sided to confine it to the punishment which God has determined for the heathen world (De Wette), or the wretched condition of the world at that time (Köllner), or to the manifestation of the punishment in the conscience (Tholuck), or in the gospel (Grotius). From the beginning, the deeds of wrath have ever succeeded the ἀσέβεια in its opposition to God's government and revelation. But the complete ἀποκάλυψις thereof does not appear before the New Testament ἀποκάλυψις of grace. The reason of this is, that the world's guilt reaches its climax in the crucifixion and death of Christ. The ἀσέβεια—the rebellion of unbelief to the revelation of the divine light and life (chap. ii. 4, 6; viii. 6, 7)—sums up the whole idea of sin which incurs the guilt of God's wrath. The idea of the ὀργή itself is God's abandonment of man to the judgment of death. And the idea of the ἀποκάλυψις of this ὀργή is the entire revelation of the judgment of God in the corruption of the world amid the light of the gospel, for the conscience of humanity, especially the body of believers. The idea of the οὐρανός is the heavenly world in its ideal laws, which lie also at the foundation of the earthly world, and react against all abnormal conduct with punishment and death. The present, ἀποκαλύπτεται, must be emphasized, it is neither merely a historical reference to the misery of the old world (Köllner, and others), nor, with Chrysostom, and others) a reference to the future day of wrath. It means, rather, a progressive revelation of the judgment in opposition to which the progressive revelation of the righteousness of salvation in the gospel acquires its perfect significance and clearness. The ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ certainly refers chiefly to ἀποκαλύπτεται, but it is indirectly declared thereby that the ὀργή Θεοῦ is from heaven, although, as a judgment immanent in life itself, it breaks forth from its internal state, or is caused by it. Special interpretations of the ὀργή: The religion of the Old Testament (Bengel); storms and natural disasters (Pelagius); external and internal necessities of the times (Baumgarten-Crusius).

* [The wrath of God is an anthropopathic but most truthful expression of the punitive justice and holiness of God over-against sin, and perfectly harmonious with His love, which is holy, and repels the evil with the same ex-

Against all ungodliness and unrighteousness. The ἀσέβεια [godlessness, impiety] is the fundamental form of personal misconduct toward God; but the word is more especially significant in that it describes ungodliness as the absence of reverence for God. See ver. 21. The ἀδίκια [unrighteousness, iniquity] is the correspondent fundamental form of misconduct toward God's law in life, and therefore not toward our neighbor alone. Theophylact, Tholuck, and many others: Profanitas in Deum, injuria in proximum. [So Hodge ἀσέβεια, impiety toward God; ἀδίκια, injustice toward men.—P. S.] Meyer, on the contrary: Irreligiousness and immorality, which is supported by the following description. [ἀσέβεια is the fountain of ἀδίκια, but both act and react upon each other.—P. S.]—Of men. Antithesis of ὀργή Θεοῦ. The word signifies, first, the universality of guilt; second, the weakness of man's enmity against Almighty God.

Who hold back the truth. Description of the obstructions which, as the wicked reaction against the revelation of God, cause the reaction of Divine displeasure in the form of the ὀργή. The truth is the revelation of God in its most general sense, as the unity and harmony of all the single Divine acts of revelation, with a special reference here to the natural revelation of God (vers. 19, 20); although the doctrines of the gospel (of which Ammon explains ἀλήθεια) must not be excluded from the general idea, nor must the natural knowledge of God be substituted for the revelation of God. The κατ' ἔχουσιν (to grasp, to hold, here with the accessory idea of holding back) strikingly denotes hinderance, keeping back (Meyer, improperly, keeping down); as is the case with καταλαμβάνουσιν in John i. 5.* An odd explanation is this: "Who possess the truth with unrighteousness; that is, sin against better knowledge" (Michaelis, Koppe, Baur).—In gy with which it attracts the good. No man can love, who cannot hate. Wrath, or hatred, is inverted love. But while the wrath of man is a passion, and destroys the sinner, God's wrath is a calm and holy energy, and restores the sinner by destroying sin. Meyer in loc.: "Der Zorn Gottes ist die Liebe des heiligen Gottes zu allem Guten in ihrer entgegengesetzten Energie gegen alles Böse." He quotes Laotintius, De ira Dei, v. 9: "Si Deus non irascitur impiis et injustis, nec pios justosque diligit; in rebus enim diversis aut in utroque partem moveri necesse est, aut in neutram." Comp. also Tholuck on Matt. v. 22, and Harless on Eph. iii. 3.—P. S.]

* [Wordsworth in loc.: "Holding, keeping down, the truth in ungodliness, as in a prison-house. Men have incarcerated the truth, and hold her a captive under restraint and duress, with the bars and bolts of a depraved will and vicious habits, so that she cannot go forth and breathe the air and see the light, and do works suitable to her own nature." The passage implies, however, that man has the remnants of the Divine image in him, and that, though fallen in Adam, he may fall still deeper by obscuring and suppressing the elements of truth in his reason and conscience. The reference to καταλαμβάνουσιν, John i. 5, is questionable. But see Lange in loc.—P. S.] unrighteousness. Not adverbial (Reiche, et al.), but instrumental (Meyer).^{*} The word must be understood here in the wide sense, according to which all sin is ἀδικία. See 1 John iii. 4. The sentence must be understood, however, in its general force, though with special reference already to the Gentiles. The history of this κατέχων is the history of the kingdom of darkness in humanity, which is consummated in the ἀντικείμενος, 2 Thess. ii. 8; comp. especially also 2 Thess. i. 8. According to De Wette, the κατέχων operates so as not to let the truth come to appearance and development. But it also so operates as to pervert the individual elements of the truth into distortions, errors, and strong delusions, and thereby calls down the wrath of God. We must observe how decidedly the Apostle here views the ἀπιστία ethically as ἀπειθεία; and how he derives the errors of unbelief from unrighteousness, and from misconduct toward the ethical laws of the inner life.

Ver. 19. Because that which is known of God.† The δοῖς in ver. 19 may be regarded as an explanation of the statement in ver. 18, with special reference to the holding back of the truth of God; the δοῖς in ver. 21 as the explanation of the preceding ἀναπολογήτοις εἶναι; and the δοῖς in ver. 24, as well as the διὰ τοῦτο in ver. 26, as the explanation of the revelation of God's wrath. Though the δοῖς of ver. 19 is not to be regarded exactly the same as γὰρ, it does not serve specially as a proof of the motive for Divine wrath. For more particular information, see Tholuck and Meyer.‡

The knowledge of God.§ Tholuck distinguishes three meanings of γνωστόν: 1. That which is known of God (Itala, Vulg., and De Wette [Meyer, Philippi, Alford, Wordsworth.—P. S.]); 2. what may be known (Photius, and many others; Rückert); 3. knowledge [= γνώσις. Fritzsche, Tholuck, Hodge.—P. S.]. He shows that γνωστός, according to the classical use of the language, means, what may be known; while γνωτός means, what is known. But in the Septuagint and New Testament the signification, known, is undoubted. Nevertheless, many expositors, from the time of Origen down to the present [Theophylact, Œcumenius, Erasmus, Calvin, Beza, Grotius, Ewald], have pronounced in favor of the translation, what may be known. But this signification does not make good sense, since it is difficult to distinguish between what may, and what may not be known of God, and since every thing that may be known of God was by no means revealed at the beginning to the nations (see Meyer). We understand what is known of God concretely as knowledge [Kenntnisse, γνώσις], notitia dei—which should become true knowledge [Erkenntnis, ἐπίγνωσις] by living appropriation. Luther has made the untenable distinction, that the reason of man can know that God is, but cannot know who or what He is. Tholuck justly remarks that the Apostle immediately afterward speaks of a certain knowledge of the nature of God. [The book of nature is a παιδείημος διανοησις, as Basil! Hezaëmeron, i.) calls it, a school of the general knowledge of God, and there is no nation on earth which is entirely destitute of this knowledge.—P. S.]

Is manifest among them.* Erasmus, Grotius, Köllner, and Baumgarten-Crusius, adopt this explanation.† On the contrary, Tholuck, Meyer, and De Wette—with reference to chap. ii. 15; Gal. i. 16—strongly advocate Calvin's interpretation, cordibus insculptum. [So also Beza: "In ipsorum animis, quia hæc Dei notitia recondita est in intimis mentis penetralibus," and Hodge: "It is not of a mere external revelation of which the Apostle is speaking, but of that evidence of the being and perfection of God which every man has in the constitution of his own nature, and in virtue of which he is competent to apprehend the manifestations of God in His works."—P. S.] But ἀποκαλύπτει stands in Gal. i. 16; and in Rom. ii. 15, the question is God's manifestation by conscience, and not by creation. De Wette says: If the knowledge of God had been something common among them, it would not have been suppressed (κατεχόμενον).‡ But this is not conclusive. We could say with more propriety: If there had been no general knowledge of God among them, there would have been no common guilt. We must admit, however, that among them presupposes in them, or the existence of a knowledge of God in their hearts.—God manifested it to them. This was not first of all ἀποκαλύπτεις, but φανέρωσις—manifestation through creation. And thus there arose from individuals a manifest knowledge of God—a φανερὸν. The reference of this φανερὸν to the gnosis of the philosophers (Erasmus, Grotius) is too contracted. But there was a tradition of the knowledge of God among men which preceded the development of heathenism. (It is hardly worth while to mention the explanation of Luther, Koppe, Flatt, that ἐν αὐτοῖς is the mere dative.) [There is a threefold revelation of God: 1. An internal revelation to the reason and conscience of every man (comp. ii. 15; John i. 9); 2. an external revelation in the creation, which proclaims God's power, wisdom, and goodness (Rom. i. 20); 3. a special revelation, through the Holy Scriptures, and in the person and work of Christ, which confirms and completes the other revelations, and exhibits the justice, holiness, and love of God. The first two are here intended.—P. S.]

Ver. 20. For his invisible attributes [τὰ ἀόρατα αὐτοῦ]. Explanation of the declaration: "God manifested it to them." Meyer: "That may not be seen of Him (sein Unschaubares), the invisible attributes which constitute His essence, not actiones Dei invisibiles." (Theodoret and Fritzsche: In relation to both creation and providence.) The pictures of creation, however, are also permanent!

* [Also Alford, who justly remarks that the pregnant ἐν, "in and by," implies that their ἀδικία is the status wherein, and the instrument whereby, they hold back the truth lit up in their consciences.—P. S.]

† [Vers. 19, 20, as also vers. 20-26, and ver. 27 of this chapter, are quoted by Hippolytus, in his recently discovered Philosophumena, or Refut. omnium hæres., lib. ix. c. 3, p. 44, and v. 7, p. 140, ed. Duncker and Schneidewin.—P. S.]

‡ [These two commentators, however, differ in their exposition of δοῖς. See Textual Note 2. The Apostle proves first that men had the ἀλήθεια (19, 20), and then that they held it back, and perverted it into a lie (21-23), and that therefore (δοῖς) God's wrath came upon them (24 ff.).—P. S.]

§ [So Dr. Lange translates τὸ γνωστόν τοῦ θεοῦ, but I am of course for Textual Note 2. P. S.]

* [So Dr. Lange translates ἐν αὐτοῖς, unter ihnen, among them, instead of in them. See Text. Note 4.—P. S.]

† [Erasmus and Grotius, with the restriction to the superior knowledge of heathen philosophers, as Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato; or others in the sense that the knowledge of God was a common revelation, accessible to all. Dr. Lange takes the latter view, as appears from what follows.—P. S.]

‡ [Precisely the same remark is made by Alford, & he often follows De Wette very closely.—P. S.]

actions, and so far providence is at least indicated. [The ἀόρατα is subsequently explained by δύναμις and θειότης, and the εἰς, followed by καί, as Tholuck remarks, does not annex a new idea (and also), but it partitions the ἀόρατα into the two ideas of δύναμις and θειότης. Paul has in view simply some of the Divine attributes, not the whole Divine being (which would rather require τὸ ἀόρατον); the pagan knowledge of God is only partial and fragmentary, though sufficient to leave those who possess it without excuse.—P. S.]

From the time of the creation of the world. Not out of the creation (Luther, and others). This idea is contained in τοῖς ποιήματι. (De Wette). κτίσις, moreover, is here equal to καταβολή (Fritzsche).—Being understood by the things that are made.* An oxymoron, Arist. De mundo C. [vi.]: [πάντη θνητῇ φύσει γινόμενος] ἀδιώρητος ἀπ' αὐτῶν τῶν ἔργων θεωρεῖται ὁ θεός.† Meyer thus paraphrases the νοούμενα καθόρατα: It is beheld by being perceived with the reason. We might ask: Should the sentence read, The invisible becomes visible by knowledge, as the means; or, it becomes visible as something known, perceptible to the reason? The latter thought is preferable here, since it is better adapted to the participle, and presupposes the import of the power, the thought-life of man. Philippi also limits himself to the middle form: "The invisible is seen; an oxymoron which is explained and qualified by the addition of νοούμενα. It is not seen by the bodily eye, but by the eye of the Spirit, the νοῦς, the reason." Our view is favored by the original sense of καθορᾶν, a conception which passes through looking down and looking over into looking at.—By the things that are made [by and in (his) works, τοῖς ποιήμασιν, instrumental dative.—P. S.]. These are therefore signs of the attributes of God. Schneckenburger (after Episcopus, and others) includes among them the government of God in history. But the conception of ἔργον, creature, is against this view. Baumgarten-Crusius, following the Syriac and other versions, takes ποιήματα in an ablative sense—by the creature—which is quite untenable.—His eternal power and divinity. [αἰδιος, from αἶν, ever-enduring, eternal, belongs to both nouns. Here is the germ of the physico-theological argument for the existence of God, as in ver. 19 the ontological argument is intimated.—P. S.] Here, as in the Creed [I believe in God the Father Almighty], omnipotence serves as the representative of the attributes of God. Tholuck: "In the contemplation of nature, the first thing which strikes man with overpowering weight is the impression of an infinite, supernatural omnipotence (Book of Wisdom xiii. 4). All religion has its root in the feeling of dependence on supernatural powers (?). To the patriarchs God first revealed Himself as אלהים, as the Almighty; Ex. vi. 3" (Gen. xvii. 1).‡

* [Lange: Die Unschaubarkeiten werden als Erkannte angeschaut. Comp. Textual Note 7.—P. S.]

† [Similar passages are quoted from Cicerone, De Divin., II. 73: "Eae praesentem aliquam eternamque naturam pulchritudo mundi ordoque rerum coelestium cogit confiteri," and Quæst. Tusc., I. 20: "Deum non vides, tamen Deum agnoscis ex ejus operibus." Comp. also Bengel in loc.: "Incomparabile oxymoron. Invisibilia Dei, si unquam, certe in creatione facta essent invisibilia: sed tum quæque non nisi per intelligentiam videri caperunt."—P. S.]

‡ [Alford: "Eternal, and Almighty, have always been recognised epithets of the Creator."—P. S.]

—And his Divinity. θειότης, from θεός, is the summary of the divinities, or divine excellencies, and must be distinguished from θεότης, the term which denotes the Divine Being itself. The omnipotence is completed by the remaining Divine attributes, through which it really becomes omnipotence in the full ethical as well as metaphysical sense. It is onesided if Schneckenburger refers it only to God's goodness. Reiche's thought is better, that wisdom and goodness are chiefly meant.

So that they are without excuse. Meyer does not regard the εἰς as expressing a consequence—as most commentators do [Vulg.: Ita ut sint inexcusabiles; Chrysostom, Luther, Reiche, De Wette, Fritzsche, Tholuck, Philippi, Ewald, Alford, Wordsworth, Hodge]—but a purpose (in harmony with Calvin, Beza, and others): In order that they may be without excuse. But this rendering leads to a monstrous view of the purpose of the creation of the world. It is too fatalistic even for the conception of predestination, which it was once designed to support. Meyer urges in its defence that εἰς, in the Epistle to the Romans, when used with τό and the infinitive, has always a teleological sense, against which [De Wette and] Tholuck (p. 67) protest. Then he insists that the results must also be determined beforehand. But this would be a kind of predestination which is self-contradictory: Predestinated—to have no excuse; that is, predestinated for guilt. The other explanation implies by no means a sufficientia religionis naturalis ad salutem, but it permits the possibility of another form of the course of development from Adam to Christ. [The object here is to show man's guilt, not God's sovereignty. Comp. on εἰς τό the Textual Note 9. Hodge: "Paul does not here teach that it is the design of God, in revealing Himself to men, to render their opposition inexcusable, but rather, since this revelation has been made, they have in fact no apology for their ignorance and neglect of God. Though the revelation of God in His works is sufficient to render men inexcusable, it does not follow that it is sufficient to lead men, blinded by sin, to a saving knowledge of Himself." Wordsworth: "It can hardly be thought that the conviction, confusion, and condemnation of men was any part of the Divine plan in creation, although it followed as a consequence from it."—P. S.]

Ver. 21. Because, although they knew God, &c. The διότι explains first of all how far they are without excuse; then, indirectly, how their guilt of holding back the truth in unrighteousness commenced. Incorrect construction: cum cognoscere potuissent (Ecumenius, Flatt).* Meyer has no ground for opposing the solution of the participle γινώσκεις into the sentence: although they knew God (not, perceived Him). The contradiction between knowing God and the designated neglect of Him is obvious indeed; but herein precisely consists the inexcusableness. The ignorance (ἄγνοια) of the Gentile world, Eph. iv. 18, &c., is improperly regarded by Tholuck as an apparent contradiction, for the Gentile world was not such at the outset, and its ignorance is the result and punishment of its great sin of neglect. They lost even their imperfect knowledge (γινώσκεις), because they did not raise it to full knowledge (ἐπιγνώσις) through the labor of the heart. [τὸν θεόν, the one true God, in opposition to the false θεοί whom the heathen worshipped.—P. S.]

They glorified him not as God. According to His divinity (John iv. 24). They were not wanting in worship, but in worship suitable to God. Melancthon refers δοξάζειν to theoretical, and ὑπακούειν to practical conduct toward God (as recognition and reverence); but Tholuck very justly rejects such an interpretation, and regards δοξάζειν as the general term for worship, and ὑχ. as the special designation of that species in which the feeling of dependence exhibits itself in the most tender and truly human way. In our opinion, the former denotes rather all worship, so far as it should be preëminently the glorification of God; the latter denotes the same worship as the grateful recognition of the Divine government for human welfare.*

But became vain [ἡματαύθησαν]. They became idle, foolish, in devising vanities (Is. xlv. 9), vain idols, μάταια (Acts xiv. 15). [ματαύτης, מָתַיִת, vanitas, is a characteristic term for idol-worship; Deut. xxxii. 21; 2 Kings xvii. 5; Jer. ii. 5; Acts xiv. 15.—P. S.] "As man, so his God." The axiom may also be reversed: As his God, so man himself (Ps. cxv. 8): They that make them are like unto them. The human mind is made dumb, wooden, and stone-like, by dumb, wooden, and stone idols (comp. Acts xvii. 29). But that vanity began in the inward life.—In their imaginations [thoughts, reasonings, speculations, διδασκαλίας]. Tholuck: "We can scarcely coincide with the Vulgate, Fritzsche, Meyer, and Philippi, in translating διδασκαλίας simply by cogitata. But since the word is used usually malo sensu, and the antithesis is more expressive, we may translate it, with Luther: 'In their imagining;' Beza: rationibus suis. We need not think exclusively of the reasonings and conclusions of the philosophers (Philippi)." Mythology was complete with its growth of ideals and images long before philosophy proper was conceived.

And their foolish heart was darkened. The supposition that "foolish" (ἄσυνετος) is used proleptically in the sense that their heart was darkened so as to lose its understanding (De Wette), is not only unnecessary (Tholuck), but altogether irrelevant (Meyer: "because it destroys the climax").† Positive darkness was the result of the negative neglect of the heart to regard the Divine tokens, and to weigh them understandingly. The καρδία, the centre of life, is first darkened; then the διάνοια, the developed thought-life (Eph. iv. 18). Tholuck: In this section the Apostle coincides so fully in word and thought with the Book of Wisdom, chaps. xiii.—xv., that Nitzsch regards it "almost impossible" to ascribe perfect originality to him. Yet he himself admits that the fundamental thought—the tracing of idolatry back to sin—was unknown to the Alexandrine author, &c. (comp. Nitzsch, Deutsche Zeitschrift, 1850, p. 387; Bleek, Stud. und Kritiken, 1853, p. 340).

SECOND SECTION, vers. 22-31.

Ver. 22. Professing themselves [i. e., while not because, they professed themselves, φάσιν or τε, or pretended] to be wise. De Wette: "This is referred by many, and also by Tholuck, to the philosophers of ancient Greece and Rome. But these were above idolatry, and, besides, were later than the origin of idolatry," &c.* The latter remark requires special attention. The question here is concerning the very ancient origin of heathenism, as characterized by the far-fetched ingenuities of symbolical mythicism. Nor could Paul have had in thought merely the pride of Grecian wisdom. But in contemplating it, he could also judge concerning the origin of heathenism. Comp. 1 Cor. i. 19-25; iii. 19. Calvin: "Negus enim id proprie in philosophis competit, etc., sed aque commune est gentium ordinumque omnium. Nemo enim fuit, qui non voluerit Dei maiestatem sub captum suum includere, ac talem Deum facere, qualem percipere possent suapte sensu."—They became fools. Not, they have by this means shown themselves to be fools (Köllner), which weakens the thought. [Their folly was in proportion to their boast of wisdom. There can be no greater folly than to worship a beast rather than God. Wordsworth in loc.: "Intelligence is no safeguard against superstition. Knowledge puffeth up (1 Cor. viii. 1). It often engenders pride, and pride is punished by God with spiritual blindness, which is the mother of idolatry."—P. S.]

Ver. 23. And exchanged, &c. They have abandoned the real δόξα [דְּבָרֵי יְהוָה],—the contemplation of God's glory—which was communicated to them through the spiritual contemplation of the creation, which was manifested to the Israelites in the Shekinah in the exalted moments of vision, and which was finally communicated to Christians in the righteousness of Christ for faith. They exchanged this glory for their religious images—that is, for vanity, folly, and darkness. "The ἐν cannot be taken for εἰς (Reiche [E. V.]), but is instrumental" (Meyer). It denotes the external element of their exchange. [The verb ἀλλάσσειν, when it means to exchange, is usually construed with τι τινα or ἀντι τινα, permutare rem per rem or re, but in the LXX. with ἐν, after the Hebrew בְּיָדָא, as in Ps. cvi. 20: ἠλλάξαντο τὴν δόξαν αὐτῶν ἐν ὁμοιωμάτων ἰδούλου, κ.τ.λ. Tholuck quotes also Sophocles, Antig., ver. 936, for the same construction. The contrast of ἀφ' ὧν and ἐν ὧν sets forth the folly of such an exchange.—P. S.] Grotius: ὁμοίωμα ἰδούλου, figura, qua apparet in simulacro. Meyer quotes Rev. ix. 7 in favor of this view. But the expression seems to indicate that the worship of images proceeded from an arbitrary, self-created symbolism. They believed that they wisely expressed and maintained the δόξα of God in the symbol or likeness of a human image. For this purpose they naturally made use of the image of the external and therefore perishable form of man. This was specially the case among the Greeks. There were also the Egyptian images of beasts: of birds

* (Bengel: "GRATIAS AGERE (ἐὐχαρ.) debemus ob beneficia: GLORIFICARE (δοξάζ.) ob ipsas virtutes divinas."—P. S.)

† [Alford: "THEIR HEART (καρδία of the whole inner man, the seat of knowledge and feeling) BEING FOOLISH (unintelligent, not retaining God in its knowledge) BECAME DARK (lost the little light it had, and wandered blindly in the mazes of folly).—P. S.]

* [In like manner, Meyer and Alford refer the words not so much to the schools of philosophy, as to the assumption of wisdom by the Greeks in general (1 Cor. i. 21), which is always connected with an alienation from the truth of God. Tholuck, also, in his 7th edition, refers the passage expressly to the whole civilized heathen world which looked down upon the rest of mankind as outside barbarians.—P. S.]

—the bird Ibis; of four-footed beasts—the Apia, the dog and the cat; and of creeping things—the crocodile and the serpent. Tholuck: The Egyptian worship was at that time domesticated at Rome;* and the expression of Paul relates as well to the adoration of the symbol, generally practised by the cultivated classes, as to the adoration of the image itself, as a real idol, which prevailed among the great masses (see Tholuck). [The common people saw in the idols the gods themselves, the cultivated heathen, symbolical representations, or, at best, only the organs through which the gods operated. A similar difference of a gross and a more refined superstition is found in the Roman Catholic Church with regard to the images of saints. The Scriptures make no account of this distinction, and denounce all image-worshippers as idolaters.—P. S.] The Apostle traces the downward tendency of heathendom, by passing, first, from the likeness to the image, and, second, from the image of man to the images of creeping animals. [Wordsworth: “xai—xai—xai—observe this repetition, marking successive stages of their moral and intellectual degradation: ending in the transmutation of the living God of heaven into the likeness of unclean reptiles crawling upon the earth!”—P. S.]

Ver. 24. Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness. The Apostle evidently distinguishes two degrees of this abandonment; ver. 24 and ver. 26. As the unnatural sins of lust are not mentioned before ver. 26, so may we understand ver. 24 as referring to the natural forms of sensuality. But lewdness is the sin common to both degrees of corruption. That the Apostle should regard sins of lust as the immediate result of religious apostasy, rests: 1. On the Hebrew idea of whoredom, according to which religious whoredom—that is, idolatry—leads to moral whoredom as its most immediate result (Num. xxv.; Ezek. xxiii.); just as, reversely, moral unchastity leads to religious lewdness (Solomon, Henry IV. [of France]). The heathen forms of worship are therefore connected in various ways with the practice of lust, or they are even the worship of lust. 2. On the ethical law, that moral principles stand in reciprocal connection with religious principles. The image of corruptible man is an image of the natural man, who, like Jupiter, indulges in love intrigues. The image of the bull likewise indicates the deification of the generative power of nature.

Wherefore God gave them up [παρέδωκεν, delivered them over]. The abandonment must not be regarded, with the Greek expositors [since Jrigen], as a mere permission† (συγχώρησις—see Chrysostom's remarks, quoted by Tholuck [who dissents from him]), nor, on the other hand, as referring to a Divine predestination of abandonment to the judgment of condemnation. (Tholuck, the editor of Calvin's Commentaries, calls this the Calvinistic view, according to which God is the effective author of sin;—but this he could certainly not prove from Calvin's exposition of the present passage. The abandonment is rather the first stage in the exercise of punitive authority (see my Positive Dogmatics, p. 468). God executed this punishment on a grand scale in the origin and growth of heathendom. He allowed the Gentiles to walk in their own ways (Acts xiv. 16; Ps. lxxxi. 13; cxlvii. 20). The permittere in this punishment becomes an effective operation by God's withdrawal of His Spirit; which measure His holiness requires.* Paul has already said that this withdrawal is retributive; but he now makes it especially prominent: in the lusts of their hearts, ἐν ταῖς ἐπιθυμίαις, &c. The ἐν must not be understood as instrumental [by or through] (Erasmus [E. V.], and others), nor like in (Piscat., Estius, and others) [but signifies the element or moral condition in which they were already when God, by a judicial act, delivered them over to a still worse condition.—P. S.]. The negative punitive judgment becomes positive in this, that they can no longer control the lusts of their heart after God's Spirit is withdrawn from them. It is in harmony with God's righteousness that sin should be punished by sin.—To uncleanness. The sins of thought and heart became sins of deed. The expression filthiness (Unflättheit, Meyer) seems too strong for the beginning of the development of uncleanness. In Gal. v. 19 (to which Meyer refers), the description passes from the grosser to the more subtle forms.

So that their bodies were dishonored. De Wette and Tholuck [Meyer, Alford, al.] maintain that ἀτιμάσθαι does not occur in the middle (Erasmus, Luther [E. V.]), but only in the passive voice. The bodies were already dishonored by natural lewdness, by which they lost their dignity as temples of God, and were degraded into instruments of sensual lust (and not merely “woman;” Tholuck). See 1 Cor. vi. 16.—Between themselves. Three explanations: 1. The ἐν is instrumental (Theophylact, Köllner). Then the moral subject is wanting. 2. The ἐν αὐτοῖς has a reciprocal signification equal to ἐν ἀλλήλοις, reciprocally (Erasmus, De Wette, Tholuck, and others). Meyer: One dishonors the other. This construction is favored by the reciprocal sexual intercourse which disappears in the unnatural lewdness described in ver. 26. 3. Reflexive (Vulgate, Luther, Calvin, and others). Tholuck remarks on this, that to themselves does not give clear sense. Comp., on the contrary, 1 Cor. vi. 16. We may adopt the second explanation, and yet the third need not be given up—namely, that in natural lewdness not only does one dishonor the other, but each dishonors himself.

Ver. 25. They who exchanged the truth of God. According to Meyer and Tholuck, Paul re-

* [Calov: “Traditi sunt a Deo non EFFECTIVE, nec solum PERMISSIVE, nec tantum ἐφεστικῶς, sed δικαστικῶς et judicialiter.” So Tholuck, Philippi, Alford (“not merely permissive, but judicial”). Meyer, stronger: “σπῆσις expresses the real active abandonment (die wirkliche active Preisgebung) on the part of God.” Both the Bible and daily experience teach that sin is punished by sin, as virtue is rewarded by virtue; and this is a Divinely instituted law in perfect harmony with our personal freedom and moral accountability; for man's will is in every act of sin as well as of obedience, and hence what is represented in one passage as the work of God, is in another passage just as properly represented as the work of man, comp. Eph. iv. 19: οἱ οὖτοι τὰς ἐαυτοῦ σπῆσις ἐν τῇ ἀσελγείᾳ, κ.τ.λ. God hardened Pharaoh's heart, Exod. vii. 13; ix. 12; x. 1, 20, 27; xi. 10; Rom. ix. 18, but Pharaoh first hardened his own heart, Exod. viii. 15, 32; ix. 24, 25, so that God punished him by his own sin. Comp. Doctrinal and Ethical, No. 1.—P. S.]

* [Tholuck quotes from Lucan (Phars. viii. 83):

*Nec in templa tuam Romana recipimus Iovem
Semideosque carnes.*—P. S.]

† [σπῆσις = classe (Chrysostom), or = συγχώρησις (Theodoret). This interpretation of the Greek fathers was followed by the rationalists, and is contrary to the meaning of the word (see Meyer). It explains nothing, for if God permits the sinner to sink deeper into vice, He does it, of course, with wise intention as a sovereign and righteous Judge.—P. S.]

turns expressly to the cause of the abandonment. But by this they overlook the definite progress of thought—namely, the argument for the abandonment of the second degree which follows in ver. 26. As a punishment of the heathen for squandering the doxa of God for the paltry sum of images, their own bodies have lost their doxa. But they are further charged with bartering the truth of God for the lie of idolatry, since they have served the creature παρὰ τὸν κτίσαντα. Therefore God gave them up to a lie of sexual lust, to a lust παρὰ φύσιν. It is from this parallel, which the commentators have overlooked, that exact exegetical definitions on this passage arise.—They who exchanged, Οἰτινίς, Quippe qui. The expression denotes them as the same, but characterizes them more fully. The sense is, they exchange for (sie tauschten um), μετέλλαξαν, which is not merely "more emphatic" (Meyer) than ἔλλαξαν. It includes, with the exchange, a very strong conception of change, of variation.—The truth of God. Explanations: 1. The truth revealed to the Gentiles (Camerarius, Reiche, and others). 2. θεοῦ is genit. object.; therefore the true knowledge of God (Piscat., Usteri. [Alford: the true notion of Him as the Creator]). 3. θεοῦ is genit. subject.; the truth or reality of God, the true Divine essence, according to the analogy τὴν δόξαν τοῦ θεοῦ (Tholuck, Meyer). Tholuck (with Theophylact, Luther, and others) takes it exactly as ἀληθινὸς θεός [and ψεῦδος for οἱ ψεῦδεις θεοὶ]. So also Hodge: a periphrase for the God—P. S.]. The δόξα of God is God's revelation in glory, and so is God's truth in the φανέρωσις (see ver. 19) of his essential truth in the truthful relations of creation. The name of God is the revelation of His nature; not His nature in and of itself. But this revelation divides itself into the δόξα when we have in view the whole majesty of His name, and into the ἀλήθεια when we look at the real harmony of its antitheses. They have forsaken the general manifestation of this truth of God. They have, indeed, utterly squandered it for the gain of a mere lie—for the lying idols. [ψεῦδος = פֶּזֶז, is used emphatically for idols in the Scriptures; Jer. xiii. 25; xvi. 19; Isa. xxviii. 15; xlv. 20; because the heathen gods do not even exist, and yet they are worshipped in the place of the only true God, who is the Cause of all existence, and the Author of all truth.—P. S.] Idols are lies not simply as dii imaginarii (Grotius). They are embodied lies. Man must make them, and they pretend to represent Him who made man (Isa. xl. 19, 20). They have mouths, but they speak not; eyes have they, but they see not (Ps. cxv. 5; cxxxv. 16; Wisdom xv. 15). The worshipper of idols has a dark consciousness of this contradiction. Even his worship is mendacious. Tholuck quotes Philo, De Vita Mosi, i. 3 [where it is said of the Israelites who had made the golden calf], Moses wondered ὅσον ψεῦδος ἀνθ' ὅσης ἀληθείας υπηλλάξαντο. Comp. also Isa. xlv. 20; Jer. iii. 10; xiii. 25; xvi. 19.—And worshipped. σεβάσθαι [only once in the N. T.] denotes religious reverence in general; λατρεῖν denotes worship [with sacrifice, and other acts and rites]. The conception of the σεβ. passes from fear and reverence to worship. Of kindred but not of identical character is the distinction of Theophylact, and others: internal and external worship.—The creature rather than the Creator. [τίσει, any created being or thing, belongs to both verbs, but is conformed to λατρεῖν as the nearest, while σεβάσθαι would require the accusative.—P. S.]

The παρὰ τὸν κτίσαντα has been interpreted in three ways: 1. More than the Creator [in the relative sense], (Vulgate, Erasmus, Luther [E. V. Grotius], and others); 2. against the Creator [contra creatorem; comp. παρὰ φύσιν, ver. 26], (Hammond, Fritzsche, and others); 3. In the sense of comparison [and exclusion], pro creatori, praterito, or relicto creatore (Hilarius, Theophylact, Beza, Tholuck, Meyer [Olshausen, De Wette, Philippi, Alford, Wordsworth, Hodge], and others). The third explanation is correct in the sense that it includes the second: Passing by one with the disregard and rejection of the same (see Luke xviii. 14). The παρὰ φύσιν in ver. 26 perfectly corresponds to this rendering. In both cases, the statement must not be understood absolutely; otherwise heathendom would have been the negation of all religion, and unnatural lust the negation of all propagation of the human race. It denotes the outbreathing sovereignty of a religious vice, which is completed in a sensus one. [Wordsworth derives from this text an argument against the Arians, who assert Christ to be a creature, and yet profess to worship Him; and against those who pay religious worship to any creature, since no one is to be worshipped, according to the Scriptures, who is not God by nature, and since there is no middle between Creator and creature.—P. S.]

Who is blessed forever. Tholuck: "The doxology is added to the name of God by Jews and Mohammedans when they must state something that is unworthy of Him, as though the writer would remove all suspicion of any share in the statement," &c. It is more natural to seek the explanation of this custom in the indignation of religious feeling, and in its confidence that God is exalted above the profanation of His name.* Tholuck informs us that an Arabian writer added, after every heresy which he mentioned: "God is exalted above all that they say!" The Apostle's expression, at all events, must not be regarded as a mere form, but as candid emotion (Meyer); which yet does not exclude the thought indicated above (Chrysostom, Grotius).—εὐλογητός, בָּרֵךְ.† Who is blessed, with reference to all future eternity, is likewise an expression of the confident expectation that he shall be blessed (Meyer therefore rejects, without good reason, the explanation of Fritzsche: celebrandus).

Ver. 26. For this cause God gave them up. The διὰ τοῦτο refers specifically to ver. 25, and takes its place with the διὸ of ver. 24 and the διότι of ver. 21 as a subdivision under ver. 18.

Unto shameful passions. The ἀτιμία was already in ver. 24, but now it becomes a passion. Meyer: πάθη ἀτιμ., genit. qual. Since whoredom is also a shameful passion, the substantive must be retained: Passions of the shameful and degraded

* [So also Meyer (Erguss der errigten Fiedr), Alford, and others. † [It is in the Bible only applied to God, while μακάριος and the corresponding Hebrew בָּרֵךְ, happy, is applied to man, very rarely to God (only in two passages of the N. T. 1 Tim. i. 11; vi. 15). The E. V. renders εὐλογητός (and εὐλογημένος; always and properly blessed, but varies in its translation of μακάριος between happy and blessed; using the latter in those passages where spiritual happiness or the future glory of saints or the blessedness of God is intended as Ps. l. 1; xxxii. 1; Luke l. 48; Matt. v. 3-11; 1 Tim. i. 11; vi. 15; Titus ii. 13.—P. condition. There was first a departure from honor to simple dishonor; then still further downward, to a passionate course of dishonor, which might almost be described as passion for villainess. The unnatural sins of lust rest upon unnatural passions, and these spring from the root of the unnatural, lying deification of creatures and images. Man is for God in a religious sense, as the man and woman are for each other in a moral point of view: this is the natural condition, the truth of the relations (Eph. v. 25). Therefore the perversion of nature, unnaturalness, or the lie of the service of the creature and of the idols, is punished by the perversion of nature, unnaturalness, or the lie of sexual gratification. Tholuck praises the modest reticence of the Apostle in the expression, although his expression is clear enough. He also says: "The self-degradation and self-condemnation of man appears most strikingly in the peculiarly (?) Grecian sin of pederasty (ἀρσενοκοίται, 1 Cor. vi. 9), which, at the time when Paul wrote, was largely practised also in Rome. After Xenophon, De Lacedæm. Republ., ii. 14, has mentioned that this vice was forbidden by Lycurgus, he adds, that this is not believed by some, ἐν πολλαῖς γὰρ τῶν πόλεων οἱ νόμοι οὐκ ἐναντιοῦνται ταῖς πρὸς τοῖς παῖδας ἐπιθυμίαις. Even the most distinguished men have incurred grave suspicions in this matter, some justly, others unjustly. Comp. Gessner, De pederastia Socratis in vet. diss. Got. ii. p. 125. Seneca, a contemporary of Paul, writes in Rome, Ep. 35: Transeo puerorum infelicitum greges, quos post transacta convivia alius cubiculi contumelia exspectant; transeo agmina exoletorum per nationes coloresque descripta. The most hideous and yet the most accurate picture of Roman licentiousness at that time, is given by Petronius, a contemporary of the Apostle. Even women (called tribades) committed the same outrage, which was called by a smoother term after a famous predecessor in the crime, "Sapphic Love." [Seneca writes, Ep. 95: "Libidine vero ne maribus quidem cedunt, pati nata; dii illas deaque male perant, adeo perverum commenta genus impudicitia viros incunt."]

For even their women. Θήλειαι and ἄρσενες, instead of γυναῖκες and ἄνδρες, on account of the sexual reference. Reiche says erroneously: In a contemptuous sense, for description of the bestial. The expression χρησται is euphemistic for usus venereus, and therefore we must not supply τοῦ ἄρσενος, or τῆς θηλείας (Fritzche). Tholuck explains thus: The Apostle places the female sex first, because the abomination of the crime is most horrible in that sex, whose noblest ornament is modesty (1 Tim. ii. 9) [similarly Hodge]. It may be observed, on the contrary, that the Apostle here generally passes from the less to the more abominable crime. He probably alludes, in ver. 26 (as Tholuck remarks), to the debauchery of the tribades (frictrices, "the Lesbian vice," λεβιάζων), where women commit abuses with women, but perhaps he included the more secret sin of onanism. This appears from the antithesis in ver. 27: Men with men. This sin is referred in a two-fold way to the deification of the creature: by μετήλλαξαν and by παρά φύσιν.

Ver. 27. And likewise also the men. The construction indicates that the unnatural burning (ἐκκαίεσθαι = ποροῦσθαι, 1 Cor. vii. 9) was inflamed by unnatural excitement in the shameful act itself. The κατεργαζόμενοι means the complete perpetration of the abomination.—"Receiving in themselves the due reward of their error." According to Ammon and others, the destructive consequences of lust. According to Tholuck, the self-degradation. According to Meyer, the designated lusts themselves, as the punishment for the πλάνη, vers. 21-23. [Alford and Hodge likewise refer the πλάνη to their departure from God into idolatry.—P. S.] But the πλάνη is certainly the godless aberration into unnaturalness—that is, into a lie against nature, and we must think of the punishment as proportionate thereto; therefore not only the absolute self-deception, but also the shameful perversion of the sexual character (a man in a horrible way "the woman of all men"). Therefore, in themselves, not through themselves (Tholuck); nor "reciprocally" (Meyer). Meyer erroneously excludes here from consideration the destructive results of debauchery.

Ver. 28. And as they did not deem it worth while [οὐκ ἰδοκίμασαν] to retain God. A further and more general development of moral corruption, based on a further and more general unfolding of religious corruption. Καθώς. The comparison is at the same time causal—which Tholuck denies. On the correspondence between the darkening of knowledge and practical corruption, see the quotations from the heathen writers, in Tholuck [and Wetstein. Cicero says, De Nat. Deor. 12: "Ha d scio, an, pietate adversus Deos sub lata, fides etiam et societas, et una excellentissima virtus iustitia tol'atur." The assertion of modern deists, rationalists, and infidels, that morality is independent of religion, is an idle delusion. The wise heathen knew better. Religion is the backbone of morality, and irreligion the mother of immorality and vice. He who is most true to God, is most true to himself and his fellow-men; and he who denies God, is not likely to recognize any binding obligation to man, except on purely selfish and utilitarian grounds. Immoral religionists and moral irreligionists are exceptions, and confirm the rule.—P. 8.] The δοκιμαῖαν = δοκιμον ἡγνίσθαι [here, to think it worthy, or worth while; comp. 1 Thess. ii. 4; 1 Cor. xvi. 8].—To retain God in (their) knowledge [ἐν ἐπιγνώσει, Erkenntnis]. Tholuck makes the ἐπιγνώσκων equal to the γινώσκων in ver. 21. But here the question is concerning perception—that is, the reception of knowledge into the inner life. Besides, the ἔχειν ἐν ἐπιγνώσκῃ is stronger than γινώσκων. Here again the punishment corresponds to the guilt; therefore the ἀδόκιμος νοῦς is not a mind incapable of judgment or discernment [judicii expertus], (Beza, Piscat. [Bengel]), but the adjective is passive, according to the use of language: worthless (good-for-nothing) mind. [δόκιμος, from δέχομαι, receivable, worthy of reception; ἀδόκιμος, worthless, worthy of rejection. The heathen did not lose the moral faculty of discerning between right and wrong, good and bad, but in spite of it they practised the bad, and encouraged its practice in others (ver. 32), thereby increasing their guilt. "It is the video meliora proboque, which makes the detiora sequor so peculiarly criminal."—P. S.] The οὐκ ἰδοιμασάν and ἀδόκιμος νοῦς are a paronomasy. The νοῦς is the perceiving and deciding intelligence, and mediates all the impressions for moral self-determination and action.—Things which are not becoming. The μὴ καθήκοντα, in the technical sense of the philosophical schools, are things contrary to duty, or immoral; but in a more popular sense here, they are an expression of moral abhorrence.

Vers. 29–32. Being filled with all unrighteousness. Tholuck: "The accusatives πεπληρωμένους, μιστοὺς, &c., depend on ποιεῖν, as Erasmus has already remarked: because their thoughts are so impure, they also commit unbecoming things." [Some connect the following accusatives with αὐτοῖς of the preceding verse, so as to express the state in which, and the reason why, God abandoned them; but it is better to connect them with the subject of ποιεῖν, understood, so as to express the consequences of such abandonment, and the various forms of τὰ μὴ καθήκοντα which they practised. πᾶσα ἀδικία, all manner of immorality, is general; the following terms are specifications. Similar catalogues of sins: 2 Cor. xii. 20; Gal. v. 19–21; Eph. v. 3; 1 Tim. i. 9, 10; 2 Tim. iii. 2–4.—P. S.] De Wette remarks that the following catalogue of sins, like a similar one in Gal. v. 19, is unsystematic; though ἀδικία stands first, as the principal conception. Likewise Tholuck (against Bengel's and Glückler's attempts at classification) maintains that the Apostle states a "συναθροισμὸς [rhetorical accumulation] of manifestations of sin," and cites the paronomasies φθόνου and φόνου, ἀνιέντοις and ἀνιέντοις. But the paronomasies are no proof, and so we attempt the following construction: *

I. Vices. The chief vice, ἀδικία, unrighteousness, at the head. This is divided into πονηρία, malice [disposition to inflict evil], wickedness—bold form; and into πλεονεξία, avarice, covetousness; κακία, badness, malice—pusillanimous form. On the addition of πορνεία to the above, see Textual Note [7]. The expression πεπληρωμένους means, that every wicked person had not merely one crime. By the vices are here meant permanent and cold traits of character, in distinction from deeds of impulse, in which the guilty persons appear as μιστοί, full and drunken.

* [The classification of Dr. Lange is certainly original and ingenious, and decidedly preferable to any other, although perhaps somewhat artificial. The next best classification is that of Bengel in Rom. i. 29: "Tota enumeratio ordinem habet supradictam, per membra nosem, in affectibus: tria, in sermone: tria, respectu Dei, et sui, et proximi; et duo, in rebus gerendis: scilicet, respectu necessitudinum." He also remarks that ἀδικία, the opposite of justitia, is put first, immiserationis last; justice has life, injustice death; ver. 32. But it seems to me that the Apostle, in this catalogue of vices, had regard not so much to systematic order, as to rhetorical effect, with the view to bring out more strikingly the absolute necessity of redemption. It is a rapid accumulation and rising climax to the crisis of the disease, which was the turning-point of the cure. Man's extremity was God's opportunity. Christ appeared "in the fulness of time," just when He was most needed, and when the way for His coming was fully prepared, both negatively by the hopeless corruption of society, and positively by the mission of the law and the promise in Israel, and the aspirations of the better class of heathen.—P. S.]

II. Evil deeds, or criminal acts. The chief sin, φθόνος, envy, at the head; divided into φόνος, murder; ἔρις, strife, contention; δόλος, deceit, or fraud; κακοήθεια, maliginity, treacherous conduct. The chief source is φθόνος; but in all these evil deeds they appear as drunken.

III. Wicked characters according to their deeds. ψιθυρισταί, whisperers, backbiters [one who slanders secretly]; καταλάλοι, slanders, calumniators; θεοστυγείς, haters of God, despisers of God, scorning God (Gottverächter). Tholuck: Promethean characters. In the classic literature, and especially the tragic department, the word occurs only in the passive meaning: hated by God, hateful to God [see the quotations of Meyer in loc.]; but the context plainly declares in favor of the active rendering, which has been adopted by most commentators from Theodoret down to the present, and which alone is in harmony with the Christian spirit. Classic usage also favors the accessory thought: ungodly, wicked. ἰβρησταί, insolent, overbearing, those who perpetrate criminal ἔβρη; ὑπερήφανοι, those who are proud, self-conceited, those who conduct themselves arrogantly above others; ἀλαζόνες, boasters, who do not design, like the previous class, to crush others by the force of their greatness, but make a lying show of it; ἐφευρέται κακῶν, inventors of villainies, or crimes, swindlers, and adventurers; γονεῦσιν ἀπειθεῖς, disobedient to parents; apostasy from the piety and affection due to parents is a fountain of corruption (see Malachi iv. 6; Luke i. 17). [Hodge: "That such should be included in this fearful list, shows the light in which filial disobedience is regarded by the sacred writers."—P. S.]

IV. (Ver. 31.) Wicked characters according to their sentiments, in leading psychological types. ἀσύνετοι, without understanding [or insight into moral things, blinded, besotted]; corrupted intelligence; ἀσύνθετοι, according to Philippi, and others, quarrelsome, implacable; according to Meyer, covenant-breakers [perfidious]; we construe the expression psychologically: unstable, unreliable—corrupted will. ἀστοργοι, destitute of affection, heartless; wanting even in natural feeling and natural love—corrupted feeling. (ἀσπονδοι, implacable, irreconcilable. Probably an insertion). ἀνελήμονες, unmerciful, without pity and compassion: a totally corrupted state of feeling (Matt. xxv. 31 ff.).

V. Wicked maxims (ver. 32). Demoniacal pleasure in wickedness on the part of those who are conscious of the deadly guilt of sin (for example, heathen philosophers, magistrates, judges, etc.); and who not only commit sins worthy of death, but also approve them in others by their endorsement and principles.—The οἰκτιρῶνς announces a new element, a new degree. This degree was of course not reached or thoroughly accomplished by all, but the generality were guilty to this degree—a fact which is shown by the crucifixion of Christ. Grotius has alluded to the defence of many crimes by the philosophers [e. g., the defence of hatred, revenge, even pederasty and sodomy]; and Heumann [and Ewald] to lax criminal justice. The δ. καί of God in the knowledge of the Gentiles is in part the institution of law and in part God's punitive dealing, so far as the latter is referred by the heathen conscience to Divine justice. [δικαιοσύνη (comp. Luke i. 6; Rom. ii. 26; viii. 4; Apoc. xv. 5, in the Septuagint often for the Hebrew דִּקְיָה, דִּקְיָה, דִּקְיָה) is here the righteous decree or sentence of God as the Lawgiver and Judge, declaring what is right and wrong, and connecting death with sin, and life with righteousness. Meyer: Rechtsbestimmung; Lange: Rechtstheil; Alford: sentence; Wordsworth and Hodge: decree. This decree is inscribed not only on the revealed law of the Old Testament, but also on the conscience or moral sense of every man. The latter is here meant.—P. 8.]

Ver. 32. Are worthy of death. Photius: According to the Mosaic law. The Socinians: Civil punishment by death. Meyer: Eternal death, by which Paul has in mind the heathen notion of the state of punishment in Hades.* Fritzsche and De Wette: The misery of sin, and similar results. But the meaning is the general idea of death in the Gentile consciousness of guilt, as the punishment of the most varied forms of sin. [Alford: θάνατος, a general term for the fatal consequence of sin; that such courses lead to ruin. Hodge: All evil inflicted for the satisfaction of justice. This passage shows that the judicial abandonment of God does not destroy the free agency or responsibility of men. The stream which carries them away is not without, but within; it is their own corrupt nature. Umbreit: Life and death are ever set over against one another in the Old and New Testaments, the one as including all good, the other as all evil.—P. 8.] The πράσσειν is a stronger expression. [It brings out more clearly the idea of repetition and continuance of action than ποιεῖν.—P. 8.]

The progress is very apparent from wicked passions to wicked acts; from these, to wicked characters, according to the positive methods of action; from these, to wicked characters in whom the inclination for what is good is extinguished; and from these, finally, to wicked maxims. This progress is also expressed by the change of the forms. The same sins are not described throughout these different categories. According to the fundamental conception of unrighteousness, the first category may be regarded as the general category. The second describes sins against our fellow-men in their individual relation; the third, those against human society; the fourth passes on to settle the character of self-corruption in its psychological forms of sentiment; and the fifth, to the complete demoniacal consciousness and approval of sin.

[This dark picture of heathen corruption (which does not exclude honorable exceptions; comp. Rom. ii. 14, 26) is by no means overdrawn, and can be fully verified by testimonies from the first writers of the classical age of ancient Greece and Rome, such as Thucydides (iii. 82-84, on the moral state of Greece during the Peloponnesian war), Aristophanes, Horace, Catullus, Juvenal, Persius, Salust, Seneca, Tacitus, Suetonius. Comp. my Church History, vol. i. p. 302 ff., and the works quoted there. I shall only refer to a passage from Seneca, the philosopher and contemporary of Paul, De Ira, ii. 8: "All is full of crime and vice; there is more committed than can be healed by punishment. A monstrous prize contest of wickedness is going on. The desire to sin increases, and shame decreases day by day. . . . Vice is no longer practised secretly, but in open view. Villeness gains in every street and in every breast to such an extent, that innocence has become not only rare, but has ceased to exist." It is true, the history of Christian countries often presents a similar picture of moral corruption (with the exception of those unnatural vices described vers. 26 and 27, which have almost disappeared, or greatly diminished within the pale of Christian civilization). Think of the state of the Latin Christians in the fifth century as described by the priest Salvianus, who charges them with every vice, and puts them, in a moral point of view, beneath the barbarians; of the condition of Catholic France under Louis XIV. and XV.; and of the large capitals of Europe and America in our days. Yea, in some respects the most diabolical forms of sin are brought out by contrast under the Christian dispensation, and apostasy from Christianity is worse than heathenism (comp. 2 Tim. iii. 1-9). But there remains this radical difference; the heathen corruptions were produced and sanctioned by the heathen mythology and idolatry; while Christian nations are corrupt in spite of and in direct opposition to Christianity, which raises the highest standard of virtue, and acts continually on the world as a purifying and sanctifying power.—P. 8.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The revelation of God's salvation is at the same time a revelation of God's wrath. One conception is eclipsed by the other. It is a vain delusion to imagine that we can separate the doctrine of redemption from that of wrath. The conception of wrath is the conception of the absolute and personal energy of the Divine government of love in punitive righteousness. Redeeming love is the absolute and personal energy of Divine righteousness in the saving exercise of love. Can a soul enjoy the experience of salvation by faith, without passing through an internal judgment, and feeling of Divine displeasure? For further information, see the Exeg. Notes; Tholuck, pp. 56, 57; Meyer, p. 49; the article Zorn Gottes, in Herzog's Realencyklopädie [vol. xviii. p. 657 ff.], together with the literature on the subject enumerated there [especially the monograph on the Wrath of God by Ferdinand Weber, with prolegomena on the doctrine of the atonement by Frans Delitzsch, Erlangen, 1862.—P. 8.]

2. The essential characteristic of all forms of unbelief consists in men's holding back or hindering the truth in unrighteousness. "Modern culture" attempts to separate the ideas ἀνομία and ἀπίθεια utterly from each other. But the biblical view will not allow such a separation. Unbelief is misconduct toward the moral claims within the horizon of the internal life. This misconduct has its degrees. The germ and principle is sin as transgression (παράβασις) in general. The definite determination is apostasy, which manifests itself also as opposition to Divine truth. Therefore the two fundamental forms of specific unbelief are: apostasy, and hostile attack. The third degree is hardness of heart. But the measure of power in human obstacles to the revelation of God is related to the power of Divine reaction against these obstacles, just as the power of man (as weakness) is related to the omnipotence of God.

3. The idea of the revelation of God by nature pervades the entire Bible. See Ps. viii., xix., civ., and others; Isa. xl. According to Schneckenburger (Beiträge zur Einleitung in's Neue Testament, 10th essay: Paul's Natural Theology, and its Sources), Philo was Paul's source. See thereon, Tholuck, p. 64. The pamphlet of Hebart also belongs here: Die natürliche Theologie des Apostels Paulus (Nürnberg, 1860); likewise Zöckler's Theologia Naturalis, or Entwurf einer systematischen Naturtheologie. [Frankfurt a. M., 1860, 2 vols.] The latter has viewed natural theology in a more primitive than usual sense. We must bear in mind that natural theology, since the revelation of salvation, has assumed a different form from what it had before the revelation of salvation, and especially as the basis of the original revelation. The symbolical natural religion which prevailed down to Abraham is distinguished from the revelation of salvation herein, that God revealed Himself there specially by symbols and signs, but here by the Word. See also the article Raymond of Sabunde, in Herzog's Real-encyklopädie [vol. xii. p. 571].

4. According to Paul, as according to all the Holy Scriptures, humanity has fallen from its original ideal height; but according to the majority of those who set themselves up as the advocates of "modern culture," it has risen from a rough, beast-like state. Wherefore Reiche also (p. 157) has expressed the opinion that the Apostle has here expressed only a contemporary opinion of the Jews. The testimony of history is against the view of "modern culture." It proves the gradual decay of the Hindus, the Arabians, the Ethiopians, the Indians, and, finally, even of the Greco-Roman world, with all its relative glory.

5. It is improper to regard the description of the Apostle as a description only of the corruption of the heathen world. It shows us first how the Gentile world arose, and then what became of it; but it does not commence with a Gentile world. Therefore it goes back, fundamentally, to the genesis of sin in the fall of man; but then it shows how the fall of man in its second form (with the self-boasting of man after the flood) became the genesis of real heathendom. The corruption arose from the original symbolical religion which prevailed from Adam down to Abraham. For men magnified the simple symbolism of nature—which God had given—by their own arbitrary symbolizations, and then mythicized the symbols; that is, they deified them. Thus mythology arose from symbolism, and idolatry and then image-worship arose from the symbolical view of nature. Recent research has commenced to exhume from the ruins of myths the gold of the original symbolism. Comp. my treatise On the Relation between General and Ecclesiastical Symbolism, in the Deutsche Zeitschrift für Christliche Wissenschaft, &c., 1855, Nos. 4-6; and the recent writings on heathendom by Wuttke [Geschichte des Heidenthums, 1852 ff.], Döllinger [Heidenthum und Judenthum, 1851], Stiefelhagen, Lasaulx, and others. [Schelling, Philosophie der Mythologie, 1857; Fabri, Die Entstehung des Heidenthums, 1859; Nägelsbach on the Homeric, and Post-Homeric Theology, 1840, 1857; Gladstone, Studies on Homer, 1858; W. S. Tyler, The Theology of the Greek Poets, 1867.—P. S.]

6. The description of the original form of natural religion does not justify the conclusion that the revelation of God in Christ would not have occurred under the presupposition of human righteousness. But it leads us to conclude that the progress from the one to the other would have been effected in the form of a historical continuity.

7. The explanation of Gentile corruption from the great peccatum omissionis. "They have not honored and thanked God" (ver. 21); this is a penetrating glance which sheds its light also upon the first fall, as well as upon every genesis of sin. On the significance of this passage for the whole Epistle, see the Introduction and the Exeg. Notes.

8. God's positive government, which impels evil through trial and temptation into the process of development from righteous judgment (sin punished by sin) and to righteous judgment (Rom. xi. 32), corresponds with God's negative abandonment, in which the first ground for the punishment is revealed, not only because God, as the Holy One, must withdraw His Spirit from the consciousness of sinful man, but also because He regards man in his freedom, and leaves him to its action (see my Positive Dogmatics, p. 468).

[Sin punished by sin. The Rabbinical tract, Pirké Aboth, c. 2, ver. 1, says: "Festina ad præceptum leve tanquam ad grave, et fuge transgressionem; præceptum enim trahit præceptum, et transgressio transgressionem; quia merces præcepti præceptum est, et transgressionis transgressio." Seneca (Ep. 16): "The first and greatest punishment of any commission of sin is the sin itself which is committed." De Wette, ad Rom. i. 24: "This view (that sin is punished by sin) is no mere Jewish doctrine, but it is universally true from the absolute standpoint of religion." Schiller:

"This is the very curse of evil deed,
That of new evil it becomes the seed."

But this judicial punishment of sin with sin does not make God the author of sin in any sense. Dr. South (Serm. ii. on 2 Thess. ii. 11) says: "God may make one sin the punishment of another, though it still is to be remembered that it is one thing for God to give a man over to sin, and quite another for God to cause him to sin; the former importing in it no more than God's providential ordering of a man's circumstances, so that he shall find no check or hindrance in the course of his sin; but the latter implying also a positive efficiency toward the commission or production of a sinful act; which God never does, nor can do; but the other He both may, and, in a judicial way, very often does. . . . In all which God is not at all the author of sin, but only pursues the great work and righteous ends of His providence, in disposing of things or objects in themselves good or indifferent, toward the compassing of the same; howbeit, through the poison of men's vicious affections, they are turned into the opportunities and fuel of sin, and made the occasion of their final destruction; ix. 17, 22." Dr. Hodge: "God often punishes one sin by abandoning the sinner to the commission of others. Paul repeats this idea three times, vers. 24, 26, 28. This judicial abandonment is consistent with the holiness of God and the free agency of man. God does not impel or entice to evil. He ceases to restrain. He says of the sinner, Let him alone; vers. 24-28."—P. S.]

9. The deep truth in the proof of the connection between religious and moral corruption.

10. The intimate connection between the denial of the δόξα of God and the degradation of the δόξα of the human form by whoredom, and between the denial of the truth of God and the degradation of the true relations of human nature, as represented by Paul, has not been properly observed. See Ezeg. Notes.

11. Other enumerations of sins and crimes in the Scriptures: see 2 Cor. xii. 20; Gal. v. 19; Eph. v. 3; 1 Tim. i. 9; 2 Tim. iii. 2.

12. Sin reaches its climax in wicked maxims and principles. They are demoniacal in their character, and the intellectual side of the service of the devil, which may be known not only in its gross forms, but also in the subtle form of cowardly idolatry of what is base, and which in this shape is widely diffused. [Yet, even in the most reprobate sinner, the voice of conscience cannot be entirely extinguished ("knowing the judgment of God," ver. 32). It makes him uneasy and miserable on earth, and will be his condemnation in the other world.—P. S.]

13. While the Apostle has here described the dark side of heathendom, the second chapter shows that the whole of heathendom does not appear to him under this dark aspect. In the first chapter he describes the prevailing Antinomian tendency of heathendom, in opposition to the prevailing legalistic tendency of Judaism.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

VERS. 18-21.

In what does the beginning of all the real sinful corruption of the world, and of the Gentiles in particular, consist? 1. In the neglect of the general manifestations of God by creation; 2. in neglect to worship God by praise and thanksgiving.—Against what will God's wrath be sent from heaven? 1. Against all ungodliness; 2. against all unrighteousness of men who hold back the truth in unrighteousness (ver. 18).

The revelation of wrath, and the revelation of love, as they, 1. Are opposed to each other; 2. are closely connected with each other.—The revelation of God in nature is a revelation of His invisible nature—that is, of His eternal power and Godhead (vers. 19, 20).—He who knows God, should praise and thank Him.—The knowledge and worship of God.—Neglect of the worship of God leads to obscuring the knowledge of God (ver. 21).

LUTHER: Where there is no faith, reason falls from one depth to another, until it is totally blinded in its speculations, as is the case with all self-conceited and heated brains (ver. 21).

STARKE: Even after the fall, every man has a natural knowledge of the nature and works of God; yet this is not sufficient to lead him to salvation (ver. 19).—God esteems our knowledge according to the means we have of obtaining it. Thus He demands more knowledge from the Jews than from the Gentiles, and still more from us Christians (ver. 21).—As God is a living God, so must our knowledge of Him also be vital, and express itself in praise and thanks (ver. 21).—LANGH Op. Bibl.: Whoever denies the wrath of God, and describes God alone according to mere love, thereby obscures also the greatness of the grace and love of God, and leads others to despise this grace and love (ver. 18).—HEIDINGER: God does not leave Himself without a witness among the heathen. All creatures eloquently testify to His might and wisdom (ver. 20). From QUENNEL: Hugo de Arca: Omnis creatura tribus vocibus nobis loquitur: prima est famulantis, accipit beneficium; secunda admonentis, reddere debitum et vitium; tertia comminantis, fuge supplicium (ver. 20).

BENGEL: Whatever is under heaven, and not under the gospel, is under the wrath (ver. 18).—The heart of man conforms to its thoughts (ver. 21).

GERLACH: The sin against which God's wrath is directed shows itself in the double form of ungodliness and unrighteousness, according as man sins more directly against God, or against himself and his neighbor (ver. 18).—As soon as man ceases to direct himself to the holy and gracious God, he worships only God's power and beauty (?), and makes Nature his God (ver. 21).

HUBNER: The denial of God can never be excused, for man can know God (ver. 19).

THE PERICOPHE for the 11th Sunday after Trinity (vers. 16-20).—HUBNER: The joy of the Christian in the confession of faith: 1. Disposition; 2. necessity; 3. how are we fitted for it?—How shall we learn to estimate properly the value of the gospel? 1. When we experience its power in our own hearts; 2. when we perceive properly the wretched condition of the human race without Christianity—its religious as well as its moral condition; 3. when we learn the insufficiency of natural religion, which reveals God's existence and power, but not His mercy toward sinners.—The relation of natural and revealed religion: 1. Harmony; 2. difference; 3. inference.

LANG: For the wrath of God. Wrath a proof of the gospel: 1. Of its necessity; 2. its truth; 3. its glory.—On the difference between the knowledge and perception of God.—The general manifestation of God, or the relation between natural religion and revealed religion in its narrower sense.—The beginning of all sin is always at bottom a sin of neglect.—The two sides of piety: to praise God, and to thank Him.

[TILLOTSON: Vers. 18, 19. If it were only the wrath and displeasure of men that the sinner were exposed to, there might be reason enough for fear but the wrath and vengeance of men bears no comparison with the wrath of God. Their arm is short, and their power small; they may shoot their most poisonous arrows at us, and at last kill us; but they cannot pursue us into the other world. But the wrath of God has none of these limits.—The fear of God's wrath: Men may harden their foreheads, and conquer all sense of shame; but they cannot perfectly stifle and subdue their fears. They can hardly so extinguish the fear of hell, but that some sparks of that fire will ever and anon be flying about in their consciences.—SOUTH (sermon on Natural Religion without Revelation, sufficient to render a sinner inexcusable (ver. 20): I heartily wish that all young persons would lodge this one observation deep in their minds: That God and nature have joined wisdom and virtue by such a near cognation, or, rather, such an inseparable connection, that a wise, prudent, and honorable old age is seldom or never found but as the reward and effect of a sober, virtuous, and well-spent youth.—SCOTT: Even to this day, if any nations seem to be sunk into so entire a stupidity as to have no notions of a God remaining among them, this still more clearly proves, not man's want of rational powers, but his carnal enmity to God and religion, through which he becomes more and more the besotted and blind slave of Satan.—CLARKE: Paul's purpose is to show: 1. That all the heathen nations are utterly corrupt, and deserving of punishment; 2. that the Jews, notwithstanding the greatness of their privilege, were no better than the Gentiles.—HODGE: The folly and darkness of which the Apostle here speaks are expressive of want of Divine knowledge, which is but the effect and cause of moral depravity.—J. F. H.]

VERS. 22-32.

Abandonment of the Gentile world: 1. Why did God abandon them? a. Because they changed His glory into something transitory and corruptible; b. His truth into a lie. 2. In what respect did God abandon them? a. In pollution of the flesh and spirit; b. in utter hardness of heart (vers. 22-32).—How dreadful to be abandoned by God! Because 1. His Spirit departs; 2. sin becomes punishment.—Has Paul described the moral pollution of the Gentile world in too dark colors? No. For what the Apostle says is corroborated by witnesses from its very midst. 1. Of ancient times (Aristophanes, Horace, Juvenal); 2. of the present day (modern Hindu literature, &c.).—He who would describe sin, must be strengthened by looking up to God (ver. 26).—The heathen world of the present day is the same as that at the time of Paul, and therefore can be converted only by the same means (the gospel).—He who knows how to do good, and does not do it, sins (ver. 32).—What men are hardened? Those who (1) know God's righteousness, (2) yet do what deserves death, and (3) are not contented to have pleasure in those who do it (ver. 32).

LUTHER: The real Epicureans are those who live as if there were no God; who boast much, and would have others boast of them that they are something extraordinary, when they really are not (ver. 30).

STARKE: It was a crime of pride, when they said, We are not so foolish (ver. 22).—To consider one's self wise and shrewd, and yet to possess foolish principia, is the greatest folly; especially when exhibited by the world's wise men in published writings (ver. 22).—The wisest and most learned are often also the most perverted.—It is absolutely unreasonable to worship God under the image of a beast; for what king, prince, and honorable man would permit himself to be represented in the form of an ox, or hog (!). How much less can God be treated thus (ver. 23).—He who forsakes God, will be forsaken also by God (ver. 24).—The most direct path to atheism, is to regard God unworthy to be known (ver. 28).—Goodness goes gently, but evil goes violently, and will be host in the house. It foams and ferments like new wine (ver. 29).—HEDINGER: Sin is sometimes the punishment of sin (ver. 24).—OSLANDER Bibl.: Teachers and preachers must be careful to speak of sins against God and nature in such a way that those sins be prevented and guarded against, rather than learned and committed (ver. 26).—CRAMER: Although the neglect to know God is regarded by the world as no sin, or, if a sin, the least of all, it is really a fountain of all sin, and, finally, of all the penalties consequent upon sin (ver. 28).

HEUBNER: The ruin of the Gentile world is a warning for Christians: Apostasy from the word of God induces similar aberrations at all times—a new though more refined heathenism (ver. 23).—God for sakes only those who will not hear Him (ver. 24).—A wicked state of heart leads to absolute pleasure in wickedness itself (ver. 32).

BESSER: Unnaturalness follows from the deification of nature (ver. 27).

LANG: The connection between religious and moral ruin is exhibited also in the world at the present time.—The barbarous disregard of the human person in all sexual sins, as often concealed beneath the most refined masks of culture, is closely connected with the irreligious disregard of the personality of God and man.—A fundamental sanctification of the sexual relations can arise only from the vital knowledge of the dignity of personal life.—Sin taking on the form of the devilish nature in wicked maxima.

[SCOTT: Religion moderates and regulates natural affections, but excess of depravity extinguishes them. It is a proof of more determined impiety for men to take pleasure in the company of the enemies of God, than to commit many crimes whilst the heart and conscience protest against them.—CLARKE: We see what the world was, and what it would ever have been, had not God sent a divine revelation of His will, and established a public ministry to proclaim it. Were man left to the power and influence of his fallen nature, he would always be what the Apostle here describes as the condition of the Gentile world.—Comprehensive Comm.: No wickedness so heinous, but a reprobate mind will comply.

HODGE (condensed): 1. It is the very nature of sin to be inexcusable, and worthy of punishment; 2. as the works of God reveal His eternal power and Godhead, we should accustom ourselves to see in them the manifestations of His perfections; 3. the human intellect is as erring as the human heart; 4. as the light of nature is insufficient to lead the heathen to God and holiness, it is our obvious and urgent duty to send them the light of the Bible; 5. sins of uncleanness are peculiarly debasing and demoralizing; 6. to take pleasure in those who do good, makes us better; as to delight in those who do evil, is the surest way to become even more degraded than they are themselves.—Compare two sermons by R. SOUTH on The Heinous Guilt of Taking Pleasure in Other Men's Sins; and sermon by C. GIRDLESTONE on Pleasure in the Sight of Sin (Parochial Sermons).—J. F. H.]

[Ver. 32. SOUTH (Sermon on the text): That sin (which sympathizes with and patronizes the sinner) is a pitch beyond all other sins, and such an one as must nonplus the devil himself to proceed farther. It is the very extremity, the fulness, and the concluding period of sin; the last line and finishing stroke of the devil's image, drawn upon the soul of man.—P. S.]

THIRD SECTION.—Gradual transition from the corruption of the Gentiles to that of the Jews. The universality of the corruption, and, with the universality of guilt, that worst corruption, the judgment of others. This judgment is likewise judged by the continuance of a universal antagonism, within the universal corruption, between pious, earnest men, and obstinate rebels, both among Gentiles and Jews, in view of the righteous, impartial government of God by virtue of the continuance of the universal legislation of God in the conscience. The revelation of the antagonism of loyal Gentiles and disloyal Jews on the day of the proclamation of the gospel.

TEXTUAL.

² Ver. 5.—καὶ after ἀποκαλύψουσιν is nowise sustained either by the Codd. or by the connection. [Probably inserted to relieve the number of genitives. Meyer: The καὶ would make the sense: the appearance of God and His righteous judgment. But the term ἀποκαλύψουσιν τοῦ θεοῦ is unusual. Paul speaks only of the ἀνοκ. Χριστοῦ, 1 Cor. 1. 7; 1 Thess. 1. 7.—P. 8.]

³ Ver. 7.—(On the different constructions see the Eng. Notes.—P. 8.)

⁴ Ver. 8.—The rec. θεμικὸς καὶ ὀργή. [The reverse order is intrinsically preferable and sustained by K. A. B. D^e. G. Vulg. Syr., &c., and adopted by the critical editors. The change in the construction from the accusative ὀργῆς αἰσίων (ἀποδοίσει), ver. 7, to the nominative ὀργή καὶ θεμικός (ἀποδοίσει or ἔσθῃ), ver. 8, is no doubt intentional

God gives eternal life, and wills all men to be saved; but condemnation is man's own guilt, and comes, so to speak, De merito. Comp. (Eusebius, Wordsworth, Hodge, and Forbes in loc. Bengel, on Matt. vii. 24, says: "Salvatis Deum ad se referi; mala a se remouet."—P. 8.]

* Ver. 11.—[Literally, acceptance of faces. For προσωποληψία, several Codd. (A. D. G. and Sinaiticus) read προσωποληψία, with an μ, and this reading has been adopted by Lachmann, Alford, and others here and elsewhere (Acts x. 34; James ii. 9). The insertion of a μ is probably Alexandrian usage, and due to a vicious pronunciation of β and π.—P. 8.]

* Ver. 13.—The article [before νόμον in both cases, which is found in the text. rec.] is wanting in A. B. D. E. (and in Cod. Sin., and is probably inserted to indicate that the written law of Moses is meant here. Nevertheless the article before law may be properly retained in the E. V. Alford proposes to omit the article before hearers, and doers, since a in both cases is generic. οἱ ἀκούοντες νόμον and οἱ ποιῶντες νόμον form properly one word: Gesetzeshörer, Gesetzethäter law-hearers, law-doers.—P. 8.]

* Ver. 14.—[ἐν νῷ, not τὰ ἔννοιαν. The omission of the article is important to avoid the appearance of conflict with the general moral depravity of the heathen, as taught i. 22 ff.—P. 8.]

* Ver. 14.—[Dr. Lange translates. etwa thun, and so renders the force of the subjunctive προσέσθαι, which is better attested (A. A. B.) than the indicative προσέσθαι, and is adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford. Others read the singular προσέσθαι with reference to the neutral plural ἐν νῷ (Meyer, Wordsworth).—P. 8.]

* Ver. 14.—[There is, as Meyer remarks, a difference of emphasis between μὴ νόμον ἔχ. and νόμον μὴ ἔχ.; the first denies the possession of the law, the second the possession of the law. This difference can perhaps best be rendered in English by: having no law, and not having the law.—P. 8.]

* Ver. 15.—[The inward monitor of the heathen condemns or acquits their moral conduct. The καὶ after ἡ is concessive, and implies that the acquittal is the exception, the condemnation the rule. μετὰ δὲ ἀλλήλων must not be separated, and μετὰ is to be taken not as adverb, as in the E. V., but as preposition, inter se, between one another, invisum, alternately; comp. Acts xv. 9: ἐδικρίνε μετὰ ἑαυτῶν καὶ αὐτῶν; Matt. xviii. 15: μετὰ σοῦ καὶ αὐτοῦ. The ἀλλήλων may refer either to the ἐθνῶν, as the preceding αὐτῶν (Meyer, Lange), or to the following τῶν διαλογισμῶν, i. e. thought against thought in inner strife. See Exeg. Notes. Omit the parenthesis vers. 13, 14, and 15 (E. V.), or of 14 and 15 (Lachmann, Meyer), which only disturbs the connection. See Exeg. Notes on ver. 14.—P. 8.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Summary.—These are the parts of this highly important section: 1. Every judgment pronounced on another becomes the self-condemnation of the one judging; for he is in the same condemnation with the one who is judged by him. Herein the sin of the Jews is already presupposed (vers. 1-5). 2. The righteousness of God is exalted above all partial righteousness; and in its retribution it distinguishes between men who earnestly long after righteousness, and those who obstinately resist; between men who constantly look toward things eternal, and those whose principle of life is contention and party spirit (vers. 6-11). This opposition constitutes a higher ideal and dynamic opposition between pious and ungodly people above the historical antagonism of Jews and Gentiles, and independently of it, so that, on the day of the declaration of the gospel, Jews may appear as Gentiles, and Gentiles as Jews (vers. 12-16).

FIRST PARAGRAPH, VERS. 1-5.

Ver. 1. Wherefore thou art inexcusable. It may be asked, To what does διό, wherefore, refer? 1. To the fundamental thought of the whole section of chap. i. 18-32 (Meyer, and others). 2. διό refers back to the δικαίωμα in ver. 32 (De Wette, Philippi [Alford, Hodge]). 3. διό points proleptically to the sins of the Jews (Bengel, Tholuck). We need hardly mention Bullinger's explanation: It is continuationis particula; proterea. We here find a definite reference to chap. i. 32. The οὕτως indicates chiefly the climax of Gentile corruption; but Gentile and Jewish corruption meet together at this climax. Gentile corruption culminates in the approval of evil, and Jewish in judging. But their common corruption is the perfect moral self-contradiction: sin against better knowledge and conscience. Therefore ἀναπολόγητοι, inexcusable, are not merely those who contribute aid to evil-doers, but those also who pronounce sentence on them. In other words, not the διό, but ver. 32 is proleptic, especially in connection with the ἀνελήμονες in ver. 31.

O man, whosoever thou art. To whom is this address directed? 1 To the Gentiles. especially Gentile authorities (Chrysostom); their better-minded ones (Olshausen, Melancthon); their philosophers (Clericus). 2. The Jews (De Wette, Rückert, and others). Meyer: "Judging the Gentiles as rejected by God (Midr. Tillin l. 6, 3; Chetubb. l. 3, 2, &c.) was a characteristic of the Jews. [Alford: The Jew is not yet named, but hinted at.—P. 8.] 3. All men, without distinction (Beza, Calovius). 4. All men, but with a special reference to the Jews (Tholuck).* The last interpretation must be rendered more definite by the consideration that the merciless among Jews and Gentiles are meant. ὅς, in reality, every one is meant who makes himself guilty of condemnatory judgment (for this is the sense of κρίνω, here, as in Matt. vii. 1; xxv. 35). See vers. 9, 10. The Gentiles, too, were merciless judges. We need call to mind only Roman politics. Tholuck recalls the corruption of Jewish life at that time under Herod, and even among their scribes.—Εν ᾧ, wherein, is explained in ver. 21 sqq., and hence must not be understood as instrumental, ὃς which means, whereby; still less eodem tempore quo, at the time when (Köllner), but in that wherein, in the matter in which (Luther [E. V., Meyer, Alford], and others). [Thou that judgest doest the same things, τὰ γὰρ αὐτὰ πράσσεις ὁ κρίνων. Uncharitable judging is itself a grave offence against the law which enjoins humility and charity as the very soul of virtue and piety. Besides, even the most moral men carry in themselves the seed of all vices, and if kept from open transgression, it is either by the grace of God preventing them, or by (Pharisaic and Stoic) pride, which is itself a sin against God, the sin of Satan and the fallen angels.—P. 8.] The addition of ὁ κρίνων, "with reproachful expression" (Meyer).

Ver. 2. But we are sure, Οἶδαμεν. Who? 1. The Jews, as knowers of the law (Rosenmüller, and others).† 2. Universal human knowledge (Rück-ert, Meyer, Philippi [Hodge]). 3. Jewish-Christian knowledge, with reference to chap. iii. 19; vii. 14 (Tholuck). 4. Yet the consciousness here declared is the specifically Christian one, which is, however, anticipated by the better universal consciousness in forebodings of the common misery of sin.

* (Similarly Hodge: Though from what follows it is plain that the Jews are here intended, yet the proposition is made general. Wordsworth: Paul uses ἀνθρώπων instead of Ιουδαίων, because the proposition is of universal application, and because he would approach the Jew with gentleness, and not alienate him by an abrupt denunciation.—P. 8.)

† (Wordsworth: We who are Jews and have the Scriptures. The Apostle charitably and wisely identifies himself with the Jews to convince them from the conceded ground of the O. T.—P. 8.)

According to truth. Κατὰ ἀλήθειαν, not ἀληθῶς [revera, truly] (Raphel, Köllner, it is real), but [as in E. V.] according to truth (Tholuck, Meyer [Alford]); that is, corresponding to the internal and real relations of guilt [according to justice, without error, without respect of persons]. The condemnatory judgment of God on those who judge is according to the relations of truth, by which judgment they are the most condemnable who, without knowing it, pronounce judgment on themselves. Therefore they are hypocrites. [Κατὰ ἀλήθειαν belongs not to κρίμα, as the predicate of the sentence, but to ἐστίν, as adverb: it proceeds according to truth, or the judgment of God, which is according to truth, is against those, &c.—P. S.]

Ver. 3. And thinkest thou this, O man. According to Meyer and Tholuck, ver. 2 is the propositio major in relation to what here follows. If the Apostle had designed such a conclusion in ver. 5, the minor proposition of vers. 3 and 4 would have been otherwise expressed. We have here the beginning of the conclusion from the premise in ver. 2. Thinkest thou that, τοῦτο. Reference to the strange supposition that God will become, by way of exception, a partisan for him. Therefore also the σὺ is emphasized. Meyer: "In opposition to Jewish conceit." Matt. iii. 7; Luke iii. 7. Yet the expression here must not be limited to the Jews.—That thou [σὺ, thou thyself, thou above all others, thou because a Jew] shalt escape. Not by acquittal (Bengel [Hodge]), but by exemption. So Meyer: "Only the Gentiles shall be judged, according to the false opinion of the Jews (Bertholdt, Christologie, p. 206), but all Israel shall have part in the Messiah's kingdom as its true-born children (Matt. viii. 12)." [Comp. Matt. iii. 7, 9; John viii. 33.] The expression escape refers at the same time to an approaching actual judgment which will overtake every guilty person.

Ver. 4. Or despisest thou. This is a different case from the preceding. [It introduces a new error or objection.—P. S.] In what does the difference consist? Thou regardest thyself either exempt from punishment, because thou believest thyself a favorite of the Deity, and that thou shalt escape at the coming judgment; or thou dost wickedly regard the riches of God's goodness in delaying the punishment as a sign that the general judgment will never come to pass at all. Paul frequently uses πλοῦτος as an expression for great fulness [chap. ix. 23; xi. 33; Eph. i. 7, 18; ii. 7; iii. 16; Col. i. 27]. It is not a Hebraism, but found also in Plato and other Greek classics, to denote abundance and magnitude.—P. S.]—His goodness. The χρηστότης is, more specifically, mildness, beneficent goodness, in contrast with penal justice. It may be asked whether we should read: His goodness (χρηστότης) and forbearance (ἀνοχής) and long-suffering (μακροθυμίας), or whether the χρηστότης is here divided by καὶ-καὶ, as well, as also, into the idea of forbearance and long-suffering. We accept the latter, since the Apostle subsequently groups all again in τὸ χρηστόν. The Apostle Peter uses the same expression, μακροθυμία, for the two ideas: forbearance toward the weakness of friends and long-suffering toward the opposition of enemies [slowness in the infliction of deserved punishment]. But Pau distinguishes between patience or forbearance, chap. iii. 25, and long-suffering, chap. ix. 22, according to the relation already indicated. The ἀνοχή is about equal to the ἱπομονή, Col. i. 11, and the πραότης Col. iii. 12.—Compare ἀνιχόμενοι ἀλλήλων, Col. iii. 13; μακροθυμεῖτε πρὸς πάντας. It is thus natural that one idea should sometimes run into the other. Tholuck: "The word of Christ (Luke xix. 41; Matt. xxiv.) would cause the expectation of a judgment on Israel, which really occurred about twenty [ten] years after this Epistle. Here Pau may naturally have had this in view."—Ἄγνοῶν The translation Not knowing is too weak. [Dr Lange translates ἄγνοῶν: Indem du misskennst, wilfully ignoring; while Grotius, Tholuck, Wordsworth, al., render it: not considering.—P. S.] Meyer opposes the interpretation of ἄγνοῶν as wishing not to know (De Wette [Alford], and others). Yet wilful and culpable ignorance is certainly meant here (comp. ἄγνοια, Eph. iv. 18).—Is leading thee to repentance. ἄγει means, at all events, not only the objective intention of God (Philippi), but also the real determination of Divine goodness. [Bengel: Deus ducit volentem duci; ducit suavit, non cogit necessitate. Wordsworth: "The word ἄγει, leads, intimates the will of God, but also the will of man. God leads, but man may refuse to be led." To this Dr. Hodge assents, but adds, from his strict Calvinistic standpoint: "Who gives the will to be led? Is there no preventing grace [gratia preveniens]? Does not God work in us to will, as well as to do? Surely there is such a thing as being made willing without being forced. There is a middle ground between moral suasion and coercion. God supersedes the necessity of forcing, by making us willing in the day of His power. The Apostle, however, is not here speaking of gracious influence, but of the moral tendencies of providential dispensations."—P. S.]

Ver. 5. But, after thy hardness [Κατὰ δὲ τὴν σκληρότητά σου]. Evidently not a continuation of the question (Lachmann [Alford]), but antithesis. The hardened one mistakes the benign purpose of Divine government, and by this means transforms the same into a judgment. The question can therefore not be one of mere frustration. [Κατὰ is taken by some, in proportion to, so that the degree of punishment corresponds to the degree of hardness and impenitence; but by most commentators in the sense of secundum, i. e., as may be expected from thy hardness, agreeably to its nature.—P. S.]—And impenitent heart. This takes away from the idea the harsh appearance of a fatalistic compulsion. The hardness is voluntarily continued and magnified by impenitence of heart.—Thou treasurest up for thyself [thou for thyself, not God for thee.—P. S.] The verb θησαυρίζω is used in the wider sense of every accumulation, and denotes also ironically the heaping up of evils and punishments. It here stands in striking opposition to the πλοῦτος of God's goodness. The despising of the riches of God's goodness in forbearance and long-suffering is the heaping up of a treasure of wrath. Unto thyself indicates voluntary guilt as well as completed folly.—In [or on, ἐν] the day of wrath. The construction is not θησαυρίζεις εἰς ἡμέραν, &c. (Luther [E. V., against], Tholuck), and also not an ὁρμή which will break but on the day of wrath (Meyer [Alford, Hodge]). But this meaning is, that the day of wrath is even now ready to burst forth, and that that furious and senseless θησαυρίων still continues; comp. James v. 8; θησαυρίαις ἐν λαγαῖς ἡμέραις. Every catastrophe of judgment which succeeds a period of long-suffering is designated a day of wrath (Ezek. xxii 24; Zephaniah ii. 2). But each of these judicial catastrophes is a prelude to the last day of consummated wrath.—And revelation [manifestation] of the righteous judgment. The δικαιοσύνη (in the New Testament, ἀπαξ λεγόμενον, and but seldom elsewhere).^{*} The righteous judgment of God proceeds in an emphatic way through all periods of time; but it has special epochs of its ἀποκάλυψις. The whole contemplation of different judicial catastrophes consists in the certainty that the time of final decision is introduced with the coming of Christ. Tholuck cites Klopstock's lines:

"Among the ways of men
God walks, with quiet tread, His unseen path;
But drawing near the goal, He rushes on,
Decided as the gleaming thunderbolt."

SECOND PARAGRAPH (VERS. 6-11).

[It may aid the reader in the exegesis of this paragraph to have in view the following parallel arrangement in four stanzas of three lines each, which we adopt from the Analysis of Forbes, with some changes in the translation:]

- | | | |
|-----|---|---|
| 6. | | Who will render to every man according to his deeds; |
| 7. | A | { To those who by endurance in good work
Seek for glory, and honor, and immortality,
Eternal life: |
| 8. | B | { But to those who are self-seeking,
And disobey the truth, but obey unrighteousness,
Indignation [shall be] and wrath: |
| 9. | B | { Tribulation and anguish
Upon every soul of man that worketh evil,
Of the Jew first, and also of the Greek; |
| 10. | A | { But glory, honor, and peace,
To every man that worketh good,
To the Jew first, and also to the Greek. |

The first two stanzas, A and B, and the last two stanzas, B and A, are antithetically parallel in each of their lines, which indicate: (1.) The character of the two opposite classes to be compared; (2.) their respective pursuits; and (3.) the appropriate rewards. In another point of view the four stanzas are introversively parallel, the first corresponding with the fourth, and the second with the third. The glorious reward of the righteous is put first and last in order to stimulate and encourage the reader. The lines in each stanza are also introversively parallel, as is made apparent to the reader by the typographical arrangement.—P. S.]

Ver. 6. Who will render to every man. The negative form of this declaration, see ver. 11. The righteousness of God is far above the partisan righteousness of man, and also above that partisan justice which believes that God's government is restrained by the historical difference between Judaism and heathendom. The decision stated by the Apostle is pronounced by the fundamental law of the entire Scriptures, of all Christendom, and of all religion (comp. Ps. lxii. 12; Isa. iii. 10, 11; Jer. xvii. 10; Matt. vii. 21-24; xii. 36; xvi. 27; xxv. 35; John v. 29; Rom. xiv. 10; 2 Cor. v. 10). The supposition that there is a great difficulty here, and an apparent contradiction between this sentence and the doctrine of justification by faith, is a remarkable indication of an inadequate view of works on one hand, and of justification by faith on the other. Tholuck gives an account of the question in discussion, p. 88 sqq. Solutions of the imaginary difficulty: 1. The Apostle speaks here only hypothetically of the judgment of believers, as God would judge them, apart from the standpoint of the gospel (Melancthon, &c.). Tholuck: Here, and in ver. 16, the Apostle regards only the Divine valuation placed on men, apart from redemption. [So, substantially, Alford and Hodge.—P. S.]. 2. He speaks of the final judgment, when faith will be proved to be the absolute fulfilment of the law (Olshausen). This is adopted by Philippi, but under the restriction: That the δικαιοσύνη ἐκ πίστεως will remove the deficiency in the works of the regenerate. Gerhard: Opera adducentur in iudicio non ut salutis merita, sed ut fidei testimonia et effecta. 3. Fritzsche: The Apostle is inconsistent, and here opens a semita per honestatem near the via regia of justification. 4. Luthardt: The new vital form of faith must be regarded as the product of a previous direction of life; the ἔργα are perfected in faith (Studien und Kritiken for 1852, No. 2, p. 368). [This view seems inconsistent with the Scripture doctrine of regeneration as a new creation, and of the new life as the reverse of the old (Rom. vi. 4, 19 ff.), and with the personal experience of Paul. But see Dr. Lange's remarks below, and consider the remarkable concession of Peter, Acts x. 34, 35, where a disposition to fear God and to work righteousness is supposed to exist before conversion, even among heathen, and to qualify them for acceptance with God.—P. S.]. 5. Cocceius and Limborch: The faith in Christ must also be included as the highest work (ἔργον). This view is undoubtedly correct; and Tholuck's explanation, that πίστις ἐκ χειρὸς must not be included here (with reference to chap.

iv. 8; xi. 16; x. 6), obscures the whole question. The passages cited by Tholuck plainly relate altogether to a life in the works of the law. But in John vi. 29 Christ calls faith a work of God which believers should exercise. Paul also calls faith a good work (ἔργον ἀγαθόν), Phil. i. 6; viewing it, however, as the operation of God. In 1 Thess. i. 3, he speaks of an ἔργον τῆς πίστεως; also in 2 Thess. i. 11. He means in these passages, of course, such a faith as proves itself by works. But it follows, nevertheless, most decidedly, that he distinguishes just as positively two kinds of works, just as James distinguishes two kinds of faith. We must therefore distinguish a two-fold conception of works with the Apostle, if we would escape the confusion made by a timid species of orthodoxy. The direction of faith as well as of unbelief has, according to Paul—as Luthardt has properly remarked—its antecedens in the antithesis of the fundamental tendencies which he describes in vers. 7, 8. The one class are, in their inward frame of mind, ζητοῦντες, striving souls—therefore men of longing and aspiration, poor in spirit [Matt. v. 3]. Their good works constitute a unity of effort, ἡπομονή ἔργον; their aim is the δόξα, τιμή, ἀφθαρσία (goodly pearls; precious pearls, Matt. xiii. 45). The other class are, in their mental disposition, ἐξ ἐριθείας, contentious, even when they confess an orthodox form of faith. They are men animated by the bigotry of party spirit, and therefore wantonly rebelling against the truth, while they are the narrow-minded slaves of the unrighteousness of party spirit. But the retribution of both classes will be determined by the respective degrees of virtue and vice which they reach. As seekers, they find faith and justification by faith, which, according to chap. iii., proceeds also from righteousness. As believers, they strive for the treasure of their heavenly calling, and strive after those things which are before them, until they reach the goal of perfection. But there they do not appear with works of the law, nor with a mixture of perfect justitia imputata and imperfect works. In the kingdom of perfect love the antagonism of merit and grace disappears in a higher unity of both. It is observable that, with the Apostle, all the ideas of the Old Testament become more profound, and are made perfect: 1. The law becomes the law of the Spirit; 2. work becomes the work of faith; 3. righteousness becomes justifying righteousness; 4. retribution becomes free, rewarding love. The observation of Meyer, that we have here the law of the Jews only, and with it the natural law of the Gentiles as the medium affecting the decision, does not relieve the matter. He indeed also adds, that Paul had good reason for this statement, since the Christian, too—because he is to be judged according to his conduct—must be judged according to the law (comp. the doctrine of the tertius usus legis), and according to the πλήρωσις τοῦ νόμου introduced by Christ [Matt. v. 17; xxv. 31 ff.; Rom. xiii. 8-10]. He justly rejects the opinion of Reiche, that the doctrine of justification by faith implies a partial abrogation of the moral order of the world.*

* [Of the English and American commentators, whom I have consulted, Dr. Hodge is the only one who takes some pains to solve the dogmatic difficulty presented by this apparent contradiction of the doctrine of retribution according to works, and the doctrine of justification by faith. I quote the substance of his remarks: "First, notwithstanding the doctrine of gratuitous justification, and in perfect consistency with it, the Apostle still teaches that the distributions of eternity are according to our works.

Ver. 7. To those who by endurance (or perseverance) in good work [καθ' ἡπομονὴν ἔργον ἀγαθόν, an adverbial qualification of the verb ζητοῦσι], &c. Where the different works are only one good work, and where there is this perfect endurance of life and effort, the direction toward higher and eternal things can only be meant. The genitive ἔργον ἀγαθόν is genit. subj. (not obj.; Meyer); that is, the endurance which is peculiar to the truly good work. [Comp. ἡπομονή τῆς ἐλπίδος, 1 Thess. i. 8.—P. S.]. It may be asked, whether the Apostle here uses the words δόξα, τιμή, and ἀφθαρσία, in the specifically Christian sense, or in the more general sense. If the former be the case, they mean future salvation in its glory (2 Cor. iv. 17; Matt. xiii. 43), in the honor connected with it (for it is the reward of victory, 1 Cor. ix. 25; joint heirship with Christ, chap. viii. 17; reigning together with Him, 2 Tim. ii. 12), and in its incorruptibility (1 Cor. xv. 52 sqq.; Rev. xxi. 4; 1 Peter i. 4). But then it must be said that the passage refers to a seeking whose object (goodly pearls, Matt. xiii.) is, at the beginning, more or less concealed from the seekers themselves (comp. Acts xvii. 23). It seems more natural, however, to interpret the above ideas as stages of the development of noble seeking; the first aim is δόξα, spiritual splendor of life, ideality; then τιμή, integrity, honorableness of character; then ἀφθαρσία, deliverance from corruption. The ζωὴ αἰώνιος, as the grace and gift of God, is very nearly related to this last object of ζητεῖν. The restless ζητεῖν—dissatisfaction, and further striving, until the object is reached, here or there—(Matt. v., the first beatitudes; Acts xvii.) remains the key-note. Other constructions: 1. (Ecumenius, Luther: ἀποδοῦναι [to be supplied from ver. 6] is connected with the accusatives δόξαν, τιμήν, ἀφθ.; and ζητοῦσι with ζωὴν αἰώνιον [i. e., "Who will give glory, honor, and immortality to those who, by patience in good works, seek eternal

The good only are saved, and the wicked only are condemned. The wicked will be punished on account of their works, and according to their works; the righteous will be rewarded, not on account of, but according to their works. Good works are to them the evidence of their belonging to that class to whom, for Christ's sake, eternal life is graciously awarded; and they are in some sense and to some extent, the measure of that reward. But it is more pertinent to remark, in the second place, that the Apostle is not here teaching the method of justification, but is laying down those general principles of justice, according to which, irrespective of the gospel, all men are to be judged. He is expounding the law, not the gospel. And as the law not only says that death is the wages of sin, but also that those who keep its precepts shall live by them, so the Apostle says, that God will punish the wicked and reward the righteous. This is perfectly consistent with what he afterwards teaches, that there are none righteous; that there are none who so obey the law as to be entitled to the life which it promises; and that for such the gospel provides a plan of justification without works, a plan for saving those whom the law condemns. He is here combating the false hopes of the Jews, who, though trusting to the law, were by the principles of the law exposed to condemnation. This he does to drive them from this false dependence, and to show them that neither Jew nor Gentile can be justified before the bar of that God, who, while He promises eternal life to the obedient, has revealed His purpose to punish the disobedient. All, therefore, that this passage teaches is, that irrespective of the gospel, to those who either never heard of it, or who having heard, reject it, the principle of judgment will be law." This is a combination of the interpretation of Tholuck with that of Olshausen, enumerated above as Nos. 1 and 2. Stuart: "There is some real goodness in the works of the sanctified; and this will be rewarded, imperfect as it is, not on the ground of law, but on the ground of grace." Very unsatisfactory. Dr. Wordsworth says not a word on this difficulty, but gives a long extract from Jerome's work against Pelagius in explanation of ver. 8.—P. 81.]

life]; 2. Reiche [Ewald]: τοῖς μὲν [to the one] καθ' ἑπομένην ἔργον ἀγαθοῦ δόξαν καὶ τιμὴν καὶ ἀφραδίαν (ἀποδοῦναι)—ἡτοιμασὲν ζωὴν αἰώνιον [ἡτοιμασὲν as apposition to τοῖς μὲν]. 3. Bengel [Fritzsche] and others: τοῖς μὲν καθ' ἑπομ. ἔργον ἀγαθοῦ (οὐσίαν), δόξαν, &c. ἡτοιμασὲν—ζωὴν αἰώνιον (ἀποδοῦναι) [i. e., to those who persevere in good work, seeking glory, &c., He will give eternal life]. Beza suggests still another and very dogmatic construction: Qui secundum patientem expectationem quarunt boni operis gloriam. Our construction has most expositors in its favor [Vulgate, Calvin, Grotius, Tholuck, Olshausen, De Wette, Meyer, Philippi, Alford, Hodge, &c.]; also the clearness of the parallel, in consequence of which, righteous retribution constitutes the conclusion both times.—Υπομονή, not patience, but perseverantia (Erasmus). Ἔργον, not collectively (Tholuck [Hodge]), but dynamically. [The singular indicates the general course and habit of life, or the moral character as a unit, as distinct from isolated resolutions and actions, comp. Gal. vi. 4; 1 Thess. i. 3; James i. 4, &c. The E. V., patient continuance in well-doing, though not literal, is well expressed.—P. S.] Δόξα, τιμή, ἀφραδία, are the phases of the manifestation of the ζωὴ αἰώνιος for those who have from afar been striving for salvation. The matter is inverted in the case of believers: Power of life, worth of life, glory of life.^{*} Tholuck's remark is strange, that "the Apostle characterized here the striving of the better class of unbelievers in such a manner as he could hardly expect to find it by any possibility among them." But Paul had become acquainted with such men as Gamaliel, Sergius Paulus, Gallio, and others.

Ver. 8. But to those who are self-seeking partisans.† [Literally, those of self-seeking—a periphrase of the subject, indicating the origin (ἐκ, out of, as from a root) and moral character; comp. οἱ ἐκ νόμου, the legalists; οἱ ἐκ πίστεως, the believers; οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, the circumcised, &c., and the cognate use of νίαι and τίνα.—P. S.] On ἐριθρία, compare Tholuck and Meyer. We must not, with the elder commentators, derive it from ἐρίων or ἐρις [from which it is distinguished, 2 Cor. xii. 20; Gal. v. 20.—P. S.], and therefore not identify it with φιλονεικία, contentiousness (Vulgate: Qui sunt ex contentione, die Streitsüchtigen); but it comes from ἐριθός, a hireling; ἐριθύνει, to work for wages, to act selfishly. Its first meaning is greediness, then trickery, partisanship. Aristotle, Polit. v. 2, 3, &c.; see Fritzsche, Excursus on Rom. ii.† Meyer: "The latter signification [Ränkesucht, Parteitreiberei] must be retained in all passages of the New Testament; 2 Cor. xii. 20; Gal. v. 20; Phil. i. 16; ii. 3; James iii. 14, 16." The succeeding words also establish this explanation. [The opposite of οἱ ἐξ ἐριθρίας is οἱ ἐξ ἀγάπης, Phil. i. 16, 17. Ignatius, Ad Philad. 8, opposes ἐριθρία to χριστομάθεια.—P. S.] Tholuck: The Apostle has here in view those Jews who surpassed the Gentiles in opposition to the gospel. He recalls to mind the intrigues of the "Zealots," and supposes that the popular sense has extended to the meaning of contention, probably on the ground of the supposed derivation from ἐρίων. Remember the contentious spirit of the Talmudist Jew. In point of fact, the party spirit is always united with the love of contention. But the ἐριθρία is a corruption, which exists in Gentiles and Jews alike. There are only two kinds of men: Men who are of the truth, whose ethical principle of life is the truth (the upright; Prov. ii. 7; John iii. 21), and who, being such, do not lose themselves in grasping after temporal objects; and men whose ethical principle of life is a contentious spirit, that is, the spirit of any bad temporal object, and who for this very reason seditiously oppose the truth as partisans, and are subject to unrighteousness, as slaves to party. In this direction every temporal form of divine things can be converted into a party affair, and destroyed by party spirit; just as the Jews of that period made even an ἐριθρία out of the Old Testament religion. Nevertheless, the definite idea is obliterated, if ἐριθρία is made to mean, without qualification, ungodliness, or vileness (Köllner, Fritzsche).—Disobey the truth. Ἀπειθεῖν; the truth has the right of a king, and Christ is King, as King of the truth. Therefore, to strive against the truth, involves not only religious opinion, but moral misconduct. Such revolt against what is high are necessarily slaves to what is low; they bow before unrighteousness (chap. i. 18).—Wrath and indignation. The nominative ὀργή καὶ θυμός is supplied by ἀποδοῦναι, or ἔσται, as constructio variata.^{*} Θυμός as excanDESCENTIA enhances the idea of ὀργή. The historical form of the judgment pronounced on the self-seeking party spirit is therewith intimated; ὀργή and θυμός of the party spirit are judged by ὀργή and θυμός of an opposite kind; and therein the ὀργή and θυμός of the Lord are revealed. (See the history of the destruction of Jerusalem, Matt. xviii. 33, 34).—[The majority of philologists and commentators make ὀργή express the permanent feeling and settled disposition (comp. John iii. 36; the wrath of God *abide*th on him); θυμός, the momentary impulse or actual outbreak of wrath on the day of judgment. Ammon.: θυμός πρόσκαιρος, ὀργή πολυχρόνιος. Θυμός (Gemüth) is the mind as the seat of the emotions, and hence denotes vehement affection, anger, fury. According to the correct reading, it fitly follows after ὀργή, as its execution and outbreak; ira excanDESCENTIA (Cicero, Tusc.

* [Tholuck makes δόξα the condition, τιμή the recognition, ἀφραδία the unbroken continuance of the blessedness of the saints. Hodge: The manifested excellence or splendor of the future condition is expressed by δόξα, the honor due such excellence by τιμή, and the endless nature of blessedness by ἀφραδία. Similarly Meyer.—P. S.]

‡ [Fritzsche renders the word malitiosum fraudum machinatorum. This derivation was first suggested by Blücher and is now generally adopted; also by Alford, Wordsworth, and Hodge, although Hodge renders the word contentious, and gives it in the present case a wider meaning, like De Wette and Tholuck. Conybeare and Howson: "Ἐριθρία seems to mean selfish party intrigue conducted in a mercenary spirit, and more generally, selfish cunning." Ἐριθρία is used for intriguing partisans by Aristotle (Polit. v. 3). The history of the word seems to bear a strong analogy to that of our term job. Moses Stuart adheres to the old derivation from ἐρίς; Robinson adopts the correct derivation from ἐριθός, ἐριθύνει, but gives it the same meaning as epus, party-strife, faction, contention. P. S.]

* [The change of construction is a delicate adjustment in the Greek, to express the nice distinction that God is directly the Author and Giver of eternal life, but not strictly and primarily of eternal punishment, which is the necessary result of the sinner's own conduct. A similar distinction is intended by the change of construction from the active εργασάμενος to the passive εργασθήσεται, Rom. ix. 22, 23. The vessels of mercy God Himself had before prepared unto glory, but the vessels of wrath are filled, or have fitted them selves, for perdition. Comp. Textual Note 4.—P. S.]

iv. 9). "ἔσση is the heat of the fire; θυμός is the burning forth of the flame."—P. S.]

Ver 9. Tribulation and anguish (θλίψις καὶ στενοχωρία). Vers. 9 and 10 repeat the same thought of retribution, but in greater precision and increased force: 1. The retribution of evil and good does not merely stand as the limit at the close, but it is ordained from the beginning, and follows man like a shadow; 2. it does not only overtake all in general, but will visit every individual; 3. it reaches to the soul; 4. it comes also as punitive retribution, first to the Jews, and then to the Gentiles. The same may be said also of the reward of the righteous. Punishment goes from without inwardly; the external tribulation, or oppression, becomes an internal anguish, or agony, from which the burdened soul knows no escape.—Every soul of man [אָדָם כָּל נַפְשׁוֹ]. ψυχὴ is not merely a circumlocution of ἀνθρώπος (according to Grotius, Fritzsche). [It expresses the idea that the soul, and not the body, is to suffer the penalty, according to Rückert, Meyer, Fritzsche. But ψυχὴ rather denotes the whole person, as in chap. xiii. 1.—P. S.]

That worketh out the evil. The καταργαζόμενον must be regarded as a strong form. It is the consistent consummation. [Alford: "καταργαζομαι, to commit, is more naturally used of evil, while ἐργάζομαι, to work, is used indifferently of both good and evil." But καταργάζομαι is also used of the good; v. 8; xv. 18; Phil. ii. 12. As distinct from the simple ἐργάζομαι, it signifies, to work out, to bring to an end, to consummate. Comp. Meyer on Rom. i. 27 (p. 77).—P. S.]

Ver. 10. But glory and honor and peace. Instead of ἀφραδία, we have here ἰσηνύη ["here in its highest and most glorious sense"] as the subjective enjoyment of ἀφραδία, by which the expression ψυχὴ is supplied (ver. 9).—Of the Jew first, and also of the Greek. Greek represents the Gentile, as i. 16. As the Jew is first in privilege and opportunity, so he is first in responsibility and guilt. Comp. Luke xii. 47, 48, and Exeg. Notes on i. 16. It becomes now evident that the second chapter refers especially to the Jews, as chap. i. 18-32 to the Gentiles.—P. S.]

Ver. 11. For there is no respect of persons. This conclusion reproves especially the exclusive party spirit of the Jew—who thought himself under the particular favor of God—by reference to a parallel expression in the Old Testament, Deut. x. 17; see Gal. ii. 6. The expression, to respect the person (to accept the face),† is used in the Old Testament in a good as well as bad sense; but in the New Testament it occurs only in a bad sense, because it is here employed always in combating the conceit of Jewish bigotry, which changed God into a partisan.

THIRD PARAGRAPH (VERS. 12-16).

Ver. 12. For as many as sinned without law. Tholuck: The Apostle here mentions the judgment only on its condemnatory side, because according to his purpose in chap. iii. 20, it was no necessary that he should take a broader view here. But he also wishes to prepare for the doctrine of justification by faith. Thus, vers. 12 and 18 establish ver. 9; and, on the other hand, vers. 14, 15, and 16 establish ver. 10.—Without law, ἀνόμος; that is, without the knowledge and norm of the Mosaic law (comp. Rom. v. 13)—that is, without a definite consciousness of definite transgression (1 Cor. ix. 21). [Νόμος and ἀνόμος throughout here refer to the written or revealed law of Moses, as the expressed will of God concerning our moral conduct. The heathen are called ἀνόμοι, not absolutely—for they have the unwritten law of conscience—but as distinguished from the Jews, who were ὑπὸ νόμον. ἀνόμος therefore is equivalent to χωρὶς νόμον.—P. S.]—Shall also perish without law Meyer: "ἀπολοῦνται is the opposite of the σωτηρία in i. 16, of the ζῆσται in i. 17, of the ζωὴ αἰώνιος in ii. 7, of the δόξα, &c., in ii. 10. Comp. John iii. 15; Rom. xiv. 15; 1 Cor. i. 18." Since the ἀπολοῦνται has its degrees (comp. Matt. xi. 22; Luke xii. 48), Meyer should not deny that (as Chrysostom, Theophylact, Ecumenius assert) there is something alleviating in the ἀνόμος. The external consequences of sin could be similar, yet the internal consequences could be different, according to the different degrees of the knowledge of transgression; and κριθήσονται is accordingly a stronger expression than ἀπολοῦνται. We should all the more reject the barbarous view of Dodwell, Weisse, Billroth, and others, by which the ἀπολοῦνται is made to express the annihilation of those who do not possess the Christian principle (see Tholuck, p. 99). It is evident that also the ἀνόμος must not be understood absolutely (see ver. 15). They only do not possess the law in the clearness and fullness of the Mosaic code. [The passage certainly teaches, 1. That the immoral heathen will not escape punishment, since they, too, are inexcusable, having the light of God's general revelation in nature (i. 20), and in their conscience (ii. 14, 15); 2. that they will be judged ἀνόμοις—i. e., not with the rigor of the written law, as the disobedient Jews and unfaithful Christians, but impartially, and hence more mildly, according to the common law of reason and of conscience. The unfaithful Jews will fare worse than the Gentiles, and the unfaithful Christians worse than the Jews. The severity of punishment corresponds to the measure of guilt, and the measure of guilt depends on the amount of opportunity. The Bible plainly teaches different degrees of punishment; comp. Luke xii. 47, 48; Matt. xi. 21-24; xii. 41, 42. In the interpretation of this passage, moreover, we should not overlook what Paul says immediately afterward of the better class of heathen, vers. 14, 15, and 26-29; comp. the Notes below.—P. S.]

* [Meyer and Alford: "θλίψις signifies more the outward weight of objective infliction, στενοχωρία the subjective feeling of the pressure." They are often associated, viii. 35; 2 Cor. iv. 8; vi. 4. The latter is the stronger term, and hence it always follows by way of climax.—P. S.]

† [נָּסָה לְפָנָיו, to lift up, or accept the face of some one, i. e., to be favorable or partial to him from personal considerations. In the N. T. the terms προσωπολήψια, προσωπολήπτῃς (in some Codd. written with an α before ψ) always denote the unjust partiality, and are tested to God and forbidden to man.—P. S.]

And as many as sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law. They shall be condemned according to the law. Νόμος, even without the article, signifies here the Mosaic law. The ἐν νόμῳ—De Wette: in the law; Tholuck, Meyer: in the possession of the law. The sense of the word seems to require a stronger expression. See chap. vii. 8. [ἐν signifies the status, under the law.—P. S.] This sentence verifies ver. 9: first upon the soul of the Jew, in contrast with the presumed righteousness of the Jew. Peter institutes a similar law for the Christian Church (1 Pet. iv. 17).

Ver. 13. For not the hearers of the law

Griebach and Reiche parenthesize vers. 13-15; Koppe, ver. 13; Lachmann, Meyer, Baumgarten-Cruik, vers. 14, 15. All these parentheses disturb the connection. Ver. 13 proves the damnableness of those who sinned against the law (see ver. 17, and James i. 22), and accordingly constitutes the transition to what follows.—Not the hearers. "Because the Mosaic law was known to the majority only by being read to them; Gal. iv. 21; Matt. v. 21; James i. 22; John xii. 34." Josephus, Antiq., 5. 1, &c., Meyer.—But the doers of the law shall be justified. Philippi: "δικαιοθήσονται" corresponds to δικαιοῖ παρὰ τῷ θεῷ of the first member of the sentence: They shall be just before the judgment-seat of God—pronounced just by God. Δικαιοῖν, like the Hebrew דִּיכָרָה, as this passage already proves, is terminus forensis: to declare just, not to make just; for the doers of the law are already just, and need not be made just by God. Δικαιοῖν, from δικαίος, according to the analogy of τυφλοῖν (to make blind), and other verbs in ὧν derived from adjectives of the second declension, means properly, it is true, according to the etymology, = to make just. Yet, as the Septuagint and the New Testament usage shows, we must supply, by declaration." Then δικαιοῖν is, originally, to make just, on the part of the δική [right, righteousness, also the goddess of righteousness], and according to its tribunal; that is, to acknowledge just, which has throughout a forensic, but never an abstractly forensic sense; as δικαιοῖν means also, in the classic sense, to think or esteem just, according to the tribunal of personal opinion. Therefore the innocent man also, when once he stands at the tribunal, must be declared just; and the guilty one, who is declared just in the tribunal of grace, receives with this declaration the δικαίωμα of Christ in his faith, without which he could never be pronounced just according to Divine truth. See the Bible-Work on James ii. 21 [p. 66 of the German, p. 85 of the Amer. ed.]. Even the punishment, according to the classical use of the term, becomes a δικαιοῖν, because the punished one, by punishment, becomes again conformable to the δική. According to Meyer, the Apostle has here only set forth the fundamental law of God judging in righteousness. According to Philippi, the ποιηταὶ τοῦ νόμου are here only placed as the true rule, in opposition to the false rule of the Jews, that the ἀκροαταὶ τοῦ νόμου should be just before God, apart from the question whether there are such ποιηταὶ; but the whole argument of the Epistle to the Romans proves, that no man is by nature such a ποιητὴς τοῦ νόμου. This construction does not coincide with vers. 14 and 15. We should rather observe here the deeper idea of ποιῶν [ἐργάσθαι τὸ ἀγαθόν] in ver. 10, and of νόμος in ver. 14; and, at the same time, with Tersteegen's view of God's different tribunals, we must acknowledge that the Apostle can also use here the δικαιοῖν in the wider sense. Comp. 1 Cor. iv. 4. The connection of this passage with the following verses cannot be destroyed by a dogmatizing exegesis.*

* [On the meaning of the terms δικαιοῖν, δικαιοῖν, δικαιοῖν, the reader is referred to the Exeg. Notes, chap. i. 17, and iii. 21-31. Dr. Hodge holds to the strictly forensic view, and agrees here with Philippi. "To be just before God," he says, "and to be justified, are the same thing. They are both forensic expressions, and indicate the state rather than the character of those to whom they refer. Those are just in the sight of God, or are justified, who have done what the law requires, and are regarded and treated accord-

Ver. 14. For when Gentiles [ἐθνη, without the article, meaning some, not all]. The confirmation of ver. 10 is introduced by what the Apostle has already said. The expositors seem here to have thoroughly wandered from the proper path, and to be influenced by a common misunderstanding of ver. 16. 1. According to Bucer, Calvin, Tholuck [Hodge], and others, ver. 14 refers to the first half of ver. 12. While there the question is concerning those who shall perish without law, the objection here to be met is, that there is only condemnation where a νόμος is present; in consequence of this, Koppe regards ver. 13 as parenthetical. Yet not only is the ἀπολογούμενων against this view, but also the τὰ τοῦ νόμου ποιῶν. 2. Philippi: The Apostle refers to the first half of ver. 13. "Not the hearers of the law are just before God, for the Gentiles have also a law; the Gentiles are also ἀκροαταὶ τοῦ νόμου." But this was not the case in the opinion of the Apostle. 3. According to Meyer, he refers to the second half of ver. 13. "The Gentiles possess a certain substitute for the Mosaic law. Therefore they are also subject to the rule: οἱ ποιῶν. νόμ. δικαιοθήσονται." But the fundamental rule is adduced only hypothetically by the Apostle, and not in the sense that the Gentiles actually are doers of the law. The deduction of vers. 14 and 15 will evidently establish the proposition of ver. 10, "But glory, honor," &c., and "also to the Greek," after vers. 12 and 13 have established the proposition of ver. 9. The fundamental thought is, that also the Gentiles can obtain eternal life; for it was not necessary that he should first prove this in reference to the Jews. This thought is mediated neither by the first half of ver. 13 alone, nor by the second alone, but by the whole rule: Not the hearers of the law are already just before God, but the doers of the law, in the sense of ver. 7. The ζητοῦντες, as poor in spirit, who are penitent, shall be justified in the new economy of salvation.—For when. ὅταν "supposes a case whose frequent occurrence is possible: in case when, whenever, as often as" (Meyer [who refers to Kühner, ii. p. 535 f., and Matthiae, p. 1195]).—Gentiles, ἐθνη, without the article. The rule might refer, as hypothetically expressed, to the whole body of the Gentiles (according to De Wette, Reiche [Philippi, Alford, Hodge], and others); but as it is too evident from the first chapter that this case did not really occur, there is very properly no article; and the supposition that there is really "an election" of ingly; that is, are declared to be free from condemnation, and entitled to the favor of God. In obvious allusion to the opinion, that being a Jew was enough to secure admission to heaven, the Apostle says, It is not the hearers but the doers of the law that are justified. He is not speaking of the method of justification available for sinners, as revealed in the gospel, but of the principles of justice which will be applied to all who look to the law for justification. If men rely on works, they must have works; they must be doers of the law; they must satisfy its demands, if they are to be justified by it. For God is just and impartial; He will, as a judge administering the law, judge every man, not according to his privileges, but according to his works and the knowledge of duty which he has possessed. On these principles, it is his very design to show that no flesh living can be justified." Similarly Melancthon: "Hæc descriptio est iustitiae legis, quæ nihil impedit aliâ dictâ de iustitia fidei." But the real difficulty consists in the apparent conflict of Paul's doctrine of justification by grace alone through faith, and his doctrine of judgment by works, as taught not only here from the standpoint of the law, but elsewhere from the standpoint of the gospel as well, 2 Cor. v. 10; Rom. xiv. 10; Gal. vi. 7; Eph. vi. 8; Col. iii. 25; Matt. xii. 36; xxv. 31-46; John v. 29. Comp. the comments on ver. 6, p. 96 f.—P. S.]

each Gentiles thereby gains greater probability. [Comp. Meyer in loc., and Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, l. p. 567, who likewise press the absence of the article, and justly reject the reference to iii. 29; ix. 30; 1 Cor. i. 23 (quoted by De Wette, Alford, and Hodge, in favor of the other view). On the other hand, ἐθνη is not identical with ἔθνη, but indicates a species or class of Gentiles.—P. S.]

Who have no law, τὰ μὴ νόμον ἔχοντα. The absence of the article means not only that they have not the Mosaic law, but that they have no revealed religious law whatever.—Do perchance by nature. By nature (φύσει) must not, with Bengel and Usteri, be referred to the preceding. For also the Jews do not have the law by nature. Nature is here the original nature, as it proves itself active, especially in the noble few—in the impulse or tendency toward the noble.—The things of the law. It is the material substance of the religious and moral law, apart from the formal definitions of the Mosaic code. The exposition of Beza and others is dogmatizing: Qua lex facit (lex jubet, convincit, damnat, punit; hoc ipsum facit et ethnicus, &c.; Cappell). [Hodge: "There are two misinterpretations of the phrase τὰ τοῦ νόμου ποιῖν. The one is, that it means, to fulfil the law; the other, to do the office of the law—i. e., to command and forbid. The former is unnecessary, and is in direct opposition to the express and repeated declaration of the Apostle, that none, whether Jew or Gentile, have ever fulfilled the law. To do the things of the law, is indeed to do what the law prescribes (comp. x. 5; Gal. iii. 12); but whether complete or partial obedience is intended, depends upon the context. The man who pays his debts, honors his parents, is kind to the poor, does the things of the law, for these are things which the law prescribes. And this is all the argument of the Apostle requires, or his known doctrine allows us to understand by the phrase, in the present instance. This being the case, there is no need of resorting to the second interpretation mentioned above, which was proposed by Beza, and adopted by Wetstein, Flatt, and others. Though ποιῖν τὰ τοῦ νόμου might mean to do what the law does, prescribe what is good, and forbid what is evil, it certainly has not that sense elsewhere in Paul's writings—see x. 5; Gal. iii. 12—and is especially out of place here, in immediate connection with the phrase ποιηταὶ τοῦ νόμου, in the sense of the doers of the law."—P. S.]

These, not having (the) law, are a law to themselves. οὗτοι is emphatic with approbation. νόμον μὴ ἔχοντες, in distinction from μὴ νόμον ἔχοντα, indicates want. Meyer: Their own moral nature supplies in them the place of the revealed law (see the classical parallels in Meyer). Philippi distinguishes between τὸν νόμον ποιῖν [ver. 13, or τὸν νόμον τελεῖν, ver. 27] and τὰ τοῦ νόμου ποιῖν. They perform what belongs to the law; they observe only single outward commands of the law, one man this, another that. "Therefore they do not observe the law in its spirituality or deep inner meaning." * An utter perversion of the proper relation. Without knowing the laws of Moses, they observe the essential part of the law, τὰ δικαιώματα τοῦ νόμου. Ver. 26, τὸν νόμον τελούσιν, that is, performing it according to its defined purpose, ver. 27.

* [Forbes, p. 148, fully adopts this distinction of Philippi, and thinks it essential to the proper understanding of the whole passage.—P. S.]

Ver. 15. Who shew, &c. Οἵτινες is no "explaining or proving," but emphasizing, recommending (see the antithesis in ver. 1). What and how do these prominent Gentiles show? They show or exhibit, the work of the law; that is, the work required by the law. Not the law itself (Wolf Koppe, &c.); for the Ten Commandments are not formally written in their heart, but the essential meaning of their requirement. Meyer: "The conduct corresponding to the law." More properly expressed, the conduct intended by it. Luther: The contents of the law; likewise Seiler and Baur. According to Meyer and Tholuck, the singular stands collectively instead of ἔργα. "As ver. 7" (Tholuck). But ver. 7 rather means that the ἔργα are only good when they proceed from the 'unity of a ὑπομονὴ ἔργον ἀγαθόν. In the higher aspiration of the Gentile there was this analogy to Christian faith: that it consisted really in the unity and consistency of sentiment and life.

Written in their hearts. The adjective γραπτόν (supply ὅν) is stronger than the participle γγραμμένον. [It implies the idea of permanency.] Evidently a contrast to the Mosaic record of the law on the tables of stone. See 2 Cor. iii. 7; Jer. xxxi. 33. Therefore a higher order of Judaism, similar to the New Testament life, is exhibited in its essential features in these chosen Gentiles (see the history of the Centurion at Capernaum). [The Greek poet Sophocles speaks of "the unwritten and indelible laws of the gods" in the hearts of men; and the Platonic philosopher Plutarch speaks of "a law which is not outwardly written in books, but implanted in the heart of man."—P. S.]

Who shew, ἐνδείκνυσται. And how do they exhibit or prove this? (see chap. ix. 17, 22.) 1. By the doing of the law (Zwingli, Grotius, and the majority of recent commentators; De Wette, Meyer). 2. By the mark of their better endeavors in many ways (in a certain measure, Calvin; but better Cocceius, tom. v. p. 46. Yet both are biased by the Augustinian view). 3. By the law of conscience. Tholuck (according to Theodoret and Erasmus): "Who, indeed, bear the impress of the judgment of the law in themselves, and in correspondence therewith their consequent conscience assumes in them the office of judge. For where we find the exercise of the judicial power in man, we must also presuppose the legislative power." But this view is inconsistent not only with σὺν in συμμεταρροίσης (for the extended treatment of this question, see Tholuck, p. 105, and Meyer [p. 98, ed. iv., the note]), but also with ἐνδείκνυσται. Here the language is concerning proofs of conscientiousness becoming outwardly manifest. Numbers 1 and 2 are to be united, since the well-doing, according to ver. 7, is only the perseverance in a noble endeavor (under the gratia praeveniens), which attains its object only in Christianity.

Their conscience also bearing witness [συμμεταρροίσης αὐτῶν τῆς συνειδήσεως]. It gives witness with, in connection with their better manner of action. Both bear witness to the belief that they are a law to themselves, in their natural spontaneity. De Wette: "συμμεταρροῖν is neither equal to μαρτυρεῖν (Grotius, Tholuck), nor una testari, with reference to the ποιῖν τὰ τοῦ νόμου. (Meyer, Fritzschke, &c.). But the σὺν, like con in contestari, refers in part to the relation of the witness to him for whom he testifies; and in part, as in συνέδης itself, to the inner relation of the conscious ness."* But as the συνείδησις is a consciousness in man which is both objective and subjective, and hence independent of his merely subjective consciousness, so is the συμμεμετρειν an independent witness of the right, which, in the case before us, corresponds with the witness of man in his deed. It is the Gentile's cheering and often even joyous consciousness of his right direction; as, for example, of the Wise Men from the East under the guidance of their star.

And between one another their thoughts accusing or also excusing. [Dr. Lange translates: Indem zwischen ihnen d. e. Gedankenurtheile anklagende oder auch entschuldigende sind. He refers, with Meyer, μεταξὺ ἀλλήλων to the heathen, not to the thoughts.—P. S.] Different expositions: 1. Their thoughts inwardly accuse each other (Luther, Calvin, Tholuck [Alford, Hodge]). There are different views on μεταξὺ ἀλλήλων: at a future time, in ἡμέρα of judgment (Koppe); post rem actam (Vater); between (two portions of time), at the same time, meanwhile (Köllner [E. V.]). But we must observe, on the contrary, that Paul does not speak of the inner facts of the consciousness, since these facts here fall under the conception of the historical ἐνδεξις. 2. The accusations and defences which were conducted between Gentiles and Gentiles (Storr, Meyer). Against this interpretation Tholuck raises the question: "How can τῶν λογισμῶν, without a more special indication, refer to any other subject than the one whose witness of conscience has just been mentioned?" But if the μεταξὺ ἀλλήλων refers to the intercourse between Gentiles, then the following must have the meaning: since the judgments of their thoughts are throughout accusing or excusing; that is, therefore, moral judgments, which refer to the origin of an immanent moral law. The accusing thoughts come first here, because the language refers first of all to the nobler Gentiles, whose opinions are related to the ordinary popular life as judicial ideals. But also in their excusing they often appeal from barbarian legal practices to the unwritten law (see Sophocles, Antigone). In short, the whole intercourse between the nobler heathen is a kind of moral dialectics, a continual moral process of thought. [Paul describes the moral process which takes place in the heart of man after a good or bad act; the conscience, συνείδησις, sits in judgment, and pronounces the sentence in God's name according to the law; the διαλογισμοί are the several moral reflections and reasonings which appear as witnesses testifying and pleading in this court of conscience, and are often conflicting, since the sinful inclinations and passions interfere and bribe the witnesses; the object of the κατηγορεῖν, or ἀπολογισθῆναι, is the moral action which is brought before the tribunal of the conscience. The ἡ καὶ indicates that the conscience finds more to accuse than to excuse. This judicial process, which takes place here in every man's heart, is a forerunner of the great judgment at the end of the world.—P. S.]

Ver. 16. In the day. The commentators seem here to overlook the obvious, proper meaning, because they suppose that the ἡμέρα on which God will judge the secrets of men, must be referred to the day of final judgment. But, in the first place, the connection does not support this view, and hence an artificial connection has been variously constructed (the Gentiles show that on the day, &c.). Calvin explains ἐν ἡμέρα as eis ἡμέραν, unto or until the day. [Others modify this by making ἐν to include eis, "until and on that day."—P. S.] Tholuck fills up the apparent chasm between vers. 15 and 16 by supposing that the Apostle probably had in mind a transition such as καὶ τοῦτο μάλιστα, and this especially, with the remark: "This view has now become the general one."* Others have helped themselves by parentheses. "So Stuart inclines to unite ver. 16 with ver. 11; Beza, Grotius, Reiche, &c., connect it with κρινθήσονται, ver. 12; † Vatabl., Pareus, and Lachmann, with δικαιωθήσονται, ver. 13." Meyer also, with Lachmann, parenthesizes vers. 14 and 15, and not, with Beza, and others, vers. 13–15. [Alford refers ver. 16 to the affirmation concluding with ver. 10, and regards vers. 11–15 as a series of quasi-parenthetic clauses, οὐ γὰρ—ὅσοι γὰρ—οὐ γὰρ—ὅταν γὰρ, assigning the reasons for the great retribution on the last day. Ewald goes back even to ver. 5.—P. S.] Secondly, the declaration that "God shall judge according to my gospel," pronounces against the reference of ἡμέρα to the day of final judgment. Meyer passes over this difficulty with the remark of Calvin: Summ appellat rationis ministerii. His quotation of 1 Tim. ii. 8 does not argue any thing for his interpretation. On the opinion that, according to a number of the Fathers, the gospel of Paul must be understood to be the gospel of Luke, compare the quotation in Meyer. But the Scriptures take cognizance not merely of one day of judgment. The day on which God judges the secrets of men according to the gospel of Paul, is the day when the Apostle preaches the gospel to them. On this day, in this time of decision, it becomes manifest that there are Gentiles who are a law to themselves; that there is another opposition than that of external Judaism and paganism; that there are Gentiles who must be counted for the circumcision, and Jews whose circumcision must be counted for uncircumcision (see vers. 26 and 27). It is a thought whose root is found already in the Old Testament, that the time of the appearance of Christ and of the preaching of the gospel is a time of judgment. See Joel iii. 6, 7, and in other places; Malachi iii. 2 ff. In John iii. 19, even the appearance of Christ is relatively called the judgment. John v. 25: "The hour is coming, and now is." The time of perfect faith is denoted a day (John xvi. 23, 26). Also, in Rom. xiii., ver. 12 connected with ver. 13, the language cannot relate exclusively to the day of final judgment. The same applies to ἡμέρα in 1 Cor. iii. 13. Comp. 2 Cor. vi. 2, ἡμέρα σωτηρίας. The Apostle mentions this day without the article, without a solemn addition. He marks the day as the day when God shall judge the secrets of men. He uses the same word κρινῆναι as in ver. 29, ὁ ἐν τῷ κριντῷ Ἰουδαίος. He says men—not merely the Gentiles—because the gospel, according to chaps. ix.–xi., manifests God's judgment not only on the Gentiles, but also on the Jews; and this is a judgment pronounced on their internal good conduct or misconduct toward the internal nature and spirit of

* [Similarly Alford: "CONFIRMING BY ITS TESTIMONY, the συν signifying the agreement of the witness with the deed, as con in contestari, confirmare; perhaps also the συν may be partly induced by the συν in συνείδησις—referring to the reflective process, in which a man confers, so to speak, with himself."—P. S.]

* [Wordsworth also adopts this connection with ver. 13, and quotes from Bishop Pearson (Art. VII. on the Creed): "Conscience is a witness bound over to give testimony for or against us at some judgment after this life to pass upon us."—P. S.]

the law. In this relation the gospel of the Apostle was the real medium and measure of the judgment (see 1 Cor. i. 18); and Jesus Christ was the real judicial authority. See John iii. 16; Acts xvii. 30, 31; 1 Cor. iv. 5, and other places.—On the day of the promulgation of the gospel the better Gentiles manifested their ordination to salvation, just as the majority of the Jews made manifest their hardness of heart.

[According to my gospel. The μου is to be either understood, ratione ministerii (Calvin, Meyer), or better, the gospel of free grace for the uncircumcision, which was especially committed to Paul, as the gospel for the circumcision was to Peter, Gal. ii. 7. The same expression occurs Rom. xvi. 25, 26.—Through Jesus Christ, as the appointed Judge of the world; Acts xvii. 30, 31; 1 Cor. iv. 5; 2 Cor. v. 10; Matt. xxv. 31; John v. 27, &c. While κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιόν μου favors Dr. Lange's interpretation of ἐν ἡμέρᾳ, the διὰ Ἰησ. Χρ. seems to refer rather to the future judgment; yet Christ has His hand in all the preparatory judgments of the history of the Church.—P. S.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The common characteristic in the condemnable condition of the Gentiles and Jews is their religious and moral self-contradiction. In this self-contradiction Paul (chap. i. 21) discovers the beginning of the offence of the Gentiles, whom he represents as inexcusable (ἀναπολόγητοις). The same self-contradiction is consummated, on one side, in the man who approves sin against better knowledge and conscience (chap. i. 32.), and, on the other side, in the man who condemns the sinner, and yet is guilty of weighty offences himself (chap. ii. 1). Therefore the expression inexcusable (ἀναπολόγητος) is also repeated here. The judgment of God is ever also a self-judgment of man. See Matt. xii. 37; xviii. 28; xxv. 26, 27. In the one who judges, the self-contradiction is completed as falsehood of the inner life in the very strongest degree. The sincere man, on the other hand (we can by no means speak of sincerity as absolute, but yet as gradually predominating), by looking into his own heart and life, arrives at that μακροθυμία, in relation to human sin and misery, which is akin to compassion, and points not to the judgment of condemnation, but to the saving judgment of the gospel.

2. The condemnatory judgment pronounced by the sinner on the sinner does not only condemn him in form, but transposes him also actually to a condition similar to condemnation. Fanaticism is never more unhappy than when it would compel, by measures of deceit and violence, those who think differently to adopt its pretended forms of happiness (James ii. 13).

3. The one who judges, says Paul (vers. 3, 4), has always a false idea of God. He either regards himself as the favorite of a partial God, on account of His conformity to theocratical, ecclesiastical, or legal forms, or he is inwardly vicious and wicked, and despises the real manifestations of God (see Ps. 16-21). An atheistic element is common to both classes.

4. The long-suffering of God, or the forbearance of God's justice toward the sinner, stands in reciprocal action with the wrath of God. Both denote the polar antagonism in the government of absolute justice, which is no rule of abstract law, but has a living, pedagogic form corresponding to the relation of the Divine personality to the human personality. See my Positive Dogmatics, p. 119. God's forbearance and clemency, no less than His wrathful judgment, looks to the working of repentance.

5. The unbeliever and hardened one, by his own deeds, transforms the works of God's forbearance and goodness into the preliminary conditions of His wrathful judgment, and accumulates for himself, out of the riches of God which he has experienced, a store of destruction.

6. The day of the rejected gospel is to man a day of inward judgment, as is proved by the destruction of Jerusalem. See the Exeg. Notes on ver. 5. But all judgments are prophecies and preludes of the last day of wrath. It is a narrow view, to suppose that the conception of historical periods excludes epochs, or that single epochs exclude the final catastrophe. This may also be applied to the idea of judgments. Just because the world's history is the world's judgment, the former pursues its course toward the latter.

7. The embarrassments of commentators on the sense of vers. 6-10 give evidence of timid and narrow views on the doctrine of justification. The passage gains its true light from the biblical doctrine that there is a gratia praeveniens over the Gentile world, which even Augustine did not yet wholly ignore, but which, through his influence, was lost sight of in the orthodox theology of the Middle Ages, and, indeed, of more recent times. The seekers who are portrayed in vers. 7 and 10 will never think seriously of relying upon their works before God, because they are in a gravitation toward the Eternal, which will find rest only when they see God in Christ, either in this or the other world. But the opposite class—whose principle of life is party spirit, and reliance upon temporal association—will ever place their confidence in their own achievements, even when they vigorously reject the doctrine of the meritoriousness of good works. For, besides the righteousness of works (Werkgerechtigkeit), there is also a righteousness of doctrine, of orthodoxy (Lehr-gerechtigkeit), a righteousness of the letter (Buchstaben-gerechtigkeit), a righteousness of negation and protest (Negationsgerechtigkeit), which have, in common with the righteousness of works, the fundamental characteristic of party righteousness (Partei-gerechtigkeit), and may be the more dangerous forms as they are the more subtle. On the salvation of the heathen, comp. Tholuck, Comm., pp. 92 ff.—The doctrine of justification cannot conflict with the doctrine of God's righteousness, by virtue of which He will reward every man according to his works.

8. Glory and honor and immortality—precious pearls; eternal life—the goodly pearl. See Matt. xiii. 45, 46.

9. It is the character of all party spirit to be a rebel upwardly against the royal right of truth, and, on the other hand, a slave downwardly to the tyrannical and terrifying spirit of party.

10. Because God, as the Righteous One, looks at the substance of personal life, He does not regard the person according to its external and civil conception, nor according to its external appearance and estimate.

11. In ver. 12, different degrees of punishment are evidently indicated. See the Exeg. Notes.

12. On δικαιοσύνη, comp. the Exeg. Notes on ver. 13 [also i. 17, and iii. 21-31] Likewise the Bible-Work on James ii. 20 ff. Since δικαιοῦν, even according to the idea of making just, can only mean to declare just, because the question is always concerning justification in some legal tribunal, the supposed exceptions where δικαιοῦν in the Scriptures is made to signify to make just, should be investigated anew. The passage, Isa. liii. 2, can really not otherwise be explained, than that He will, by virtue of his knowledge as the righteous servant of God, declare many just; and this because He shall bear their iniquities. The passage in Daniel, chap. xii. 3, must by all means be explained thus: That the subject is the judgment of the world, in which, according to the biblical representation, the righteous shall take part (1 Cor. vi. 2); and even if צַדִּיקִים refers to this life, it no more means one who makes just, than חֲכָמִים means one who makes wise. The reading, δικαιοῦσθαι, Rev. xxi. 11, cannot be sustained against the more strongly credited rendering, δικαιοσύνην ποιῶντων. See more on this subject ad chap. iii. 26.

13. On the occurrence of a fulfilment of the law among the Gentiles, see Tholuck, pp. 101, 102. The author, following the older theologians, very justly opposes Flacianism [i. e., that sin is a substance, a revival of the old Manichean heresy, by Flacius Illyricus, the editor of the Magdeburg Centuries, and a Lutheran controversialist of the 16th century.—P. S.]. To speak of virtues of the heathen, is liable to misunderstanding, unless we mean thereby a search after the Infinite. As heathen virtues, they can only be virtues of progress toward poverty in spirit (Matt. v. 3), under the guidance of the gratia præveniens, or fundamental forms of the development of a desire after salvation. The attempt, in Rothe's Ethik, part ii. p. 398 [1st ed.], to explain this class of virtues, is not very clear.

14. The three objective forms of seeking higher attainments in the Gentile world are: The state, as the expression of the search after righteousness in the conscience, or in the will; philosophy, as the expression of the search for an intelligent comprehension of the truth; and art, as the expression of the search for ideal contemplation, and the representation of life by means of the sentiments.

15. The three subjective forms of search for higher attainments in the Gentile world are: 1. Works of magnanimity. 2. The conscience, especially the cheerful impulses of the moral consciousness. "When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy." 3. An intercourse of moral judgment, of either an excusing or accusing character. [Bishop Sanderson, as quoted by Wordsworth: Paul teaches here (ver. 15) that every man, however unholy, has a conscience, though depraved; and that, at the fall of man, conscience itself was not lost, but its rectitude and integrity were impaired; and that, when we are born again in baptism, we do not receive the infusion of another conscience, but our conscience, which was before unclean, is washed by the blood of Christ, and is cleansed by faith, and is enlightened by the Holy Spirit, in order that it may please God.—P. S.]

16. On the day of the crisis which the gospel brings to pass, it will appear that many Gentiles are really Jews, and that many Jews are really Gentiles. Likewise, many Christians of the Middle Ages were essentially believers of evangelical truth, while many so-called evangelical persons whose righteousness consists of works, and others whose righteousness consists of doctrines, and still others whose righteousness consists of their Protestantism, are, after all, only Roman Catholics at heart. Ideal dynamical antitheses, which the day of the Lord will bring to light, predominate over the historical antitheses, which possess very great significance. On the day mentioned here, see the Exeg. Notes.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

God's impartial righteousness is shown: 1. He does not give preference to the Jews, although they possess the law; 2. He is not prejudiced against the Gentiles, although they are without the law; but, 3. of one, just as of the other, He asks whether they have done good or evil (vers. 1-16).—Because others are black, we do not become white (ver. 1).—Judging our neighbor is the worst depravity, because: 1. We are blind toward ourselves; 2. we are unjust toward our fellow-men (ver. 1).—By our judgment of others we fall under the judgment of God pronounced on ourselves (ver. 3).—What does the celebration of a day of fasting and prayer require us to do? 1. Not to despise the riches of God's goodness, patience, and forbearance; but rather, 2. to remember that His goodness should lead us to repentance (ver. 4).—God's goodness regarded as the pure source of repentance (ver. 4).—Treasure not up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath (ver. 5).—Dies ira, dies illa, solvet sæcla in favilla (vers. 5, 6).—What will God give to every man according to his works? 1. To some, glory and honor and immortality, together with precious peace; 2. to others, indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish (vers. 6-11).—What it is to continue patiently in well-doing for eternal life (ver. 7).—God's indignation! 1. Not unmerited, but deserved; 2. not temporary, but eternal (ver. 8).—God's wrath: holy displeasure, not unholy anger.—No one is without law. For, 1. God has given His law to the Jews by Moses; 2. he has written the substance of it upon the hearts of the Gentiles (vers. 12-16).—The universal revelation of God in the conscience (vers. 14, 15).—The conscience, and human thoughts in their relation to each other. This relation is such, that, 1. The witness of the former testifies of the work of the law; 2. the latter, in the presence of such witness, accuse or excuse one another (vers. 14, 15).—Impossibility of preaching the gospel among the heathen, if they were deprived of conscience.—The revelation of God in the conscience, on the one hand, not to be despised; and, on the other, not to be overvalued.—Conscience regarded as the connecting link for every missionary sermon among the heathen.

LUTHER: * The little word "law" must not be understood here after a human fashion, that it teaches which works are to be done, and which are to be left undone; as is the case with the laws of men, which can be obeyed by works, without the feeling of the heart. God judges according to the intent of the heart, and will not be satisfied by words; but all the more punishes as hypocrisy and lying those works which are done without the feeling of the heart. Therefore Paul says that nobody is a doer of the law by the works of the law (ver. 15).

* Long-suffering is a virtue which is slow to become wrathful and to punish wrong. Patience is that which bears misfortune in property, body, or reputation, whether it happen justly or unjustly. Goodness is temporal reciprocal benevolence, and a friendly nature (ver. 4).

STARKE: The ungodly are as the swine, which do not look at the tree whose acorns they gather up. Thus, with all their enjoyment of temporal mercies, they do not look up to God, who gives them richly to enjoy every good thing (Hosea ii. 7; Isa. i. 3; Jer. v. 24); for by every morsel of bread He seeks their improvement (ver. 4).—He who does not grow better, will grow worse by Divine goodness (ver. 5).—As the labor, so the reward; and each one must reap what he has sown (ver. 6).—The pious will gain in perfection in the kingdom of glory that which they had sought in the kingdom of grace (ver. 10).—HEDINGER: To censure others, is the same as to condemn one's self. He who therefore loves to judge, pronounces sentence upon himself (ver. 1).—Blindness! Delay produces deception. Security follows Divine forbearance. Take care! The longer the storm gathers, the greater its devastation. The one who has received the long loan, has not therefore received it as a gift (ver. 4).—Every sin will receive its due reward. Who will trifle with it? (ver. 8).—A greater measure of knowledge brings only greater condemnation, and no excuse. This much a Gentile knows of the will of God, that he may be condemned to death justly; much more may the Christian be justly condemned who can and should know perfectly the will of God in the law (ver. 14).—Nova Bibl. Tub.: The sinner can persuade himself, and by many kinds of misconception stupefy himself, so as to believe that his sins will go unpunished. Ah, how common is this deception! (ver. 8).—Eternal life is a jewel for which we should strive, a crown for which we should fight, a gift which we should accept, hold, and keep until the end. He who perseveres, will be saved. The question at the judgment-day will not be one of words, but of deeds (ver. 7).—No one is without law! If it is not written in stone, it is nevertheless engraved upon the heart. Every one knows by nature what is just and what is unjust, what is good and what is evil (ver. 4).—CRAMER: God must be truly in earnest for human salvation, which He seeks by prosperity and adversity. When words cannot avail, He punishes, and waits with great forbearance and patience until the sinner is converted (ver. 4).—The law of nature is a source of the written law of God, embraced in the two rules: Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; and what you would not have them do unto you, do not unto them (ver. 14).—No one can sin so that his sins shall remain concealed; for, if they are not revealed before, they will be brought to light at the last day (ver. 16).—Würtemb. Bibl.: Works are witnesses of faith. We must therefore do good works, not in order to be saved, but in order that with them we may testify of our faith, and by faith may inherit eternal life (ver. 7).—LANG: Abandon all the excuses of age, or condition, or other personal circumstances, that you, with your want of honest Christianity, bring forward; for you can derive no advantage from them before God's judgment-seat (ver. 11).—The law of nature must be of great advantage, and be written very deeply on the hearts of all men, since its willful transgression brings upon men so great guilt, and punishment or condemnation (ver. 12).

BENGL: As long as man does not feel the judgment of God, he is apt to despise His goodness, Matt. xxviii. 18. Mark here the antithesis of the richness of Divine goodness despised, and the accumulated treasure of wrath.

O. V. GERLACH: The goodness of God is manifested in the exhibition of blessings; His patience, in bearing with the sinner; and His long-suffering in withholding from punishment (ver. 4).—Christianity is not something lately discovered among men; but its Founder, the Son of God Himself, is the King and Judge not only of Christians, but likewise of Jews and Gentiles, whom He, in His preparatory households of grace—the former in His Father's house, the latter by an awakened longing for the same—is seeking to train up for His kingdom, though now they are far distant from home (ver. 16).—LISCO: Merely external honesty is also punishable (ver. 1).—Glory, splendor, instead of lowness, honor instead of contempt, and immortality instead of the mortal condition (1 Cor. xv. 53, 54), are the reward of patience, of the continuous striving for eternal life in spite of all impediments and difficulties (ver. 7).

HEUBNER: God's judgment is righteous: 1. Objectively: in accordance with sacred laws; not arbitrarily or capriciously, without regard to the person. 2. subjectively: according to the true character of the man, taking each one for his internal and external worth (ver. 2).—The dealing of God toward sinful men is simply this: He first tries each with goodness, before He pronounces punishment; it is our salvation to acknowledge this goodness, but it is our ruin to despise it (ver. 4).—The hardened heart is accusable: its operation is not that of nature, but of its own degeneration. How is it first hardened? 1. By frivolity; 2. by obstinacy and pride; 3. by actual, continued sinning (ver. 6).—The righteous impartiality of God. God does not judge: 1. By outward advantages, form, birth, pedigree, power, respect, wealth; nor, 2. by gifts of mind, acquisitions, skill; nor, 3. by external performances as such, by merely external works, external piety;—but by the whole inward sense, by the simplicity and clearness of the heart; by faith and fidelity. He has regard to what is given to each man (ver. 11).

THE PERICOPÉ (vers. 1-11) for 10th Sunday after Trinity (Memorial of the destruction of Jerusalem), instead of 1 Cor. xii. 1-11: The impenitent sinner has no excuse before God.: 1. Proof; 2. application.—Man before the Divine judgment: He must, 1. Acknowledge himself guilty; 2. regard God's judgment righteous and inevitable; 3. take refuge in God's goodness, and listen to its call to repentance; 4. fear the future; 5. listen to revelation.—We should see ourselves reflected in the example of the impenitent Jews.

DANIEL SUPERVILLE: The sovereign equity of God (ver. 11).—MENKEN: The universal equality of men before God's judgment.

SPENNER: The whole law was written on the heart of the first man, for his soul was an image of God's perfect holiness and righteousness. But after this complete law had been erased from the heart, there remained, so to speak, only some of the larger letters, some portion of the knowledge of the manifest evil and good (ver. 15).—Conscience is nothing else than a voice of God (ver. 15).—ROOS: Conscience is the consciousness or the judicial declarations of the law (ver. 15).

BESSER: From man's knowledge of God's law written on his heart, there arises conscience, which testifies to him, as Luther excellently describes, the power with which conscience presses its judicial witness upon man (ver. 15).—To the question, "What disease is killing you?" the poet Euripides makes:

matricide answer: "Conscience; for I am conscious that I have done evil" (ver. 15).

J. P. LANGR: The judgment of men in the judgment of God.—The sources of judgment (vera. 4, 5).—How the sinner changes the treasures of God's goodness into treasures of wrath.—The great judgment-days in the world's history, especially the destruction of Jerusalem.—Justification and God's righteousness: 1. Apparent contradiction; 2. perfect unity.—Two kinds of men perceptible: 1. In two purposes; 2. two kinds of seeking; 3. two results (vera. 7-10).—God does not regard the person because He looks at it: 1. He does not regard it in a worldly sense; 2. He regards it according to its spiritual significance.—The gospel reveals the thoughts of the heart: 1. As a savor of death unto death; and 2. as a savor of life unto life.—But this does not apply to every form of Christianity.

BURKITT: On the day of judgment as the time when God's character and dealings shall be displayed, ver. 5.—It will be a day when His righteousness shall be universally manifested and magnified; when all His attributes shall be glorified; His wonderful clemency sweetly displayed; His exact justice terribly demonstrated; His perfect wisdom clearly unfolded; all the knotty plans of Providence wisely resolved; all the mysterious depths of His counsels fully discovered; and His injured honor and glory clearly repaired, to the joyful satisfaction of all good men, and to the dreadful consternation and confusion of the wicked and impenitent world.—On ver. 16: Here, 1. A doctrine is boldly asserted—a coming day of judgment; and 2. its proof and confirmation—"according to my gospel."

[M. HENRY (condensed) on the whole passage, vera. 1-16: The Apostle, 1. Arraigns the Jews for their censoriousness and self-conceit; 2. asserts the invariable justice of the Divine government; 3. draws up a charge against the Jews; 4. describes the measures by which God proceeds in His judgment; and 5. proves the equity of all His dealings with men when He comes to judge them.

[MACKNIGHT: Paul distinguishes between meritorious and gratuitous justification; the former being that which is unattainable by works of the law, the latter that which is attainable, as James says, not by faith only, but by works also.—Ver. 15: That there is a natural revelation made to the heathen, is proved by Paul by three arguments: 1. By many virtuous acts performed by the heathen; 2. by the natural operation of their consciences; 3. by their reasonings with one another, by which they excused or accused one another.

[JORTIN: These suppositions agree both with Scripture and reason: 1. All men can do all that God requires of them; 2. all who do the best they can, derive help from God as far as is needful; 3. they all have Christ as their Redeemer, though He was never revealed to them.—Who knows whether the lot of the savage be not better than that of the philosopher, and the lot of the slave than that of the king? But this much we know, that every one ought to be contented with that state in which his wise and good Creator has placed him, and to conclude that it will be the best for him if he makes the best use of it. Upon this supposition the Divine impartiality stands fully justified.

[TIMOTHY DWIGHT: 1. Our eternal life is in itself an immense good; 2. eternal happiness consists in eternal disinterestedness and its consequences. (See sermon on Consistency of Benevolence with seeking Salvation, in which Lord Shaftesbury's celebrated theory, that disinterestedness is virtue, and the only virtue, is controverted.)

[JOHN FOSTER: To the present hour in each life the series of the Divine goodness may be counted by the succession of a man's sins. Not one sin, small or great, but immediately close by it were acts and proofs of this goodness. If this had been realized to thought, what a striking and awful admonition! Every sin a testimony, a representative of good; and the wonder is that the goodness goes on!

[Annot. Parag. Bible (London): The question is not (vera. 14, 15) whether any of the Gentiles have actually attained to eternal life without a Divine revelation, but whether they had the law of nature or conscience. They had this; and by it they shall be judged.—TAYLOR: Note Paul's wisdom in appealing to Jew and Gentile: 1. If the Jew could be convinced that a right-minded Gentile might be blessed with eternal salvation, why should he not now be pardoned, and taken into the visible Church? 2. the Gentile, made despondent by the representations of his guilt in the last chapter, here finds himself placed with the Jews, and entitled to hope in God's mercy.

[HODGE: The principles on which the Apostle assures us all men are to be judged, are, 1. He who condemns in others what he does himself, ipso facto condemns himself; 2. God's judgments are according to the real character of men; 3. the goodness of God, being designed to lead us to repentance, is no proof that He will not punish sin; 4. God will judge strictly according to works, not profession; 5. men shall be judged strictly according to their knowledge of duty.—Further Remarks by HODGE (condensed): 1. The deceitfulness of the heart strikingly exhibited in the different judgments they pass on themselves and others; 2. ask yourself, "How does the goodness of God affect me?" 3. genuine repentance produced by discoveries of God's mercy, legal repentance by fear of His justice; 4. any doctrine that tends to produce security in sin, must be false; 5. how vain the hopes of blessedness founded on God's partiality, or forgetfulness of sin; 6. to escape our guilt, we must seek the Saviour's righteousness; 7. He who died for the sins of men, will sit in judgment on sinners.

[Ver. 16. BARNES: On the propriety of a day of judgment, when all the thoughts of the heart will be revealed: 1. It is only by revealing these that the character is really determined, and impartial judgment administered; 2. they are not judged or rewarded in this life; 3. men of pure motives and pure hearts are often basely calumniated, and overwhelmed with ignominy; while men of base motives are often exalted in public opinion. It is proper that the secret principles of each should be revealed.—J. F. H.]

[Ver. 7. By patient continuance in well-doing. BARROW: No virtue is acquired in an instant, but by degrees, step by step; from the seeds of right instruction and good resolution it springs up, and goes forward by a continual progress and customary practice. 'Tis a child of patience, a fruit of perseverance, and, consequently, a work of time; for enduring implies a good space of time.—Ver. 9. ADAM: Every sin, when newly committed, amazes and terrifies the soul, though the sense of it soon wears off. How shall we bear the anguish of all our sins together, when conscience, which forgives and extenuates none, brings them to our remembrance?—Ver. 14. A law unto themselves. BISHOP PEARSON: Every particular person has a particular remembrance in himself, as a sufficient testimony of his Creator, Lord, and Judge. That man which most peremptorily denieth God's existence, is the greatest argument to himself that there is a God. Let Caligula profess himself an atheist, and, with that profession, hide his head or run under his bed, and when the thunder strikes his ears, and lightning flashes in his eyes, those terrible works of nature put him in mind of the power, and his own guilt, of the justice of God; whom, while in his wilful opinion he weakly denies, in his involuntary action he strongly asserteth. So that a Deity will either be granted or extorted, and, where it is not acknowledged, it will be manifested.—Vers. 5 and 16 BISHOP J. TAYLOR: There are two great days in which the fate of all the world is transacted. This life is man's day, in which man does what he pleases, and God holds His peace. But then God shall have His day too, in which He shall speak, and no man shall answer. If we do the work of God in our own day, we shall receive an infinite mercy in the day of the Lord.—Ver. 16. My gospel. The gospel: 1. A voice of love (vox amoris); 2. a voice of challenge (vox contestationis); 3. a voice of certainty (vox certitudinis); 4. a voice of persuasion and invitation (vox invitationis); 5. a voice of decision and judgment (vox judicii).—P. S.]

FOURTH SECTION.—The aggravated corruption of the Jew in his false zeal for the law (a side-piece to the corruption of the Gentile in his idolatrous worship of symbols). The fanatical and wicked method of the Jews in administering the law with legal pride, and in corrupting it by false application and treachery—an occasion for the blasphemy of God's name among the Gentiles.

CHAP. II. 17-24.

24 the transgression of the law thou dishonourest God.]⁵ "For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you," as it is written [Isa. lli. 5; Ezek. xxxvi. 20].

TEXTUAL.

¹ Ver. 17.—[Instead of the text. rec., behold, which is not sufficiently sustained, read ei δὲ, but if, with K. A. B. D^e. K., Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Bloomfield, Alford, and nearly all the recent commentators. The reading behold is either a mistake, or a change for the purpose of avoiding the anacoluthon, which, however, is more apparent than real. The apodosis must be supplied (why dost thou not act accordingly, or, how great is thy responsibility), or it may be found in ver. 21, by simply omitting the οὗν, which is often epianaleptic, resuming the thread of the sentence. So Meyer, who regards vers. 17-28 as the protasis, and 21, 22 as the apodosis.—P. S.]

² Ver. 17.—[ἐπαρταύς νόμος, without the article, K. A. B. D^e. The later MSS. and the text. rec. insert ἔν before νόμος, because it here clearly applies to the written law of Moses as representing the whole Mosaic system, the civil and religious polity of the Jews. νόμος has here as in ver. 14 the force of a proper name. Alford: "The article is omitted, because 'the law' is not here distributed—it is not the law itself in its entirety which is meant, but the fact of having or of knowing the law—the strict way of expressing it would perhaps be, 'in the fact of possessing a law,' which, condensed into our less accurate English, would be in one word, in the law: viz., 'which thou possessest.'"—P. S.]

³ Ver. 18.—[On the different interpretations of δοκιμάσεις τὰ διαφέροντα, see the Engg. Notes. Lange (with Tholuck, Fritzsche, Reiche, Rückert, Philippi, Alford) translates: Du beurtheilst die widerstreitenden Dinge. Tholuck: Du prüfst das Unterschiedene. Tyndale: Hast experience of good and bad. Conybeare and Howson: Givest judgment upon good or evil. Robert Young, too literally: Dost approve the distinctions. But the versions of Cranmer, Geneva, James, Rheims, and Am. Bible Union agree substantially with the Latin Vulg.: Probas utiliora. So also Meyer, who translates: Du billigst das Vorseitliche. Wordsworth: Thou discernest the things that are more excellent. The same phrase occurs, Phil. i. 10, where the E. V. renders it in the same way. Grammatically, both interpretations are correct, and hence the connection must decide. δοκιμάσεις means first to examine, to try, to prove (1 Cor. iii. 13; 1 Peter i. 7); and then, as the result of examination and trial, to discern, to distinguish, and to approve (1 Cor. xvi. 3; Rom. xiv. 22). διαφέρω is: (1.) To differ; (2.) to differ to advantage, to excel. Hence τὰ διαφέροντα: (1.) The difference between right and wrong, good and bad; (2.) the excellent things, utilia.—P. S.]

⁵ Ver. 23.—[Lange and Meyer take this verse as a categorical charge, resulting from the preceding questions which the Jew could not deny. This view is supported by the following γὰρ. παράβασις, in the six other passages of the N. T. where it occurs, is uniformly translated transgression in the E. V.—P. S.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The connection with the foregoing is explained by Tholuck [p. 110] thus: "The Jew was already humbled by the proof that the Gentile was also in possession of the law. But it is further charged upon him that his possession of the law has become a dishonor to Him who gave it to him." We have seen already that the connection consists in a sharp antithesis: a Gentile who is a Jew at heart; a Jew who, according to the spirit of the law, is the most wanton Gentile. [Estius justly calls the following apostrophe, "oratio splendida ac vehemens."] Ver. 17. But if thou art named a Jew. There seems to be an anacoluthon in the following verses, which it was probably intended to remove by the reading ἰδί. Tholuck: "The apodosis appears to be wanting to the protasis, vers. 17-20." But we may explain without an anacoluthon (Meyer): "But if thou art called a Jew, &c. . . thou therefore (οὖν, ver. 21, in consequence of what has been said, who teachest another, teachest thou not thyself?" We would find an easier solution, if we could read the verbs ἐπονομάζω and ἐπανάπαυή as conjunctives for the formation of a hypothetical protasis; the following indicatives would then constitute the apodosis. But the ἂν is wanting to the ἰδί. [See Textual Note 1.]-Named. Jew was the designation of the Hebrew according to his religion; therefore the theocratic name of honor, which is also contained in the etymology of the word itself.* Ἐπονομάζω is translated cognominaris in the Vulgate and Bengel. [Wordsworth: ἐπ-ονομάζω, thou hast a title in addition to (ἐπί) that which other men possess.—P. S.] But the compound verb is also used in the sense of the simple ονομάζω, and the name Ἰουδαῖος was not a surname, although it might become a surname for the false Jew. Tholuck [Meyer, Philippi, Hodge; comp. LXX. Gen. iv. 17, 25, 26, and the classical quotations of Meyer in loc.—P. S.].—And rearest. Intimation of Jewish pride. Strictly: Thou liest on it for rest. Thus the Jew abused his privilege; Ps. cxlvii. 19, 20.—Israel perverted into a false trust its ideal destination for the nations, according to Isa. xlii. 6, 7, and other passages; and it so caricatured the single elements (which are designated in the following verses) of this destination, that the most glaring moral contradiction took place in its character.—Thou makest thy boast † in God, as thy [exclusive] guardian God; Isa. xlv. 25; Jer. xxxi. 33. [To boast or glory in God, or in Christ (Gal. vi. 14), is right, if it proceeds from a sense of our weakness and unworthiness, and a corresponding sense of the goodness of God, as our sure refuge and strength; but it is wrong if it arises from religious bigotry and conceit, which would monopolize the favor of God to the exclusion of others. Calvin:

* [יָדָוּ is the verbal noun from the future hophal of יָדָה, to praise, and means praised, so. Jah, God (Gollob); see Fürst, Dict., sub יָדָה, vol. i. 491; Gen. xxix. 35 (where Leah, after the birth of Judah, says: "Now will I praise the Lord; therefore she called his name Judah"); xlix. 8; Rev. ii. 9. To be a Jew in this proper sense was to belong to the covenant people of God selected for His praise.—P. S.]

† [Καυχᾶσαι (also in 1 Cor. iv. 7), like κατακαυχᾶσαι, Rom. xi. 18, θύνασαι (for θύνη), Matt. v. 36, θύνασαι, Luke xvi. 25, is the original uncontracted form for καυχᾶ. in use with the poets and later prose-writers, see Winer, Gram., p. 73, 7th ed. The dv signifies the sphere in which the boasting moves, or the object of boasting, as χαίρειν dv.—P. S.]

"Hæc igitur non cordis gloriatio, sed lingua jactantia fuit." The false Jewish boasting in God amounted to a boasting in the flesh, against which we are warned, Gal. vi. 13; 2 Cor. x. 15; Phil. iii. 2. Ἰουδαῖος ἐπαινομάζω—καὶ ἐπανάπαυή νόμου—καὶ καυχᾶσαι ἐν θεῷ, form a rising climax.—P. S.]

Ver. 18. And knowest his will [τὸ θεόλημα is emphatic.—P. S.] That is, His will as the inward part of the law; Eph. iii. 18, &c.; or rather, the absolute will which has become manifest in the law.—And discernest the things that differ [δοκιμάζεις τὰ διαφέροντα]. Three explanations of this expression: 1. The difference between right and wrong (Theodoret, Theophylact, Grotius, &c., Tholuck, Philippi, and others); 2. what is at variance with the will of God, sinful (Clericus, Glöckler); 3. thou approvest the excellent (Vulgate: probas utiliora, Bengel, Meyer [Hodge]). According to the meaning of διαφέρειν (to be prominent; to be distinguished; to excel), and διαφέροντα (the distinctions; the excellent), these different explanations are equally allowable; and the connection must therefore determine which is the best one. But the explanation: thou approvest the excellent, is not strong enough; although Meyer sees in it the completion of a climax.* The Jew was, as וְיָדָה,† the distinguishing, the sharply deciding between what was allowed and disallowed; he was skilled in the διακρίσις καλοῦ τε καὶ κακοῦ, Heb. v. 14; the διαστολή ἁγίων καὶ βεβήλων [a term frequently used by Philo]. This explanation passes over into a fourth: τὰ διαφέροντα, the controversies (De Dieu, Wolf).—Being instructed. After his fashion he lives in the law, κατηχοῦμενος, not κατηχηθεῖς. [Being instructed, not only catechetically in youth, but didactically and continually by the reading and exposition of the Scriptures in the synagogue on the Sabbath day.—P. S.]

Ver. 19. And art confident. He should be every thing that follows, according to Old Testament intimations; see Isa. xlii. 6, 7, and other passages. So much less is there a reason why Reiche should find here reminiscences from the Gospels (Matt. xv. 14; Luke xx. 32). The corruption of Judaism consisted throughout in perverting the Old Testament attributes of the people, and of its future, into the literal and the carnal. From this arose also its proselytism (Matt. xxiii. 15), which is here described.—Guide of the blind. The Jew called the Gentiles blind; σκότος, in Isa. lx. 2, means, therefore, the Gentiles; and ὥς εἰς ἀποκλίνας ἰθύνων, in Isa. xlix. 6, means the Jews; νήπιον, the proselytes (see Tholuck).

Ver. 20. Form (pattern) of knowledge. μὲρ φωσέας—classically, μόρφωμα; Heaychius: σχηματισμός. [In the New Testament it occurs only once more—2 Tim. iii. 6—where it is opposed to δῖναμις, and means the mere outward form or appearance. Here, on the contrary, it is the real representation or expression, exemplar, effigies. Grotius: forma qua rem exprimit.—P. S.] According to Meyer, the doctrines and commandments of the law itself are the form of knowledge and truth. We are nearer right when we remember the didactic impression of the Old Testament revelation of the law in the rabbinical tradition from which the Talmud subsequently arose; for the Apostle speaks of a μόρφωσις τῆς γνώσεως, which should be indirectly μορφ. τῆς ἀληθείας ἐν τῷ νόμῳ. Œcumenius and Olshausen, without cause, think of the typical character of the Old Testament; others (with Theophylact) of the mere phantom of truth. The question is concerning an object of which the Jew boasts. His μόρφωσις is indeed the gloomy anti-type of the personal incarnation of the truth in Christ, as in Ecclesiasticus xxiv. 25 (23) we read of the σοφία becoming a book in the Thora. All these are now the characteristics of the Jew's pretensions. There now follow the proofs of the contradiction in which he stands to himself.

* [So does Hodge: "To approve of what is right, is a higher attainment than merely to discriminate between good and evil." But there is a difference between an instinctive and an intelligent approval of what is right. The latter is the result of reflection and discrimination, resting on superior knowledge, which was the peculiar advantage of the Jew having the touchstone of the written law and the continual instruction of the Scriptures. What immediately follows agrees better with the interpretation of Lange. Comp. Textual Note 2.—P. S.]

Ver. 21. Thou, then, that teachest another. [The virtual apodosis of ver. 17. The several clauses are more lively and forcible if read interrogatively, so as to challenge the Jew to deny the charge, if he dare.—P. S.] The analogy of the following charges to the Apostle's judgment on the Gentiles lies herein: the Jews, by their pride of the law and by their legal orthodoxy, were led into the way of ruin, just as the Gentiles had been by their intellectual conceit indulging in symbols and myths. The first charge is general: Teachest thou not thyself? Ps. i. 16. After this, three specific charges follow in strong gradation. Meyer: "The following infinitives [μὴ κλέπτειν, μὴ μοιχεύειν] do not include in themselves the idea of δύναι or ἐξύναι, but are explained by the idea of command which is implied in the finite verbs" [viz., κλέπτεις, μοιχεύεις. The verba judendi here are κηρύσσων and λέγων.—P. S.] In the charge of stealing, there was undoubtedly special reference to the passionate and treacherous method of transacting business adopted by the Jews (James iv. 18); in the charge of adultery, to the loose practice of divorces (Matt. xix. 8, 9; James iv. 4).—[Μοιχεύεις. The Talmud charges adultery upon some of the most celebrated Rabbins, as Akiba, Meir, Eleasar.—P. S.] The strongest charge is the third:

Ver. 22. Thou that abhorrest idols, &c. Βδελύσσομαι, from βδελύσσω, to excite disgust by a loathsome odor. In the religious sense, to abhor. The Jew called the idols βδελύγματα (1 Mac. vi. 7; 2 Kings xxiii. 18, תועבות). Explanations: 1. By plundering the temples of idols (Chrysostom, Theophylact, and many others; Meyer, Philippi [Alford, Conybeare and Howson]). Tholuck: "The law, in Deut. vii. 25, forbids the appropriation of the gold and silver ornaments of the images of gods; and in the paraphrase of this prohibition in Josephus (Antiq. iv. 8, 10), express reference is made to the robbing of heathen temples. Acts xix. 36, 37, shows that the Jews had the name of committing such an offence." [The objection to this view is, that the Jew, attaching no sacredness to the temples of idols, regarded the depouling of heathen temples as no sacrilege, but simply as robbery, which might be justified under certain circumstances.—P. S.] 2. ἱεροστυλίω in the figurative sense: profanatio majestatis divine (Calvin, Luther, Bengel, Köllner).* 3. Embezzlement of taxes [tithes and offerings] for their own temple (Pelagius, Grotius [Ewald, Wordsworth, and others; comp. Mal. i. 8, 12, 14; iii. 8-10]). To the charge of robbing heathen temples, the idea of pollution— which this robbery carries with it—may also be added, as is done by Meyer. But it seems strange that the Apostle should have established, on isolated occurrences of such robbery, so general and fearful a charge. As in the charges: "Thou stealest, thou committest adultery," he had not merely in mind occasional great transgressions, but also the universal exhibitions of Jewish avarice and concupiscence, so we must also here accept a more general and spiritual significance of his accusation. We must indeed suppose here transgressions that were an occasion of offence to the Gentiles; and Luther goes much too far in spiritualizing the charge: "Thou art a robber of God; for it is God's honor that all those who rely on good works would take from Him." But the worst outrage on the temple, according to John ii. 19, consisted in the crucifixion of Christ (comp. James v. 6). It was therefore as a sign of judgment that the temple in Jerusalem itself was desecrated by the Jews in every possible way before its destruction. In a wider sense, the transgression of the Jews consisted in their causing, by their fanaticism, not only the downfall of the temple, but in frivolously abusing and insulting the sanctuaries of Gentiles, and, where occasion offered, in converting their treasures into spoils and articles of commerce.

Ver. 23. Thou that makest thy boast in the law. Since this judgment is the result of the foregoing question, Meyer has good reason for reading this verse not as a question, but as a categorical impeachment. This is supported by the γάρ in ver. 24.

Ver. 24. For the name of God. That is, the Gentiles judged the religion of the Jews by the scandalous conduct of the Jews themselves, and thus were led to blaspheme their God, Jehovah. The Jews boasted of the law (which, Baruch iv. 3, is termed ἡ δόξα τοῦ Ἰακώβ), and reflected disgrace on the lawgiver. For the Jews, the Apostle here seals again his declaration, by concluding with a quotation from the Old Testament—Isa. lii. 5: "My name continually every day is blasphemed" [in the Septuagint: δὲ ἡμᾶς διαπαντός τὸ ὄνομα μου βλάσφημεῖται ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι]. Comp. Ezek. xxxvi. 23: "I will sanctify my great name, which was profaned among the heathen, which ye have profaned in the midst of them."

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The Apostle now passes over from his indirect representation of the corruption in Judaism, which he had given from a general point of view, vers. 10-16, to paint its life-picture from experience. In chap. iii. 10-19, he proves that the Old Testament had already testified to the corruption of the Jewish people. But this description of the actual corruption must be distinguished from the sketch of the original transgression, chap. v. 12 ff., and from the development in part of the judgment of hard-heartedness, chaps. ix. and x.

* [So Hodge: "The essence of idolatry was profanation of God; of this the Jews were in a high degree guilty. They had made His house a den of thieves."—P. S.]

2. The description of the corruption in Judaism presents only legalistic features, as 'he account of Gentile corruption presents Antinomian features. In the former case, the disfiguration of religion proceeded from legal conceit, while in the latter it arose from the conceit of wisdom; the root of pride is therefore common to both lines of corruption. The self-contradiction of the Gentiles was developed thus: he, the pretended wise man, becomes a fool by disfiguring his symbolical religion of nature; with all his self-glory, he becomes a worshipper of the creature, and loses the dignity of his human body; with all his deification of nature, he sinks thereby into abominable unnaturalness; with all his efforts for vigor of life and enthusiasm, he sinks more and more into the degradation of wicked characters; and finally, with all his better knowledge, he ornaments and varnishes sin theoretically and aesthetically. The self-contradiction of the Jew, on the other hand, developed itself thus: he, the pretended teacher of the nations, becomes an Antinomian blasphemer, by the perversion of his religion of revelation and law, while he teaches others, and not himself, and, by a succession of transgressions of the law, goes so far as to profane sacred things, by abusing and robbing the temples (see Matt. xxi. 18). To the profanation of the temple was added that of the high-priesthood, which reached its climax in Caiaphas. Likewise the ministry of the Jew was thoroughly profaned by proselytism and falsification of the law, and his religiousness was converted into a cloak for hypocrisy.

3. The fanatic grows ever more profane by the consistency of his course of conduct—a despiser of the substantial possessions of religion. Church history furnishes numerous examples, how fanatics of the churchly as well as unchurchly type become at last, out of pretended saints, profaners and robbers of the temple.

4. Priests and preachers have certainly corrupted religion as often as philosophers have corrupted wisdom, politicians the State, jurists the law, &c.

5. The dogmatic and legalistic spirit of the Middle Ages, too, which, in a better form, was really a "teacher of the blind," has finally gone so far as to present the greatest variety of religious and moral hindrances to modern Gentiles. It is not without serious significance, therefore, that the Epistle to the Romans contains this very section.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The false zeal for the law practised by the Jews as occasion for blaspheming the name of God by the Gentiles: so far as, 1. such false zeal knows God's will; but, 2. wantonly transgresses it (vers. 17-24).—The mere name of Christianity goes no further than the name of Judaism (vers. 17-24).—Do not depend upon your orthodoxy, if you do not act right by faith (vers. 17-24).—Notwithstanding brilliant knowledge, one is a bad teacher if he does not do what he knows (vers. 17-24).—Blasphemy of the name of God (ver. 24).—God's name has already been often blasphemed among the heathen (and Mohammedans) because of Christians. Proof: 1. From the outrages of persons professing Christianity in the Middle Ages (Charlemaigne, and the Saxons, the Brethren of the Sword, the Spaniards in America, &c.); 2. from the abuses in trade in the present time (the slave trade, opium trade, sandal-wood trade).

STARKE: When one does any thing which has ever so good appearance, it is sin if it does not come from faith (ver. 18).—Theological learning is by no means enough for a teacher, when he is not taught in the school of the Holy Spirit (ver. 20).—That teacher cannot be an example of good works who can only say of himself: "Judge according to my words, and not according to my deeds" (ver. 21).—Boasting and vain-glory—the manner, alas, of many Christians! (ver. 23).—CRAMER: The titles and names of honor that we may possess should be to us a continual reminder to conduct ourselves in harmony with such titles (ver. 17).—Nova Bibl. Tub.: Oh, how many external privileges a soul can have! Communion in the true Church, knowledge of God and His word, of His will and His works, the best instruction, a skilful sense of the difference between good and evil; and yet, in spite of all this, it can be at fault, and quite removed from the inner fellowship with God (ver. 17).—Look, teacher! You must commence with yourself; you must first be your own teacher, guide, and chastiser; first preach to your own self, first break your own will, and perform what you preach. But to desire to guide, discipline, and control others, and yet steal and commit adultery yourself, &c.—that will enter in judgment against you. Oh, how great is this corruption! (ver. 20).—QUESNEL: Oh, how rare a thing it is to be learned without being proud! (ver. 19).

HUBNER: There is a false and a true boasting on the part of a believer in revelation. He does it falsely when he imagines, 1. that he thereby makes himself more acceptable to God; 2. that merely having and knowing are sufficient, without practice; 3. when, at the same time, he despises others. He boasts properly when, 1. he gives God all the glory; 2. makes use of the revealed truth; 3. does not despise others (ver. 17).—It is a great grace when God gives a tender conscience (ver. 18).—To know the right, is in the power of every Christian; and sin does not consist in ignorance or misunderstanding, but has its root in the will (ver. 19).—Melancholy contradiction between knowledge and deeds (vers. 21-23).—The honor of Christianity is dependent upon us.—A holy life is the final vindication of faith (ver. 24).

BESSER: Legalists, who would be righteous by their works, deprive the law of its spiritual clearness (ver. 17).

LONGE: The internal self-contradiction between knowledge and disposition extends to external life: 1. As self-contradiction between word and deed; 2. between the vocation and the discharge of it; 3. between destination to the welfare of the world, and degeneration, on the contrary, to the misery of the world.—The teacher of the law in olden times, and the (religious) teacher of the law in recent days—the offence of modern Gentiles.

[BURKITT: Vers. 17-20. Learn: 1. That persons are very prone to be proud of church privileges, glorying in the letter of the law, but not conformed to its spirituality either in heart or life; and 2. that gifts, duties, and supposed graces, are the stay and staff which hypocrites lean on. The duties which Christ has appointed, are the trust and rest of the hypocrite; but Christ Himself is the trust and rest of the upright.—Vers. 21-24. 1. It is much easier to instruct and teach others, than to be instructed ourselves; 2. it is both sinful and shameful to teach others the right way, and to go in the wrong ourselves. While this is a double fault in a private person, it is inexcusable in the teacher

3. the name of God suffers by none so much as by those who preach and press the duties of Christianity upon others, but do not practise them themselves. The sins of teachers are teaching sins. Lord, let all that administer unto Thee in holy things consider that they have not only their own sins to account for, but also the sins of their people, if committed by their profligate example.—MATTHEW HENRY: The greatest obstructors of the success of the Word, are those whose bad lives contradict their good doctrine; who in the pulpit preach so well, that it is a pity they should ever come out; and out of the pulpit live so ill, that it is a pity they should ever come in.—DODDRIDGE: We pity the Gentiles, and we have reason to do it; for they are lamentably blind and dissolute: but let us take heed lest those appearances of virtue which are to be found among some of them condemn us, who, with the letter of the law and the gospel, and with the solemn tokens of a covenant relation to God, transgress His precepts, and violate our engagements to Him, so turning the means of goodness and happiness into the occasion of more aggravated guilt and misery.—CLARKE: Ver. 17. It is the highest honor to be called to know God's name, and be employed in His service.—HODGE (condensed): The sins of the professing people of God are peculiarly offensive to Him, and injurious to our fellow-men.—The sins and refuges of men are alike in all ages.—Were it ever so certain that the church to which we belong is the true, apostolic, universal Church, it remains no less certain, that without holiness no man shall see the Lord.—BARNES: It matters little what a man's speculative opinions may be; his practice may do far more to disgrace religion, than his profession does to honor it.—J. F. H.]

CHAPTER II. 25-29.—III. 1-20.

FIFTH SECTION.—The external Judaism of the letter, and the internal Judaism of the spirit. The objective advantage of historical Judaism. The subjective equality of Jews and Gentiles before the law of God, according to the purpose of the law itself—to bring about the knowledge of sin. (The utility of circumcision;—an accommodation to the need of salvation by the knowledge of sin. The circumcision which becomes uncircumcision, and the uncircumcision which becomes circumcision; or, the external Jew possibly an internal Gentile, while the external Gentile may be an internal Jew. Not the mere possession of the law, but fidelity to the law, is of avail. The latter does not create pride of the law, but knowledge of sin—that is, the need of salvation. The advantage of circumcision therefore consists in this, that to the Jew were committed the oracles of God—that law by which all men are represented in the guilt of sin. Sin, as acknowledged guilt, represented in contrast with the law.)

CHAP. II. 25-29.

- 25 For circumcision verily [indeed] profiteth, if thou keep [keepest] the law: but if thou be [art] a breaker [transgressor] of the law, thy circumcision is made [has] 26 become, or, is turned into] uncircumcision. Therefore, if the uncircumcision [so called, i. e., the uncircumcised] keep the righteousness [decrees, commandments, moral requirements, δικαιώματα] of the law, shall [will] not his uncircumcision be 27 counted for circumcision? And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature, if it fulfil the law, judge thee, who by ' the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law? [He who is uncircumcised by nature, if he fulfils the law, will even judge thee, who, with the letter and circumcision, dost transgress the 28 law.]' For he is not a Jew, which [who] is one outwardly; neither is that 29 circumcision, which is outward in the flesh: But he is a Jew, which [who] is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and [omit and] not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God.

CHAP. III. 1-20.

- 1 What advantage then hath [What, then, is the advantage of] the Jew? 2 or what profit is there [what is the benefit] of circumcision? Much every way: chiefly, [First, indeed,] because that unto them were committed [they 3 —i. e., the Jews—were entrusted with, ἐπιστεύθησαν] the oracles of God. For what [What, then,] if some did not believe [were faithless]? shall their unbelief [faithlessness, or, unfaithfulness] make the faith of God without effect 4 [destroy, or, nullify the faithfulness of God]? God forbid: [Let it not be!] yea, let God be true, but every man a liar; as it is written, "That thou mightest [mayest] be justified in thy sayings, and mightest [mayest] overcome when 5 thou art judged" [Ps. ii. 4]. But if our unrighteousness commend [doth

- establish]* the righteousness of God, what shall we say? Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance [who is inflicting, or, bringing down, the wrath, ὁ ἐνυπάρχων τὴν ὀργήν]?* (I speak as a man [after the manner of men, κατὰ ἀνθρώπων].)
- 6 God forbid: [Let it not be!] for then how shall God judge the world?
- 7 For [But] if¹ the truth [covenant-faithfulness] of God hath more abounded through my lie [was made the more conspicuous by means of my falsehood, unfaithfulness] unto his glory [chap. v. 20]; why yet [still, any longer] am I also judged as a sinner? And not rather, (as we be [are] slanderously [blasphemously] reported, and as some affirm that we say,) Let us do evil, that good may come? whose damnation [condemnation, judgment]² is just.
- 9 What then? are we better than they?³ No, in no wise [Not at all] for we have before proved [charged] both Jews and Gentiles, that they are
- 10 [to be] all under sin; As it is written, "There is none righteous, no, not one:
- 11 There is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God.
- 12 They are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there
- 13 is none that doeth good, no, not one" [Pa. xiv. 1-3].⁴ "Their throat is an open sepulchre;" with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is
- 14 under their lips" [Pa. v. 9; xii. 3].⁵ "Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitter-
- 15, 16 ness" [Pa. x. 7].⁶ "Their feet are swift to shed blood: Destruction and
- 17 misery are in their ways: And the way of peace have they not known"
- 18 [Isa. lxx. 7, 8].⁷ "There is no fear of God before their eyes" [Pa. xxxvi. 1].⁸
- 19 Now we know that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law: that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may
- 20 become guilty before God. [.] Therefore [because] by⁹ the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified [by works of the law no flesh (i. e., no person) shall (can) be declared righteous] in his sight:" for [.] For] by the law is the knowledge of sin [comes a knowledge of sin].

TEXTUAL.

* Ver. 27.—[The E. V. here, as often, follows Beza, who translates sed, per, which is its fundamental meaning when it rules the genitive. But here it expresses the state or the circumstances under which the transgression takes place—i. e., with or in spite of, notwithstanding, the written law and circumcision; comp. ἀνδραγαθίας, with patience; & ἀκαρτερίας, while in circumcision, Rom. iv. 11; & ἀποστήματα, with offence, xiv. 20; and Winer, Gramm., 7th ed., p. 355 f.—P. 8.]

² Ver. 2.—[ἵππεύοντες τὴν γὰρ. K. A. D. ³ E. L., Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Lange, insert γὰρ, namely, after πᾶς; B. D. ⁴ G., Vulg., Syr., Lachmann, omit it. πρῶτον, first, in the first place, is not followed by secondly, &c.; comp. πρῶτον μὲν, i. 8. To avoid the anacoluthon, Calvin translates: precipue; Beza: primarium illud est. So also the E. V. and Dr. Lange.—P. 8.]

⁶ Ver. 4.—[Or, Far be it, far from it, by no means; Vulg., absit; German: es werde nicht, or (Luther, Lange), das sei fern! The phrase, μὴ γένοιτο, is an expression of strong denial or pious horror, corresponding to the Hebrew לֹא-יִהְיֶה (Gen. xiv. 17; Jos. xxii. 29; 1 Sam. xx. 2), and occurs fourteen times in Paul's Epistles—ten times in Romans (iii. 4, 6, 31; vi. 2, 15; vii. 7, 13; ix. 1, 11), three times in Galatians (ii. 17; iii. 21; vi. 14), and once in 1 Cor. vi. 15; but elsewhere in the N. T. only Luke xx. 16. It is also used by Polybius, Arian, and the later Greek writers. The God forbid of the Authorized Version (like the German Gott behüte, Gott bewahre) is almost profane, though very expressive, and in keeping with old English usage; for we find it in all the earlier E. V., including that of Wiclif, and also that of Rheims. Wordsworth's rendering: "Heaven forbid that this should be so," is hardly an improvement. Remember the third commandment, as explained by Christ, Matt. v. 34.—P. 8.]

⁷ Ver. 4.—[Or, in Thy judging, when Thou judgest, as the E. V. has it in Ps. li. 4. The active rendering of ἐν τῇ ἀποκρίσει (middle, in the sense of litigare) corresponds to the Hebrew בְּשִׁפְטֶיךָ, Ps. li. 4 (comp. LXX.; Job xiii. 19; Isa. xliii. 26; Jer. li. 35; Matt. v. 40; 1 Cor. vi. 1, 6), and is defended in this passage by Beza, Bengel, Tholuck, Meyer, and Ewald; while Vulg., Luther, Lange, Hodge, &c., prefer the passive rendering: when Thou art judged. See Heb. Notes. The quotation is from the penitential Psalm of David, composed after his double crime of adultery and murder, and reads in Hebrew thus:

לִּי לִבְרָה חַטָּאתִי
יָחַד בְּעֵינֶיךָ עָשִׂיתִי
לִפְנֵיךָ חַטָּאתִי בְּדַבָּרִי
חֹמֶר בְּשִׁפְטֶיךָ

Literally:

"To Thee, Thee only, I have sinned,
And done the evil in Thine eyes,
In order that Thou mayest be just in Thy speaking,
And pure in Thy judging."

Paul follows the translation of the Septuagint, which renders ΠΙΣΤΗ by δικαιωθῆς (that Thou mayest be justified—i. e. be accounted, declared just), substitutes νικῆς (that Thou mayest conquer, prevail judicially in Thy cause) for ΠΙΣΤΗ (be clear, pure), and takes the active ΠΙΣΤΕΥΕΙΣ in the passive, or more probably in the middle sense, ἐν τῇ κρινέσθαι σε. The sentiment is not materially altered. The apostles, in their citations, frequently depart from the letter of the Hebrew, being careful only to give the mind of the Holy Spirit.—P. 8.]

⁹ Ver. 5.—[Ἐνιστάμεν, to make stand with, to place together (constituo, colloco); and thence of persons, to introduce, to commend by letter (xvi. 1; 2 Cor. iii. 1); trop., to set forth, to make conspicuous, to prove; so here, and Rom. v. 8, ἐνιστάται τὴν . . . ἀγάπην; 2 Cor. vi. 4, ἐνιστάμεντες ἑαυτοὺς ὡς θεοῦ δίκαιοι; Gal. ii. 18, καταβάτην ἑμαυτὸν ἐνιστάμεν, and often in Polybius, Philo, and Josephus.—P. 8.]

¹¹ Ver. 7.—[The usual reading is, εἰ γὰρ; but Cod. Sin. reads, εἰ δέ. Lange, in his translation, reads, wenn nämlich; but in the Ææg. Notes: wenn aber. See his explanation of the difficult passage.—P. 8.]

¹² Ver. 8.—[Dr. Lange makes a period after come, and translates: And so let us by no means—as we are blasphemously charged, and as some pretend that we say—do evil, that good may come! The condemnation of such is just. See the Ææg. Notes. But nearly all the commentators regard ver. 8 as a continuation of the question commenced in ver. 7, and assume an irregularity of construction. Πιστεύομεν, then, instead of being connected with καὶ (τί)μή at the beginning of ver. 8, is connected by ὅτι with the preceding ἀγνοῦν. "And why do we not rather say, as we are blasphemously reported (βλασφημοῦμεθα), and as some give out that we do say, 'Let us do the evil things (τὰ κακά), that the good ones (τὰ ἀγαθὰ) may come?'—whose judgment is just."—P. 8.]

¹⁵ Vers. 10-12.—[Literal version of Ps. xiv. 1-3 from the Hebrew:]

"A fool hath said in his heart,
"There is no God."
They are corrupt,
They have done abominable things,
There is not a doer of good.
Jehovah from the heavens
Hath looked on the children of men
To see if there is a wise one, seeking God.
The whole have turned aside,
Together they have become worthless:
There is not a doer of good, not even one."—P. 8.]

¹⁶ Ver. 12.—[Ps. v. 9, according to the Hebrew:]

"There is no stability in their mouth;
Their heart is full of mischief;
An open grave is their throat;
Their tongues they make smooth."—P. 8.]

²² Ver. 20.—[τίς ἄνθρωπος ἔσται οὐ δικαιωθήσεται πᾶσα σὰρξ ἰδόντες αὐτοῦ, probably in allusion to Ps. cxliii. 2, LXX.: ὅτι οὐ δικαιωθήσεται ἰδόντες σου πᾶς σὰρξ. The negation belongs not to πᾶσα, but to the verb, according to a Hebraizing syntactic connection. "All flesh shall not be justified" = "nobody shall be justified." Comp. Matt. xxiv. 22: οὐκ ἔσται ἰωσὴφ πᾶσα σὰρξ.—F. 8.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Survey.—1. The use of circumcision. Its two-fold operation, according to the conflicting conduct of the Jews. Its spiritual significance, by which the Gentile can be a Jew, and the Jew a Gentile; vers. 25-29. 2. The objective advantage of historical Judaism. The authority of the Word of God, which remains established by virtue of God's faithfulness to His covenant, though many of the Jews become unfaithful. By this unfaithfulness they must even cause the glory of God's faithfulness to abound. Nevertheless, the unfaithful are responsible for their guilt, and the application of the sin of unfaithfulness to the glory of God would be a wicked transgression; chap. iii. 1-8. 3. The subjective equality of the Jews with the Gentiles. In a subjective relation, the former have no advantage, since, according to the witnesses of the Old Testament, they are in a severe condemnation. The conclusion: All the world stands guilty before God; vers. 9-20.—The whole section contains, briefly, the three points: 1. Circumcision (Judaism) is conditionally either an advantage, or not; 2. as far as the designed mission of Judaism was concerned, it was an advantage; 3. from the conduct of the Jews, as opposed to the righteousness of God, it was no advantage.

FIRST PARAGRAPH (VERS. 25-29).

Ver. 25. For circumcision indeed profiteth (or availleth). After the Apostle has portrayed the corruption of the Jews, he comes to the objection of Jewish theology, or also to the argument from the theocratic standpoint: What, then, is the prerogative of circumcision? Does not circumcision, as God's covenant promise, protect and sustain the Jews? Answer: The advantage of circumcision is (according to the nature of a covenant) conditional. It is actually available (not merely useful); it accomplishes its complete work when the circumcised keep the law. Plainly, circumcision here falls under the idea of a covenant. It is a mark of the covenant of the law, by which God will fulfil His promise to the Jew on condition that the Jew keep the law (see Exod. xix. 7, 8; Deut. xvi. 16). But afterward the circumcision of God is made prominent as God's institution; it remains in force, though a part of the Jews become faithless to the covenant relation. But this rests upon its inner nature or symbolical significance, as a promise and pledge of the circumcision of the heart; that is, a continual sincerity and heartiness in the fulfilment of the law (Deut. x. 16; xxx. 6; Jer. iv. 4; Col. ii. 11; Acts vii. 51: "Uncircumcised in heart and ears"). The consequence is, that the one who is circumcised is received into the people of the covenant. But the idea of the people of the covenant gradually becomes more profound, just as that of the covenant and the new birth itself, as the time of their fulfilment in the New Testament approaches. It is from this point of view that the following discussion must also be explained.—It is of unc-—that is, it accomplishes what it should accomplish according to its original idea.—If thou keep the law. Here the question is plainly not concerning the perfect fulfilment of the law in the Jewish sense (Tholuck); which is opposed by vers. 26 and 15. Nor can the Apostle anticipate here so soon the New Testament standpoint of faith, according to which believers alone, including those from the Gentiles, have the real circumcision. He therefore means the fulfilment of the law according to the measure of sincerity and heartiness by which either Jew or Gentile is prepared to obey the truth of the gospel (vers. 7, 8).—But if thou art a transgressor. One of the mystical expositions of the Pentateuch, Shemoth Rabbah (from about the 6th century), expresses the same thought in the same figurative drapery: "The heretics and the ungodly in Israel should not say, 'Because we are circumcised, we do not descend to the Gehenna.' What does God do? He sends His angels, and brings back their uncircumcision, so that they descend to Gehenna" (Tholuck).* The expressions transgressor and uncircumcision were especially terrible to the Jews. Uncircumcision was the peculiar characteristic of the impurity of heathendom, as circumcision denoted the consecration and holiness of the Jewish people. But here it is stated, not merely that uncircumcision takes the place of circumcision, but that circumcision actually becomes uncircumcision. That is, the unbelieving Jew becomes virtually a Gentile. [What is here said of Jewish circumcision, is equally applicable to Christian baptism: it is a great blessing to the believer, as a sign and seal of the New Covenant, and a title to all its privileges, but it avails nothing, yea, it is turned into a curse, by the violation of the duties implied in this covenant.—P. S.]

Ver. 26. Therefore, if the uncircumcision. The Apostle here uses the Jew's mode of expression. Ἀκροβυστία, uncircumcision, stands in the first clause of the sentence as an abstract term for the concrete ἄκροβυστος, uncircumcised; hence the αἰτοῦ [i. e., of such an ἄκροβυστος] after the second ἄκροβυστία).†—Τὰ δικαιώματα τοῦ νόμου. The requirements of the law in essential matters, as τὰ τοῦ νόμου, ver. 14; as they can be observed by the Gentile also. [The moral requirements, not the ceremonial, among which circumcision was the very first. The E. V. here mistakes δικαίωμα for δικαιοσύνη.—P. S.] Be counted for circumcision. He shall be accepted as a Jew who is obedient to the law (Matt. viii. 11; 1 Cor. vii. 19; Gal. v. 6). The clause is supposed by Philippi to apply to the Proselytes of the Gate. But these have ceased to be Gentiles in the full sense of the word. The point here throughout is not concerning the form, but the disposition. Fritzsche refers the future [λογισθήσεται] to the final judgment; but Meyer, and others, regard it as applying to the abstract future: "As often as the question concerns justification." Assuredly the Apostle has already in mind the definite future, the day when the gospel is preached.

* [Rabbi Berechias, in Shemoth Rabb., fol. 138, col. 13: "Ne heretici et apostatas et impii ex Israelitis dicant: quando quidem circumcisi sumus, in infernum non descendimus. Quid agit Deus S. B. ? Mittit angelum et praeputia eorum attrahit, ita ut ipsi in infernum descendant." Attrahere, or adducere praeputium, means as much as to obliterate the circumcision, or to become uncircumcised. It was done by apostate Jews at the time of the Maccabees, under the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes; 1 Mac. i. 15; Josephus, Antiq. xii. 6, § 2. It was a common Jewish opinion, that circumcision, as such, saves from hell. Rabbi Menachem (Comm. on the B. of Moses, fol. 43, col. 3): "Our Rabbins have said, that no circumcised man will see hell." Midrash Tillein (f. 7, c. 2): "God swore to Abraham, that no one who was circumcised should be sent to hell." See these, and similar passages, in Schöttgen and Eisenmenger (Endecktes Judenthum ii. p. 639 f.)—P. S.]

Ver. 27. And he who is uncircumcised by nature [ἐκ φύσεως belongs to ἀκροβυστία, not to τελοῦσα] will judge thee [κρινεῖ, rise up in judgment by his example; comp. Matt. xii. 41, 42, where κατακρίνω is used]. Analogies to this bold word can be found in the Gospels, Matt. iii. 9; viii. 11; xii. 41, and others; and even back in the Old Testament. The sentence is read by many as a question, as the previous verse; while the οὐχί is again supplied in thought before κρινεῖ (Rückert, Tholuck [in the earlier editions, but not in the fifth.—P. S.], Lachmann, and others). On the contrary, as a declaration, it is a definite answer and conclusion to ver. 26 (Luther, Erasmus, De Wette, Meyer).—Uncircumcised by nature. The Gentile as he is by virtue of his natural birth, as is the Jew no less. The ἐκ φύσεως is erroneously made by Koppe to relate to τὸν νόμον τελοῦσα; still more artificial is Olshausen's explanation: "The Gentile world observing the law without higher aid."—Who with the letter [διὰ γραμματος]. The διὰ reminds us of the declaration in chap. vii. 11: "For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, and by it slew me" (Ecumenius, Beza, and others). Yet it should be urged here, as Meyer properly remarks, that such a Jew, in spite of the law, transgresses it. But that he becomes a transgressor (παράβατης), and not merely a sinner (ἀμαρτωλός), rests upon the fact that he is in possession and knowledge of the law (chap. v. 13, 14). The expression γράμμα defines the law in its specific character as written law [not in a disparaging sense, in opposition to πνεῦμα]; circumcision (περιτομή) is the appropriate obligation to the same.

Ver. 28. For he is not a Jew who is one outwardly. We here have a succession of brief utterances (breviloquentia).^{} Meyer translates: "For not he who is a Jew externally, is a [genuine] Jew." This means, in complete expression (according to De Wette and others): "Not the one who is a Jew externally is a Jew, that is, is on that account already a Jew internally, or a true Jew." Thus, also, the second clause of the verse should be understood: Neither is the circumcision which is external in the flesh, genuine circumcision; the external sign is not the reality: it is the symbolical mask of the reality. Tholuck: "Mark xii. 33, as well as other examples, prove that this view was not unknown to the Scribes." Yet even this, and the expression quoted from the Talmud—"The Jew consists in the innermost parts of the heart"^{}—is far from resembling this Pauline antithesis.

Ver. 29. But he is a Jew who is one inwardly. Explanations: 1. "He who is internally a Jew is a Jew; and the circumcision of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter, is circumcision" (De Wette, Tholuck, with Beza, Este, Rückert). Here the absent predicate is in the concluding word. 2. But he who is one inwardly, is a Jew, and circumcision of the heart rests in the spirit, not in the letter (Luther, Erasmus, Fritzsche, Meyer). In the first construction, the ellipses are very strong; in the second, circumcision of the heart creates an anticipation which is at variance with the parallelism. Therefore, 3. But he is a Jew (this is brought over from the preceding verse) who is a Jew inwardly; and circumcision (likewise brought over from the preceding) is circumcision of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter. We must therefore supply Ἰουδαίος after ἀλλά, and περιτομή after καί.—A Jew in secret, ἐν κρυπτῷ Ἰουδαίος. The true theocratic disposition—that is, the direction of legality to heartiness, truth, and reality, and thus to the New Testament. This is not quite equal in degree to ὁ κρυπτὸς τῆς καρδίας ἄνθρωπος (1 Peter iii. 4). Circumcision of the heart; see Deut. x. 16, &c.; Philo: σύμβολον ἡδονῶν ἐκτομῆς. Circumcision of the heart does not mean "the separation of every thing immoral from the inner life" (Meyer), but the mortification or breaking of the natural selfish principle of life, by faith, as the principle of theocratic consecration and direction. [Even the Old Testament plainly teaches the spiritual import of circumcision, and demands the circumcision of the heart, without which the external ceremony is worthless; Deut. x. 16; xxx. 6; Jer. iv. 4; ix. 29; Ezek. xlv. 9; comp. Col. ii. 11; Phil. iii. 2. The same may be applied to baptism, the sign and seal of regeneration.—P. S.]—In the spirit. Explanations: 1. In the Holy Spirit (Meyer, Fritzsche, Philippi [Hodge]). Incorrect, since the question is not yet concerning the Christian new birth. 2. In the spirit of man (Ecumenius, Erasmus, Beza, Relche, and others). [Wordsworth: the inner man as opposed to the flesh.—P. S.] 3. The Divine spirit, as chap. vii. 6; 2 Cor. iii. 6; the spirit which fills the heart of the true Jew (Calvin, De Wette; the true spirit of the Jewish Church coming from God; Tholuck). 4. The new principle of life wrought by God in man (Rückert). 5. When πνεῦμα is placed in antithesis to γράμμα, or the life ἐν πνεύματι to the life ἐν γράμματι—that is, the life in an external, slavish, contracted pursuit of the single and outward prescriptions of the law according to the letter—then by spirit we are neither to understand the Spirit of God in itself, nor the spirit of man, but the spirit as life, the spirit-form of the inward life, by which the human spirit moves in the Spirit of God, and the Spirit of God in the human spirit.—Whose praise. Explanations of the οὗ: 1. neuter; cujus rei (Luther, Camerarius, Meyer: "ideal Judaism and ideal circumcision" [Wordsworth]). 2. More fitly: masculine; reference to Ἰουδαίος (Augustine, and others, Tholuck, De Wette

^{*} [In ver. 28 the subject is incomplete, and must be supplied from the predicate thus: οὗ γὰρ ὁ ἐν τῇ φανερῇ (Ἰουδαίος) Ἰουδαίος (ἐν τῇ κρυπτῇ, or ἀληθινῇ) ὅτις, οὐδὲ ὁ ἐν τῇ φανερῇ, ἐν σαρκὶ (περιτομῇ) περιτομῇ (ἀληθινῇ) ὅτις. In ver. 29 the predicate is wanting, and must be inferred from ver. 28 thus: ἀλλὰ ὁ ἐν τῇ κρυπτῇ Ἰουδαίος (Ἰουδαίος ὅτις), καὶ περιτομῇ καρδίας, ἐν πνεύματι, οὐ γράμματι (περιτομῇ ὅτις). This is the arrangement of Beza, E. V., De Wette, Tholuck, Alford. Dr. Lange (see Exeg. Notes on ver. 29) differs from this only in form, by supplying Ἰουδαίος as predicate after ἀλλά. But Fritzsche and Meyer make ver. 29 strictly parallel with ver. 28, and take Ἰουδαίος as predicate thus: ἀλλὰ ὁ ἐν τῇ κρυπτῇ (ὅτις) Ἰουδαίος, but he who (is a Jew) inwardly is a Jew (in the true, ideal sense of the word). This would seem the best arrangement, if it were not for the following: καὶ περιτομῇ καρδίας, &c., which Meyer renders: and the circumcision of the heart (is, consists in) the spirit, not in the letter. But a strict parallelism would here require: καὶ ὁ ἐν τῇ κρυπτῇ (or ὅτις) περιτομῇ. Ewald agrees with this structure of Meyer in the first clause, but would make καρδίας the predicate in the second clause: circumcision (is that) of the heart. This is forced, and would require the article before περιτομῇ. The sense is not materially affected by the difference of construction. In this passage the authorized E. V., upon the whole, can scarcely be improved.—P. S.]

^{*} [Tholuck quotes from the Talmud (Nidda, f. 20, 2) the axiom: לבב יהודי בן דבריה, Judeus in penetralibus cordis.—P. S.]

[Alford, Hodge]. Ἰπαινος, John v. 44; xii. 48. The expression, according to chap. xiii. 3 and 1 Peter ii. 14, is often "a judicial term" (Tholuck). The Apostle here declares not only that the genuine Jewish disposition of pious Jews and Gentiles is far exalted above every praise from below, and enjoys the approbation of God, but also that its honor comes from God, and will therefore be sanctioned by God by a judicial act—which can at last be nothing else but justification by faith. To Judah it was said, as the explanation of his name: "Thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise." But God Himself will praise this genuine spiritual Judah.

SECOND PARAGRAPH, CHAP. III. 1-8.

Ver. 1. What then is the advantage of the Jew [τί οὖν τὸ περισσὸν τοῦ Ἰουδαίου]? After the Apostle has shown that not only the Jews are included in the same corruption with the Gentiles, but that pious Gentiles have even an advantage over ungodly Jews, he comes to the question which would naturally be presented to him—whether, then, Israel has any peculiar prerogative, and, if so, in what it consists. He does not ask in the name of a Gentile Christian (Seb. Schmid), or of the Judaist, although he must take from these every occasion for accusation, but from the standpoint of the true theocracy. The advantage in the sense of profit (De Wette).—Or what is the benefit of circumcision (τίς ἡ ὠφέλεια τῆς περιτομῆς)? The second question does not relate merely to circumcision as a single means of grace (De Wette). It makes the first question more precise, so far as for the Apostle the Jewish economy is different from the Old Testament in general (chap. iv.; Gal. iii.).

Ver. 2. Much every way. First of all, namely. [πολύ refers to both περισσὸν and ὠφέλεια; Meyer. κατὰ πάντα τρόπον, under every moral and religious aspect, whichever way you look at it; the opposite is κατ' οὐδένα τρόπον.—P. S.] All that he could have in mind he shows in chap. ix. 4. But from the outset, apart from his train of thought and purpose, he had a further object than to show the advantage that to them the λόγια τοῦ Θεοῦ were committed. We therefore accept, with Theodoret, Calvin, Bengel, and others, that πρῶτον means here præcipuum, or primarium illud est, first of all. Tholuck and Meyer [Alford, Hodge], on the other hand, suppose that he omitted to enumerate the other points (to which the μήν refers), and quote, as examples, chap. i. 8; 1 Cor. xi. 18.—They were intrusted with the oracles of God. According to our rendering of the πρῶτον, τὰ λόγια (significant promulgations, χρησμοί, words of revelation, Acts vii. 38; Heb. v. 12; 1 Peter iv. 11) can by no means denote the Old Testament word of God in its general aspect (Cocceius: quidquid Deus habuit dicendum), but this word only in the specific direction in which the most of the Jews were unbelieving in respect to it. What is meant, therefore, is not the law alone and as such (Theodoret, Ecumenius, Beza); for the law, according to Paul, was also a typical gospel (which Tholuck seems to overlook, when he says: The contents of the λόγια divide into the twofold part, ὁ νόμος and αἱ ἑπαγγελίαι); nor the Messianic prophecies alone (Grotius, Tholuck, Meyer), but properly both (De Wette), as one was the condition of the other, and both constituted a covenant of Jehovah with the people (Calvin, Calov [Hodge], and others). The unity of these elements lay chiefly in the patriarchal promises; and as the people of Israel were made a covenant people, these were committed to them as the oracles of God establishing the covenant, which Israel, as the servant of God, should proclaim to the nations at the proper time. [The Apostle, in calling the Old Testament Scriptures the oracles of God, clearly recognizes them as divinely inspired books. The Jewish Church was the trustee and guardian of these oracles till the coming of Christ. Now, the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament are committed to the guardianship of the Christian Church.—P. S.] Ἐπιστεύθησαν. They were entrusted with. Πιστεύει τῷ τ. in the passive. comp. Winer, § 40, 1 [§ 39, 1, p. 244, 7th ed.; also Gal. ii. 7; 1 Cor. ix. 17.—P. S.] They were federally entrusted by the faithfulness of God (πίστις, ver. 3) with God's promises, or were authenticated in their faith in order that they might exercise it with fidelity to faith.

Ver. 3. What then? If some were faithless, &c. In these words the Apostle intimates that the Jews, in the main, still have the advantage just mentioned. The statement is therefore neither an objection nor a proof, but it establishes the previous point against doubt. In view of the certain fulfilment of the Divine promise, even the mass of the apostate people is only a poor crowd of individuals, some; though these some may grammatically be many. Meyer, taking ground against Tholuck and Philippi, disputes the contemptuous and ironical character of the expression τινές. The contempt and irony lies, of course, not in the word, but in the idea. Unbelief has scattered and divided Israel. According to De Wette and Fritzsche, the expression has an alleviating character. Since the great mass of the unbelievers was known to the readers, the expression has rather a palpable sharpness. Meyer's translation: "If many did refuse to believe (Glaube), their unbelief (Unglaube) will not annul the credibility (Glaubhaftigkeit) of God," expresses the correspondence of the different designations, but it is not satisfactory to the sense. The Apostle forces us, by the πίστις Θεοῦ, to bring into prominence here the moral force of ἀπιστία; and the assertion of Meyer, that ἀπιστεῖν and ἀπιστία mean always, in the New Testament, unbelief, not unfaithfulness, rests upon a false alternative.* Köllner refers the ἀπιστία to the unfaithfulness of the Jews in the ante-Christian time. De Wette likewise: "They have been unfaithful in keeping the covenant (Theodoret, Ecumenius, Calvin, and others); not, they have been unbelieving toward the promises and the gospel (Tholuck, Olshausen, Meyer)." This view is very strange, since he correctly observes that in the word ἀπιστεῖν there lie two meanings; as πίστις is at the same time fidelity and faith. Meyer's objection to De Wette is equally strange: "τινές would be altogether unsuited, for the very reason that it would not be true. All were disobedient and unfaithful." This is against history and the declarations of the Bible (see the discourse of Stephen, Acts vii.). If we distinguish between the ideas, to be a sinner and to be an apos-

* [Hodge: That ἀπιστεῖν may have the sense to be unfaithful, is plain from 2 Tim. ii. 13, and from the sense of ἀπιστία, in Heb. iii. 12, 19, and of ἀπιστος, in Luke xii. 48; Rev. xxi. 8. To understand the passage as referring to want of faith in Christ, seems inconsistent with its whole context.—P. S.] tate, then it follows that, according to the Scriptures, the numerical majority of apostates was always offset by a dynamical majority of persons faithful to the covenant, by whom the covenant was continued on the ground of the πίστις Θεοῦ; and it would have been very strange if Paul, in view of this oft-repeated history, which was first really consummated in his time, should have quite ignored the present. But as ἐπιστεύσαν elsewhere (for example, John viii. 30) means, they became believers, so is ἠπιστήσαν here, they have become unbelieving, not, they have been. The πίστις of God is His fidelity; His fidelity to the covenant certainly involves "credibility." (2 Tim. ii. 13; πιστός ὁ Θεός, 1 Cor. i. 9; x. 13, &c.)

Ver. 4. Let it not be, μὴ γένοιτο. [Comp. Textual Note *.] This expression of impassioned repulsion [solemn and intense deprecation], also common to the later Greeks, is, in the mouth of the Hebrew (חַלְבָּהּ, ad profana), at the same time an expression of a religious or moral repugnance or aversion. Therefore the Apostle repels the thought, as if the τῷ could annul the πίστις of God, and therefore also nullify the realization of the eternal covenant of grace in the heart of Israel and in a New Testament people of God.—But let it be: God (is) true, but every man false. [Lange: So aber sei's: Gott ist wahrhaftig, jeder Mensch aber falsch.] Since γένοιτο relates to one sentence, the antithetical γινώσθω must relate to the sentence which offsets it, and must be marked, as announcing a declaration, by a colon. According to Meyer and De Wette, it means logice γινώσθω, or ἀποδοκιμασθω (Theophylact). [Tholuck prefers ὁμολογισθω as equivalent.] But then the term would have been unfitly chosen. Koppe explains: Much rather let it be (vielmehr so sei es). Meyer objects that in this case we should expect τοῦτο or τό as article before the whole sentence, and remarks, that Paul did not design to introduce any sentence from the Old Testament. But Paul can nevertheless make use of a sentence of his own on the future of Israel, and the want of the τό does not outweigh the consideration that the γινώσθω, as the antithesis of μὴ γένοιτο, requires a formal declaration. Moreover, Pa. cxvi. 11 (all men are liars) furnished already one half, and the connection the other half of the declaration. This point was to be unfolded in all its amplitude in the history of the New Testament. See 2 Tim. ii. 13. [I prefer to connect γινώσθω (Paul does not say, ἵνα) with θεός, and to take it in the subjective sense: Let God become, i. e., be seen and acknowledged, even by His enemies, as true, whatever be the consequences. So also the E. V. and the best English commentators. The parallel, 2 Tim. ii. 13, is striking: "If we are unfaithful (ἀπιστοῦμεν), yet He abideth faithful (πιστός): He cannot deny Himself." Comp. also the phrase: stat justitia, pereat mundus.—P. S.].—God is true [according to Dr. Lange's view, which disconnects θεός from γινώσθω]. According to Tholuck, ἀλήθεια here comprehends practical and theoretical truth; in opposition to what he denotes as the usual exposition, that the Apostle expresses the wish that God would reveal Himself continually as true and faithful (according to Cocceius, in the counsels of his plan of salvation). If the question is on the truth of God in reference to the apparent collision between the Old and New Testaments, then the sense must be that even in this powerful antithesis, which to the view of man appears to be an irreconcilable contradiction, God will remain consistent with Himself, and therefore be truthful and faithful (see 2 Cor. i. 20; Rev. iii. 14 the name Jehovah). All men are liars so far as the, are sinners (sin = lie); yet unbelief is emphatically a lie (John viii. 44), since, with its rejection of the truth, it becomes obedient to falsehood, and is implicated in the grossest self-contradictions (see chap. ii. 21-23). Unbelief is not only a characteristic of apostates, but also a tendency and manifold fault of believers; and so far all men are liars through unbelief. Whenever the covenant between God and man is shaken or broken, absolute faithfulness is always found on God's side; He is a rock (Deut. xxxii. 31, &c.), while all the vibrations, as well as all the breaches of faithfulness, are on the side of men. Also, in Pa. cxvi. 11, all men are represented as liars, in opposition to the faithfulness of God; and by troubling believers they oppose faith.

As it is written (Pa. ii. 4).—The application of the passage quoted from the Psalms gives evidence of the most profound insight. The original, according to Hupfeld's translation, reads thus:

"To Thee alone I have sinned,
And done what is wicked in Thy sight,
In order that Thou mayest be just in Thy sayings,
Pure* in Thy judging."

The Septuagint translates, "In order that Thou mayest be acknowledged just (δικαιοθήης) in Thy words (in Thy sayings), and mayest conquer (νικήσης), instead of (νικήσει) in Thy κρίνοσθαι (ἡκρίβεσθαι)." Paul quotes from the Septuagint. The sense of the original text is, that David placed himself before the judgment of God and His revelation. Viewed according to the custom of Oriental despots, Nathan had condemned him too harshly; but when he regarded his sin in all its depths as a sin against God, and before His eyes, he perceived the justice of the prophet's charge, and the holiness of his judicial declaration of the guilt of death. The translation of the Septuagint, "that Thou mayest be justified, declared just" [δικαιοθήης for the Hebrew תִּצְדֵּק], is exegetical. [In using the word δικαιοθῆναι here evidently, like the hiphil of צדק, in a declaratory sense (for God is just and cannot be made just, but only declared or acknowledged as just), Paul furnishes us the key to the proper understanding of his doctrine of justification by faith, see below, ver. 28.—P. S.] The change νικήσης, &c., is a periphrasis. "Thou mayest be pure in Thy judgment," means properly, "Thou wilt be recognized as pure; therefore Thou overcomest, since Thou wilt be justified in Thy judgment." The Septuagint has amplified the slight antithesis, "in Thy sayings, in Thy judgment," so that the distinction can be drawn between God's word and His judgment. The chief point is the canon: If God is to be thoroughly known and recognized as just and holy in His word and in His judgment, then must sin, which stands committed against Him, be known in all its breadth and depth. The defect in our knowledge here is what casts a shade in part upon God's word and in part upon His judicial government. Paul's employment of the quotation from the Psalms corresponds to this

* צדק indicates the righteousness, צדקה (properly, & be pure), the holiness of God.—P. S.]

anon; much sooner shall all men be liars, than that a shadow be cast on God's truth or fidelity to His covenant. The καὶ is frequently used in the judicial sense (see Meyer). Beza, Piscat., and recently Tholuck and Philippi [also Meyer and Ewald], would take κρίνεισθαι in the middle sense, for to litigate. But the Apostle could not expect that his expression would be understood in any other sense than in the Septuagint. [Comp., however, Textual Note 1.—P. S.]

[That thou mayest, ὅπως ἂν, ἵνα, in Pa. li. 6 (ver. 4 in the E. V.), to the intent that, in order that (τελεωθῇ). This seems to mean that God caused David's sins to take this aggravated form for the very purpose that He might appear to be entirely just, when He pronounced condemnation of it. But such an interpretation would imply the contradiction that God condemns His own act. Hence most commentators (even Calvin) take ἵνα here, and often, like ἵνα and ὅπως in the New Testament, of the effect or consequence (ἐπαγωγικῶς) = so that. But ἵνα and ἵνα grammatically always, or nearly always, indicate the design or purpose (see Gesen., Thes., s. v., and Winer, Gramm., p. 426 ff., 7th ed.); and where this seems inapplicable, as here, we must assume a logical rather than a grammatical latitude. Design and effect often coincide. The Bible no doubt teaches the absolute sovereignty of God, yet never in a fatalistic or pantheistic sense so as to exclude the personal freedom and responsibility of man. Hence it represents, for instance, the hardening of Pharaoh's heart, as the judicial act and punishment of God (Exod. iv. 21; vii. 3), and at the same time as Pharaoh's own act and guilt (ix. 34). David certainly could not mean to say that he sinned with the intention of glorifying God—which would have destroyed the sincerity of his repentance, and exposed him to the just condemnation of Paul in ver. 8—but that his sin was overruled by God for the greater manifestation of His justice. God never does evil, nor wills any man to do evil, in order that good may come out of it, but He exercises His power, wisdom, and love in overruling all evil for good. It is not the sinner who glorifies God through his sin, but God who glorifies Himself through the sinner. Comp. also the remarks of Hupfeld and Hengstenberg on Pa. li. 6.—P. S.]

Ver. 5. But if our unrighteousness, &c. [A new objection which might be suggested by the ὅπως in ver. 4; namely, if man's sin redounds to the glory of God, and sets His righteousness in a clearer light (as in the case of David), it is a means to a good end, and hence it ought not to be punished. Paul admits the premise, but denies the conclusion, ver. 6.—P. S.] Meyer takes here ἀδικία in a very general and comprehensive sense, without regard to the legal element contained in it, and explains: "an abnormal ethical disposition."* By this definition the wicked, the unholy, the bad, can be denoted; but unrighteousness is misconduct in opposition to the law and the right. On συνίσταται, see the Lexica; also Rom. v. 8; 2 Cor. vii. 11, &c. [also Textual Note 1].

What shall we say? τί ἐροῦμεν. A

* [Comp. Hodge: "ἀδικία is not to be taken in the restricted sense of injustice, nor as equivalent to avertia in the preceding verse, but in the comprehensive sense of unrighteousness, wickedness. form which often occurs in Paul (chap. iv. 1; vi. 1, &c.). It is peculiar to rabbinical dialectics, and is very common in the Talmud (quid esset dicendum). It is a formula of meditation on a difficulty, a problem, in which there is danger of a false conclusion. It was also in use among the classics. [See Tholuck.] The sentence, if our unrighteousness, &c., is true, but the following conclusion is rejected as false. The Apostle certainly assumes that an unbelieving Jew could raise this objection, but he makes it himself. This is evident, first, from the interrogative form; second, from the position of the question in such a manner that a negative answer is expected;† third, from the addition: humanly speaking, κατὰ ἀνθρώπων λόγῳ. This expression is common among the rabbis, "as men speak" (see Tholuck); the term ἀνθρωπίνως λαλῶν [humanly loquit] also occurs in the classics [see the examples quoted by Tholuck]. The expression κατὰ ἄνθρωπον, resting on the antithesis between God and man, denotes, with Paul, now the opposition between the common sinful conduct and opinions of men, and the conduct and opinions in the light of revelation; and now the opposition between common human rights and customs and the theocratic rights (Gal. iii. 16, and other places). From this addition it does not follow that the question, μή ἀδικός, must be regarded as affirmative (see Meyer, against Philippi). [The phrase κατὰ ἀνθρώπων proves nothing against inspiration. The Apostle here puts himself into the place of other men, using their thoughts and arguments, but expressly rejecting them.—P. S.]

Ver. 6. For then how shall God judge the world? This does not mean: God would then not be able to judge the world; but, according to the usual explanation: Since it is universally agreed among religious people that God will be the Judge of the world, the conclusion alluded to must be rejected. The argument is therefore a reductio ad absurdum.‡ (Rückert: the proof is weak!) Cocceius [Reiche], Olshausen, and others, refer κόσμος (according to rabbinical usage of language) to the Gentile world, and the proof is thus conceived: Even Gentile idolatry must bring to light the glory of the true God; and yet God will judge the Gentile world. Therefore the unbelief of some Jews cannot escape the judgment, even though their unrighteousness corroborates the righteousness of God. But there is no proper foundation for this explanation in the text; and besides, it would only remove a smaller difficulty by a greater one, and in a way that would commend itself only to Jewish prejudice. The New Testament idea of the general judgment is universal. Even the antithesis of κόσμος and βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ cannot be applied here. With the usual explanation (Tholuck, Meyer, and others) it may nevertheless be asked, whether a sentence which has been dismissed with μη γένοιτο, stands in further need of a proof. According to our construction, the sentence can also be explanatory, and stand in connection with the following (see below).

See Winer, p. 476; Hartung, Partik. ii. 88; and Meyer in loc.; against Rückert and Philippi. Paul does not ask: Is not God unjust? but, Is God unjust? expecting a negative reply; and he apologises even for putting the question in this form.—P. S.]

‡ [Calvin: "Sumit argumentum ab ipsius Dei officio que probet id esse impossibile; judicabit Deus hunc mundum, ergo injustus esse non potest." So, substantially, Grotius, Tholuck, De Wette, Rückert, Köllner, Meyer, Hodge. It seems that the Apostle here assumes the very thing he is to prove. But he reasons from acknowledged premises: God is universally conceived as the Judge of all mankind; this necessarily implies that He is just. The opposite is inconsistent with the idea of God as Judge, and with the nature of the judgment.—P. S.]

VERS. 7, 8. But if the truth of God, &c. The objection of ver. 7 appears only to repeat that of ver. 5; therefore it is difficult to connect it with what precedes. The difficulty is solved as follows: (1.) Calvin, Beza, Grotius [Bengel, Rückert], Philippi, and others think that the objection of ver. 5 is only continued and established in ver. 7; and the words κατὰ ἀνθρώπων λέγει το κόσμος (ver. 6) should be read, according to Philippi, parenthetically, as a preliminary outburst of apostolic indignation. By this means, the dialectics assume the shape of an involved controversy, in which the Apostle prematurely interrupts the opponent. Tholuck believes that he can produce similar examples in proof of this (chap. vii. 25, and Gal. iii. 8, 4). (2.) Meyer: "The ἐπεὶ πῶς κρινεῖ ὁ θεὸς τὸν κόσμον (ver. 6) is now confirmed thus: The fact already considered (ver. 4 f.), that God's truth is glorified by the lie of man, removes every ground for supposing that an unrighteous God (sic!), who is to judge the world, will judge man as a sinner," &c. Apart from the quaint construction of the thought, the true statement in ver. 5 would be treated as untrue. [De Wette, Alford, Hodge, though differing somewhat in detail, likewise regard vers. 7 and 8 as the amplification and confirmation of the answer given in ver. 6 to the objection stated in ver. 5. If this objection be valid, then not only may every sinner claim exemption, but it would follow that it is right to do evil that good may come. This is certainly a more easy and natural connection than the one under (1.), and best explains the γὰρ. But if we read εἰ δέ, we must regard ver. 7 as introducing a new objection, as in a dialogue between the Apostle and an interlocutor—an objection which is indignantly resented by Paul as a blasphemous slander. But see the remarks under the next heads.—P. S.] (3.) Even if we find here, according to Thodoret, the language of a Jew in dispute with the Apostle, the sentence does not appear to be the continuation of the thought of ver. 5. Then the Jew has first drawn the conclusion from ver. 5 that God is unjust if He punish sins by which He is glorified. Here he would deduce the conclusion, from ver. 4, that the man, who by his ψεύσμα contributes to the glory of God, is neither a sinner, nor punishable; rather, that he may do evil that good may come. Thus two cases, which would constitute a parallel to chap. ii. 3, 4—the first case denoting fanaticism, the other, antinomianism. But there are considerations presented by the text itself against this view. First, the γὰρ at the beginning of ver. 7; which, for this reason, has been removed by many Codd. (B. D., &c., the Vulgate, &c.) as an impediment to the proper understanding of the passage. Then the σοφιστ, ἐπερίσσειαν, which Meyer thinks should be understood from the standpoint of the general judgment (Tholuck regards it as present, with Luther). Further, Meyer must interpolate a τί before the μή in ver. 8 (τί μή, quidni?). Also, if Paul be not permitted to speak in the name of the unbelieving Jew and interrupt himself, an ἡμεῖς must stand before βλασφημοῦμεθα. We are therefore of the opinion that the hypothesis of the interlocution of the obstinate Jew is not correct. (4.) Our explanation is contained already in the translation [See Textual Notes " and "]. The Apostle says first, God does not declare wrath on all who have glorified his faithfulness by their unfaithfulness. Granted that His covenant faithfulness has, by means of my unfaithfulness, shown itself more powerful and conspicuous to His glory (chap. v. 8), that is, that I have finally become a believer—how? am I also still judged as a sinner? Answer: No. And therefore we would by no means continue in unbelief, as those τινές in ver. 3, in order, by wicked conduct, to accomplish a good purpose, God's glory—which is the principle laid by some to our charge. Men who act thus (and the τινές do act thus) are justly condemned. Here the ἀλήθεια of God is the agent, and ψεύσμα is the object. In ver. 5 there was the reverse, the ἀδύνα of man being the agent, and God's righteousness the object. In ver. 7 the question is concerning the predominance or conquest (see v. 20) on the side of the ἀλήθεια for the honor of God; in ver. 5, the question is merely concerning the bringing of the truth to light. The solution of the difficulty lies in the ἐπερίσσειαν.—On the different explanations of καὶ γὰρ, see Tholuck. I as well as others [De Wette, Alford]; even I, a Jew [Bengel]; even I, a Gentile [Coccej, Olshausen]; even I, Paul [Fritzsche]; even I, who have added to the glorification of God [De Wette, Tholuck].

Ver. 8. [As we are blasphemously (not, slanderously) reported. The blasphemy refers not only to Paul, but in the last instance to God, whose holy and righteous character is outraged by the impious maxim, to do evil that good may come.]—In reference to the ὅτι, we must observe that, in consequence of attraction, the ποιήσωμεν is united with λέγειν.—The καθὼς βλασφημοῦμεθα leads us to conclude that the Jews charged the Apostle, or the Christians in general, with the alleged principle: The end sanctifies the means (Tholuck, Calvin). Usual acceptance: the doctrine of superabounding mercy (chap. v. 20) is meant (see Tholuck). Meyer: "The labors of the Apostle among the Gentiles could occasion such slanders on the part of the Jews." According to the view of the Jews, the Christians converted the Gentile world to Monotheism, by betraying and corrupting the covenant of the Jews.—Whose condemnation is just. The ὅν does not refer directly to the slanderers as such, since this is an accessory notion, but to the principle, let us do evil that good may come, and to the fact lying at its root, the hardness of the Jews in unfaithfulness, as they more clearly showed the covenant faithfulness of God. But, indirectly, the charge of those slanderers is also answered at the same time. Ver. 7 favors our explanation. [ὅν refers to the subject in ποιήσωμεν, to those who speak and act according to this pernicious and blasphemous maxim.—P. S.]

THIRD PARAGRAPH, VERS. 9-20.

The transition of the covenant of law to the covenant of grace is already indicated in the preceding paragraph. This is brought to pass in part by the constant unfaithfulness of individuals, and in part by the transitory unfaithfulness of others. In every case Israel's sin is manifested in this covenant.

Ver. 9. What then? It must not be read, with Ecumenius [Koppe, Hofmann, Th. Schott], τί οὐν προχόμεθα [omitting the interrogation sign after οὐ]; against which is the οὐ. The introduction of the result refers to the foregoing section under the point of view that Israel certainly has advantages on the objective side, but none on the subjective. This is now extended further. Προσχομιθα. Explanations: 1. The middle voice here has the signification of the active: Have we [the Jews] the preference? do we excel? have we an advantage? (Theophylact, Ecumenius, the old commentators in general.) Also De Wette, who says: This is the only suitable sense.* Therefore the reading προκαίχομεν. Meyer urges against this view: (a.) The usage of language; † (b.) the previous admission of Israel's advantage [ver. 2, πολύ κατὰ πάντα τρόπον, which seems to conflict with οὐ πάντως, ver. 9.—P. S.]. 2. The middle voice in the signification of: to hold before, to hold for one's protection. Hemsterhuys, Venema, &c. (Fritzsch, figuratively: Do we need a pretext? Meyer: Have we a protection? That is, have we something with which to defend or screen ourselves? Against this, Tholuck raises the objection that the verb, in this case, should have an accusative. [Have we any thing for a pretext? Answer: Nothing (instead of: Not at all, not in the least).—P. S.]. 3. The passive construction (Ecumenius II., Wetstein, Storr). [Ecumenius takes the word as the question of a Gentile: Are we surpassed by the Jews? Wetstein, as the question of a Jew: Are we surpassed by the Gentiles? Reiche and Olshausen: Are we preferred by God? This last form of the passive rendering agrees, as to sense, with the active rendering sub No. 1. But the Apostle is not speaking here of God's favor, but of man's sin, and shows that the Jews, though highly favored by God, are yet subjectively no better, and even more guilty, than the Gentiles.—P. S.] 4. The middle form was most easily applicable to the intransitive, to be prominent, to excel; therefore we translate, "Are we ahead, or, better?" Tholuck properly calls to mind that so many of the Greek fathers have taken no exception to the middle form. It is quite against the context when Olshausen [?] and Reiche read the word as a question of the Gentiles (shall we be preferred?).—(Οὐ πάντως, Not in the least. Grotius, and others [Wetstein, Köllner], literally: not altogether, not in all respects [as in 1 Cor. v. 10, where πάντως limits the prohibition.—P. S.]. This is contrary to the context. [For the Apostle proves the absolute equality of guilt before the law. οὐ, πάντως is here = πάντως οὐ, 1 Cor. xvi. 12; πάντως strengthens the negation, no, in no wise; not at all; οὐδαμῶς (Theophylact); nequaquam (Vulgate); durchaus nicht; nein, ganz und gar, i. e., nein, in keiner Weise, keineswegs.

* [So also the Vulgate (præcellimus), Luther, Calvin, Beza, E. V., Grotius, Bengel, Tholuck, Rückert (2d ed.), Reiche, Philippi, Baur, Bloomfield, Alford, Wordsworth, Hodge, who says, with De Wette, that this is the only interpretation which suits here.—P. S.]

† [Sometimes, however, the middle and the active form of the same verb are used without a perceptible difference; as in Luke xv. 6, συγκαλεῖ τοὺς φίλους; ver. 9, συγκαλεῖται τοὺς φίλους (according to Lachmann; while Tischendorf reads the active); James iv. 2 f., αἰρεῖτε and αἰρεῖσθε; Acts xvi. 16, μαρτυρεῖ; xix. 24, μαρτυροῦ, presabat. Comp. Winer, Gramm., p. 240 f., 7th ed. There is, it is true, no example of the active use of μαρτυροῦμαι. But the middle voice may have been preferred here to the active, because the Apostle speaks of a superiority which the Jews claimed for themselves, for their benefit; comp. σεαυτὸν μαρτυρούμενος ἑαυτὸν, Titus ii. 7. This, then, comes to the interpretation of Lange, sub No. 4. The reading of Cod. Boerner: προκαίχομεν σεαυτὸν, gives the same sense.—P. S.]

This sense was probably indicated by the emphatic pronunciation of πάντως, and a stop after οὐ. In 1 Cor. v. 10, on the contrary, the πάντως, non omnino limits the prohibition contained in οὐ. Comp. Winer, p. 516, and Meyer in loc.—P. S.]—For we have before charged, προηγορασάμεθα. Namely, in the previous part of the Epistle [i. 18 ff., with reference to the Gentiles; ii. 1 ff., with reference to the Jews.—P. S.]. The προκαίωσθαι [from αἰτία, motive, reason, and in a forensic sense, charge, ground of accusation] is a compound word without example.*—Under sin [ἡ ἁμαρτία ἡμῶν]. Not merely, are sinners (Fritzsch). Meyer: are governed by sin. He denies, against Hofmann, that the question here is concerning the punishableness or guilt of sin [which is to be inferred afterwards from the fact of ἡ ἁμαρτία ἡμῶν]. But this is implied in αἰτιώσθαι. The αἰτία is the ground of the charge

Vers. 10–19. As it is written. [γέγραπται, occurs nineteen times in this Epistle.—P. S.] Paul had previously proved the guilt of the Jews from their living experience, with only a general allusion to the Scriptures; he now confirms his declaration in the strongest way by Scripture proofs. Under the presupposition of exact knowledge of the Old Testament, rabbinical writers also connect various testimonies without specifying the place where they may be found. At the head there stands Pa. xiv. 1–3, from ver. 10 to ver. 12, where we have a description of universal sinfulness as well of the Jews as of the Gentiles. There then follows a combination from Pa. v. 9 and cxi. 3 and Pa. x. 7, in vers. 13, 14, as a description of sins of the tongue. Then Isa. lix. 7, 8, quoted in vers. 16, 17, as a delineation of sins of commission. Finally, Pa. xxxvi. 1, in ver. 18, as a characterization of the want of the fear of God lying at the root of all.† The quotations are free recollections and applications from the Septuagint [yet with several deviations]. Finally, in ver. 19, there follows the explanation that these charges were throughout just as applicable to the Jews as to the Gentiles, and indeed chiefly to the Jews. [The passages quoted describe the moral corruption of the times of David and the prophets, but indirectly of all times, since human nature is essentially the same always and everywhere. In Pa. xiv. the general application is most obvious, and hence it is quoted first.—P. S.]

Ver. 10. There is none righteous. [Paul uses δικαιος for צַדִּיק, LXX.: ποιῶν χρηστότητα, doer of good.] Refers the ποιῶν χρηστότητα of the Septuagint to the law. The want of right eousness is the inscription of the whole; not as Paul's word (Köllner, &c.), but as free quotation from Pa. xiv.

Ver. 11. There is none that understandeth. While ὁ συνιὼν † represents the receptivity of the religious understanding, ἐκζητῶν § denotes the de-

Ver. 13. An open sepulchre. Estius [Bengel, Tholuck, Hodge]: breathing out the noxious odor of corruption. Meyer prefers the meaning: As rapacious and insatiable as a grave which awaits the corpse; in this sense, the quiver of the Chaldeans is called "an open sepulchre," Jer. v. 16—i. e., destructive (also Calvin, and others). But thus ver. 15 would be anticipated.—They have used deceit. The imperfect *ἡδολοῦσαν denotes continuous action; they have become deceivers for the future; that this is their settled character.—The poison of asps. Behind the cunning of falsehood there is deadly malice.

Ver. 14. Full of cursing. The gross, passionate form of ungodly speech, alternating with double-tongued, false language. The bitterness or animosity of their hateful selfishness is the standing ground of their cursing. [Paul here condenses the translation of the Septuagint, omitting the "deceit," as he had already mentioned it in ver. 13.—P. S.]

Ver. 15-17. Their feet are swift. The symbol of their excited course of conduct. [On the slightest provocation they commit murder. Paul here again condenses the sense of Isa. lix. 7.] Their many different ways, full of destruction [συντριμμα, literally, concussion, bruising together, then calamity, destruction] and misery [ταλαιπωρία], (destruction the cause, misery the result) are, as the ways of war of all against all, contrasted with the one way of peace [ὁδὸν εἰρήνης]. By this we must undoubtedly understand not merely a way in which they should enjoy peace (Meyer), but an objective way of peace in which they should become the children of peace. [The way that leads to peace, in opposition to the ways which lead to ruin and misery.] Οὐκ ἔγνωσαν, Grotius: Hebrais nescire aliquis dicitur, quod non curat (Jer. iv. 22).

[Ver. 18. This quotation from Ps. xxxvi. 1 goes back to the fountain of the various sins enumerated. The fear of God, or piety, is the beginning of wisdom and the mother of virtue; the want of that fear, or impiety, is the beginning of folly and the mother of vice.—P. S.]

Ver. 19. Now we know. The Jews, indeed, would not readily admit this, but were inclined to refer such declarations exclusively to the Gentiles. [But the passages above quoted from the Psalms and the Prophets, speak not of heathen as heathen, but of fallen men as such, and therefore are applicable to Jews as well.—P. S.]—The law. This is the Old Testament, especially in its legal relation [as a norm or rule to which they should conform their faith and conduct; John x. 34, where our Lord quotes a Psalm as in "the law," and other passages].—Who are under the law. That is, the Jews; also particularly from the legal standpoint. Calov and others have understood, by the law, the law as distinguished from the gospel; and the expression, "those who are under the law," as meaning all men. But this is application, not explanation.—That every mouth may be stopped. On the question whether ἴνα may be understood ἐκ βαρυῶς [so that, instead of in order that], see Tholuck and Meyer. Here it evidently designates the one purpose of the law, to produce the knowledge of sin, but other purposes are not excluded. The φράσσειν τὸ στόμα (Pa. cvii. 42) means, in a religious relation, that it represents men as ἀναπολογητοί at the tribunal of Divine justice; so that they "cannot answer God one of a thousand."—The whole world. [Not to be restricted, with Grotius: maxima pars hominum, but all men, Jews as well as Gentiles.] Paul has already declared this of the heathen portion in chap. i. 20, 32.—[Should become (γένηται), in their own conviction, guilty, subject to justice. ἰπόδομος = κατάκριτος, ἐνοχος δίκῃ, ἰπνοκίμενος τιμωρίας, i. e., not only guilty, but convicted of guilt, and therefore obnoxious to punishment (straffällig).—Before God, to whom satisfaction for sin is due.—P. S.]

Ver. 20.* Because (Deushalb weil). Since διότι can be propterea quod (because) as well as propterea (therefore), Tholuck [with Beza and Morus] prefers propterea, the conclusive form. But the Apostle here goes farther out, and comes to that universal condemnatory judgment of the law. [See Textual Note 20.]

By works of the law. Explanations of νόμος:

1. The ritual law (Theodoret, Pelagius, Cornelius a Lapide, Semler, Ammon, and others).† On the contrary, Augustine‡ and Thomas Aquinas already referred to the concluding sentence of the verse: "by the law comes knowledge of sin." Paul, moreover, understands the word law throughout in its totality, although he does not ignore its several parts and differences. [The decalogue is merely the quintessence of the whole law. The antithesis is not: the ceremonial law and the moral law, but: works of the law and works of faith.—P. S.]

2. The Mosaic law alone [but as a whole, both moral and ritual] is meant (Meyer). [So also Philippi: the whole revealed law as an undivided unity, yet with special regard to the moral law.—P. S.] But against this is, that Paul speaks here, and in the

* [On this important verse, Dr. Hodge (pp. 125-133) is very full and clear; while Alford and Wordsworth pass it over very slightly.—P. S.]

† [Several Roman Catholic and Rationalistic commentators meet from opposite extremes on Pelagian ground, and resolve the meaning of this passage simply into this: that men are not justified by any external rites or ceremonial works, such as circumcision and sacrifices, but only by moral acts of the heart and will. But the prevailing Romish doctrine is, that works of the law are works done before regeneration, which have only the merit of congruity; while the works done after regeneration, and therefore under the impulse of Divine grace, have the merit of condignity, and are the ground of acceptance with God.—P. S.]

Augustine agrees with the Reformers in the doctrine of total depravity and salvation by free grace without works, but agrees with the Roman Catholic view of the meaning of justification, as being a continuous process essentially identical with sanctification.—P. previous verse, of the guilt of all men before the law.

3. De Wette accepts it as merely the moral law, and not also the ritual law. The works of the law, as they were performed by the Jews, and would also have been performed by the Gentiles, if they had been placed under the law (Rückert).

4. The law in a deeper and more general sense, as it was written not only on the Decalogue, but also in the heart of the Gentiles, and embracing moral deeds of both Gentiles and Jews (Tholuck [also Storr, Platt, Stuart]). Certainly it is plain from the context, that the Jewish νόμος here represents a universal legislation. [The Apostle includes the Gentiles as well as the Jews under the sentence of condemnation, because they do not come up to their own standard of virtue, as required by their inner law of conscience; ii. 15.—P. S.]

But what are works of the law [ἔργα νόμου]?
Explanations:

1. Works produced by the law, without the impulse of the Holy Spirit [νόμον as genetivus auctoris or causae]. So especially Roman Catholic expositors, as Bellarmine [Augustine, Thomas Aquinas]; and also some Protestants, as Usteri, Neander, Philippi [Olshausen, Hofmann, even Luther; see Tholuck, p. 187]. Philippi: "Not the works which the law commands—for he who does these is really righteous (ii. 13)—but those which the law effects (or which the man who is under the law is able by its aid to bring forth)." The deeds of the law are ἔργα νηφά (Heb. vi. 1); the νόμος cannot ζωοποιῇσαι [Gal. iii. 21], although it is complete in its method and destination. On Luther's distinction between doing the works of the law and fulfilling the law itself, see Tholuck.

2. The deeds required or prescribed by the law. Protestant expositors, e. g., Gerhard, who includes also the bona opera ratione objecti. [So also Melancthon, Calvin, Beza, Rückert, Fritzsche, De Wette, Meyer, Hodge. In this view, the ἔργα νόμου include all good works, those after regeneration as well as those before. Even Abraham, the friend of God, was not justified by his works, but by faith. The law of the Old Testament is holy, just, and good, and demands perfect conformity to the will of God, which is true holiness. But even our best works, done under the gospel and under the influence of Divine grace, are imperfect, and can therefore be no ground of justification. Hence the most holy men of all ages and churches never depend on their own works, but on the work and merits of Christ, for final acceptance with God.—P. S.]

3. Tholuck combines the two explanations [p. 140]: "The Apostle includes both meanings, so that, in some passages, the meaning of the deeds required by the law, and, in others, that of the deeds produced by the law, appears more prominent." But, from the very nature of the case, the deeds required by the law, and those produced by the law, correspond to each other on the legal standpoint. The unity of both are the works of the legal standpoint, as it may be found also among the heathen (e. g., Creon in the Antigone of Sophocles). The law is, for those subjected to it, an analytical letter, which is related to the external work; but, on the contrary, for those who seek God, it is a synthetical symbol, which is related to the disposition of the heart. The former meaning applies certainly to every man, but only to introduce him to the understanding; its second significance: Those who know it only in the former meaning, always seek justification ἐκ νόμου and ἐξ ἔργου, until they are ἐξ ἐπιθίας (chap. ii. 8), and only become acquainted with an apparent righteousness of a partial character. So, on the other hand, the ἀσθαλείας ἡτοίματες, in all their efforts to fulfil the law, are more and more convinced of the impossibility of a righteousness by works. The requirement of the law, therefore, as well as its operation, continually impels—in the moral, still more in the religious sphere—by means of the knowledge of sin, far beyond the legal standpoint to faith itself. Therefore the remark frequently made: "not as if complete obedience to the law would be insufficient for justification" (Meyer), is apt to mislead.* De Wette properly remarks: "It lies in the nature of man, and of the law, that this is not fulfilled, and consequently that righteousness cannot be obtained" (see James ii. 10). Where the Old Testament Scriptures speak of righteous persons, those are meant who, in their observance of the legal letter, are theocratically and ecclesiastically irreproachable, but yet do not therein find their comfort (see Luke i. 6).

No flesh. No human being. [With an allusion to our weakness and frailty, as we say: No mortal. The parallel passage in Ps. cxliii. 2 has, instead: no man living.—P. S.] Not even the believer. It never occurs to him that he might perfect his justification by faith through dead works. [The phrase ἐσ πᾶσα σὰρξ is a strong Hebraism, לֹא כָל-בָּשָׂר]

[Shall (can) be justified, δικαιώθησονται. The future refers not to the day of judgment (Reiche), for justification takes place already in this life; nor to the indefinite, abstract future (Meyer, Philippi: whenever justification shall take place), but to the moral possibility, or impossibility rather (can ever be justified); comp. xpiw, ver. 6.—P. S.]

[On the meaning of δικαιώσω, to justify, comp. the Exeg. Notes on chap. i. 17; ii. 13; iii. 24. It is perfectly plain that here, and in the parallel passage, Gal. ii. 16, it can only mean, to declare or judicially pronounce just, not to make just. This appears (1.) from Ps. cxliii. 2, here referred to ("Enter not into judgment with thy servant; for in thy sight shall no man living be justified;") (2.) from the aim of the passage, which is to confirm by διότι, the preceding sentence: "that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God" (ver. 19); and (3.) from the addition ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ, which represents God as Judge, coram Deo iudice.—Dr. Wieseler, in his exposition of the parallel passage, Gal. ii. 16 (Commentar, &c., pp. 176–204), enters into an elaborate discussion of the meaning of δικαιώσω, of which we will give the substance in English, anticipating in part our own remarks on iii. 24:

"The verb δικαιώω has, in the Greek, two fundamental significations:

"(1.) τὸ δικαιῶν ποιεῖν τινα (cf. καὶνῶν τινα, to do any one wrong, harm); that is, to do any one justice. It is used in this sense especially of a judge, and signifies, to determine justice generally; or more specially, according to the result of the judging, on the one hand, to condemn and punish, as with peculiar frequency in the profane writers; or also either to declare guiltless of the charge, or to acknowledge, in the case of any one, the claims of right, which he has; only that the favorable or unfavorable judgment, in this fundamental signification, is always conceived as his δικαίον, as derived by him.

* [Meyer says this in view of the principle: αὐτοὶ νόμον δικαιωθήσονται (ii. 13), but he immediately adds that no human being can fully comply with the law, that the law only makes us more conscious of our moral imperfections.—P. S.]

"(2.) δικαίον ποιεῖν τι, or τινά, to make a thing or person righteous; that is, either to account and declare righteous, or to transfer into the right condition; for the verbs in ὧ express also a bringing out into effect that from which the verb is derived; comp. δολῶ, τιφλῶ = δοῦλον and τιφλόν ποιεῖν. So does δικαιοῦν τι accordingly signify, to account any thing right and equitable, to approve, wish, require; equivalent to ἀξιῶν.

"The biblical usus loquendi of δικαιοῦν attaches itself to the Hebrew הצדיק (or צדק), of which it is commonly the translation in the LXX. This, now, for the most part signifies to declare righteous (judicially, or in common life); but, to make righteous, or, to lead to righteousness, only in Dan. xii. 3; Isa. liii. 11.

"Even so δικαιοῦν, in the Septuagint, frequently signifies, to declare righteous judicially; Pa. lxxii. 3; Exod. xxiii. 7; Deut. xxv. 1; 1 Kings viii. 32; and in common life also, to acknowledge as righteous, or, to represent as righteous; Ezek. xvi. 51, 52; and is interchanged in this sense with ἀποκαθάρσιν δικαίων; Job xxxii. 2; xxvii. 5. On the other hand, it is used with extreme infrequency in the sense, to make righteous, to transfer into the condition of righteousness; Ps. lxxiii. 18; Is. liii. 11; Sir. xviii. 22.

"Thus far our examination has afforded the result, that δικαιοῦν can, it is true, signify also, to make righteous, as well in profane Greek (in this, according to the second fundamental signification), as in the LXX, but that this signification has, in the use of the language, receded decidedly into the background in comparison with the forensic and judicial.

"To still less advantage does the signification, to make righteous, appear in the New Testament use. Leaving out of view the passages in question, where a δικαιοῦσθαι ἐξ ἔργων νόμου, or διὰ νόμου, is spoken of, there does not occur a single passage in which the signification to make righteous is found. (Besides the passages mentioned above, the verb occurs Matt. xi. 19; Luke vii. 29, 35; x. 29; Rom. iii. 4; 1 Tim. iii. 16; Rev. xxii. 11.)* This fact cannot but be most unfavorable to the assumption of the signification, to make righteous, in the remaining passages."—P. S.]

For by the law (comes) a knowledge of sin. Tholuck would supply only (no more than) a knowledge; but ἐπιγνώσις is exact, living, increasing knowledge. The antithesis laid down by Chrysostom—that the law, far from being able to take away sin, only first brings it to knowledge—needs still the supplementary thought, that it is just this knowledge which is the preliminary condition for the removal of sin. [The law, being the revelation of the holy and perfect will of God, exhibits, by contrast, our own sinfulness, and awakens the desire after salvation. This sentence of Paul, together with his declaration that the law is a παιδαγωγός, to lead to Christ (Gal. iii. 24, 25), contains the whole philosophy of the law, as a moral educator, and is the best and deepest thing that can be said of it. Ewald justly remarks of our passage: "Mit diesen Worten trifft Paulus den tiefsten Kern der Sache;" i. e. with these words Paul hits the nail on the head, and penetrates to the inmost marrow of the thing. γὰρ is well explained by Calvin: "A contrario rationatur . . . quando ex eadem scatebra non procedunt vita et mora."—P. S.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Chap. ii. 25-29. The elder theology has properly regarded circumcision as a federal sacrament of the Old Testament, and as the preliminary analogue or type of New Testament baptism; just as the Passover feast was an Old Testament type of the Lord's Supper. And thus far did the παιδομνη represent the whole of Judaism, which is proved by the fact that Paul used this term to designate the Jews (see also Gal. v. 3). But it is easy to go astray on the biblical meaning of circumcision, as on the law of the Sabbath, if we do not bear in mind that we have to deal with institutions which comprehend many points of view. Thus, the Sabbath law is first a religious and moral command of God among the Ten Commandments (Exod. xx. 8 ff.). But it is likewise a religious and liturgical, or Levitical command on worship (according to Lev. xxiii. 8). In the latter sense, it is abrogated as a mere Old Testament form, as far as Christians are concerned; or, rather, it has been supplanted by the divine-human creation of a new day "of the great congregation"—the Lord's Day. But the religious and ethical command of the Sabbath in the Decalogue has become a religious and ethical principle, which, in its educating and legal form, has connected itself with Sunday. In the same way is circumcision a synthesis. The foundation of it was a very old, sporadic, oriental custom (Epistle of Barnabas, chap. ix.*). It was made to Abraham, according to chap. iv. 11, a symbolical seal of his faith; which is certainly the sacrament of the covenant of promise. But then Moses also made it, in a more definite sense, an obligation of the law (Exod. iv. 25; Joa. v. 2 ff.). The law was the explication of circumcision, and circumcision was the concentration of the law. While, therefore, the law was annulled in regard to Christians by faith, circumcision was also annulled; or, rather, the New Testament symbol took its place, and the fulfilment of the Abrahamic promise—the new birth of faith—was connected with it. Tholuck thinks (p. 114) it is a contradiction, that, according to the elder theology,† faith in the Messiah was the condition of the Divine promise in circumcision; while, according to Paul, the fulfilment of the law was this condition. But Paul certainly knew of no other fulfilment of the law than that in the Messianic faith, which became, finally, faith in the Messiah. On p. 117, Tholuck himself refers to the inward character of the requirements of Judaism.

2. The great importance which the Apostle at

* (Pseudo-Barnabas says, l. c.: "Thou (addressing the Jew) wilt say, 'Yea, verily the people are circumcised for a seal.' But so also is every Syrian and Arab, and all the priests of idols: are these, then, also within the bond of this covenant (or, according to the reading of Ood. Sin.: their covenant)? Yea, the Egyptians also practise circumcision."—P. S.)

† [Tholuck means "the old Lutheran conception of circumcision," and refers to Gerhard (Loc. Theol., vol. ix., pp. 12, 30), who teaches that circumcision was a sacrament of grace, in which the verbal element of Divine promise was connected with the material element.—P. S.]

* [If δικαιοῦντι ἐν should be the true reading, against which see, however, Lachmann and Tischendorf.—P. S.]

laches to what is within—to the sentiment of the heart—is plain from his bold antitheses. Notwithstanding his uncircumcision, the Gentile, by virtue of his state of mind, can become a Jew, and vice versa.

3. The witnesses adduced by the Apostle on the universality of corruption in Israel, neither preclude the antithesis in chap. ii. 7, 8, nor the degrees on both sides.

4. On chap. iii. 8. The covenant of God is always perfect according to its stage of development. If it generally fails to become apparent, the fault always turns out to be man's. The covenant of God is surely no contract social—no agreement between equal parties. It is the free institution of God's grace. But this institution is that of a true covenant, of a personal and ethical mutual relation; and whenever the hierarchy, or a Romanizing view of the ministry obliterate the ethical obligation on the part of man in order to make the sacraments magical operations, their course leads to the desecration and weakening of the covenant acts.

5. Chap. iii. 4. For our construction of the passage in Ps. li. 4 f., see the Exeg. Notes on chap. iii. 4. For another view, see Philippi, p. 81, with reference to Hengstenberg, Psalm, vol. iii., p. 19. [Both take ῥῆμα, ὁπῶς, in the usual strict sense (τελεῖται, not ἐκβαρύνεται), as does also Gesenius, Theol., p. 1062: "cum in finem peccavi, ut illustretur justitia tua;" and they make the old distinction between the matter of sin, which is man's work, and the form of sin, which is in the hands of God.—P. S.] Hupfeld also refers the passage to the holy interest of God's government in human offences, but at the same time has definitely distinguished the relative divine and human parts. Without contending against the thought per se, we would refer the ὁπῶς not to sin itself, but to the perception and knowledge of sin. Hence we infer the proposition: All want of a proper knowledge of sin on the part of man obscures the word of God, and leads to the misconception of His judgments (as in the talk about fanatical ideas of revelation, gloomy destiny, &c.).

6. On the truth of God, see the Exeg. Notes on ver. 4.

7. On iii. 20. By the law is the knowledge of sin (see Gal. iii. 24). This purpose of the law excludes neither its usus primus nor the usus tertius.^{*} But the three usui mark the developing progress of the law from without inwardly, as well in a historical as in a psychological view. The first stage [usus politicus] has also its promise. The Jew who lived according to the law is justified in the tribunal of his priesthood, and has also his earthly blessing ("that it may go well with thee," &c.). But the subtilty of the law—not to speak of its first and last commandment—and its symbolical transparency and spiritualization, impel him, if he be upright, further to the pedagogical standpoint, which looks to Christ. And with this, he receives the whole power for the tertius usus [in regulating his life of faith].

8. While the elder theology separated the three parts of the law (morals, worship, polity) too far from each other, at present the idea of the law as a unit is often so strongly emphasized as to lose sight of the fact that, both in the Old Testament as well as in the New, cognizance is taken of the difference of the parts (see Matt. xix. 17; Rom. vii. 7). The view to the unity of the law, however, prevails in the Mosaic and legal understanding of the Old Testament revelation, as represented by the letters of the two tables.

* [The old Protestant divines speak of a threefold use of the law: 1. Usus politicus, or civilis (in the state, which can only be governed by laws); 2. usus elencticus, or pedagogicus (leading to a knowledge of sin and misery); 3. usus didacticus, or normativus (regulating the life of the believer). Comp. the Formula Concordiæ, p. 594 sq. Similar to this is the German sentence, that the law is Zügel, Spiegel, and Riegel, a restraint, a mirror, and a rule.—P. S.]

9. The incapacity of the law to make man righteous lies chiefly in this: First, it is a demand on the work of the incapable man, who is flesh (no flesh shall be justified); but it is not a Divine promise and work for establishing a new relation. Then it meets man as a foreign will, another law; by which means his false autonomy is inclined to resistance, because he is alien to himself and to the concurring law within his inward nature. Finally, it meets him in analytical form and separateness. Man only becomes susceptible of Divine influences: 1. As they are founded in the grace and gift of God; 2. in the spontaneous action of voluntary love; 3. in synthetical concentration.

(FROM CHAP. II. 25 TO CHAP. III. 20.)

Either, or. As this applied to the Jew according to his position in the Old Testament, so does it apply to the Christian according to his position in the New (ver. 25).—It is not the external possession of a saving means that produces blessings, but faithfulness in its application (vers. 25-29).—How the fact, that the Jew becomes a Gentile, and the Gentile a Jew, can be repeated in our time in various contrasts (vers. 25-27).—The Jew, proud of the letter and of circumcision, below the condemnatory sentence pronounced on the illegal and uncircumcised Gentile—a warning for evangelical Christians (ver. 27).—Inner life in religion; already the principal thing in Judaism, and much more in Christianity (vers. 28, 29).—He who is inwardly pious, receives praise, not of men, but of God.—God's pleasure or praise of inward faithfulness in piety. Herewith it must be seen: 1. How this praise can be acquired; 2. In what does it consist? (ver. 29).—The praise of men and the praise of God (ver. 29).

What advantage have the Jews? This question, and its answer, exhibit to us the infinitely great blessing of Christianity (chap. iii. 1-4).—How Paul never ignores the historical significance of his people, but triumphantly defends it against every charge (comp. chap. ix. 4, 5).—The historical feeling of the Apostle Paul (vers. 1-4).

On chap. iii. 2. God has shown His word to Jacob, his statutes and judgments unto Israel (Ps. cxlvii. 19). Why has God spoken to Israel? 1. Because He chose this people, out of voluntary compassion, for His inheritance; 2. Because by this people, specially appointed by Him for the purpose, He designed to prepare salvation for all the nations of the earth.—Do not complain too much at the unbelief of the world! For, 1. The unbelievers always remain in the minority in real significance, let their number be ever so great; 2. Not only does their unbelief not make the faith (faithfulness) of God without effect; but 3. Rather contributes thereto, by radiantly showing God's truthfulness, in contrast with all human falsehood (vers. 3, 4).

On chap. iii. 5-8. Why is it impossible that God should have desired our unrighteousness for His glory? 1. Because God could not then judge the world; 2. Because we would be condemned as sinners by an unjust method.—How far does our unrighteousness prove the righteousness of God?—God cannot be the author of sin! This was acknowledged, 1. By Abraham, the father of all the faithful (Gen. xviii. 25); 2. By Paul, the Apostle of all the faithful.—Through God's providence, good continually comes out of evil; but we should never say, Let us do evil, that good may come!—He who says, Let us do evil, &c., 1. Blasphemes God; and therefore, 2. Receives righteous condemnation.—The principle of the Jesuits, that the end sanctifies the means, is nothing else than a hypocritical cloaking of the plain words: "Let us do evil, that good may come."

On vers. 9-18. The sinfulness of all, both Jews and Greeks: 1. Proved by Paul himself in his description of their moral depravity; 2. Corroborated by the proofs of Holy Scripture from the Psalms, Proverbs of Solomon, and the Prophet Isaiah.—As Paul appeals to the Old Testament, so should we, in order to authenticate truths, appeal to the whole Bible, though first and continually to the New Testament.—Every doctrine must be scriptural.—Paul a master in the application of Scripture: 1. So far as he grasps the fullness of the scriptural expression; but, 2. He does not thoughtlessly arrange quotations from the Scriptures; but, 3. He skilfully connects kindred passages into a beautiful whole.

On vers. 18-20. The severe preaching of the law: 1. To whom is it directed? 2. What does it accomplish?—How far does the law produce knowledge of sin?

LUTHER: Spirit is what God supernaturally effects in man; letter is all the deeds of nature without spirit (chap. ii. 29).—"God is a sure support; but he who trusts in man will want" (chap. iii. 4).—David says (Ps. li. 4): "Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned," &c. These words would seem to mean that man must sin in order that God might be just, as Paul would also seem here to say. Yet this is not the case; but we shall acknowledge the sin of which God accuses us, that He might thereby be confessed truthful and just in His law.

STARKE: A true Christian must not despise the means of grace: as, attending church, making confession, and partaking of the Lord's Supper; nor should he speak derisively of them because they are misused by most persons as a false hope (chap. ii. 25).—He who will be comforted by the consideration that he has been baptized in the name of Christ, must examine himself whether he has also been newly born, and walks after the new man: where this is not the case, holy baptism is of just as little use to him, as circumcision was to the unbelieving Jew: 1 Peter iii. 21 (chap. ii. 29).—In worldly courts, injustice often rules; but God will judge the world in the justest manner (chap. iii. 6).—When our misery is properly uncovered, compassion is near; and when we are truly compassionate ourselves, compassion is not far from us (chap. iii. 12).—The way to grace is open when we stand dumb before God (chap. iii. 19).—There is only one way to salvation, by which men, before, at the time of, and after Moses, can be saved (chap. iii. 20).—LANGE: Oh, how many Christians are put to shame at this day by honorable heathen! And how the latter will rise up against the former on the judgment-day! (chap. ii. 26).—HEDINGER: The new creature must be all in all. If this be not the case, there is no godly sorrow, no faith, no Christ, no hope of salvation (chap. ii. 25).—There is only one way to salvation, yet God is at perfect liberty to say in what people He will build His Church, and what measure of grace and gifts He will give (chap. viii. 2).—Here stands the pillar of the evangelical Church, the test and corner-stone of the pure, saving gospel (chap. iii. 20).—QUESNEL: A strong proof of original sin, because no one who comes into the world is righteous, or without sin (chap. iii. 10).—Let love be in the heart, then will loveliness be also in the mouth (chap. iii. 14).—CRAMER: Learn to distinguish well between true and false Jews, true and false Christians; the external profession does not constitute a true Jew or Christian (chap. ii. 28).—It is not all gold that glitters, and not all show is wisdom. Although the natural reason can devise many conclusive speeches and subtleties, these must not be regarded as wisdom in divine things (chap. iii. 5).—Nova Bibl. Tüb.: The dead members of the Church depend upon its external advantages, take their comfort in them, and make their boast of them, without remembering that they can derive no good from them without penitence and faith (chap. iii. 1).—Though we be unfaithful, God remaineth faithful. Oh, let us therefore rely upon His faithfulness and promise, and take comfort in the fact that we always have a ready entrance to the faithfulness of our God (chap. iii. 3).—OSLANDER: If God is truthful, but men false, why do some men believe folly sooner than the word of God? But to God alone belongs the praise of righteousness and truth (chap. iii. 4).—Those who boast of their righteousness before God, know neither God's will nor themselves (chap. iii. 19).

GERLACH: The usefulness of the covenant of grace extends on all sides and encompasses all the relations of life (chap. iii. 2).—God's wisdom, omnipotence, justice, and love, are glorified either in the punishment or conversion of the sinner; the more wicked the sinner, the greater the glory. But this glory consists precisely in the death of the sinner, since he either dies to sin, having once lived to it; or, with all other sinners, suffers eternal death in perdition (chap. iii. 4).—Description of men of malignant feeling, who strive to injure others by their language. Throat, tongue, and lips—three instruments of speech, which utter the words from within (chap. iii. 13).—The more complete and deep the command, the stronger is its declaration of condemnation, and the less can it awaken in us faith and hope for salvation (chap. iii. 20).

LISCO: The Christian is aided by the sacraments only when he lives in faith (chap. ii. 25).—On what the moral worth of man before God depends (vers. 25, 26).—Israel's advantages (chap. iii. 1-4).—He who adopts the principle: "Let us sin, that good may come," will receive righteous condemnation; for God desires to be glorified only by our obedience; all disobedience is dishonoring His majesty, but terminates also with the sinner's destruction and likewise extends to the justification or glorification of the holy and righteous God (chap. iii. 8).

HEUBNER: External ecclesiasticism and confession has value only when it leads to religion of the heart and life; otherwise, it is only the same as heathenism (chap. ii. 25).—The great difference between outward and inward Christianity. True Christianity is internal (chap. ii. 28).—The true worshipper of God is inward, is concealed from the world, and is known only to God (chap. ii. 29).—The worth and merit of the pious person is exalted above all opinion of the world: 1. Because true piety by no means passes in the world for the highest good, but only that which is profitable, and shines; 2. Because men cannot discern this inner, pure condition of heart, neither can they credit it to others; 3. Because the world cannot reward this piety (chap. ii. 29).—God's word is committed to us; use it aright, support it, propagate it. In many places it has disappeared through the fault of men (in Asia and Africa), chap. iii. 2.—God's honor cannot be touched. Nothing can be charged against God; it would be blasphemy to charge Him with blame of any kind (chap. iii. 4).—God's righteousness becomes the more apparent in proportion to the manifestation of man's unrighteousness (chap. iii. 5).—Every feeling of hatred is the root for a willingness to shed blood (chap. iii. 15).—Every man is guilty before God, and subject to His punishment; but he should also know and confess it (chap. iii. 19).—The law requires obedience to all its commands (chap. iii. 20).

SPENCER: When people are wickedly taught to sin, so that God may be lauded because of the forgiveness of sins, it is the same slander which the same old slanderous devil charged at that time against the apostles, and which is still cast against the doctrine of the grace of God (chap. iii. 8).

BESSER: Circumcision of the heart is real circumcision (chap. ii. 29).—The evangelical theme of joy in the Epistle to the Romans is, that God, in grace, is just in His words to sinners whom He has justified by faith in Jesus (chap. iii. 4).

To have an advantage, and yet not to have one.—The testimonies of Scripture on the sinful depravity of man.—Vers. 8–19. How vain is the effort to be justified by the law: 1. Because "by the deeds of the law," &c.; 2. "For by the law," &c.

[BURKITT: (condensed) ii. 25. The heathen have abused but one talent, the light of nature; but we, thousands; even as many thousands as we have slighted the tenders of offered grace. What a fearful aggravation it puts upon our sin and misery! We must certainly be accountable to God at the great day, not only for all the light we have had, but for all we might have had in the gospel day; and especially for the light we have sinned under and rebelled against.—Chap. iii. 1. Great is that people's privilege and mercy who enjoy the word of God—the audible word in the Holy Scriptures, the visible word in the holy sacraments. It enlighteneth the eyes, rejoiceth the heart, quickeneth the soul. It is compared to gold for profit, to honey for sweetness, to milk for nourishing, to food for strengthening!—Chap. iii. 8–7: God is never intentionally, but is sometimes accidentally glorified by man's sins. There never was such a crime as crucifying Christ, but nothing by which God has reaped greater glory.—Chap. iii. 10. The unrighteousness of man: 1. There is none originally righteous; 2. None efficiently righteous; 3. none meritoriously righteous; 4. None perfectly righteous.—MATTHEW HENRY: The Jews had the means of salvation, but they had not the monopoly of it.—On the righteousness of God, observe: 1. It is manifested; 2. It is without the law; 3. It is witnessed by the law and the prophets; 4. It is by the faith of Jesus Christ; 5. It is to all, and upon all them that believe.—DODDRIDGE: We pity the Gentiles, and justly so; but let us take heed lest those appearances of virtue which are to be found among some of them do not condemn us, who, with the letter of the law and the gospel, and with the solemn tokens of a covenant relation to God, transgress His precepts, and violate our engagements to Him; so turning the means of goodness and happiness into the occasion of more aggravated guilt and misery.—CLARKE: The law is properly considered the rule of right; and unless God had given some such means of discovering what sin is, the darkened heart of man could never have formed an adequate conception of it. For as an acknowledged straight edge is the only way in which the straightness or crookedness of a line can be determined, so the moral obliquity of human actions can only be determined by the law of God, that rule of right which proceeds from His own immaculate holiness.

[HODGE: When true religion declines, the disposition to lay undue stress on external rites is increased. The Jews, when they lost their spirituality, supposed that circumcision had power to save (ii. 25).—Paul does not deny, but asserts the value of circumcision. So, likewise, the Christian sacraments, baptism and the Lord's Supper, are of the utmost importance, and to neglect or reject them is a great sin (ii. 25; iii. 1).—It is a mark of genuine piety to be disposed always to justify God, and to condemn ourselves. On the other hand, a disposition to self-justification and the examination of our sins, however secret, is an indication of the want of a proper sense of our own unworthiness and of the Divine excellence (iii. 4, 5).—There is no better evidence against the truth of any doctrine, than that its tendency is immoral (iii. 8).—Speculative and moral truths, which are self-evident to the mind, should be regarded as authoritative, and as fixed points in all reasonings (iii. 8).—BARNES: If all men were willing to sacrifice their opinions when they appeared to impinge on the veracity of God; if they started back with instinctive shuddering at the very supposition of such a want of fidelity in Him; how soon would it put an end to the boastings of error, to the pride of philosophy, to lofty dictation in religion! No man with this feeling could be a Universalist for a moment; and none could be an infidel.

Archbishop TILLOTSON, Sermon on 2 Tim. ii. 19 (quoted by James Ford on Romans): "Baptism verily profiteth, if we obey the gospel; but if we walk contrary to the precepts of it, our baptism is no baptism, and our Christianity is heathenism." We would say: worse than no baptism, worse than heathenism. For in proportion to the blessing intended, is the curse incurred by abuse. The case of an apostate Christian is far more hopeless than the case of an unconverted heathen. The one has Christianity behind him, the other before him; the one has deliberately cast it off, the other may thinkfully embrace it.—P. 8.]

SIXTH SECTION.—The revelation of God's righteousness without the law by faith in Christ for all sinners without distinction, by the representation of Christ as the Propitiator ("mercy-seat"). The righteousness of God in Christ as justifying righteousness.

SEVENTH SECTION.—The annulling of man's vain-glory (self-praise) by the law of faith. Justification by faith WITHOUT THE DEEDS OF THE LAW. First proof: FROM EXPERIENCE: God is the God of the Gentiles as well as of the Jews—proved by the actual faith of the Gentiles. True renewal of the law by faith.

VERSES 27-31.

- 21 But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested [But now apart from the law,¹ the righteousness of God hath been made manifest²], being 22 witnessed [testified to, attested] by the law and the prophets; Even³ the righteousness of God which is by [by means of, through] faith of Jesus Christ
 23 unto all and upon all⁴ them that believe; for there is no difference: For all have sinned [all sinned, i. e., they are all sinners],⁵ and come [fall] short [νέμειναι,
 24 in the present tense] of the glory of God; Being justified freely by his grace
 25 through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: Whom God hath [omit hath] set forth [προέθετο] to be a propitiation [mercy-seat]⁶ through [the⁷] faith [,] in his blood, to declare [for a manifestation (exhibition) of, εἰς ἐνδειξιν τῆς δικ.] his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past [because of the prætermision (non-visitation, passing by) of the former sins, διὰ τὴν (not τῆς) πάρεσιν (not ἄρεσιν) τῶν προγεγονότων ἁμαρτημάτων]⁸ through [in, ἐν] the forbearance
 26 of God; To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness; that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus [with a view to the manifestation (exhibition, πρὸς τὴν ἐνδειξιν) of his righteousness at this present time, in order that he may be (shown and seen to be) just and (yet at the same time) be justifying him who is of the faith of (in) Jesus, εἰς τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸν δίκαιον καὶ δικαιοῦντα τὸν ἐκ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ].⁹
 27 Where is [the] boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? [By the 28 law] of works? Nay; but by the law of faith. Therefore [For]¹¹ we conclude [judge] that a man is justified by faith¹² without the deeds [without 29 works] of the law.¹³ [Or, ἦ] Is he the God of the Jews only? ¹⁴ is he not also 30 of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also: Seeing¹⁵ it is one God, which shall [who will] justify the circumcision by faith, and uncircumcision through faith.
 31 Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: [Far be it!] yea, we establish¹⁶ the law.

TEXTUAL.

¹ Ver. 21.—[Or: independently of the law. Luther: ohne Zuthun des Gesetzes. χωρίς νόμου, opposed to ἀπὸ νόμου, ver. 20, is emphatically put first and belongs to the verb. The transposition in the E. V. obscures this connection and destroys the parallelism.—P. 8.]

² Ver. 21.—[μεγαλύνεται. The perfect has its appropriate force and sets forth this revelation of righteousness as an accomplished and still continued fact. Comp. the ἀποκαλύπτειν, i. 17. Meyer: "ist offenbar gemacht, zu Tage gelegt, so das sie jedem zur Erkenntnis sich darstellt; das Praesens der vollendeten Handlung, Heb. ix. 26. Bernhardt, p. 378."—P. 8.]

³ Ver. 22.—[Even (or, I say, inquam, and so on) is the best rendering of ἔτι here, since it is not strictly adversative, but explanatory and reassumptive (if I may coin this term for epianaleptic), as in ix. 30; Phil. ii. 8. The contrast is not between the righteousness of God and the righteousness of man (Wordsworth), but between the general idea of the righteousness of God and the specific idea of righteousness through faith now introduced.—P. 8.]

mann. Alford brackets, and says: "Possibly from homœotel.; on the other hand, the longer text may be the junction of two readings." Lange retains the received text without remark. It is redundant, but not superfluous. Righteousness is represented as a flood extending unto all (εις πάντας) and over all (ἐπὶ πάντας). Ewald: "bestimmt für alle und kommt über alle."—P. 8.]

⁶ Ver. 23.—[The aorist ἡμαρτον, not the perfect ἡμαρτήσασθαι. Luther: Sie sind allzumal Sünder. Rückert, in his ridiculously presumptuous proclivity to criticise the Apostle's grammar and logic, calls the use of the aorist here an inaccuracy. Bengel, Olshausen, and Wordsworth refer it to the original fall of the race in Adam. Meyer in loc.: "The sinning of each man is presented as a historical fact of the past, whereby the sinful status is brought about." So also Tholuck, Philippi, Lange. See Exeg. Notes.—P. 8.]

⁹ Ver. 25.—[Or as Alford translates: on account of the overlooking of the sins which had passed, in the forbearance of God. Conybeare and Howson: because in His forbearance God had passed over the former sins of men. Lange: von wegen der Vorbeiblasung (Nichtbeachtung) der vorher geschehenen Sünden. The Authorized Version here, following Beza (per remissionem), is a mistranslation. ὑπερέχον (from ὑπερίσχω), which occurs but once in the N. T., differs from ἔφερον (from ἐφέρω), which occurs seventeen times, in this, that it is, 1. a temporary pretermission or overlooking, not a total remission or pardon; 2. a work of the Divine ἀγῶν, forbearance (ii. 4), not of the Divine χάρις, grace (Eph. i. 7); 3. it leaves the question of future punishment or pardon undecided, while the ἔφερον removes the guilt and remits the punishment. The same idea Paul expresses, Acts xvii. 30: τοῖς μὲν οὖν χρόνοις τῆς ἀγορίας ὑπερέχων (having overlooked) δ' ἔφευ, &c. δὲ with the accusative cannot mean through, by means of, or for, but on account of; for Paul clearly distinguishes (even Rom. viii. 11; Gal. iv. 13) δὲ with the accusative and ἐκ with the genitive. The Vulgate correctly renders δὲ propter, but mistakes ὑπερέχον for ἔφερον, remission. So also Luther: in dem dass er Sünde vergibt.—P. 8.]

¹¹ Ver. 26.—The addition ἵπσου is found in Codd. A. B. C. K. [and Sin.], Lachmann [Alford. Omitted by F. G. 52, It., Fritzsche, Meyer, Tischendorf; while other authorities read Χριστοῦ ἵπσου, or τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰ. Χ. A usual insertion. The force of τὸν ἐκ πίστεως is weakened by the E. V. The ἐκ indicates that πίστις, or Christ rather as apprehended by πίστις, is the root or fountain of his spiritual life; comp. the ἐκ in i. 17; ii. 13. Conybeare and Howson: "It means 'him whose essential characteristic is faith,' 'the child of faith,' comp. Gal. iii. 7, 9. δίκαιοις would perhaps be better rendered by righteous, but we have no verb from the same root equivalent to δίκαιοις.—P. 8.]

¹³ Ver. 28.—The reading δίκαιοις ὄντας ἀνθρώπους πιστεύει. [The receipt reads πιστεύει before δίκαιοις ὄντας, to throw emphasis on faith. But N. B. C. D. read δίκ. πιστεύει ἀνθρώπων.—P. 8.]

¹⁴ Ver. 28.—[ὑπερὶ ἔργων νόμου, without or apart from law (legal) works (Gesetzeswerke) or works of the law.—P. 8.]

¶Furber arranges the important section, vers. 21-26, in this way, which may assist somewhat in the exegesis:

21. Νυνὶ δὲ χωρὶς νόμου
Δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ πεφανέρωται,

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

FIRST PARAGRAPH, CHAP. III. 21-26.

Contrast between the saving time of justification and the old time of sin and death.

Ver. 21. But now, νυνὶ δέ.—Explanations of νυνὶ: 1. Contrast of times [at this time, under the gospel dispensation, = ἐν τῷ νῦν καιρῷ, ver. 26]; (Grotius, Tholuck, Philippi [Olshausen, Wordsworth, Hodge], and others); 2. contrast of circumstances [as things are]: earlier dependence on the law, now independence of the law [διὰ νόμον—χωρὶς νόμον], (Pareus, Piscat., Meyer, De Wette [Fritzsche, Alford. In this sense the classics use only νῦν, not νυνὶ, but the latter is so used repeatedly in Hellenistic Greek]); 3. in soteriology the two contrasts of time and condition coincide.—Apart from the law [of Moses, χωρὶς νόμον]: 1. It is referred to παραίρεται (Luther, Tholuck, Meyer, and others); 2. to δικαιοσύνη (Augustine, Wolf [Reiche, Hodge], and others): the righteousness of God which the believer shares without the law [or rather, without works of the law, χωρὶς ἔργων νόμον, Gal. ii. 16]. The latter view is not correct. [Comp. διὰ νόμον in ver. 20, which likewise belongs not to the noun ἐπιγνωσκ, but to the verb to be supplied. Also Text. Note 1.—P. S.]

[The righteousness of God. Comp. the Recg. Notes on chap. i. 17. It is the righteousness which proceeds from God (gen. auctoris), which personally appeared in Christ, "who is our Righteousness," and which is communicated to the believer for Christ's sake in the act of justification by faith. It is both objective, or inherent in God and realized in Christ, and subjective, or imparted to man. It is here characterized by a series of antitheses: independent of the law, yet authenticated by the law and the prophets (ver. 21); freely (δωρεάν) bestowed on the believer, yet fully paid for by the redemption price (διὰ τῆς ἀπολυτρώσεως) of Christ (24); intrinsically holy, yet justifying the sinner (26); thus uniting the character of the moral governor of the universe, and the merciful Father who provided a free salvation.—P. S.]

Has been made manifest, παραίρεται. This is now the complete revelation of righteousness; as John i. 17 represents the complete revelation of grace and truth; and as Eph. i. 19 represents the complete revelation of omnipotence. All are single definitions of the completed New Testament revelation itself. The expression does not absolutely presuppose "the previous concealment in God's counsel" (Meyer).^{*} For the Old Testament was the increasing revelation of God, also in reference to righteousness. But compared with this completeness, the growing revelation was still as a veil.—Being testified to [μαρτυροῦμένη], put first with reference to χωρὶς νόμον, which it qualifies] by the law and the prophets [i. e., the Old Testament Scriptures; Matt. v. 17; vii. 12; xxii. 40, &c.; just as we now say the Bible. νόμον has here, as Bengel remarks, a wider sense than in the preceding χωρὶς νόμον.—P. S.] There is therefore no contradiction between the Old and New Testaments.

^{*} [So also Hodge: "This righteousness which, so to speak, had long been buried under the types and indistinct utterances of the old dispensation, has now in the gospel been made clear and apparent."—P. S.]

The Old Testament is in substance a prophetic witness of the New, and therefore also of the righteousness of faith (see chap. iv., and x. 6; Acts x. 43 chap. xv.). And not only do the prophets (Isa. xlviii. 16; Habak. ii. 4) testify to this righteousness, but so does the law also in its stricter sense (the patriarchs, &c.); yea, even its strictest sense; for example, the law of the sin-offering (Lev. xvi.). [Augustine: Novum Testamentum in Vetere latet; Vetus T. in Novo patet. See the proof in chap. iv. from the case of Abraham and the declarations of David.—P. S.]

Ver. 22. Through faith of Jesus Christ.* The usual explanation is, through faith in Jesus Christ [genitive of the object].† Meyer produces in its favor the usage of language (Mark xi. 22; Acts iii. 16; Gal. ii. 20; iii. 22; Eph. iii. 12, &c.), as well as the essential relation of the πίστις to the δικαιοσύνη. [These parallel passages, to which may be added Gal. ii. 16; Eph. iv. 13; Phil. iii. 9; James ii. 1; Rev. xiv. 12, seem to me conclusive in favor of the usual interpretation that our faith in Christ is meant here; comp. also τὸν ἐκ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ, ver. 26. But Dr. Lange strongly fortifies his new interpretation: CHRIST'S faithfulness to us, taking Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ as the genitive of the subject.—P. S.] The explanation of Benecke, the faithfulness of Christ, is overlooked even by Tholuck. We make it, Christ's believing faithfulness [Glaubens-treue]. Reasons: 1. The πίστις θεοῦ (chap. iii. 8), and the coherency of the ideas, πιστεῖν, πιστύνειν, and πίστις θεοῦ, in opposition to the ideas: ἀπιστία, ἀπίστια, and corresponding with the ideas: righteousness of God, righteousness of Christ, righteousness by faith. 2. The addition in this passage of ἐκ πάντας καὶ ἐπὶ πάντας; with which we must compare chap. i. 17, ἐκ πίστεως ἐκ πίστεως. 3. The passages, Gal. iii. 22; Eph. iii. 12; comp. Heb. xii. 2. As to His knowledge, Christ of course did not walk by faith, but by sight; but as regards the moral principle of faith—confidence and faithfulness—He is the Prince of faith. 4. We cannot say of the righteousness of God, that it was first revealed by faith in Christ. The revelation of God's righteousness in the faithfulness of Christ is the ground of justifying faith, but faith is not the ground of this revelation. 5. So also the διὰ τῆς πίστεως ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι, ver. 26, cannot be regarded as substantiating the ἰλαστήριον.

Unto all and upon all. The ἐκ denotes the direction, the ideal dynamic determination of the δικαιοσύνη; the ἐπὶ, the fulfilment, the appropriation. [This must, of course, not be understood in a Universalistic sense. See Textual Note 1.—P. S.] Both prepositions have been combined in various ways as identical, and explained as strengthening the thought for all (thus Rückert, and others); on the contrary, Theodoret, Eucumenius, and others, have arbitrarily referred ἐκ to the Jews, and ἐπὶ to the Gentiles; according to Morus, and others, καὶ ἐπὶ, &c., is construed as a further explanation of the ἐκ πάντας.

For there is no difference. On account of γὰρ, this clause refers to the former. There is

* [διὰ πίστεως, by means of, through; not διὰ πιστεως, on account of. Faith is the appropriating organ and subjective condition, not the ground and cause of our justification.—P. S.]

† (Berlage, Scholten, V. Hengel, take Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ as gen. of the author: ides que auctore Jesu Christo Dns habetur. See against this Meyer in loc. footnote.—P. S.)

neither a difference between Jews and Gentiles, nor, in reference to the necessity of justification, is there a difference between those who have shown themselves, according to chap. ii. 7 ff., doers or transgressors of the law.

Ver. 23. For all sinned [they are all sinners; Luther: sie sind allzumal Sünder]. They sinned, in the sense that they have become sinners. Therefore aor. (II.), and not perfect. They sinned in such a way that they are still sinning.* But their righteousness was altogether lost when their transgression began.—And fall short of the glory [ὕστερον, in the present tense. All sinned, and consequently they come short. τῆς δόξης. Explanations: 1. Glorifying before God, gloriation† (Erasmus, Luther, Rosenmüller, and others). 2. The δόξα Θεοῦ as the image of God (Flacius, Chemnitz, Rückert, Olshausen; see 1 Cor. xi. 7). 3. The glory of eternal life [as in ver. 2], (Ecumenius, Glückler, &c., Beza, Bengel, as sharing in the glory of God). 4. Honor before God, i. e., in the estimation of God (Calvin [gloria quæ coram Deo locum habet], Köllner). 5. The honor which God gives, i. e., the approbation of God (the genit. auct.); Piscat., Grotius, Philippi, Meyer [Fritzache, De Wette, Alford, Hodge]. Tholuck: The declaration of honor, like the declaration of righteousness.‡ This would give the strange sense: because they lack the declaration of righteousness on the part of God, they are to be declared righteous. It must not be overlooked that men belong here who, as inward Jews, according to chap. ii. 29, have already ἔκτισαν ἐκ Θεοῦ. Certainly, the question is concerning righteousness before God, because the question concerns God's judicial tribunal. But what men were wanting since Adam's fall, is not the righteousness of justification—for it is by this that that want is to be supplied—but the righteousness of life (not to be confounded with the righteousness by the works of the law), as the true glory or radiance of life [δόξα in the sense of splendor, majesty, perfection. Lange translates it: Gerechtigkeit, eitelglanz, Lebensruhm.—P. S.]. But as the δικαιοσύνη of man must come from the δικαιοσύνη of God in order to avail before Him, so also the δόξα. Therefore the alternative, from God or before God, is a wrong alternative.§ But the supply is equal to the want: the δικαιοσύνη of Christ becomes the δικαιοσύνη of the believer, and therefore Christ's δόξα his δόξα (Rom. viii.).]

Ver. 24. Being justified freely.¶ The participle δικαιοῦμενοι, in connection with what follows, specifies both the mode by which their want of Divine δόξα becomes perfectly manifest, and the opposite which comes to supply this want. The δικαιοῦσθαι does not merely come to supply the want of glory (according to Luther's translation: and are justified [Peshito, Fritzache, = καὶ δικαιοῦνται]), but by the δικαιοῦσθαι, the fact of that ὑστεροῦσθαι becomes perfectly apparent. The individual judgment and the individual deliverance are, in fact, joined into one: repentance and faith; hunger and thirst after righteousness, and fullness

[NOTE ON THE SCRIPTURE MEANING OF ΔΙΚΑΙΩΣΙΝ.—Δικαιοῦμενοι depends grammatically on ὑστεροῦνται, but contains in fact the main idea: ut qui justificentur (Beza, Tholuck, Meyer). This is the locus classicus of the doctrine of justification by free grace through faith in Christ, in its inseparable connection with the atonement, as its objective basis. The verb δικαίωσις occurs forty times in the New Testament (twice in Matthew, five times in Luke, twice in Acts, twenty-seven times in Paul's Epistles, three times in James, once in the Apocalypse). In the Gospel and Epistles of John, as also in Peter and Jude, the verb never occurs, although they repeatedly use the noun δικαιοσύνη and the adjective δικαίος. It must be taken here, as nearly always in the Bible, in the declaratory, forensic or judicial sense, as distinct from, though by no means opposed to, or abstractly separated from, a mere executive act of pardoning, and an efficient act of making just inwardly or sanctifying. It denotes an act of jurisdiction, the pronouncing of a sentence, not the infusion of a quality. This is the prevailing Hellenistic usage, corresponding to the Hebrew קָדַשׁ. Comp., for the Old Testament, the Septuagint in Gen. xxxviii. 26; xlv. 16; Ex. xliii. 7 (ὁ δικαιοῦντος τὸν ἄσπετον); Deut. xxv. 1; 2 Sam. xv. 4; 1 Kings viii. 32; Ps. lxxiii. 3; Prov. xvii. 15; Isa. v. 23; for the New Testament, Matt. xii. 37; Luke x. 29; xvi. 15; xviii. 14 (where διδικαιοῦντες evidently refers to the publican's prayer for forgiveness of sin); Acts xiii. 39; Rom. ii. 13; iii. 4, 20, 24, 26, 28, 30; iv. 2, 5; v. 1, 9; viii. 30, 33; 1 Cor. iv. 4; vi. 11; Gal. ii. 16, 17; iii. 8, 11, 24; v. 4; Titus iii. 7; James ii. 21–25; Apoc. xxii. 11. There is, to my knowledge, no passage in the New Testament, and only two or three in the Septuagint (Ps. lxxiii. 18: ἐδικαίωσα τὴν καρδίαν μου; Isa. liii. 11: δικαίωσας δικαίους; comp. Dan. xii. 3: מַצְדִּיקֵי הַיְרֵבִים), where δικαίωσις means to make just, or, to lead to righteousness. The declarative sense is especially apparent in those passages where man is said to justify God, who is just, and cannot be made just, but only accounted and acknowledged as just; Luke vii. 29, 35; Matt. xi. 19; Rom. iii. 4 (from Ps. li. 5); comp. also 1 Tim. iii. 16, where Christ is said to be justified in spirit.

The declarative and forensic meaning of the phrase, δικαιοῦσθαι ἐκ πίστεως, may be proven (1. from the opposite phrase, δικαιοῦσθαι ἐκ νόμου, which is equivalent to δικαιοῦσθαι παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ ἐν νόμῳ, Gal. iii. 11 (or ἐξ ἔργων νόμου, Gal. iii. 10), or ἐκ νόμου αἰσίου, Rom. iii. 20; i. e., to be justified in the sight or in the judgment of God; (2.) from the term λογίζεσθαι ἐκ δικαιοσύνης, to account for righteous, which is used in the same sense as δικαιοῦν, Rom. iv. 3, 5, 9, 23, 24; Gal. iii. 6; James ii. 23, and is almost equivalent with σκίζειν, to save (comp. Rom. v. 9, 10; x. 9, 10, 13; Eph. ii. 5 ff.) (3.) from the use of the opposite word to condemn

¶ [Still another exposition is that of Hoffmann of Erlangen (Schriftbeweis, vol. i. p. 432, 2d ed.): the δόξα which belongs to God, as His own attribute, like the δικαιοσύνη. Ewald: the δόξα which man had through creation, Ps. vii. 8, but which he lost through sin.—P. S.]

¶ [Wordsworth lays stress on the present tense, as indicating that the work of justification is ever going on by the application of the cleansing efficacy of Christ's blood to all who lay hold on Him by faith.—P. S.]

s. g., Prov. xvii. 15: "He that justifieth (צַדִּיק יְצַדִּיק, LXX: δικαιον κρίνει) the wicked, and he that condemneth (צַדִּיק יַשְׁמִיט) the just, even they both are abomination to the Lord," in the translation of the Vulgate: "Qui justificat inpium et qui condemnat justum, abominabilis est uterque apud Deum." He who would implant righteousness in a wicked man, or lead him into the way of righteousness, would doubtless be acceptable to God. So also Matt. xii. 37: "By thy words shalt thou be justified (δικαιωθήσῃ), and by thy words thou shalt be condemned (καταδικασθήσῃ)."

The corresponding noun, δικαιοσύνη (which occurs only twice in the New Testament, viz., Rom. iv. 25; v. 18), justification (Rechtfertigung), is the opposite of κατὰ κρίμα, condemnation; comp. Matt. xii. 37; Rom. viii. 1, 33, 34; hence the antithesis of κρίμα εἰς δικαιώσιν and κρίμα εἰς κατὰ κρίμα, Rom. v. 16, 18. Justification implies, negatively, the remission of sins (ἀφεσις τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν), and, positively, the imputation of Christ's righteousness, or the adoption (νιοθεσία, Gal. iv. 5; Eph. i. 5).

No human being can so keep the law of God, which demands perfect love to Him and to our neighbor, that on the ground of his own works he could ever be declared righteous before the tribunal of a holy God. He can only be so justified freely, without any merit of his own, on the objective ground of the perfect righteousness of Christ, as apprehended, and thus made subjective by a living faith, or life-union with Him. This justifying grace precedes every truly good work on our part, but is at the same time the actual beginning of all good works. There is no true holiness except on the ground of the atonement and the remission of sin, and the holiness of the Christian is but a manifestation of love and gratitude for the boundless mercy of God already received and constantly experienced.

This I take to be the true evangelical or Pauline view of justification, in opposition to the interpretation of Roman Catholics and Rationalists, who, from opposite standpoints, agree in taking δικαιώσις in the sense of making just, or sanctifying, and in regarding good works as a joint condition, with faith, of progressive justification. The objection that God cannot pronounce a man just if he is not so in fact, has force only against that mechanical and exclusively forensic view which resolves justification into a sort of legal fiction, or a cold, lifeless imputation, and separates it from the broader and deeper doctrine of a life-union of the believer with Christ. Certainly God, unlike any human judge, is absolutely true and infallible; He speaks, and it is done; His declaratory acts are creative, efficient acts. But mark, the sinner is not justified outside of Christ, but only in Christ, on the ground of His perfect sacrifice, and on condition of true faith, by which he actually becomes one with Christ, and a partaker of His holy life. So, when God declares him righteous, he is righteous potentially, "a new creature in Christ;" old things having passed away, and all things having become new (1 Cor. v. 7). And God, who sees the end from the beginning, sees also the full-grown fruit in the germ, and by His gracious promise assures its growth. Justifying faith is itself a work of Divine grace in us, and the fruitful source of all our good works. On the part of God, then, and in point of fact, the actus declaratorius can indeed not be abstractly separated from the actus efficiens: the same grace which justifies, does also renew, regenerate, and sanctify; faith and love, justification and sanctification, are as inseparable in the life of the Christian, as light and heat in the rays of the sun. "When God doth justify the ungodly," says Owen (on Justification, vol. v. p. 127, Gould's ed.), "on account of the righteousness imputed unto him, He doth at the same instant, by the power of His grace, make him inherently and subjectively righteous, or holy." Nevertheless, we must distinguish in the order of logic: Justification, like regeneration (which is the corresponding and simultaneous or preceding inner operation of the Holy Spirit), is a single act, sanctification a continuous process; they are related to each other like birth and growth; justification, moreover, depends not at all on what man is or has done, but on what Christ has done for us in our nature; and, finally, good works are no cause or condition, but a consequence and manifestation of justification. Comp. Doctrinae and Ethical, No. 5, below; also the Exeg. Notes on i. 17; ii. 18; iii. 20.—P. S.]

Freely. δωρεάν, as a gift, gratis, not by merit (chap. iv. 4; comp. 2 Thess. iii. 8). [Comp also ἡ δωρεὰ τῆς δικαιοσύνης, Rom. v. 17, and θεοῦ τὸ δῶρον, Eph. ii. 3.—P. S.]—By his grace. The idea of grace denotes the union of God's love and righteousness, the highest manifestation of His favor, which, by its voluntary operation, as love, destroys the sinner's guilt freely, and which, as righteousness, destroys the guilt on conditions of justice. [Grace—i. e., God's love to the sinner, saving love, is the efficient cause, redemption by the blood of Christ the objective means, faith the subjective condition, of justification. αὐτοῦ is emphatically put before χάριτι. Justification on the part of God is an act of pure grace (Eph. ii. 8-10; Gal. ii. 21), and χάρις is the very opposite of μισθός ἐργον or ὀφείλημα (iv. 4; xi. 6). Faith, on our part, is not a meritorious act, but simply the acceptance and appropriation of God's free gift, and is itself wrought in us by God's Spirit, without whom no one can call Jesus Lord (1 Cor. xii. 3).—P. S.]

Through the redemption, ἀπολύτρωσις. The grace of God is marked as the causality of this ἀπολύτρωσις. This is therefore to be regarded here as the most general view of the fact of redemption, as is also plain from the addition, τῆς ἐν Χ. Ἰ. [in Christ, not through Christ; comp. Eph. i. 7; ἐν ᾧ ἔχομεν τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν διὰ τοῦ αἵματος αὐτοῦ]. The ἀπολύτρωσις, or redemption,* in the wider sense, and viewed as a fundamental and accomplished fact, comprehends: 1. καταλλαγὴ [change from enmity to friendship, reconciliation], Rom. v. 10; 2 Cor. v. 18: freedom from the enmity and rancor of sin. 2. ἱλασμός [propitiation, expiation], 2 Cor. v. 14; ver. 21; Gal. iii. 13 [ἐξηγόρασαν ἐκ τῆς κατὰρας τοῦ νόμου]; Eph. i. 7 [τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν . . . τῇ ἄριστῃ τῶν παραπτωμάτων]; Col. i. 14; Heb. ii. 17: freedom from the guilt of sin. 3. ἀπολύτρωσις in the narrower sense, Rom. v. 17; vi. 2; vi. 18, 22; viii. 2, 21; Gal. v. 1; Titus ii. 14; Heb. ii. 15; ver. 18: freedom from the dominion of sin. The same ἀπολύτρωσις, viewed in its ultimate aim and effect, means the transposition from the condition of the militant to the triumphant Church: Luke xxi. 28 ["the day of redemption draweth nigh"]; Rom. viii. 23; Eph. i. 7, 14; iv. 30. The ἱλασμός is justly represented here as the central saving agency of the whole ἀπολύτρωσις. [Hodge: Redemption from the wrath of God by the blood of Christ. Ver. 25.* Whom God set forth. Explanations of προῖδμετο: 1. Previously purposed, designed, decreed (Chrysostom, Ecumenius, Fritzsche [Forbes], and others, with reference to Eph. i. 9); † 2. Kypke: substituit, nostro loco dedit. Against the meaning of προῖδμετο, ‡ 3. Publicly set forth (Vulgate, Luther, Beza, Bengel, De Wette, Philippi, Meyer, Tholuck [E. V., Alford, Hodge; also Delitzsch, Comm. on Heb., ix. 5]). Meyer: "This signification of προῖδμετο, well known from the Greek usage (Herod., iii. 148; vi. 21; Plato's Phædr., p. 116, E., &c.), must be decidedly accepted, because of the correlation to εἰς ἑνδοξον." § The peculiar interest of God is indicated by the middle voice. It was manifested through the crucifixion; compare the discourse of Jesus, in John, where He compares Himself with the serpent of Moses; John iii. 1.]

This explanation acquires its full weight by the following ἱλαστήριον, a substantive of neuter form, made from the adjective ἱλαστήριος, which relates to expiatory acts; see the Lexicons. In the Septuagint especially it is the designation of the mercy-seat, or the lid or cover of the ark, כַּפֹּרֶת, which was sprinkled by the high-priest with the blood of the sin-offering once a year, on the great day of atonement [and over which appeared the shekinah, or δόξα τοῦ κυρίου; Lev. xvi. 13-16; Ex. xxv. 17-22. † [Where προῖδμετο is used of God's eternal purpose. In the third passage where Paul employs this verb, Rom. i. 13, he means his own purpose. The E. V. translates correctly, (hath) set forth, but suggests in the margin, foreordained. This interpretation would not necessarily require, as Meyer asserts, the infinitive εἶναι (quæ esse voluit Deus), comp. προῖδμετο, ἐκτελεσθαι τὸν νόμον, and Rom. vii. 29; James ii. 5. But it is inconsistent with the context; for Paul refers to a fact rather than a purpose, and emphasizes the publicity of the fact; comp. πεφανέρωται, ver. 21, and εἰς ἑνδοξον, ver. 25.—P. S.]

‡ [Kypke quotes Euripides, Iphig. Aul., 1592; but in this passage προῖδμετο means either simply: Diana set forth (the sacrificial animal), or she preferred. See Meyer.—P. S.]

S.]. See also Exod. xxv. 23, and other places. Explanations: 1. Expiatory sacrifice, sin-offering (Sühnopfer).* Some supply θυμῶς [which, however, is unnecessary, ἱλαστήριον being used as a noun]. (So Clericus, Reiche, De Wette, Köllner, Fritzsche [Meyer, Alford, Conybeare and Howson, Jowett, Wordsworth, Hodge, Ewald]). 2. Means of propitiation [Sühnmittel] (Vulgate: propitiatio; Castellio: placamentum; Morus, Usteri, Rückert). ‡ 3. The mercy-seat, or covering of the ark of the covenant [Origen, Theodoret, Theophylact, Augustine], (Erasmus, Luther, Calvin, Forster, Calov., Olshausen, Philippi [Tholuck, Forbes]). Against the first exposition it may be urged: (a.) The expiatory offering is not brought to man on God's part, but man brings it to God by the high-priest (see Philippi). † (b.) The offering is not publicly set forth. (c.) The permanence of the operation of the offering requires another expression, and this is Christ crucified as the permanent atonement itself. This sets aside also the second explanation, which, moreover, is too abstract (Meyer). Arguments in favor of the third explanation: (a.) The Septuagint [uniformly] has translated כַּפֹּרֶת, ἱλαστήριον (Exod. xxv. 18, 19, 20, 21, &c. [twenty-six passages according to Fürst's Hebrew Concordance]). § (b.) In Heb. ix. 5, ἱλαστήριον means the

* [This meaning of ἱλαστήριον does not occur in the LXX., but often in the later Greek writers. See the examples quoted by Meyer in loco, who himself adopts this explanation. Comp. also the analogous terms καθαρισμός and εὐχαριστήριον, thank-offering, καθάρσιον, offering for purification, σωτήριον, sacrificium pro salute (Heiligtum). The sense then is this: God set forth Jesus Christ, in the sight of the intelligent universe, as a propitiatory sacrifice for the sins of the world. The choice lies between this and the third view; the second having no support in the use of language, besides being too abstract. Dr. Lange has made the third interpretation (mercy-seat) more plausible than any other commentator. See below. Comp. also Philippi, p. 105 f., and Forbes, p. 163, for the same view.—P. S.]

† [So also Hofmann, l. c., i. 1, p. 340. He takes ἱλαστήριον to be essentially the same as ἱλασμός in 1 John iv. 10: ἀπέστειλεν τὸν υἱὸν αἰῶνος ἱλασμένον. The E. V. translates both words propitiation. Dr. Morrison, in a monograph on Rom. iii., as I learn from Forbes (p. 166), maintains that ἱλαστήριον is never used substantively in the meaning of propitiatory sacrifice, and concludes for the adjective meaning of "set forth as propitiatory," which, as applied to Christ, would designate Him as the antitypical fulfilment of all the symbols of propitiation.—P. S.]

‡ [Philippi, p. 108, remarks: "The Scripture says, that Christ offered Himself to God as a propitiatory sin-offering, Heb. ix. 14, 28; Eph. v. 2; John xvii. 19, but not, that God offered and exhibited Him to mankind as a sacrifice. The sacrifice is not offered by God, but to God." But there is a difference between God offering His Son, and God setting forth His Son as a sacrifice to the contemplation of the world.—P. S.]

§ [The LXX. uses ἱλαστήριον in no other sense, except in the isolated passage, Ezek. xliii. 14, 17, 30, so that every Jewish Christian reader of the Romans must at once have been reminded of the Cipporeth in the Holy of holies. Dr. Hodge, p. 143, asserts that this use of ἱλαστήριον in the LXX., arose from a mistake of the Hebrew term, which means a cover, and never the mercy-seat. (So also Gesenius, Fritzsche, De Wette, and Bleek, Comm. on Heb. ix. 5, vol. iii., p. 499, note 6.) But כַּפֹּרֶת is not derived from the unusual Kal of the verb כָּפַר (to cover, Gen. vi. 14), but from the Piel כָּפַר, which always means, to forgive, to propitiate, to atone (Lev. xvi. 33; Deut. xxxii. 43; Ezek. xliii. 20, 26, &c.), and is the technical term, in the Mosiac mercy-seat. (c.) This view is sustained by the idea pervading the whole Epistle, of the contrast between the old worship, which was partly heathen and partly only symbolical, and the real New Testament worship. The verb προτίθω [ad spectandum proponere] likewise favors it.* As, according to John i. 14, the δόξα, or Shekinah, openly appeared in the person of Christ from the secrecy of the Holy of holies, and has dwelt among men, so, according to the present passage, is the ἱλαστήριον set forth from the Holy of holies into the publicity of the whole world for believers. See Zech. xiii. 1; the open fountain. (d.) The ἱλαστήριον unites as symbol the different elements of the atonement. As the covering of the ark of the covenant itself, it is the throne of the divine government of the cherubim above, and the preservation of the law, with its requirements, below. But with the sprinkled blood of expiation, it is a sacrifice offered to God, and therefore the satisfaction for the demands of the divine law below. Also Philo called the covering of the ark of the covenant the symbol of the gracious majesty [ἡ δὲ διδραμὴ] of God [Vit. Mos., p. 668; comp. Josephus, Antiq. iii. 8, 5.—P. S.].

Meyer [admits that this interpretation agrees with the usage of the word, especially in the LXX., and gives good sense by representing Christ as the antitypical Capporeth, or mercy-seat; but, nevertheless, he] urges against it the following objections: † (a.) That ἱλαστήριον is without the article. But this would exclude the antitype, the Old Testament ἱλαστήριον. The requisite articulation is here in ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι. [With more reason we might miss ἀλλήθινόν or ἡμῶν. Christ may be called our pascha, or the true pascha, or the true mercy-seat, rather than simply pascha or mercy-seat. Yet this is by no means conclusive.—P. S.] (b.) The name, in its application to Christ, is too abrupt. Answer: Since there must be a place of expiation for every expiatory offering, the conceptions of places and offerings of expiation must have been quite familiar to the readers, not merely to the Jews, but also to the Gentiles, although here the idea is connected with the Old Testament symbol. (c.) If Christ should be conceived as Capporeth, then the εἰς ritual, for the object and intent of sacrifice. If the word were formed from the Kal, it would be כַּסֵּף. "The golden lid was called כַּסֵּף, not because it covered the open ark, but because it subserved the act of expiation which was here performed" (Bähr, Symbolik des Mos. Cultus, i., p. 381). The Capporeth was the centre of the presence and revelation of God, and His glory dwelt over it between the two cherubim which overshadowed the ark, and represented the creation. Hence the Holy of holies was called קֹדֶשׁ הַקֳּדָשִׁים (1 Ohron. xxviii. 11). The Pe-shito and Vulgate (propitiatorium) have followed the LXX. Comp. also Tholuck, Rom., 5th ed., p. 157, note; and Ewald, Altera, p. 165. But Ewald and Meyer derive כַּסֵּף from כָּסַף in the sense of scabere, to rub off, to forgive; against which Tholuck protests in favor of the usual derivation from כַּסֵּף. Ewald (l. c., p. 165, 3d ed. of 1866) maintains that Capporeth cannot mean the plain cover, as if the ark had no other, but a second cover or a separate settle (the footstool of Jehovah), which was even more important than the ark itself, and is so described, Ezek. xxv. 17-31; xxvi. 24, &c. He derives it from כַּסֵּף, as scammum, or scabellum from scabere, and refers to כָּסַף, 2 Ohron. ix. 18, and to an Ethiopic verb.—P. S.]

* [Wordsworth, on the contrary, urges προτίθω as an argument against this interpretation, since the mercy-seat was not set forth, but concealed from the people and even from the priests. But this has no force.—P. S.]

ἐνδεδεῖται τῆς δικαιοσύνης αὐτοῦ would be improper, since the Capporeth must much rather appear as ἐνδεδεῖται of divine grace. This objection rests simply on a defective understanding of the Pauline idea of righteousness (see above). According to Paul, righteousness is not merely condemnatory and putting to death, but, in its perfect revelation, also delivering and quickening. Grace itself is called, on one side, righteousness, on the other, love. (d.) The conception of Christ as the antitype of the mercy-seat nowhere returns in the whole New Testament. Answer: Likewise the types of Christ as the antitype of the brazen serpent (John iii. 14), and Christ as the curse-offering (Gal. iii. 13), and others, only occur once. (e.) It has also been objected [but not by Meyer], that the image does not suit, because the covering of the ark and the sprinkling of the blood were two different things. [Hodge: "It is common to speak of the blood of a sacrifice, but not of the blood of the mercy-seat." In reply to this, even Meyer observes: Christ is both sacrifice and high-priest.—On the ignorantly contemptuous manner in which Rückert and Fritzsche criticise the proper explanation, see Tholuck. [Fritzsche dismisses this interpretation with a frivolous "valeat absurda explicatio."—P. S.]

Through faith in his blood [διὰ πίστεως, ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι]. Different interpretations: 1. By faith on His blood (ἐν instead of εἰς; Luther, Calvin, Beza, Olshausen [Tholuck, Hodge], and others). Although the language will permit this view, the thought is not only obscure, but incorrect, that God, by faith on the blood of Christ, should have made Christ himself the throne of grace for humanity. Faith, in this sense, is a consequens, but not an antecedens, of the established propitiation. 2. The same objection holds good against the construction of Meyer, and others, by which both clauses, διὰ τῆς πίστεως and ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι, should refer coordinately to προτίθω; namely, so that faith would be the subjective condition, and the blood of Christ the objective means of the setting forth of Christ as the expiatory offering.* An objective condition should precede the subjective one, and the propitiation exists before faith, in the sense of the New Testament idea of salvation. Faith is therefore the completed faithfulness of Christ (see ver. 22), which, in the blood of His sacrificial death, has become the eternal spiritual manifestation and power for the world. [As in ver. 22, I beg leave here to differ from this unusual interpretation of πίστις, and understand this, with other commentators, more naturally of our faith in Christ; comp. τὸν ἐκ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ at the close of ver. 26. If it meant the faithfulness of Christ, the Apostle would probably have added αὐτοῦ, as he did before αἵματι. It is better to separate the two classes by a comma after "faith."—The blood of Christ means His holy life offered to God as an expiatory sacrifice for the sins of the world. It is like a healing fountain send-

* [Meyer, in the third and fourth editions, connects διὰ τῆς πίστεως with ἱλαστήριον, and ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι only with προτίθω: God set forth Christ in His blood (l. c., by causing Him to shed His blood, in which lies the power of the atonement) as a sin-offering, which is effective through faith. De Wette connects both διὰ πίστεως and ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι alike with προτίθω ἱλαστήριον, the former expressing the means of the subjective appropriation (das subjective Aneignungsmittel), the latter the means of the objective exhibition (das objective Darstellungsmittel) of Christ as a propitiatory sacrifice. For the demonstration of his righteousness [εἰς ἐνδειξὴν τῆς δικαιοσύνης αὐτοῦ]. In order to perfectly reveal and establish it. The divergent interpretations of the word δικαιοσύνη indicate how difficult it has been for theology to regard God's righteousness as grace which produces righteousness. Truthfulness [contrary to the meaning of δικαιοσύνη], (Ambrose, Beza [Turretin, Hammond], and others); goodness (Theodoret, Grotius [Koppe, Reiche, Tittmann], and others); holiness (Neander, Fritzsche [Lipsius]); judicial righteousness (Meyer* [De Wette, Tholuck, Philippi, Alford, Wordsworth, Hodge]); justifying, or sin-forgiving righteousness (Chrysostom, Augustine, and others); the righteousness which God gives [which would be a superfluous repetition of ver. 21, and inconsistent with ver. 26.] (Luther, and others); [Stuart, and others: God's method of justification, which δικαιοσύνη never means.—P. S.]. It is rather the righteousness of God in the fulness of its revelation, as it proceeds from God, requires and accomplishes through Christ the expiation of the law, and institutes the righteousness of faith by justification as the principle of the righteousness of the new life.† For the righteousness of God, like His truth, omnipotence, and love, forms an unbroken and direct beam from His heart, until it appears in renewed humanity.

Because of (or, on account of) the pre-emption (passing over), [i. e., because He had allowed the sins of the race which were committed before Christ's death to pass by unpunished, whereby His righteousness was obscured, and hence the need of a demonstration or manifestation in the atoning sacrifice, that fully justified the demands of righteousness, and at the same time effected a complete remission of sins, and justification of the sinner.—P. S.]. The πάρεσις must not be confounded with the ἄφεσις, as Cocceius has proved in a special treatise, De utilitate distinctionis inter πάρεσιν et ἄφεσιν (Opp. t. vii.). [Comp. Textual Note*.] The judicial government of God was not administered in the ante-Christian period, either by the sacrificial fire of the Israelitish theocracy, or by the manifestations of wrath to the old world, both Jews and Gentiles, as a perfect and general judgment. Notwithstanding all the relative punishments and propitiations, God allowed sin, in its full measure, especially in its inward character, to pass unpunished in the preliminary stages of expiation and judgment, until the day of the completed revelation of His righteousness. For this reason, the time of the πάρεσις is denoted as the time of the ἀνοχή. God permitted the Gentiles to walk in their own ways (Ps. lxxi. 12; cxlvii. 20; Acts xiv. 16); He overlooked, or winked at, the times of this ignorance (Acts xvii. 30). But among the Jews, one of the two goats which was let loose in the wilderness on the great day of atonement, represented symbolically the πάρεσις (Lev. xvi. 10). This is not only a transcendent fact, but one that is also immanent in the world. The fact that the administrators of the theocracy, in connection with the Gentile world, have crucified Christ, proves the inability of the theocracy to afford a fundamental relief of the world from guilt.*—Of sins previously committed. The sins of the whole world are meant, but as an aggregate of individual sins; because righteousness does not punish sin until it has become manifest and mature in actual individual sins. [Comp. the similar expression, Heb. ix. 15: εἰς ἀπολύτρωσιν τῶν ἐπὶ τῇ πρώτῃ διαθήκῃ πασθαισάντων. This parallel passage, as well as the words ἐν τῷ νῦν καιρῷ, in ver. 26, plainly show that the προηγμένα ἁμαρτήματα are not the sins of each man which precede his conversion (Calov., Mehring, and others), but the sins of all men before the advent, or, more correctly speaking, before the atoning death of Christ. Comp. also Acts xv. 30: τοῖς χρόνοις τῆς ἀγορίας ὑπερδῶν ὁ θεός. Philippi confines the expression to the sins of the Jewish people, in strict conformity to Heb. ix. 15; but here the Apostle had just proven the universal sinfulness and guilt, and now speaks of the universal redemption of Christ.—P. S.]

Vers. 25, 26. Under the forbearance of God for the demonstration [Unter der Geduld Gottes zu der Erweisung, ἐν τῇ ἀνοχῇ τοῦ θεοῦ, &c.]. Construction: 1. Œcumenius, Luther [Rückert, Ewald, Hodge], and others, refer the ἀνοχή to προηγμένων [i. e., committed during the forbearance of God; comp. Acts xvii. 20. This gives good sense, but would require, as Meyer says, a different position of the words, viz., τῶν ἁμαρτ. τῶν προηγμ. ἐν τῇ ἀν. τ. θ.—P. S.]. 2. Meyer refers the forbearance to πάρεσις, in consequence of indulgence or toleration, as the ground of the passing over. [So also Philippi]. 3. Reiche: εἰς ἐνδειξὴν τῆς δικαιοσύνης; the δικαιοσ. having been manifested partly in the forgiveness of sins, and

* [Meyer, p. 146 (4th ed.): "In the strict sense, the judicial (more particularly the punitive) righteousness, which demanded a holy satisfaction, and secured it in the atoning sacrifice of Christ." De Wette (and, after him, Alford): "This idea alone suits the δικαιοσύνη, which is likewise judicial. A sin-offering excites, on the one hand, the feeling of guilt, and is expiation; on the other, it produces pardon and peace; and thus Christ's death is not only a proof of God's grace, but also of His judicial righteousness, which requires punishment and expiation (2 Cor. v. 21). Here is a foundation for the Anselmic theory of satisfaction, but not for its grossly anthropopathic execution."—P. S.]

† [Forbes, p. 168: "God's judicial righteousness in both its aspects, of sin-condemning and sin-forgiving righteousness."—P. S.]

* [Dr. Hodge, from fear of Romanising inferences, takes πάρεσις in the sense of ἄφεσις, and adopts the false translation of the Vulgate propter remissionem, "because God had overlooked or pardoned sin from the beginning." . . . "To say God did not punish sins under the Old Dispensation, is only a different way of saying that He pardoned them. So, 'not to impute iniquity,' is the negative statement of justification." Comp. against this, Textual Note*. Hodge goes on to say (p. 150): "This passage is one of the few which the Romanists quote in support of their doctrine that there was no real pardon, justification, or salvation before the advent of Christ. The ancient believers, at death, according to their doctrine, did not pass into heaven, but into the limbus patrum, where they continued in a semi-conscious state until Christ's descensus ad inferos for their deliverance. The modern transcendental theologians of Germany, who approach Romanism in so many other points [?], agree with the Papists also here. Thus Olshausen says, 'Under the Old Testament there was no real, but only a symbolical forgiveness of sins.' Our Lord, however, speaks of Abraham as in heaven; and the Psalms are filled with petitions and thanksgiving for God's pardoning mercy." But how will Dr. Hodge on his theory explain the Old Testament doctrine of Sheol or Hades before Christ's resurrection, and such passages as Heb. ix. 15; xi. 39, 40; Acts xiii. 36, which likewise plainly teach the incompleteness of the Old Testament salvation before the advent of Christ? There certainly can be no remission of sin without the sacrifice of Christ; and whatever remission there was under the Old Dispensation, was granted and enjoyed only by reason of the retrospective efficacy, and in trustful anticipation of that sacrifice. But anticipation falls far short of the actual reality. Tholuck calls the atonement of Christ not unaptly "the Divine theodicy for the past history of the world."—P. S.]

partly in the delay of punishment. [This implies a wrong view of διὰ and δικαίωσις; Meyer.—P. S.] 4. We connect the ἀνοχή with the following πρὸς τὴν ἰδούειν (ver. 26) into one idea,* and suppose here a brief form of expression, by which προηγνομένων must be again supplied before ἀνοχή. The πάρεσις must by all means be connected with the ἀνοχή; but it is not operative by virtue of this alone. The ἀνοχή denotes the old time as the period of God's prevailing forbearance, to the end that He may reveal His perfect righteousness in the future decisive time. The πάρεσις, on the contrary, appeared at that time as the supplement of the propitiatory and retributive judgments which had already commenced as preliminaries. For this reason, the εἰς ἰδούειν (ver. 26) is not the same as πρὸς τὴν ἰδούειν (ver. 26). The first ἰνδούειν, as the judicial righteousness revealing itself in the blood of Christ, has supplemented the πάρεσις. The second ἰνδούειν is the purpose of the ἀνοχή, the fully accomplished ἰνδούειν, which branches off in penal righteousness, and in justifying righteousness to him who "is of the faith of Jesus, and draws faith from His fountain of faith." The εἰς should therefore not be confounded with the πρὸς (Meyer).†

Ver. 26. [At this present time, ἐν τῷ νῦν καιρῷ, not opposed to ἐν τῇ ἀνοχῇ (Bengel, Hodge), but rather to πρὸς in προηγνομένων, and added emphatically. The time of Christ is a time of critical decision, when the πάρεσις is at an end, and man must either accept the full remission (ἁρτίσις) of sin, or expose himself to the judgment of a righteous God.—P. S.]—That He may be just and the justifier, &c. [εἰς τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸν δίκαιον καὶ δικαιοῦντα τὸν ἐκ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ. The εἰς expresses not merely the result, but the design of God in exhibiting Christ to the world as the mercy-seat.—P. S.] We emphasize αὐτὸν, one and the same (ein und derselbe).‡ That He may be—that is, that He may plainly appear [and be recognized by men in this twofold character as the Just One and the Justifier of the sinner]. The righteousness of God in the death of Christ has fully revealed that which the human view of the early and later times found so difficult to grasp; namely, righteousness and forbearance or love in one spirit, condemnation and deliverance in one act, killing and giving new life in one operation.

[Bengel: "Summum hic habetur paradoxon evangelicum; nam in lege conspicitur Deus justus et condemnans, in evangelio justus ipse et justificans peccatorem." This apparent contradiction is solved, objectively, in the love of God, which is the beginning and the end of his ways; and, subjectively, in faith (τὸν ἐκ πίστεως), by which the sinner becomes one with Christ. In the death of Christ, God punished sin and saved the sinner, and Divine justice was vindicated in the fullest display and triumph of redeeming love. Not that the Father poured the vials of His wrath upon His innocent and beloved Son (as the doctrine is sometimes caricatured), but the Son voluntarily, in infinite love, and by the eternal counsel and with the consent of the holy and merciful Father, assumed the whole curse of sin, and, as the representative head of the human family, in its stead and for its benefit, He fully satisfied the demands of Divine justice by His perfect, active and passive obedience. His sacrifice, as the sacrifice of the eternal Son of God in union with human nature, without sin is of infinite value both as to extent and duration while the Old Testament sacrifices were merely anticipatory, preparatory, and temporary. Justification is here represented as the immediate effect of Christ's atoning death. On δικαίωσις, comp. the Ezeg. Notes on ver. 24, and also Doctrinal, below, No. 5. Wordsworth has a long note here on the doctrine of justification. He likewise maintains that δικαίωσις (and ῥᾳσῆ) in the LXX. and in the New Testament means, not to make righteous, but to account and declare righteous, and to regard and treat as such, in opposition to condemning and pronouncing guilty. But he insists also, that we are actually made righteous by our union with Christ, and that God's righteousness is not only imputed, but also imparted to us in Him who is "the Lord our Righteousness." This work of infusion of grace, however, is not properly called justification, but sanctification. Comp. vi. 22: "Being freed from sin, and made servants unto God—i. e., being justified—ye have your fruit unto holiness"—this is sanctification.—P. S.]

SECOND PARAGRAPH (VERB. 27-81).

Ver. 27. Where, then, is the boasting? This announces the great conclusion from the foregoing. The lively expression of the paragraph arises from the triumphant confidence of the Apostle. [Bengel: ποῦ, particula victoriosa.] The καύχησις [gloriation] is certainly not the same as καίχημα [gloriant material], subject of boasting (Reiche); but yet it is not exactly bragging (Meyer), since in many persons boasting of the law arose from dogmatic error. Jewish boasting is especially meant here,* but not exclusively, for the general conclusion is here drawn in reference to the righteousness of the Jews and Gentiles (see ver. 19). With the negation of the καίχησις, the καύχημα is also denied at the same time.—It is excluded. Perhaps the expression is here chosen with reference to the limits of the court of justice. The law excludes unqualified plaintiffs and defendants.—By what law? (By the law) of works? Since the Mosaic law was a law of works in form only, and not in spirit (see chap. vii. 7), the question presupposes that there is no such law of works; the spirit of the law is the law of faith. But the meaning of the question itself is: the law, as such, erroneously made a mere law of works, is too imperfectly developed in its operation to exclude boasting (see

* [Hence Dr. Lange, in his translation, makes a period after ἀπαργάσω. I prefer the construction of Meyer and Philippi as being more natural. The ἀνοχή must not be confounded with χάρις: the former suspends and puts off the judgment by πάρεσις, the latter abolishes the guilt of sin by ἀφεσις.—P. S.]

† [Meyer: "πρὸς τὴν ἰδούειν, Wiederaufnahme des εἰς ἰδούειν, ver. 25, und zwar ohne 24, ver. 22, wobei εἰς mit dem gleichbedeutenden πρὸς abschließend verbunden ist, der Artikel aber der Vorstellung der bestimmten, geschichtlich gegebenen ἰδούειν dient, was dem Fortschritte der Darstellung entspricht." So also Tholuck and Philippi. The latter commentator explains the exchange of πρὸς for εἰς from euphony, to avoid the threefold repetition of εἰς (εἰς ἰδούειν, 25; εἰς τὸ εἶναι, ver. 26.)—P. S.]

‡ [Meyer takes αὐτὸς simply as the pronoun of the third person. It evidently belongs both to δικαιῶν and δικαιοῦντα.—P. S.]

* [Hence the article 4, which seems to refer to the καίχησις already spoken of in chap. ii. 17; iii. 19, comp. below, ver. 29. So Chrysostom, Theodoret (τὸ ὑπερβῆναι τὴν ἰουδαίων φρόνημα), Bengel, Rückert, Tholuck, Philippi, Meyer, Alford; while Fritzsche, Hodge, and others, take it in a general sense of the boasting of the sinner before God; which, of course, includes the boasting of the Jews over the Gentiles.—P. S.]

Matt. xix. 20.—By the law of faith. According to Meyer, the Apostle speaks of the law of faith because the gospel prescribes faith as the condition of salvation. According to Tholuck and De Wette, the word νόμος has here the idea of a religious rule (norma).^{*} But, according to ver. 31, the Apostle will completely establish the same law, for the making void of which the Jew charged him. The same revealed law which, in its analytical character—that is, in its single commandments—bears the appearance of a law of single works, is, in its syncretical character, recognized as one, a law of faith (Deut. vi. 4, 5; Mark xii. 29; James ii. 10); because, as our schoolmaster to lead us to Christ, it leads to faith, and in Him first comes to man as the objective principle of faith, and then, as the subjective principle of faith, it becomes the law of the new life. [With νόμος πίστεως, comp. ἰπτακοή πίστεως, i. 5; νόμος τοῦ πνεύματος τῆς ζωῆς, viii. 2; ἔργον Χριστοῦ, 1 Cor. ix. 21; νόμος τέλειος τῆς ἐλευθερίας, James i. 25; ii. 12—all going to show that the liberty of the gospel has nothing to do with license and antinomianism.—P. S.]

Ver. 28. Therefore [For] we judge. λογιζόμεθα [consequens, comp. ii. 8; viii. 18; 2 Cor. xi. 5], is not, we infer, nor merely, we think, reckon (Tholuck [Alford, Hodge]), which, with the reading γὰρ, would not even make good sense. The expression, “For we think,” would be an odd method of demonstration. It is not the subjective fact of justification which establishes the objective economy of salvation already described; but it is this objective economy which, on the one hand, excludes false justification, namely, that which is by works; and, on the other hand, establishes real justification, that which is by faith. We must consider also that the Apostle lays down the statement of ver. 28 as the principal proposition to the entire following argument, but will not apply it as proof for the negative statement, that man is not justified by works.—By faith [πίστις = διὰ πίστεως, instrumental cause]. Luther’s addition of alone [durch den Glauben ALLEIN] is defended by Tholuck (the Nuremberg edition of the Bible of 1483 also reads, only by faith). Meyer properly remarks: It does not belong to the translation, but it is justified by the context as an explanation.†—Without works of the law. This naturally refers to δικαιώσθαι, but not to faith. In the process of justification, the works of the law do not come into coöperation. [Hodge: “To be justified without works, is to be justified without anything in ourselves to merit justification. The works of the law must be the works of the moral law, because the proposition is general, embracing Gentiles as well as Jews. . . . The Apostle excludes every thing subjective. He places the ground of justification out of ourselves.” Yet faith is something subjective, by which the objective ground of justification is personally appropriated, and made available for our benefit.—P. S.]

Ver. 29. Or is he the God of the Jews only? [Or, in case that what was said in ver. 28 should be called in doubt. Vers. 28, 30 furnish an additional striking proof. Ver. 29; Meyer.—P. S.] εἶναι τινος, to belong to some one. The Rabbinical, and subsequently the Talmudic Jews, certainly assumed that God was merely the God of the Jews (see Tholuck, p. 162. Meyer refers to Eisenmenger’s Entdecktes Judenthum, i. p. 587).—Paul can declare, without further proof: Yes, of the Gentiles also. The Apostle does not have here in mind chiefly the utterances of the prophets, as Tholuck supposes, but the same fact of Christian experience to which Peter refers, Acts x. 46 ff.; xv. 9; and to which he himself refers in Gal. iii. 5. The Old Testament witnesses were explained and confirmed by the fact of the salvation of the Gentiles by faith, by which fact also his apostleship to the Gentiles was first completely sealed (see 1 Cor. ix. 2). [God is not a national, but a universal God, and offers salvation to Gentiles and Jews on precisely the same terms. Hodge: “These sublime truths are so familiar to our minds, that they have, in a measure, lost their power; but as to the Jew, enthralled all his life in his narrow national and religious prejudices, they must have expanded his whole soul with unwonted emotions of wonder, gratitude, and joy.”—P. S.]

Ver. 30. Seeing it is one God. The ἐνότης, since [alldieueil, introducing something that cannot be doubted]. According to Meyer, the weight with the verb, not with verbo. The Bible never says: “faith justifies,” but, “we are justified by faith (πίστις),” because faith comes into view here simply as a means, or as the ὄργανον ἀπαιτούμενον which apprehends and appropriates Christ; and hence it is by faith, without the coöperation of works, that we are justified. But faith is nevertheless the fruitful source of all good works. “Fides sola justificat, ad nec est, nec manet sola: intrinsecus operator et extrinsecus.” The more full and correct formula would be: Gratia sola justificatur per fidem quam Christus iustitiam apprehendit et per caritatem operator (verbo et ἔργοις ἀπαιτούμενοι), or salvation by grace alone as apprehended by a living faith. Justifying faith purifies the heart, overcomes the world, and abounds in fruits of righteousness. It is impossible true to believe in Christ, without partaking of the power of His holy life. Wordsworth, in loc. hits the point, when he says: “Though it is by faith we are justified, and by faith only, yet not by such a faith as has no works springing out of it. Every such faith is a dead faith. And yet it is not from the works that spring out of faith, but from the faith which is the root of works, that all are justified.” In other words, it is not by faith as an active or working, but by faith as a receptive or appropriating principle, by which we are justified; yet that which faith receives is a power of life which must at once manifest itself in good works. It is but just to Luther to add, that he taught most clearly and forcibly this inseparable connection between faith and works. I shall quote but one passage from his admirable preface to the Epistle to the Romans: “O es ist ein lebendig, geschäftig, thätig, mächtig Ding um den Glauben, dass er unmöglich ist, dass er nicht ohne Unterlass sollte Werke wirken. Er fragt auch nicht, ob gute Werke zu ihm sind, sondern er man fragt, hat er sie gethan, und ist immer im Thun. . . . Also dass unmöglich ist, Wer vom Glauben zu scheiden; ja, so unmöglich, als brennen und leuchten vom Feuer mag geschieden werden.” Comp. p. 140. No. 9.—P. S.]

^{*} [So also Alford and Hodge: “νόμος is not used here in its ordinary sense.” The general idea, however, of a rule of action is retained.”—P. S.]

† [This is very true. Luther’s allein is correct in substance, and appropriate as a gloss or in a paraphrase, but has no business in the text. It is a logical inference from the context, and is equivalent to the deus in the parallel passage, Gal. ii. 16. The Latin Vulgate had taken the same liberty; it is true, in other cases; and, in this very verse, Luther’s insertion can be justified by Catholic versions, viz., the oldest German Catholic Bible of Nuremberg (published 1483, the year of Luther’s birth), which reads: nur durch den Gl., and two Italian versions (of Genoa, 1476, and Venice, 1538, per la sola fide). Even Erasmus defended Luther in this case, and said: “Vix sola tot clamoribus lapidata hoc sæculo in Lutherum, reverenter in Patribus (!) auditur.” Comp. Wolf, Koppe, Tholuck, and Philippi in loco. Nevertheless, the insertion of the “sola” in the translation was unnecessary and unwise, and, in the eyes of Romanists, it gave some plausibility to the unjust charge of falsifying the Scriptures. It brought Paul into direct verbal (though no real) conflict with James, when he says that by “works man is justified, and not by faith only” (et sic in virtute morum, ii. 24). The dogmatic formula, sola fide (hence the term solifidianism), has become a watchword of evangelical Protestantism, and, rightly understood—i. e., in the sense of gratia sola—it expresses a most precious truth, which can never be sacrificed. But it must not be confounded with fide solitaria, a faith that is and remains alone. The χαρις ἔργον ἐκείνου must be connected of the proof rests on the unity of God, Monotheism; but the context puts the weight upon the fact that the justification of the Jews and Gentiles as one divine fact—which therefore appears to be divided into two parts—must be traced to one and the same God.—The future δικαιοσύνη is certainly not used for the present δικαιοῦν [Grotius [more Hebraeorum], and others], still less does it refer to the universal judgment (Beza, Fritzsche); but it assumes the experience that Jews and Gentiles are already justified, in order to give prominence to the future established by it; namely, that Jews and Gentiles will be justified. [The future (= prospiciens futurabile) expresses the permanent purpose and continued power of justification in every case that may occur; comp. the future in ver. 20 and v. 19. Erasmus: "Respectit ad eos qui adhuc essent in Iudaismo seu paganismo."—P. S.]—Circumcision by faith. It is remarkable that there is not only a change of the prepositions ἐκ and διὰ, but also that the article stands with the latter, but not with the former. Meyer regards the change of prepositions, as well as the disappearance of the article from ἐκ, as a matter of indifference.* Calvin observes in the change of the prepositions ἐκ and διὰ a certain irony: "Si quis vult habere differentiam gentilis a Judæo, hanc habeat, quod ille PER fidem, hic vero EX fide iustitiam consequitur" (from Tholuck, p. 162). Meyer properly regards this explanation as strange. But indifference as to the form of expression would be equally strange. There seems in reality to be a double form of breviloquence here: He will justify the circumcision (which is a circumcision by faith) by faith; for the real Jew has already a germinating faith; and He will justify the uncircumcision (that which through faith has become circumcision) through the faith. Or, more briefly: To the genuine Jew, saving faith, as to its germ, is something already at hand, and justification arises from the completion of the same, just as the fruit from the tree. But to the Gentile, faith is offered as a foreign means of salvation.†

Ver. 31. Do we then make void the law? The question here arises, whether ver. 31 constitutes the conclusion of the preceding train of thought, or whether it opens the new train of thought which begins with chap. iv. 1, and extends throughout the chapter. The former acception has prevailed since Augustine as the preferable one (Beza, Melancthon, Tholuck, Philippi [Hodge]); the latter (conform-ably to Theodoret, Pelagius) has been maintained by Semler, and others, and by De Wette and Meyer. According to Meyer, the Apostle, from chap. iii. 31 to iv. 25, proves the harmony of the doctrine of justification by faith with the law, by what has been said in the law about Abraham's justification. Meyer urges against the former view, that then this very important sentence appears merely as an abrupt categorical assertion; and Philippi's reply, that chap. viii. 1 continues it further, certainly does not relieve the matter. But Tholuck justly remarks against the second view, that then a γὰρ, instead of οὖν, would be naturally expected in chap. iv. 1. [Besides, the main object of Paul here is to show the true method of justification, and not the agreement of the law and the gospel.—P. S.] This much is clear: that ver. 31 constitutes the transition to chap. iv. But, in itself, it serves as the conclusion of the paragraph from vers. 27-30, in that it brings out the relation of the experimental fact that there are believing Gentiles—to the law. Paul had shown that the justification of the Gentiles, with the justification of the Jews, is to be traced back to one and the same God. By this means, he says, the law is not made void, but established. How far established? The answer is furnished by the preceding verses: As far as the unity of God, which underlies the law, is glorified by the harmony of His saving operations among Jews and Gentiles. Particularism weakens the law, because it makes the law the statute of a national God. The universal Monotheism of Christianity, proved by the universal justification of believers, first properly establishes the law in its true character, by making plain the universal character of the lawgiver.—The sentiment, Do we then make void the law? is sufficiently repelled by the emotional expression, μή γένοιτο, Far be it! by no means! But the opposite sentiment, We establish the law, has been already proved by the fact that the law is defined as the law of faith, and has been traced back to the God of the Jews and Gentiles. This is indeed extended further in what follows, yet not in the form of a continued proof, but in the form of a new scriptural argument. The question, How far does Paul, or Christianity establish the law? has been variously answered; see Tholuck, p. 168. Chrysostom, and others, say, that the salvation in Christ is the end of the law. Most expositors hold that the law is fulfilled by the new obedience, chap. vi. and viii. 4 [by love, which is called "the fulfilment of the law;"] xiii. 10. Augustine, Luther, Calvin, Beza, Calov, Philippi.—P. S.] Tholuck thinks that the testimony of the νόμος and the προφήται is meant. But this is not a new ιστάται; nor would the continuation in chap. iv. be a new ιστάται from this point of view; it is only a new proof for the righteousness by faith: the proof from Scripture. The Apostle glorifies and establishes the law on a new and broader foundation, by representing it as a unit, by tracing it to its principle of life, and enlarging its contents from the Jewish particularism to the universality of the revelation of the living God of all men. Thus the Mosaic law, as the type of the Mosaic religion, is glorified so far as it is the representative of all the legal elements of religion in general.*

* (So also Hodge, since Paul uses both forms indiscriminately; ἐκ, in i. 17; iii. 20; iv. 16; and διὰ, in iii. 22, 25; Gal. ii. 16, and sometimes first the one and then the other, in the same connection. Comp. the English prepositions by and through. According to De Wette and Alford, ἐκ νόμων, by faith, expresses the objective ground; διὰ τῶν νόμων, through his (their) faith, the subjective medium of justification. Jowett connects ἐκ νόμων with ἐπαγγελίᾳ, the circumcision which is by faith, and thereby destroys the correspondence to the other member. Green (Gr., p. 300, as quoted by Alford) refers διὰ τῶν νόμων to νόμων just mentioned, by the instrumentality of the identical faith which operates in the case of the circumcised. Bengel: "Judei pridem in fide fuerant; gentiles Adem ab illis recens nati erant."—P. S.]

† (Very similar is the interpretation of Wordsworth: The Jews, or children of Abraham, are justified out of or from (ἐκ) the faith which Abraham their father had, and which they are supposed to have in him, being already in the covenant with God in Christ. The Gentiles, of ἑσέ, must enter that door of the faith of Abraham, and pass through it (διὰ), in order to be justified. There is but one Church from the beginning. Abraham and ἑσέ are seed in the household of faith in Christ, but they must live and act from its spirit; the heathen must enter the house through the door of that faith in Him.—P. S.)

* [Comp. a long note of Wordsworth in loc., who assigns no less than twelve reasons for the assertion of ver. 21, viz., because the doctrine of justification is grounded on the testimony of the law that all are under sin; because the sacrifice of Christ was pre-announced by the passover, and other sacri-

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

FIRST PARAGRAPH (VERB. 21-26).

1. As the Old Testament, according to ver. 21, has testified of the righteousness of faith contained in the New Testament, so does the New Testament—as the perfect revelation of God's righteousness—bear witness to the holiness of the law in the Old Testament.

2. It is a defective and inorganic view to believe that, as far as the single attributes of God are concerned, in the New Testament His justice is less prominent than in the Old, in order that His love may appear more prominent. On the contrary, the revelation of His justice is first completed in the New Testament. It is here completed so grandly, that, in proportion to this completion, the Old Testament revelation of justice may be regarded as still veiled. The same may be said of all the Divine attributes. In the New Testament they have a killing and a vivifying—i. e., creative effect. The justice in union with love is grace. In the Old Testament, however, justice appears mainly in its punitive aspect.

3. On the double form and kind of faith, see the Exeg. Notes on ver. 22.

4. Also on the δόξα Θεοῦ, see Exeg. Notes on ver. 23. As the δικαιοσύνη is the internal part of the Divine δόξα, so is the want of δόξα on man's part the evidence of his want of δικαιοσύνη. The same connection is likewise exhibited in the life of faith. The δοξάζεσθαι arises from the δικαιοῦσθαι (chap. viii. 30).

5. The doctrine of justification. On the δικαιοσύνη, see chap. ii. 13, and the section relating thereto. On the fact that it is under the δικαιοῦσθαι that man's utter want of personal righteousness first becomes prominent, see the Exeg. Notes on ver. 21. The evangelical definition per fidem is opposed to the Roman Catholic definition propter fidem. The form propter fidem has a double sense. If faith is understood as merit, the order of the work of salvation is reversed, and its causality is transferred to man. It is very clear from the present tense δικαιοῦσθαι (ver. 28), that the Apostle distinguishes here, and throughout, between redemption and justification. Christ is, indeed, effectively the righteousness of believers, and virtually the righteousness of humanity, and so far could the redemption be once loosely denominated justification. Yet the Apostle's usage of language is far above this indefiniteness, and chap. viii. 30 proves conclusively (comp. chap. v. 18) that he regards justification as a part of the fices of the law; because the law reveals God as a just Judge, who needs an adequate propitiation for sin; because the death of Christ is such a propitiation; because Christ has, by His perfect obedience to the law, established its dignity; because justification by faith obliges men to new degrees of love and gratitude to God, &c., &c. But these are all subordinate points.—In one sense the law is abolished, as a type and shadow of things to come; as a killing letter, with its curse; comp. Eph. ii. 25; Gal. iii. 13; but as to its moral contents, as the expression of the holy will of God, as a rule of conduct, it was perfectly fulfilled by Christ, and is constantly fulfilled by every believer in love to God and love to our neighbor. The decalogue is a national code in form, a universal code in spirit and aim. This applies to all the Ten Commandments, from which we cannot take out one (say the second, or the fourth) without marring the beauty, harmony, and completeness of the whole. Christ has settled that question in His interpretation of the law, by the fundamental principle of the magna charta of the kingdom of heaven, as laid down Matt. v. 17 ff.—P. S.]

plan of salvation. The connection between the δικαίωμα—which grace effects in every believer after the κλήσις—and the ἵλασμός, consists in this: that Christ, as the perfect δικαίωμα, is, by the gospel, offered to men, that He is set forth as ἵλαστήριον. (Lipsius, in a monograph entitled The Pauline Doctrine of Justification, 1853, holds that the δικαιοσύνη is the condition of righteousness, and that every one is δικαίος who is just what his destination requires he should be. The author's conclusion is, that Paul, in no single passage, compels us to divide the divine operation—the result of which is the (preliminary) human δικαιοσύνη—into two distinct and separate acts, the actus efficiens and the actus declaratorius, in such a manner that the latter only may be called δικαιοῦν.)—The way for the Protestant doctrine of justification was prepared by the sound productions of the mysticism of the Middle Ages; for example, in "German Theology."* This book contrasts selfdom, or egoism, with entire self-surrender to God and His will, and thereby indicates the deepest ground for the sinner's justification by faith. Justification, as the appropriation of Christ's δικαίωμα, makes the gospel, through the power of the Holy Ghost, an individual and special absolution from the guilt of sin, which the believer experiences in peace of conscience and freedom. It makes the objective δικαίωμα in Christ his subjective δικαιοσύνη. Justification is essentially a pronouncing righteous, but by the creative declaration of God; therefore it is also a making righteous, in the sense that it is the communication of a new principle of life, yet in such a way that this new principle of life must ever be regarded as the pure effect of Christ, and not in any way as the cause of justification. The one gracious act of justification is divided into two acts: 1. The offer of the δικαίωμα for faith until faith is awakened by free grace; 2. Accounting faith as righteousness. The effects of justification are, negatively, liberation from the guilt, the curse, and punishment of sin; and, positively, adoption or sonship, by which the believer's filial relation—that is, the decision of his individual regeneration, and his translation into the state of peace—is pronounced. In the old Protestant theology, justification has been variously confounded too much with the redemption itself; while in our day, as was already the case with Osiander [died 1552], it has often been far too much identified with sanctification.

[Additional remarks on the doctrine of justification by faith, or rather by free grace through faith in Christ.

(a.) Its importance and position in the theological system. It belongs to soteriology, the appropriation of the salvation of Christ to the sinner. It presupposes the fundamental truths of the Trinity, the incarnation, total depravity, the atonement, all of which were revealed before, as the Gospels and Acts precede the Epistles. It is therefore not, strictly speaking, the articulus stantis et cadentis ecclesiae (Luther), but subordinate to the article of Christ, who alone can be called the one foundation and rock of the whole Christian system (1 Cor. iii. 11). The doctrine that

* [The Deutsche Theologie, or Theologia Germanica, is the work of an unknown author of the fifteenth century and was edited by Dr. Luther with a highly commendatory preface in 1516, one year before the commencement of the Reformation. Recent editions by Pfeiffer, 1855, and Reiserath, 1863. There is also an English translation by Susanna Winkworth, with introductions by Bunce and Kingsley, London, 1855, reprinted at Andover, 1856.—P. S.]

Christ is the Son of God, and came into the flesh—i. e., was born, died, and rose again, to save sinners—is emphatically “the mystery of godliness” (1 Tim. iii. 16), and forms the burden of the first Christian confession (Matt. xvi. 16-19); its assertion or denial is the criterion of true Christianity and of antichrist (1 John iv. 2, 3). But justification by faith is undoubtedly a fundamental article of subjective Christianity and of evangelical Protestantism, as distinct from oecumenical Catholicism, and as opposed to Greek and Roman sectional Catholicism. It constitutes the material or life-principle of Protestantism (principium essendi), as the doctrine of the supreme authority of the Holy Scriptures in matters of faith and practice constitutes its formal principle (principium cognoscendi). It was never properly understood in the Christian Church, not even by Augustine, until Luther, and the other Reformers brought it out into clear light from the Epistles of Paul, especially those to the Romans and Galatians. The unbiassed philological exegesis of modern times has fully justified the scripturalness of this doctrine of the Reformation. Yet the best men in the Church of all ages, and the profoundest divines before the Reformation, such as Augustine, Anselm, Bernard, have, in fact, always come to the same practical conclusion in the end, and, disclaiming all merit of their own, they have taken refuge in the free grace of God, as the only and sufficient cause of salvation. “Our righteousness,” says St. Bernard (Sermo V. de verbis Esaie Proph., vi. 1, 2), “our righteousness, if we have any, is of little value; it is sincere, perhaps, but not pure, unless we believe ourselves to be better than our fathers, who no less truly than humbly said: All our righteousnesses are as filthy rags.”

(b.) Definition of justification. It is a judicial act of God by which He freely acquits the penitent sinner, and adopts him as His child on the ground of Christ's perfect righteousness, and on condition of a living faith. Paul has in his mind a judicial process: The righteous and holy God is the Judge; man is the guilty culprit; the law, or the expressed will of God, is the accuser; Christ, with His perfect sacrifice, steps in as a substitute; the sinner accepts Him in hearty faith, or enters into Christ's position, as Christ did into his; God, on the ground of this relation, acquits the sinner, and treats him as His own child; the sinner, being one with Christ, no more lives unto himself, but, the grace of God enabling him, unto Christ, who died for him, and rose again. This is justification.

(c.) Relation to the atonement, regeneration, and sanctification. Justification differs:

(aa.) From the atonement (ἱλασμός, ἱλαστήριον, expiation, propitiation, Versöhnung) and the consequent reconciliation (καταλλαγή, at-one-ment in the old sense of the term, as used in the E. V., Rom. v. 11, in German Versöhnung), i. e., the reconciliation of God and the sinner by the self-sacrifice of Christ, which fully satisfies the claims of Divine justice, and draws men to God by the attraction of superhuman love. The atonement is the objective ground of justification; it was accomplished once for all time, but justification is repeated in the case of every sinner.

(bb.) From regeneration, or the new birth. This is a creative act of the Holy Spirit in man preceding or accompanying the objective act of justification by God the Father, and resulting in a subjective change of heart, which corresponds to the new relation of the believer as justified in Christ.

(cc.) From sanctification. This is a gradual growth, beginning with regeneration and justification, and culminating in the resurrection of the body. Justification is God's gracious act toward us; sanctification is God's gracious work within us: the former is a single act of God, the latter a continuous growth in man.

(d.) The evangelical Protestant (Pauline) doctrine of justification must be maintained:

(aa.) Against Pharisaism, Pelagianism, and Rationalism, or the doctrine of justification by works, which, in various forms and degrees, glorifies human ability and represents justification as a reward for man's own merit (legalism, self-righteousness, work-righteousness).

(bb.) Against the semi-Pelagian and the Romish or Tridentine, as well as the modern Anglo-Romanizing or Tractarian theory of justification by faith and works, which confounds justification with sanctification (justitia infusa; ex injus o justus redditur), makes it depend on the degree of personal holiness, teaches the meritoriousness of good works (opera meritoria proportionalia vilæ æternæ; meritum de congruo and meritum de condigno; opera supererogationis), and divides the glory of our salvation between God and man.

(cc.) Against ultra- and pseudo-Protestant Solifidianism and Antinomianism, which destroy the law, as a rule of conduct, tear justification from its proper antecedents and consequents, and deny the necessity of good works. (Amesdorf, a Lutheran divine of the sixteenth century, went so far as to assert that good works were pernicious or dangerous to salvation; while Major maintained the opposite thesis: bona opera necessaria ad salutem. The result of this controversy was the distinction that good works were necessary, not as a condition of salvation, but as the evidence of saving faith; and that not good works, but only such reliance on them as interfered with trust in the merits of Christ, was dangerous to salvation.)

(dd.) Against subjective Spiritualism and un-churchly Fanaticism, which resolve justification by faith into a justification by feeling, and despise or ignore the Church and the sacraments, as the regular, divinely appointed means of grace.

6. On ἱλαστήριον, ἱλασμός, and ἀπολύτρωσις, see the Exeg. Notes on ver. 25. For more detailed information, see my Positive Dogmatics, p. 818 ff. As recent efforts have been made to set aside the true doctrine of atonement itself by refuting the view of Anselm,* it should be remembered that the defects in Anselm's theory were acknowledged even in the Middle Ages, but that they cannot destroy its relative truth and value. The real idea of the atonement cannot be clearly apprehended without understanding the meaning of compassion, of sympathy, of reconciliation in Christ, of the divine judgment-seat in the sinner's conscience, and of the connection of judgment and deliverance in the sufferings of Christ as well as in the sinner's conversion.

7. God is the righteous Judge and the justifying God: (1.) In the same grace; (2.) In the objective work of redemption, or in justification by faith.

8. When the Apostle, in ver. 27, contrasts a law of works and a law of faith as excluding each other, and then says in ver. 31: "We establish the law," it follows that he only recognizes that antithesis in ver. 27 as one which the external legalism of the Jews had made; or as the appearance of the antithesis between the economy of the Old and New Testaments, but that his own view was based upon a deeper unity.

9. It is well known that very much has been written about Luther's sola, ver. 28. This word is perfectly true so far as it is contrasted with ἔργα νόμου, for the reading is χωρὶς ἔργων νόμου, without works of the law. Therefore the sola is even positively exclusive. But does it also exclude works of faith? Answer: As soon as a work of faith is added to faith, it is made an ἔργον νόμου, a work of the law. If the work remains a mere phenomenon or manifestation of faith, it has no separate significance in itself.

[Dr. Donne, a standard divine of the Church of England, originally a convert from Romanism (died 1631), in Sermon ii. on John xvi. 8-11, makes the following apt remarks on this sola fide: "Faith is but one of those things which in several senses are said to justify us. It is truly said of God, Deus solus justificat; God only justifies us—efficienter; nothing can effect it, nothing can work towards it, but only the mere goodness of God. And it is truly said of Christ, Christus solus justificat; Christ only justifies us—materialiter; nothing enters into the substance and body of the ransom of our sins but the obedience of Christ. It is also truly said, sola fides justificat; only faith justifies us—instrumentaliter; nothing apprehends, nothing applies the merit of Christ to thee, but thy faith. And lastly, it is as truly said, sola opera justificant; only our works justify us—declaratorie; only thy good life can assure thy conscience, and the world, that thou art justified. As the efficient justification, the gracious purpose of God, had done us no good without the material satisfaction, the death of Christ, that followed; and as that material satisfaction, the death of Christ, would do me no good without the instrumental justification, the apprehension by faith; so neither would this profit without the declaratory justification, by which all is pleaded and established God enters not into our material justification: that is only Christ's. Christ enters not into our instrumental justification: that is only faith's. Faith enters not into our declaratory justification (for faith is secret), and declaration belongs to works. Neither of these can be said to justify us alone, so as that we may take the chain in pieces, and think to be justified by any one link thereof—by God without Christ, by Christ without faith, or by faith without works. And yet every one of these justifies us alone, so as that none of the rest enter into that way and that means by which any of these are said to justify us." Comp. my foot-note on ver. 28, p. 136.—P. S.]

10. Ver. 29. Paul did not need any longer to prove from the Scriptures that God was also the God of the Gentiles. The first phenomenon of the New Covenant: Blessedness of faith, speaking with tongues, and a new life, was, with the Apostles, equivalent everywhere to scriptural proofs, and served for the exposition of the Old Testament. It was, indeed, the specific New Testament evidence which precedes with Paul the argument from the Old Testament in chap. iv.

11. On the means by which Christianity chiefly establishes the law, see the Exeg. Notes on ver. 31. The Judaism of the Old Testament first attained its universal historical glory by Christianity, and its thanks are due especially to Paul, who was so hated by the Jews. [Bishop Sanderson (Sermon on 1 Peter ii. 16, as quoted by Ford): "The law may be considered as a rule; or, as a covenant. Christ has freed all believers from the rigor and curse of the law, considered as a covenant; but He has not freed them from obedience to the law, considered as a rule. . . . The law, as a rule, can no more be abolished or changed, than can the nature of good or evil be abolished or changed."—P. S.]

CHAP. III. 21-26.

The revelation of the righteousness of faith through Jesus Christ which is efficacious in God's sight. It comes to pass: 1. Without the assistance of the law, although testified by the law and the prophets; 2. For all sinners, without distinction, who believe; 3. By the redemption effected by Jesus Christ the Mediator, who proffers the righteousness which is acceptable to God (vers. 21-26).—The testimony of the law and the prophets concerning the righteousness which is acceptable to God: 1. Of the law by its typical reference to the atonement; 2. Of the prophets by the Messianic prophecies (ver. 21).—The Apostle takes from the law what does not belong to it, and concedes what does belong to it. He denies: 1. Its alleged coöperation in the righteousness which is acceptable to God. But he concedes to it: 2. The testimony of the future atonement (ver. 21).—The universality of grace corresponding to the universality of sin (vers. 22-24).—What sort of confession should we make to God daily as evangelical Christians? Two kinds: 1. We are altogether sinners, and come short of the glory we should have before God; 2. We are justified freely by His grace, &c. (vers. 23-24).—Christ set forth by God to be a propitiation (mercy-seat), through faith in His blood: 1. To what end? To offer His righteousness at this (present) time; 2. Why? Because in time past He could pass over sin

* [As set forth in his celebrated tract, Our Deus Homo. An able and vigorous, but unsuccessful attempt to set aside the orthodox view of the atonement has been made in America by Dr. Bushnell, The Vicarious Sacrifice, New York, 1866. by His Divine forbearance, and thereby shake faith in His justice (vers. 25, 26).—Divine forbearance (ver. 25).—God the only just One, and therefore the only Justifier (ver. 21).

LUTHER: "All have sinned," &c. This is the chief portion and central part of this Epistle, and of the whole Scripture. Therefore understand this text well, for the merit and glory of all works,—as he himself says,—are done away with, and God's grace and glory alone remain (ver. 28).—Sin could be removed neither by laws nor by any good works; that must be done by Christ and His forgiveness (ver. 25).—Faith fulfils all laws, but works cannot fulfil a single tittle of the law (ver. 31).

STARKE: There is only one kind of justification in the Old and New Testaments; namely, that which is by faith in Christ (ver. 21).—To have a believing heart, is to hunger and thirst after the grace of God in Christ, and to appropriate the righteousness of Christ for our spiritual satisfaction and refreshment (ver. 22).—Do not make a wrong use of this passage against active Christianity, for God's image must be restored in us in the order of the new birth and daily renewal (ver. 28).—Grace and righteousness are the two principal attributes of God which are proved in the work of our salvation. Therefore one cannot be separated from the other, either in the cause or order of our salvation (ver. 24).—The faith which appropriates the blood of Jesus Christ and His expiatory death, and presents them to God the Lord, is the only means by which Christ becomes also our mercy-seat (ver. 25).—If you are ever so distinguished and wealthy, and are deficient in true and living faith, you can neither be justified nor saved (ver. 26).

OSLANDER: No doctrine must be accepted in the Church of God to which God's word does not bear witness (ver. 21).—LANGE: The merit of the blood of Christ is not only the object which faith grasps, but also the foundation on which it firmly rests (ver. 25).—HEDINGER: Christ our righteousness! Oh, the glorious consolation, which screens us from the wrath of God, the curse of the law, and eternal death! No work, no perfection out of Christ; but faith alone makes us dear children of God—righteous, holy, and blessed (ver. 25).

BENGL: Under the law, God appears just and condemning; under the gospel, just, and yet justifying the guilty sinner.

LISCO: The nature of evangelical righteousness is, that it is obtained by faith in Jesus Christ; and it comes to all and upon all who believe in Him. Like a flood of grace it flows to all, and even so overflows as to reach even the heathen. It is therefore a righteousness by faith, and not a righteousness by works.—In the work of redemption, God's holiness and grace, justice and forbearance, are revealed (vers. 25, 26).

HEUBNER: The difficult question is now solved: "How can the sinner find redemption from his sins?" Christianity replies: Believe in Christ (ver. 22).—How is the righteousness which God accepts testified by the law and the prophets? 1. By this means: all forgiveness, all redemption, is everywhere described in the Scriptures as the free work of God's grace; neither the offering, nor man's own merit, was sufficient for this end; 2. In the emphatic prophecies of a future Redeemer (ver. 21).—Unworthiness before God is universal. This is the first prostrating word of revelation: Know that thou art a sinner, a poor sinner: that is, who hast nothing, and must get something from God (ver. 23).—Christ's redemption is: 1. A ransom (Matt. xx. 28) from the guilt of sin (Eph. i. 7); 2. A ransom from the punishment of sin (Rom. v. 9); 3. A ransom from the dominion of sin (1 Peter i. 18; ver. 23).—The subjective condition of redemption is faith as a faith of the heart, which reposes its confidence on Christ's sacrificial death—a faith that Christ died for me. This for me is the great thing! (ver. 26).—On vers. 23-25, REINHARD preached his celebrated Reformation Sermon (il. 270) in the year 1800: "The great reason why our Church should never forget that it owes its existence to the renewal of the doctrine of God's free grace in Christ."

BESSER: The law impels toward righteousness, but it does not confer it.—There are not two orders of salvation, one for Jews and honorable people, and the other for heathen and publicans; but there is only one for all.—We are justified: 1. Without merit; 2. By God's grace; 3. Through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus (ver. 24).—The highest declaration of God's grace is at the same time the highest declaration of His justice.

J. P. LANGE: The fact of salvation is also a miraculous work of God (ver. 21).—Redemption as the second and higher world of miracle in relation to the natural world of miracle.—Golgotha is more exalted than Sinai in respect also to God's justice.—The lightning-flash of New Testament justice: 1. Killing; 2. Making alive.

[BURKITT: Vers. 24-26. We see here: 1. A glorious privilege for believers, justification; 2. Its efficient cause, God; 3. The moving or impulsive cause, free grace; 4. The meritorious cause, the blood shedding and death of Christ; 5. The final cause, the declaration of His righteousness; 6. The instrumental cause, faith.—Oh, glorious and all-wise contrivance, whereby God made sufficient provision for the reparation of His honor, for the vindication of His holiness, for the manifestation of His truth and faithfulness, and for the present consolation and eternal salvation of all repenting and believing sinners to the end of the world!—MATTHEW HENRY: Ver. 25. Christ is the propitiation—there is the healing plaster provided. Faith is the applying of this plaster to the wounded soul.—Faith is the bunch of hyssop, and the blood of Christ is the blood of sprinkling.—DWIGHT devotes six sermons to the subject of Justification, in which he treats of its nature, source, and means; duty of believing; nature of faith; influence of faith on justification; reconciliation of Paul and James on justification; influence of works on justification; and justification by faith no diminution of motives to obedience (Theology, vol. ii., pp. 515-605).—CLARKE: vers. 23-24. As God is no respecter of persons, all human creatures being equally His offspring, and there being no reason why one should be preferred before another, therefore His mercy has embraced all.—The redemption of Christ comprehends whatsoever He taught, did, or suffered, in order to free men from evil.—HODGE: As the cardinal doctrine of the Bible is justification by faith, so the turning-point in the soul's history, the saving act, is the reception of Jesus Christ as the propitiation for our sins.—All modes of preaching must be erroneous, which do not lead sinners to feel that the great thing to be done, and done first, is to receive the Lord Jesus Christ, and to turn unto God through Him. And all religious experience must be defective, which does not embrace distinctly a sense of the justice of our condemnation, and a conviction of the sufficiency of the work of Christ, and an exclusive reliance upon it as such.—J. F. H.]

ON CHAP. III. 27-31.

The exclusion of man's self-glorification. Its results: 1. Not by the law of works; but, 2. By the law of faith (ver. 27).—How are we justified? 1. Not by the works of the law; but, 2. By faith alone (ver. 28).—"Only by faith"—LUTHER's watchword, and also the watchword of the evangelical church of the present day (ver. 28).—The righteousness of the law and the righteousness of faith (ver. 28).—God, a God of all people, because He is only one God (vers. 29, 30).—Faith in the one God considered as the source of the true kind of universalism (vers. 29, 30).—The popular saying of religious indifference: "We all believe in one God," is only true when we also believe that this God also justifies those who believe (vers. 29, 30).—The proof that the law is not made void through faith, but established, is supplied by both the deeds and doctrine: 1. Of the Lord; 2. Of His apostles, and especially of Paul (ver. 31).

LUTHER: Faith keeps all the laws, while works keep no point of the law (James ii. 10).—[A passage in the preface to the Epistle to the Romans is also in place here: Faith is not that human folly and dream which some take for faith. But faith is a divine work in us, which changes us and creates us anew in God, &c.]

STARKE: Faith alone justifies and saves; but you must not take away works from faith in order to beautify your sinful life, or it will become unbelief.—There are many forms of arbitrary will on earth, and yet but one way to salvation. God would save all men, and yet by only one way.

HEDINGER: Christianity, with its doctrine of faith, opens no door for sin, but shows how we can be obedient to the law with a filial spirit for God's sake (chap. iii. 31).—QUENNEL: The more faith in a soul the less pride there is in it.

GERLACH, from CHRYSOSTOM: What is the law of faith? Salvation by grace. Herein God's power is declared, not only in delivering men, but also in justifying them and raising them to glory; for God did not stand in need of works, but sought faith alone.—True, the word alone is not in the text literally, but yet it is there in sense, as it is expressly declared in Gal. ii. 16, 17; without faith, nothing can justify.

HEUBNER: Christianity unites humanity by one God, by one Father, who is the Saviour of all.—The unity of faith in grace should also establish the unity of hearts.

SPENNER: Looking at the subject in its true light, faith is not that which itself justifies man—for its strength would be far too small for this work—but faith only accepts the most powerful grace of God as a proffered gift, and thus permits man to be saved by it, instead of its really justifying and saving him. This is the great doctrine of this Epistle, on which every thing rests, and from which every thing must be derived.

LANGHE: Therefore we judge, &c., and thus it stands (ver. 28). True salvation of the inner life a witness: 1. Of the true faith; 2. Of the true gospel; 3. Of the true God.

[BURKITT: Ver. 31. The moral, not the ceremonial law. The moral law is established by the gospel; Christ has relaxed the law in point of danger, but not in point of duty.—HENRY: Ver. 27. If we were saved by our own works, we might put the crown upon our own heads. But the law of faith, the way of justification by faith, doth forever exclude boasting; for faith is a depending, self-emptying, self-denying grace, and casts every crown before the throne: therefore it is most for God's glory, that thus we should be justified.—MACKNIGHT: Ver. 28. Faith in God and Christ necessarily leads those who possess it to believe every thing made known to them by God and by Christ, and to do every thing which they have enjoined; so that it terminates in the sincere belief of the doctrines of religion, and in the constant practice of its duties, as far as they are made known to the believer.—CLARKE: Why did not God make known this grand method of salvation sooner? 1. To make it the more valued; 2. To show His fidelity in the performance of His promises; 3. To make known the virtue and efficacy of the blood of Christ, which sanctifies the present, extends its influence to the past, and continues the availing sacrifice and way of salvation to all future ages.—HODGE: The doctrine of atonement produces in us its proper effect, when it leads us to see and feel that God is just; that He is infinitely gracious; that we are deprived of all ground of boasting; that the way of salvation, which is open for us, is open for all men; and that the motives to all duty, instead of being weakened, are enforced and multiplied.—In the gospel, all is harmonious: justice and mercy, as it regards God; freedom from the law, and the strongest obligations to obedience, as it regards men.—BARNES: One of the chief glories of the plan of salvation is, that while it justifies the sinner, it brings a new set of influences from heaven, more tender and mighty than can be drawn from any other source, to produce obedience to the law of God.—J. F. H.]

EIGHTH SECTION.—Second proof of the righteousness of faith: FROM THE SCRIPTURES, and particularly from the history of the faith of Abraham, the ancestor of the Jews. Abraham is the father of faith to the Gentiles as well as the Jews, because he was justified in uncircumcision as a Gentile, and because he received circumcision as the seal of the righteousness of faith. David is also a witness of the righteousness of faith. (He is particularly so, since his justification was that of a great sinner.) Abraham, by his faith in the word of the personal God of revelation, and particularly in the promise of Isaac, is a type of believers in the saving miracle of the resurrection.

CHAP. IV. 1-25.

- 1 What [, then,] shall we say then that Abraham our father, as pertaining to 2 the flesh, hath found [found according to the flesh]?¹ For if Abraham were [was] justified by works [as is assumed by the Jews], he hath whereof to glory [he
 3 hath ground of boasting];² but not before God. For what saith the Scripture?
 Abraham believed God, and it was counted [reckoned] unto [to] him for right-4 eousness [Gen. xv. 6]. Now to him that worketh [to the workman]³ is the reward not reckoned of [according to, or, as a matter of] grace, but of 5 [according to, as a] debt. But to him that worketh not,⁴ but believeth on him 6 that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted [reckoned] for righteousness. Even as David also describeth the blessedness [happiness]⁵ of the man, unto whom God 7 imputeth righteousness without works, Saying, Blessed [Happy] are they whose 8 iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered [atoned for]. Blessed [Happy] is the man to whom the Lord will not impute [reckon] sin [Ps. xxxii. 1, 2].⁶
 9 Cometh this blessedness [happiness] then upon the circumcision only, or [also] upon the uncircumcision also? For we say that faith was reckoned to 10 Abraham for righteousness. How was it then reckoned? when he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision.
 11 And he received [Gen. xvii. 2] the [a] sign of circumcision,⁷ [as?] a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised [of the faith in the uncircumcision, τῆς πίστεως τῆς ἐν τῇ ἀκροβυστίᾳ, or, of the faith which he had while in uncircumcision]: that he might be the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised [while yet in uncircumcision]; that 12 righteousness might be imputed [reckoned also] unto them also:⁸ And the father of circumcision to them who are not of the circumcision only, but who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had being yet uncircumcised [which he had while in uncircumcision].⁹
 13 For the promise, that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law [For not through (the) law is the promise to Abraham, or to his seed, that he should be heir of the world], but through 14 the righteousness of faith. For if they which [who] are of the law [οἱ ἐκ νόμου] be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none [no] effect [ren-15 dered powerless]: Because the law worketh wrath: for where¹⁰ no law is, there 16 is no transgression [but where there is no law, neither is there transgression of the law]. Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end [in order that] the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham; who is the 17 father of us all, (As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations [A father of many nations have I set thee; Gen. xvii. 5],) before him whom he believed,¹¹ even God, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be [are] not as though they were:
 18 Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the [omit the] father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be 19 [Gen. xv. 5]. And being not weak in faith, he considered not¹² his own body now [already]¹³ dead, when he was [being] about a hundred years old, neither 20 yet the deadness of Sarah's womb: He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief [But with regard to the promise of God he wavered, or doubted not in unbelief]; but was [made] strong in faith, giving glory to God

21 And¹ being fully persuaded, that what he had [hath] promised, he was [is] 22 able also to perform. And therefore [Wherefore also]² it was imputed [reckoned] to him for righteousness.

23 Now it was not written for his sake alone, that it was imputed [reckoned]
 24 to him; But for us also, to whom it shall be imputed [reckoned], if we believe
 25 on him that [who] raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead; Who was delivered
 [up] for our offences, and was raised again [once again] for our justification.³

TEXTUAL.

¹ Ver. 1.—The reading in Lachmann, ἐπεσφάδα: Ἀπρ. τὴν προέσφρα ἡμῶν, is not only mostly authenticated (A. B. C., &c.), but, if well understood, it also gives the best sense; and we regard the opposite reading, which is now generally favored, as an explanatory transposition. See the Exeg. Notes. [The text. rec. pub. Ἀπὸ τῆς τερπῆς (not προέσφρας) ἡμῶν before ἐπεσφάδα. Cod. Sin. sustains the reading of Lachmann, which is also adopted by Alford, who, however, brackets ἐπεσφάδα as being of doubtful authority, since it is omitted by the Vatican Cod. (see Tischendorf's edition, p. 1448). But it is indispensable, and abundantly sustained by the other uncial MSS. Meyer admits the weight of external authority in favor of Lachmann's reading, but is disposed, nevertheless, to regard it as a later transposition to suit the connection of κατὰ σάρκα with τὴν τερπῆν ἡμῶν. The E. V., following the text. rec., adopts this connection, and Dr. Lange defends it in the Exeg. Notes. But with the majority of modern commentators, including Meyer, Alford, Hodge, I prefer to join κατὰ σάρκα with ἐπεσφάδα. This is indeed necessary, if we follow the lectio recepta, and it is perfectly allowable, though not so natural, if we adopt the reading of Lachmann. In this case we must translate: What, then, shall we say that Abraham our father (forefather) found (or, gained, attained) according to (the) flesh (or, in the way of the flesh)—i. e., through his own natural efforts as distinct from the grace of God. Grotius: propriis viribus; De Wette, and others: nach rein menschlicher Weise. Meyer takes ἐπεσφά here as the weak, unspiritual, sinful human nature. Abraham did indeed attain righteousness, but by faith, not by works. Codd. N. A. B. C. sustain προέσφρα for the τερπῆς of the Ec.—P. 8.]

² Ver. 2.—[Lange translates: ex hac Rahm, glory. καύχημα (as also καύχησις) in the N. T., and in the LXX., means generally (not always, as Meyer says, p. 160) the object or ground of boasting, materia gloriandi; Rom. iv. 2; 1 Cor. ix. 15, 16; 2 Cor. i. 14; Gal. vi. 4; Phil. i. 26; ii. 16; and sometimes, as in the classics, the act of boasting or exulting, gloratio; 1 Cor. v. 6; 2 Cor. v. 12; ix. 3.—P. 8.]

⁴ Ver. 5.—[τῇ μὴ ἐργασίᾳ, to him who worketh not for hire—der nicht Werkdienst treibt.—P. 8.]

⁶ Vers. 7, 8.—[From Pa. xxxii., which describes the happiness and the condition of the forgiveness of sins. The following is a literal version of vers. 1 and 2:

*Blessed (Happy) is he whose transgression is forgiven, Whose sin is covered.
 Blessed (Happy) is the man
 To whom Jehovah imputeth not iniquity,
 And in whose spirit there is no guile.*

Bwald (Die Psalmen, 3d ed., 1866, p. 65) renders the passage thus:

*Seig dessen Missethat vergeben, Dessen Sünde ist verzeih!
 Seliger Mensch dem Jhove nicht anrechnet Schuld,
 Und in dessen Geiste keine Täuschung!*—P. 8.]

⁸ Ver. 12.—καὶ αὐτοῖς must be retained, contrary to Lachmann. [καὶ is wanting in x. B. Meyer defends it. —P. 8.]

⁹ Ver. 13.—Τῇ ἐν (τῇ) ἀποβυσσὶν πίστει [N. A. B. C. D¹, &c., Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford]. The opposite reading is τῇ πιστ. τῇ ἐν τῇ ἀποβ. [Recommended by Griesbach, adopted by Scholz—contrary to the majority of the uncial MSS. It looks like a mechanical adjustment to ver. 11. τῇ is also to be omitted.—P. 8.]

¹⁰ Ver. 15.—ὅδ δὲ is probably an exegetical correction; though strongly attested by A. B. C., Griesbach, Lachmann. [The text. rec. reads ὅ γάρ, for where, which is supported by M¹. D. F. K. L., while M¹ favors ὅδ δὲ, see where.—P. 8.]

¹² Ver. 19.—The οὐ is wanting in the celebrated Codd. A. B. C. (and Sin.). Also in Lachmann. According to Meyer, this omission arose from regard to Gen. xvii. 17. It could also have been occasioned by the antithesis in ver. 26. [The οὐ is inserted in D. F. K. L., Lat., Syr., &c. Alford brackets it. See Exeg. Notes.—P. 8.]

¹³ Ver. 19.—The ἡ δὲ is wanting in B. F. G., &c. (and thrown out by Fritzsche and Tischendorf, but sustained by x. A. C. D. K. L. Lachmann and Alford bracket it.—P. 8.)

¹⁴ Ver. 21.—The καὶ is sustained by A. B. C., &c., Lachmann. [Cod. Sin. likewise favors καὶ, and Alford retains it.—P. 8.]

¹⁵ Ver. 22.—[The καὶ after δὲ is omitted by B. D¹. F., but inserted by x. A. C. D³. K. L. Lachmann and Alford bracket it.—P. 8.]

¹⁶ Ver. 23.—[Luther, to whom above all others the Christian world is indebted for a lucid and forcible exposition of Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, has made a strange mistake here by translating δικαιόσιν: Gerechtigkeith (righteousness), instead of: Rechtfertigung (justification). δικαιόσιν is the divine act of setting a man right, or putting him into the state and possession of δικαιοσύνη.—P. 8.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

General Remarks.—The theocratical Scripture proof for the righteousness of faith promised to the Gentiles as well as the Jews. Enlargement of the Mosaic economy of particularism by the development of the germ-like universality of the Abrahamic religion. Survey: 1. Abraham's justification was a justification by faith, and excluded justification by works. It was therefore only a justification of the sinner, as is shown by the beatitude pronounced by David (vera. 1-8). The opposite is the Jewish righteousness of works. 2. It was independent of circumcision and the law. Abraham did not obtain the blessedness of justifying faith in circumcision, but in uncircumcision; circumcision was then added to it as a seal of justification. Abraham was thereby set forth to be the father of the faithful, as well of the uncircumcised as of the circumcised (vera. 9-12). The opposite is Jewish particularism. 3. Justification is as universal as the promise, which constitutes even an antithesis to the law. Abraham's justification is to him and to his seed a promise of the inheritance of the world. This promise is not limited by the law. Such a limitation would make the promise void; for the law produces that wrath (ἀγρι), which looks rather to the destruction than the inheritance of the world. The promise is both conditioned and established by faith and grace (vera. 13-17). The opposite is Jewish legalism. 4. Abraham and Christians have in reality the same righteousness of faith. The analogy between Abraham's faith and that of his believing children,—Christians: a. In relation to the same wonder-working God (ver. 17). b. In relation to the same conduct of faith: looking away from the contradiction of the natural life; strong confidence in the Divine word of revelation and promise (vera. 18-21). c. In reference to the same operation (vera. 22-25). The opposite is the external and superficial contemplation of the worldly sense.—Or also: a. The faith of Abraham (vera. 17-22); b. Application to the faith of Christians (vera. 23-25). The opposite, in general, is the hierarchical formalism and ceremonialism.

FIRST PARAGRAPH, VERS. 1-8.

[Paul exhibits Abraham as a truly evangelical character, as a man of faith, in order to confirm the doctrine that the ground of our salvation lies not in us, but outside of us in the free grace of God, and that this must be apprehended first by faith, before we can do any good works. James, on the other hand (ii. 21 ff.), in opposition to a barren orthodoxy and mere notional belief, represents Abraham as a man of holy obedience, who proved his faith by works. In the one case he appears as the champion of the righteousness of faith, in the other as the champion of the righteousness of life. Both views are right. Paul goes to the root of the matter, the vital principle, which animated Abraham; James looks at the fruit produced thereby. Faith and works, righteousness and holiness, are as inseparable as light and heat, as the tree and the fruit, as cause and effect. Paul himself, after laying the only true foundation, as strongly insists upon a holy life as James. There is, in the Old Testament, an evangelical as well as a legal element; and the gospel, or promise, precedes the law which came in between the promise and the fulfilment (ver. 20). Abraham represents the evangelical element, as Moses does the legal. Abraham's faith differs from the Christian faith, as the promise differs from the fulfilment of the gospel salvation, and as hope differs from fruition; but the essential element, the ethical keynote, in both is unconditional confidence and trust in God's truth and God's mercy.—P. S.]

Ver. 1. What, then, shall we say. The οὖν announces an inference from the previous statement (iii. 29), that God is the God of the Jews as well as of the Gentiles, considered in relation to Abraham's history and its significance. But our inference is not a corroboration (Meyer), or confirmatio ab exemplo (Calvin). We have here rather a new proof, as deduced from the foregoing, namely, the explanation of Abraham's history and of David's words of faith. Likewise Tholuck observes, the οὖν cannot be explained if, in accordance with the view of recent expositors, this verse be connected immediately with ver. 31 of the previous chapter.—The construction: It may be asked, first, whether the question should be read as one question, or two? Grotius and others have placed an interrogation mark after ἐροῦντες, and thus made two questions out of the sentence. Then δικαιωσίνης is supplied to εἰρηξέναι.—If the εἰρηξέναι be taken absolutely in the sense of the Grecian philosophy, this division could be made more easily. Yet the chief question here is not, what should be said, but what is Abraham's advantage?—It may further be asked, whether κατὰ σάρκα relates to προπάτορα (πατέρα), or to εἰρηξέναι. Lachmann's reading: τὸ οὖν ἐροῦντες εἰρηξέναι Ἀβρ., &c., [see Textual Note], is the one most favored by the Codd. (A. C. D., &c., and also the Sin.). "The suspicion that the transposition of the κατὰ σάρκα [of εἰρηξέναι] rather.—P. S.] is to be laid to the charge of the copyist, is strengthened when we see that such expositors as Chrysostom, Theophylact, Genadius in Eusebius, who read εἰρηξέναι κατὰ σάρκα, nevertheless connect the latter with πατὴρ ἡμῶν" (Tholuck, p. 167). De Wette, Meyer [Tholuck, Alford, Wordsworth, Hodge], and most commentators, with the Peshito, connect κατὰ σάρκα with εἰρηξέναι, and not (according to Origen, Ambrose, Calvin,* &c.) with πατὴρ ἡμῶν. But in ver. 9 ff., the subject is circumcision; while in vera. 1-8, it is only the contrast between righteousness by works and righteousness by faith. Therefore, according to Meyer's construction, κατὰ σάρκα should correspond to the εἰς ἔργων, yet not so that the two ideas should be identical, but that works should be embraced in the more general idea of κατὰ σάρκα. The σὰρξ, in antithesis to the divine πνεῦμα, should then denote humanity given up to itself. Pelagius, Ambrose, and others, refer κατὰ σάρκα to circumcision. Rückert understands the word as embracing both circumcision and ἔργα. While Tholuck consents to the now customary connection of the κατὰ σάρκα with εἰρηξέναι, he does not grant that the works of faithful Abraham were ἔργα κατὰ σάρκα; although Flacius would include likewise the opera veniati, as performed by men and not imputed by God, in the opera carnis; and Bullinger and others would make σὰρξ equal to ἔργα. Tholuck therefore arrives at the conclusion, that Paul did not design to apply Christian justification in all its consequences to the patriarch. But how could he represent him here as the father of the faithful, if he would belittle or limit his justification? We go upon the supposition that, in accordance with the best Codd., Ἀβραὰμ ὁ προπάτωρ ἡμῶν κατὰ σάρκα (ver. 1) is an antithesis to αὐτοῦς πατὴρ πάντων τῶν πιστευόντων, &c. (ver. 11), and to ὁ ἔστιν πατὴρ πάντων ἡμῶν (ver. 16). The principal subject is, therefore, Abraham, the natural ancestor of the Jews; and if it be asked, What hath he found? the emphasis rests on τί, and this refers to the δικαιοῦσθαι πιστεὶ χωρὶς ἔργων νόμον (chap. iii. 28), and especially to ver. 29 also. As God is a God of the Jews and Gentiles, Abraham, the προπάτωρ of the Jews, has become a πατὴρ of Jews and Gentiles.

Ver. 2. For if Abraham was justified [ἐδικαιώθη] by works [in the opinion of the Jews]. The answer assumes that the view that Abraham was justified by the works of the law, was already denied in the question. Yet this very thing was believed by the legalistic Jew. "In the Talmud it was even deduced from Gen. xvi. 5, that Abraham observed the whole Mosaic law" (Meyer).* The answer does not therefore assume an οὐδέν [omitted before ἢ γὰρ] or an οὐδαιότης (Tholuck), because κατὰ σάρκα [ver. 1] does not stand in connection with ἐργάσθαι, [? comp. Textual Note 1.—P. S.] To the question, Which of the two kinds of righteousness? it assumes the conclusion, that it was not the imaginary righteousness of works, but the true righteousness of faith. The supposition is so plain, that the Apostle proceeds at once to the proof.—Was justified by works. The sense can be: if he should be so justified, it could only be at a human tribunal, and not at the tribunal of God—as has been already described. But it can also be understood thus: if Abraham, according to the national prejudice of the Jews, has been really justified by works. This is the more obvious view. Conceding this kind of justification, Abraham has a καύχημα (maternam gloriandī), but not before God. Not before God, first, because no flesh is justified by works in His sight (chap. iii. 20); second, because we know definitely from the Scriptures that Abraham was justified in God's sight, or at His tribunal, by faith. The ἐδικαιώθη is made by Beza, Grotius, and others, to refer to a general opinion pronounced on Abraham; but by Calvin, Calov., and others, to an imaginary opinion, under the supposition of an incomplete conclusion (the major: he who is justified by works hath whereof to glory. The minor: but not before God. The necessary concluding statement: therefore Abraham is not justified by works).†

† [Calvin's interpretation is given by him (ad Rom. iv. 2) in these words: "Epicherema [ἐπιχειρήμα], an attempted proof, an incomplete syllogism] est, i. e., imperfecta ratiōnatio, quæ in hanc formam colligitur: Si Abraham operibus justificatus est, potest suo merito gloriari; sed non habet unde gloriatur apud Deum; ergo non est operibus justificatus est. Ita membrum illud, 'Sed non apud Deum,' est minor propositio syllogismi. Huic attestat conclusio quæ posuit, tametsi a Paulo non exprimitur." Similarly Fritzsche: "Si suis bene factis Dei favorem nactus est, habet, quod apud Deum gloriatur . . . ; sed non habet, quod apud Deum gloriatur, quælibet v. propter idem, non propter quælibet facta cum Deo probatum esse docent . . . ; non est igitur ab eis bene facta Deo probatus." So also Kraus-

Tholuck thinks, with Meyer, that reference to God cannot disappear from ἐδικαιώθη, and he follows him, with Theodoret, in explaining thus: "For if Abraham has been justified by God through works, he has certainly received—the perfect fulfilment of the law being granted,—glory, but not a divine glory, so far as such glory could not be traced back to God's grace." This explanation contradicts the previous suppositions: 1. That no flesh can be justified by the deeds of the law (chap. iii. 20); 2. That no external fulfilment of the law in the sense of νόμος ἔργων is conceivable, but only in the sense of νόμος πίστεως. A plain remark may aid in the understanding of this difficult passage: that δικαιοῦσθαι always refers to a definite tribunal, but that this tribunal may be very different according to the different relations of δικαιοῦσθαι. Thus the tribunal of Jewish national prejudice already mentioned was very different from that of the theocratic communion of faith itself, which the passage in James ii. 23 has in view (see the Commentary on James, chap. ii. Also, Pa. cvi. 31, on the justification of Phinehas). It has been counted to him for righteousness—from generation to generation, see Tholuck, p. 172, thereon. What Theodoret says is certainly true: that true justification before God must glorify the love of God; but for this very reason no other mode of justification before God is conceivable. (Singular explanation of Semler and others: Has he glory? No; before God, not! Protestation.)

Ver. 3. For what saith the Scripture? Paul makes a true representation of Abraham in accordance with the Scriptures, in opposition to the false representation of the Jews.—But Abraham believed God, and it (viz., the believing, τὸ πιστεῖν, which must be supplied from ἐπίστευσεν) was reckoned to him for righteousness, ἐνίσταται δὲ Ἀβραὰμ τῷ θεῷ, καὶ λογισθῇ αὐτῷ εἰς δικαιοσύνην. Gen. xv. 6, Sept. The emphasis lies on ἐπίστευσεν, placed first, or the faith of Abraham as distinct from works and as excluding merit on the part of man. Λογισθῇ εἰς δικαιοσύνην, to reckon, or count, or impute to any one as righteousness, and consequently to treat him as righteous, is identical with δικαιῶν (see p. 130). On the con-

sold, Baur, Köstlin, Hodge. This interpretation would have been more clearly expressed thus: ἔχει καύχημα (πρὸς τὸν θεόν): ἀλλ' οὐκ ἔχει καύχημα πρὸς τὸν θεόν. But it certainly gives good sense and falls in best with the γὰρ in ver. 3. We explain thus: If Abraham, as the Jews suppose, was justified by works, he has reason to glory before God (for then he can claim justification as a just reward for his merits, leaving no room for the display of God's mercy); but, according to the Scripture, he has no ground to glory before God, for (ver. 3) the Scripture derives his justification from faith in God or from something outside of him, and not from works of his own. Meyer, in his former editions, defended the untenable view that ἐδικαιώθη was a question, and ἔχει . . . θεόν the negative answer; but, in his last editions, he returns, with Tholuck and Wordsworth, to the interpretation of the Greek fathers (Theodoret, Chrysostom, Theophylact), which would require in ver. 3, ἀλλὰ, instead of γὰρ.—P. S.]

roversy whether Abraham was justified per fidem through the instrumentality of faith), as the Protestants rightly teach, or propter fidem (on account of the merit of his faith), as the Romanists assert; compare the remarks of Tholuck, p. 173 ff.; also the note of Alford in loc. Hodge enters here into a lengthy discussion of the doctrine of imputation, pp. 164-175, partly polemical against Olshausen.—P. S.] The quotation of Gen. xv. 6, is from the Septuagint which has changed the active verb $\epsilon\lambda\omicron\gamma\iota\sigma\theta\eta$ into the passive $\epsilon\lambda\omicron\gamma\iota\sigma\theta\eta$. Paul uses the more prominent expression $\delta\epsilon$ instead of the $\kappa\alpha\iota$ of the Septuagint. Different explanations: 1. Rückert: Paul incorrectly used the passage for his purpose. 2. Roman Catholic expositors (and Bucer): Abraham submitted to the authority of God's word, and that gave value to his faith. 3. Faith in the promise of a large posterity was, in view of its object, faith in the promise of the Messiah who was to come forth from his posterity (A. Lapide, Calvin, Gerhard, Calov., and others). 4. Implicit faith in the Divine promise (Bullinger, and others). Tholuck adopts this view, though with hesitation. "Delitzsch, on Gen. xv. 6, having more regard for the historical interpretation, says: 'Every thing was contained in the person of Jehovah and in the promise of a numerous posterity to Abraham, which was separately disclosed and fulfilled in the New Testament time of redemption.' But faith in a numerous posterity cannot effect the same nova obedientia as faith in a Christus satisfaciens and satisfaciens can effect." [Tholuck, p. 173.] Further particulars on the nova obedientia of Abraham may be read in Gen. xxii. According to Tholuck, we should not introduce into the faith of Abraham the faith in the Messiah. But yet we must not reject it. According to the promise in Gen. xii. 3, the question in Gen. xv. 6—the passage here in mind—could not be the promise of a merely natural posterity. It is certainly consistent with the principles of historical interpretation, when we are considering later decisions, to look back at the earlier ones which lie at their root. Meyer [p. 161] more appropriately remarks: "In the $\pi\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon\sigma\alpha\iota\tau\omega\theta\epsilon\omega$ on the part of Abraham, Paul has perceived nothing really different from Christian $\pi\sigma\tau\iota\varsigma$; since Abraham's faith referred to the Divine promise, and indeed to the promise which he—one who was the friend of God, and illuminated by Him—has perceived to be the promise which embraced the future Messiah (John viii. 56)."

Yet, under the supposition of the substantial identity between the faith of Abraham and that of Christians, we shall need to lay stress on the difference in form: The faith of Abraham is the essential beginning of the specific faith of salvation in the Old Testament; the faith of Paul and his companions is the completion of the same in the New. Faith in general, as well as in each of its particular parts, undergoes a great metamorphosis in its passage from that initial point to this terminal point.

But it remains the same faith in substance. And the peculiarity of this substance is, that the Divine object, and its human organic reception, constitute an indissoluble christological synthesis. The objective parts are: a. The personal God of revelation in His revelation; and especially as the creative, wonder-working God, who can call forth new salvation and life; b. His word of promise; c. The import of His word of promise—the future salvation of the nations with the seed of Abraham. Corresponding with these, are the subjective parts: a. The living knowledge, perception, and reception of the revealed God; b. Confident submission to the words of promise, against all the contradiction of sense and worldly appearance; c. The appropriation of the object of the promise as the principle and energy of the renewed life.

The operations correspond to this harmony of object and subject: 1. Justification. Freedom of conscience before God, according to the measure of the condemnation of conscience. The peace of God, Gen. xv. 2. The sacramental, symbolical seal, Gen. xvii., see ver. 11. 3. Confidence, and acquirement of new life from condemnation to death, or even from death itself—internal death.

All these separate parts exist as germs in Abraham's faith. De Wette, after an ill-founded remark on the Apostle's arbitrary dialectics and scriptural application, admirably says: "When the Apostle in this way unites the climax of religious development with the historical point of connection—for the developing series commenced with Abraham—he gives evidence of great historical penetration." Comp. the Commentary on Genesis, xv. 1-12.

Ver. 4. Now to the workman [$\tau\omega\delta\epsilon\epsilon\rho\gamma\alpha\lambda\omicron\upsilon\mu\epsilon\nu\omega$, Lange: Dem aber, welcher den Werkdienst treibt]. The statements of vers. 6 and 7 are two sentences, which establish the doctrine of justification by faith, as well in its divine as in its human character. The work does not reach up to God, His grace, or His heaven; but it belongs to the sphere of gain, and makes the remunerator the debtor—which cannot be said of God without impiety. But as God's grace is exalted above the claims of merit, so is man's faith exalted. The believer does not rely on merit, but on the gracious strength of Him who justifies the ungodly, and he receives the righteousness in proportion to his faith. The first sentence establishes negatively, that Abraham, according to his relation to God, could not be justified by works; the second sentence establishes positively, that justification presupposes a relation of God's grace to the sinner. It is therefore clearly intimated that Abraham was a sinner; besides, the introduction of David and his testimony proves conclusively that the justification is that of the sinner. But the root of the antithesis is in the $\epsilon\rho\gamma\alpha\lambda\omicron\upsilon\mu\epsilon\nu\omega\varsigma$ and the $\mu\eta\epsilon\rho\gamma\alpha\lambda\omicron\upsilon\mu\epsilon\nu\omega\varsigma$; it is the continuation of the contrast in chap. ii. 7, 8. Those who strive untiringly, seek God as their only end; but partisans oppose God by their claims. The $\epsilon\rho\gamma\alpha\lambda\omicron\upsilon\mu\epsilon\nu\omega\varsigma$ is not "the active man, whose characteristic is works" (Meyer), but he whose righteousness consists only of works, who relies on the merit of his works, and whose basis of confidence and pride are works. Therefore, his counterpart is not an $\omicron\upsilon\kappa\epsilon\rho\gamma\alpha\lambda\omicron\upsilon\mu\epsilon\nu\omega\varsigma$, but a $\mu\eta\epsilon\rho\gamma$.

Is the reward ($\acute{o}\mu\iota\sigma\theta\acute{o}\varsigma$) not reckoned according to (as a matter of) grace ($\kappa\alpha\tau\grave{\alpha}\chi\acute{\alpha}\rho\iota\tau\iota$). That is, the earned reward, in accordance with the law of wages and labor. The $\lambda\omicron\gamma\iota\sigma\sigma\alpha\iota$ is a very flexible idea; in the case of works, denoting a literal settling up, a payment, according to the external quantitative relations; and in the case of faith, a respectful valuation or reward, according to the internal qualitative relations. But even in the latter case, there is no fiction, no untruth, but a decision in strict conformity with the actual condition. He who makes God his debtor for service rendered, reverses the poles of spiritual life; he conceits that God exists for his sake, and for the sake of his external work. Therefore, the mere worker becomes a culpable laborer in the judgment of God. Faith is the return to the normal relation with God. Here God is the absolute majesty, the justifier, the source, the giver of all things, the infinitely merciful; and before Him the believer stands in the sense of absolute need, dependence, poverty, impurity, and guilt. But when the believer commits himself to the burning and delivering arms of God's love, his guilt vanishes as the cloud before the sun.—Not according to grace, but according to (as a) debt. The ἐργαζόμενος; really declines grace; he claims a reward for his merit. And in the same way will his reward be reckoned according to his debt. Ὁφείλημα, the debitum, according to the relations of reward.—It is plain that such a relation did not apply to Abraham, from the fact that, according to ver. 8, he obtained God's grace; and this in a definite case, where the question could not be one of merit (Gen. xv.).

Ver. 5. But to him that worketh not (for hire), &c. Meyer properly remarks, in opposition to Reiche, who refers the statement directly to Abraham,* that the sentence is a locus communis, and that it is left to the reader whether he will include Abraham in it or not. But, according to Paul, Abraham has certainly included himself. In the same way, Meyer properly observes that ἀσεβής, ungodly, must not be diluted into ἀδίκος, unrighteous. Faith perceives that the foundation of the ἀδικία is the ἀπίστια (chap. i. 21), alienation from God; and, because of its deeper knowledge of sin, applies to the grace of God. The πιστὶς ἐν ἑσέ cannot merely denote a faith in the direction toward some one, but a believing self-surrender on the ground of God's grace (Acts xvi. 31, &c.).

Ver. 6. Even as David. The introduction of David completely establishes the fact that the justification of man is a justification of the sinner, and that the believer perceives his sins; for, in relation to David, both his guilt and pardon were conceded by the Jews. And now David must also testify to this truth. Even as (καθ' ὅσον) indicates that David is quoted for the elucidation and proof of what has been said already in vers. 4 and 5. He is quoted, not as a universal example of justification in general, but in special proof that it is such a justification of the sinner as excludes the merit of works. [Vers. 7 and 8 prove clearly that the forgiveness of sins belongs to justification; but this is only the negative part, with which is inseparably connected the positive part, namely, the imputation and application of the righteousness of Christ, and this contains the germ and power of sanctification.—P. S.] Tholuck: "By the negative statement, Calvin was led to insist that the idea of the justificatio is exhausted with the condonatio peccatorum (Inst. iii. 11). The same thing is done by the Protestant doctrinal theology before the Formula Concordia—which first expressly added the νιοθεσία, which is really included therein." Compare, however, the Heidelberg Catechism, Question 60.† The beatitude from Ps. xxxii. 1 and 2 is quoted from the Septuagint. [See Textual Note *] The choice of verbs in ver. 7 corresponds to the substantives. The ἀμαρτία is a debt doomed to prison; it is released, and thus abolished; the ἀμαρτία is the ground of it, and is covered from God's eye (עֵינַי מִכֶּסֶף)—that is, abolished by Him.

SECOND PARAGRAPH (VERS. 9-12).

Justification applies also to the Gentiles. It is a justification for all.

Ver. 9. (Is) this blessedness [ὁ μακαρισμός, the pronouncing happy, congratulation, Seligpreisung], then, upon the circumcision. The question now is, whether the beatitude described by David applies only to the Jews. The expositors have supplied different words: Tholuck [Stuart, Philippi, Meyer, ed. 4.], and others, ἐστί; Meyer [Fritzsche, De Wette, Alford, Hodges], λέγεται [comp. Heb. vii. 18; Mark ix. 12], with reference to ver. 6 (others, πίπτει [Theophylact], ῥέλει [Ecumenius], ἐργεται [Olshausen], γέγρε). The λέγεται has less foundation than ἐστί. [It is always safer to supply the simplest word.—P. S.]—Or also upon the uncircumcision? The also shows that the previous clause is to be understood in the exclusive sense: upon the circumcision only. [Some MSS. add μόνον.—P. S.]—For we say. The γὰρ presupposes that the Apostle has already mentally expected an affirmative reply to the question, Or upon the uncircumcision also? [The form of the question, too, with ἢ καί, presupposes an affirmative answer to the second clause, and this implied affirmation is made the ground of the argumentation, vers. 10-12. De Wette and Alford.—P. S.] The τῷ Ἀβρ. is certainly emphatic, as Fritzsche, De Wette [Alford], and others, maintain, though Meyer denies it; for the whole of the following argument proceeds from the person of Abraham. [For we say that to Abraham faith was reckoned for righteousness.—P. S.]

Ver. 10. Not in circumcision, but. According to Gen. xv., Abraham was justified about fourteen years before his circumcision, Gen. xvii. [Consequently his circumcision was not the effective cause and condition, but the Divine ratification of grace already received.—P. S.]

Ver. 11. And he received a sign of circumcision [καὶ σημεῖον ἔλαβεν περιτομῆς]. Genitive of apposition [i. e., a sign which consisted in circumcision. Van Hengel and Hofmann, preferring the reading περιτομῇ to περιτομῆς, explain: As a sign he received circumcision, as a seal (σφραγίδα in apposition to σημεῖον). Meyer objects that thus: "How art thou righteous before God? Answer: Only by true faith in Jesus Christ. That is: although my conscience accuse me, that I have grievously sinned against all the commandments of God, and have never kept any of them, and that I am still prone always to all evil, yet God, without any merit of mine, of mere grace, grants and imputes to me the perfect satisfaction, righteousness, and holiness of Christ, as if I had never committed nor had any sin, and had myself accomplished all the obedience which Christ has fulfilled for me, if only I accept such benefit with a believing heart."—P. S.]

* [This must refer to a former edition; for, in the 4th ed. of 1865, Meyer gives the preference to ἐστί: "Als das sich von selbst versteht: Verbum wird am einfachsten ἐστί gedacht (vergl. II. 9, Note IV. 33, al.); weniger naheliegend: λέγεται aus v. 6."—P. S.]

† [The order of the words is simply rhetorical and euphonic, and gives no emphasis to συνίεναι. See Tholuck and Philippi.—P. S.]

* According to Reiche, Abraham is the μὴ ἰσχυόμενος, the ἀσέβης; and this word alludes to the early idolatry of Abraham, which is described by Philo, Josephus, and Malmonides. Grotius, and others, have adopted the same opinion.

† [This question of the Heidelberg Catechism, which was first published in 1563, contains one of the best statements of the evangelical doctrine of justification, and clearly brings out the positive element, which Tholuck wrongly takes from the Form of Concord of the year 1577. It reads in the first case, σημειον, in the second, περιτομήν, ought to have the article, and explains: Ein Zeichen mit welchem er durch die Beschneidung versehen ward, empfangt er als Siegel—i. e., a sign, with which he was provided in circumcision, he received as seal. But the article is sometimes omitted where the reference is specific, and where there is no danger of mistake; comp. Winer, p. 118 f. σημειον, sign, token, symbol, τίς. Circumcision was the sign of the covenant God made with Abraham, Gen. xvii. 11; God, on His part, promising the Messianic κληρονομία (Gen. xv. 5, 18), and Abraham, on his part, exercising the obedience of faith which was reckoned to him for righteousness (Gen. xv. 6). Hence Paul represents it as a seal of the righteousness of faith. This was not only a "legitimate dogmatic inference" (Meyer), but, as Tholuck remarks, a historical necessity, since the sign of the covenant was granted in consequence of the faith previously shown.—P. S.]—The seal. The seal denotes here the symbolical and sacramental sealing; from this, the real sealing of Abraham, which was given him after the offering of Isaac, Gen. xxii. 1, is still to be distinguished (see the Biblework on Genesis xxii.). "It is also represented in the Talmud as the sign and seal of the covenant. See Schöttgen and Wetstein in loc. These words belonged to the formula of circumcision: 'Benedictus sis, qui sanctificavit dilectum ab utero, et signum (τίς) posuit in carne, et filios suos sigillavit (σφραγισεν) signo fœderis sancti.' Beracoth, f. xiii. 1." Meyer [foot-note]. Christian writers [Acta Thomæ, § 26; Grabe, Spicileg. Patr. l. p. 338] speak in the same way of the water of baptism as a seal [ἡ σφραγὶς τοῦ λουτροῦ]. A seal here means a mark of Divine ratification of a justification already received, a "signaculum rei actæ," not a "pignus rei agenda;" comp. 1 Cor. ix. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 19. We have here an intimation of the true idea of sacraments: they are signs, seals, and means of grace, but not the grace itself. Circumcision is not the covenant, neither is baptism regeneration. A sign and seal can never be the substitute for the thing signed and sealed, nor should it be made a ground of confidence and hope; but it is all-important as a Divine ratification, and gives, so to say, legal validity to our claims, as the governmental seal to a written instrument. Without the seal of circumcision, Abraham would have had no certain guarantee of the Divine favor; and if justification by faith is abstractly separated from the church and the means of grace, it becomes a subjective fiction of man.—P. S.]—That he might be the father. The spiritual father is meant here. Abraham is the father of faith. "The conception of author, founder, is also contained in that of father; comp. Job. xxxviii. 28; Gen. iv. 21; 1 Macc. ii. 54;" Tholuck.—On the idea of Abraham's spiritual children, see Matt. iii. 9; John viii. 37, 38. Gal. iii. 8, 29, is a parallel.—That righteousness might be reckoned also to them. This means the sense in which Abraham, as a believing Gentile, has become the father of believing Gentiles.

Ver. 12. And the father of circumcision. Prominence is here given to the life of faith, the proof of faith, in connection with circumcision for faith. We remark on the language: 1. ἐς τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸν must be mentally repeated after καὶ. 2. τοῖς, the dative commodi [for those], comes in the place of faith. 3. Instead of ἀλλὰ καὶ τοῖς στοιχείουσιν, we should expect ἀλλὰ καὶ στοιχοῦσι without the article. Tholuck: "The καὶ τοῖς; is an 'unexamples' solecism in the Apostle's language." Theodoret, Hervæus, Luther, and others, have assumed a transposition: τοῖς οὖν, instead of οἱ τοῖς. Meyer and Tholuck reject this. Rückert defends the supposition of a transposition; Fritzsche excuses the article; Reiche defends it [so does Stuart; both regard it as a resumption of the sentence begun with the preceding τοῖς, and interrupted by the οὖν ἐκ περιτομῆς μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ.—P. S.] It may be asked, whether οἱ οὖν ἐκ περιτομῆς μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ οἱ στοιχοῦντες could be said. And this would certainly be practicable, if we could place οὗτος after μόνον. They are not only the people of the circumcision, but also those who walk, &c. The faith of the real Jews is not only here made prominent, but also their life of faith; no doubt with reference to the fact that these believing Jews, like Abraham, should be the humane publishers of salvation to the Gentiles. [τοῖς ἔχουσιν, the dative after στοιχοῦν is not local, but normative; comp. Gal. v. 18, 35; vi. 16; Phil. iii. 16; Meyer.—P. S.]

THIRD PARAGRAPH (VERS. 13-17).

Ver. 13. For not through (the) law is the promise to Abraham, or to his seed, that he should be the heir of the world. (See Gal. iii.) Ver. 13 does not simply establish the preceding (Meyer), since that is established of itself. The foregoing statement is indeed strengthened by the discussion which now follows (therefore: for); but the latter also sets forth a new privilege of the righteousness of faith, namely, its release from the law. See De Wette.—Not through the law. The law declared only the possession of Canaan by the Jews; but the promise which Abraham received pledged to him and his believing children the whole earth as an inheritance.—Through the law; that is, not per justitiam legis (Pareus, and others), but with the Mosaic legislation. [De Wette and Alford: "διὰ νόμου, not, 'under the law,' nor, 'by works of the law;' nor, 'by the righteousness of the law;' but, through the law, so that the law should be the ground, or efficient cause, or medium, of the promise."—P. S.]—The promise (sc. ἐστί) to Abraham, or to his seed. This is the great Messianic ἐπαγγελία κατ' ἐξοχήν. The ἡ, or, expresses the indivisibility of the promise to Abraham and his seed—that is, his believing seed (Gal. iii. 9)—and cannot be replaced by καὶ, or be divided thus: neither to Abraham nor his seed (Meyer). Abraham inherits with his seed, and his seed inherits with Abraham (see Matt. viii. 11; Heb. xi.). According to Estius, Olshausen, and others, the seed is Christ, conformably to Gal. iii. 16. Meyer says: "Not Christ;" which is just as incorrect as the limitation of the seed to Christ.—That he should be the heir of the world [τὸ κληρονόμουν αὐτὸν εἶναι κόσμον]. The τό introduces an explanatory declaration of the import of the promise. The αὐτός refers to Abraham, because he, in his person, represents also his seed. "In the promises, Gen. xiii. 15; xvii. 8; xlii. 17, 18, the blessing bestowed on Abraham in chap. xii. is expressly transferred to his seed;" Tholuck. It may be asked now, Where has this promise of the possession of the world been given to Abraham? The promises which the Old Testament furnishes in reference to the hereditary possession of Abraham seem to include only the land of Canaan; Gen. xii. 7: "Unto thy seed will I give this land" (Canaan); chap. xiii. 14, 15: "Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward: for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever;" chap. xv. 18: "From the river of Egypt unto the great river; the river Euphrates;" chap. xvii. 8: "All the land of Canaan;" chap. xxii. 17: "Thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies" (comp. chap. xxvi. 3, the repetition of the promise to Isaac; and Exod. vi. 4, the legal establishment). In all these there is no promise of the inheritance of the world. It is not correct to consider κόσμος and γῆ as identical. Thus Meyer says: "The hereditary possession of the land of Canaan, which was promised to Abraham and his posterity (Gen. xii. 7, &c.), was regarded in the Jewish christology as the government of the world by the Messianic theocracy, which was supposed to be typically indicated in Gen. xxii. 'Abraham patri meo Deus possidendum dedit CŒLUM ET TERRAM;' Tanchuma, p. 163, 1; see also Wetstein. The idea of the Messianic sovereignty of the world, which underlies this Jewish particularistic view, is not set aside in the New Testament, but it is brought out by Christ Himself (Matt. v. 5) in allegorical form (Matt. xix. 28 ff.; Luke xxii. 30; Matt. xxv. 21), divested of its Judaistic notion, and elevated to christological truth. It is necessary, because of the universal sovereignty to which Christ Himself is exalted (Matt. xxviii. 18; John xvii. 5; Phil. ii. 9; Eph. iv. 10, &c.); and because of the necessary communion between His disciples and Himself." But we can hardly suppose that the Apostle would here apply against the Jews the promise of the land of Canaan to the Jews, in its higher signification. We must keep in view the significant passage, Gen. xxii. 17, 18: "Blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemy. And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Here we have the germ of the same promise (Origen, Chrysostom, Bengel, and others). Superiority is declared by the very position of the one who blesses, and the earth itself is meant by the nations of the earth. Tholuck remarks, on the contrary, that by κόσμος we must then understand the σπίρμα itself, so far as it is led to faith, and that this cannot be regarded at once as κληρονομία and κληρονομία. But the σπίρμα, as the organ of the world's conversion, must be distinguished from the σπίρμα, as the converted world. God is the inheritance of believers, as believers are the inheritance of God. De Wette, in summing up the different explanations, says: "ἡ κληρονομία τοῦ κόσμου is not an indefinite allegorical blessedness (Flat); not the reception of all nations into the theocracy (Melancthon, Beza, Bengel, Chrysostom, Theodoret, &c.); not the possession of Canaan and some adjacent countries, 'qua felicitas arcanam gerebat inaginem æternæ felicitatis' (Grotius); nor of the earth (Rosenmüller, Koppe, Köllner, Rückert), in the sense of the political sovereignty of the world; nor is it a possession of the future world (Calov.*); still less of the beneficia spiritualia (Bald.), or sub typo terræ Canaan non modo spes celestis vite, sed plena et solida Dei benedictio (Calvin); but it is the dominion over the world, which, with all its opposing forces, shall be subjected to Christ and the Christians (Reiche, Meyer, Fritzsche)." Obviously too many negations!—We must bear in mind, that in the Messianic promise given to Abraham, the struggle and the dominion are indicated only finally; the chief idea is the blessing. If all the nations of the earth were to be really blessed by Abraham's seed, then his seed must be able to dispose of a world of blessing. [The promise will be literally fulfilled when the kingdoms of the world are given to the people of the Most High, and Christ will rule with His saints forever and ever; Dan. vii. 27; Apoc. xi. 15; xii. 10; Matt. v. 5; 2 Tim. ii. 12.—P. S.]—By the righteousness of faith. This was the fundamental gift by which the promise of the world was conditioned. Meyer thinks that, because of the date of the justification, Gen. xv [i. e., after the promise had been given; Gen. xii. 3, 7; xiii. 15, 16.—P. S.], Paul must have here in mind only later passages [xv. 18; xvii. 8, where the promise is repeated.—P. S.]. But, according to Gen. xii., Abraham's life of faith had begun at the time of his emigration. [The faith of Abraham covered the whole period of the promise, which was made and repeatedly confirmed to his faith.—P. S.]

Ver. 14. For if they who are of the law. Proof that Abraham's believing children, but not they who, in contrast with them, rely on the law and its deeds, shall inherit the world. The νόμος, according to Flat, the moral law; according to Meyer, the Mosaic law; both, according to Tholuck. The Apostle is certainly not concerned here exclusively with the idea of the Mosaic νόμος, as such, but rather with the idea of the legal standpoint, or of the law, considered abstractly in itself, and in contrast with the promise. And it may be said of the natural moral law, too, that it worketh wrath. Οἱ ἐκ νόμου are not people who are still under the law as such, but whose life-principle is the law, and who wish to be justified by the law. [οἱ ἐκ νόμου], those of law = adherents of the law, legalists. This periphrase is of frequent occurrence; comp. οἱ ἐξ ἐπιθυμίας, those of self-seeking = self-seeking partisans; ii. 8; οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, the circumcised; iv. 12; Tit. i. 10; Acts x. 45; xi. 2; οἱ ἐκ πίστεως, the believers; Gal. iii. 7, 9; Rom. iv. 16; οἱ ἐξ Ἰσραὴλ, the Israelites; Rom. ix. 6, &c.; comp. Xenoph., Anab. i. 2, 18, οἱ ἐκ τῇ ἀγορᾷ, the market people. The preposition ἐκ (out of) indicates here the origin and character.—P. S.]—Be heirs, faith is made void. At the time when this decisive word was uttered, it had not only a great spiritual, but also a great prophetic meaning. Judging from external signs, it was more probable that the Jews, rather than the Christians, would inherit the earth. They had a powerful prominence, wide dissemination, and synagogues all over the world. But the Apostle was sure of his cause, and wished clearly to distinguish the future of faith from the future of that darkened legalism. Yet his thought is not: if the legalists are heirs, believers cannot be; but, if the legalists are heirs, there will be no inheritance of the promise at all. Faith is made void—that is, it loses its import, the righteousness of faith—by wrath in the conscience; the promise is made powerless by the wrath of historical judgments, because it was only intended for faith.

Ver. 15. Because the law worketh wrath

* [By a typographical mistake, the original, in the second as well as the first edition, reads Calvin, instead of Calovius, who was a fierce Lutheran polemic of the seventeenth century, and author of the Biblia illustrata, in refutation of the commentaries of Grotius.—P. S.]

The operation of the law is to reveal sin and to represent it as transgression, as well in the conscience as in the life itself. Therefore it produces wrath, which, according to the Divine sentence and government, bursts forth from the internal and external life as the severe judgment of dissolution and of death. For where there is no law, neither is there transgression (of the law); and where there is no transgression, there is no wrath. But inversely, the law fully reveals transgression, and, with transgression, wrath and condemnation to death. The proof that the law worketh wrath, is therefore negative. This operation is meant to apply first of all to the Mosaic law, as is proved by Rom. v. 13, 14, particularly by the distinction between ἁμαρτία and παράβασις (see 1 Tim. ii. 14; Gal. iii. 19). Tholuck quotes Augustine: "Sine lege potest esse quis iniquus, sed non pravaricator," and says that "this difference has generally been observed ever since. But where it has not been observed, such παρρηγορηταί have arisen, as with Luther (on Gal. iii. 19), who introduces, from chap. vii. 5; v. 20, the thought that the lust of sin is dormant without the law." Tholuck also properly remarks, that the axiom of chap. v. 13, ἁμαρτία οὐκ ἔστιν ἔλλογιται μὴ ὄντος νόμου, can be understood only relatively of a less quantity of guilt, as is proved by the judgment of the Deluge, and other judgments. He quotes Thomas Aquinas: "Et tamen omne peccatum potest dici pravaricatio, in quantum legem naturalem transgreditur." [But Thomas adds: "Gravius tamen est transgredi simul legem naturalem et legem scriptam, quam solum legem naturalem. Et ideo lege data crevit pravaricatio et majorem iram promeruit."] Yet the ἔλλογιται of chap. v. 13 is to be emphasized so as to denote God's real reckoning with the sinner by His law, which first causes the natural punishment of the sinner to assume the clear blaze of wrath. Man can obtain salvation only by this passage through the judgment of death. For this reason the Apostle does not deny the necessity of the law; but with him it is a means for an end, and constitutes the pedagogic point of transition for the pious under the law (ὑπὸ νόμον, chap. vi. 14, 15). But people of the law (οἱ ἐκ νόμου), who seek justification ἐξ ἔργων (chap. iv. 2) because they are in feeling ἐξ ἐπιθυμίας (chap. ii. 8), make the means an end. They seek their life in the single precepts and observance of the law, in pride in the possession of the law, and in the settlement of their account with God; and by this course they find their existence in the fire of wrath, but, unlike the salamander, they find no comfort in the fire. They do not make the law their preparation for faith, but the antithesis of faith; and they endeavor, by the fire of their fanaticism, to entice from a joyous and bright life those who are happy in faith, and to draw them into their own gloomy heat. For other explanations of ὀργή, see Tholuck. Cocceius: The ceremonial law is the emanation of wrath; J. Müller: ὀργή must be understood subjectively—the consciousness of wrath; Melancthon: The ὀργή is the sinner's wrath toward the avenging God.

Ver. 16. Therefore it is of faith. The inference from vers. 14, 15. That cannot be; therefore this must stand true. Ἐκ πίστεως. Supply: ἡ κληρονομία γίνεται (Beza, Bengel); ἡ ἐπαγγελία τῷ Ἀβρ. ἐστὶ καὶ τῷ σπέρματι αὐτοῦ (Grotius, Fritzsche, Tholuck in earlier editions, and others); δικαιοσύνη (Luther); or, better, οἱ κληρονόμοι εἰσὶ Meyer, De Wette, and Tholuck, referring to ver.

14, where ἐκ πίστεως and ἐκ νόμου appear as antitheses). This last seems the most appropriate; yet in ver. 14 we read not οἱ κληρονόμοι, but οἱ ἐκ νόμου—κληρονόμοι; and further on it is οἱ ἐκ πίστεως. Therefore, we must merely supply either κληρονόμοι or ἐστὶ.—That it might be by grace. Faith is here plainly denoted the homogeneous organ of grace. It is grace, and not man's faith, that is the source of that general surety of God's promise; but grace makes faith the organ, just as wrath manifests itself in the work of the law. ἵνα denotes here the consistency of the principle of faith, which certainly rests upon a Divine determination. Tholuck supplies ὥσυν.

In order that the promise might be sure to all the seed [εἰς τὸ εἶναι βεβαίαν τὴν ἐπαγγελίαν παντὶ τῷ σπέρματι]. The εἰς denotes the result designed by God—that the promise of His grace be communicated to faith. By this determination the fact is secured, that the promise holds good for his collective seed—that is, for his entire spiritual posterity.—Not to that only which is of the law, &c. The τῷ ἐκ τοῦ νόμου denotes here the historical origin of the whole body of faithful Jews. The τῷ ἐκ πίστεως, as antithesis, denotes the faithful Gentiles. They form a totality by which Abraham is the father of all (see vers. 11, 12).

Ver. 17. As it is written. Gen. xvii. 5; where a natural posterity of many nations is promised to Abraham in relation to his name.* Yet this promise has its ground in his faith (vers. 18, 19), and hence Paul very properly regarded it as the type of his spiritual posterity. The spiritual relation is also implied in the Divine appointment, τίθεικά σε.—[It was] in the sight of him whom he believed [κατέναντι οὗ ἐπίστευσεν θεοῦ†]. On account of the connection with what has preceded, the difficult word κατέναντι must be here explained [as far as the construction is concerned]. 1. Luther follows the reading ἐπίστευσας [before God, whom thou hast believed] of the Codd. F. G., It., and others, and finds here a continuation of God's words. An attempt to explain the connection. 2. Bretschneider: "in view of which word," οὗ sc. εἰρημέτρου. 3. Meyer, Tholuck [Alford, Hodge], and others: The quotation, καθὼς—σε, is parenthetical [so also in the E. V.], and κατέναντι must be connected with ὡς ἐστὶ πατὴρ πάντων ἡμῶν [i. e., Abraham is the father of us all, not physically, but spiritually, in the sight and estimation of God, with whom there are no obstacles of nature or time.—P. S.] Meyer [and also Winer, Gramm., p. 156, 7th ed.] thus resolves the attraction: κατέναντι τοῦ θεοῦ, κατέναντι οὗ ἐπίστευσεν [i. e., before God, before whom, or, in whose sight he believed], according to the analogous attraction of Luke i. 4; and rejects the more common resolution [adopted also by Fritzsche] of the attraction κατέναντι θεοῦ, ᾧ ἐπίστευσεν [before God, whom he believed—a form of attraction with the dative, which is very unusual; see Winer, p. 156, and Meyer in loc.—P. S.]. See Meyer, for other attempts at construction. But what are we to understand by the expression: he is the father of us all before God? The idea of a substitution by Abraham, which might easily be inferred from the language, would be foreign to the Apostle. 4. We supply ἐγένετο [before κατέναντι], and explain thus: As it is written, "I have made thee a father of many nations;" it took place in the presence of God, or, it came to pass there, in the place where he stood believing before God, that he was made the father of many nations; before Him, namely, God, &c. He who is justified, who receives God's promise, stands before God. [Philippi, without parenthesizing καθώς—σε, supplies after this quotation: And as such—viz., as father of nations—he stands in the sight of God, &c.—P. S.]

A.—Abraham's Faith (vers. 17-23).

Ver. 17. Before him whom he believed, even God. Explanations of coram [κατέναντι], literally, down over against, opposite to, like the classical κατεναντίον; then = κατενώπιον, coram, so here, and often in the LXX., for נֶגֶד—P. S.]: 1. According to the will (Reiche). 2. According to the decision (Rückert, and others). 3. Vi atque potestate divina (Koppe). 4. Before God's omniscience (Olshausen). 5. Meyer [p. 178, footnote]: "We must leave it without explanation. Abraham is represented as standing before God who has appeared to him." But it denotes the first element of the Abrahamic faith. Abraham, as the friend of God, stands in the view of the living God of revelation, the speaking God, who is at the same time the God of miracles and new creations; and it is while Abraham is there, that he is appointed the father of many nations. (Theodoret, Theophylact, and others, have explained κατέναντι as equal to ὁμοίως τῷ θεῷ; Grotius has divided the sentence into question and answer; see Meyer).—Κατέναντι οὐ ἐπιστευσεν, standing before Him, he believed the promise on the spot.

Who quickeneth the dead. [The present tense ζωοποιεῖν and καλοῦν is used to indicate the continued manifestation of God's creative power in every physical and in every spiritual birth.—P. S.] "The ζωοποιεῖν τοὺς νεκρούς is the solemn characteristic of the omnipotent God," says Meyer. The doctrine of the omnipotence of God, as the wonder-working power of the God of revelation, has been directed from the beginning to the consummation of the revelation in the resurrection of Christ, and subsequently to the special and general resurrection (Eph. i. 19 ff.). This is evident from those passages of the Old Testament which represent the wonder-working power of God as a power to bring the dead to life, produced by it (Deut. xxxii. 39; 1 Sam. ii. 6; Isa. xxvi. 19; lili. 10; Ezek. xxxvii. 1 ff.; Hosea xiii. 14; Dan. xii. 1, 2; comp. Book of Wisdom, vi. 13; Tobit xiii. 2; John v. 21; 2 Cor. i. 9; 1 Tim. vi. 13). The Apostle, with profound penetration, sees this miraculous power which raises the dead to life, foreshadowed already in the promise of Isaac. For he does not have in view the offering of Isaac (according to Erasmus, Grotius, Baumgarten-Crusius), although the stronger expression seems to have been selected also with reference to that last believing act of Abraham. Neither is the awakening of the spiritually dead chiefly meant (according to Origen, Anselm and others). Nevertheless, we would not, with Meyer, altogether reject these explanations as false; for the external awakenings stand in the most intimate reciprocal relation with the internal. In fact, the former are generally conditioned by the latter; as we see that Abraham had to believe first in the promise given to him.

And calleth those things, which are not, as though they were [literally, calling things not being, as being, καλοῦντος τὰ μὴ ὄντα ὡς ὄντα. Τὰ μὴ ὄντα differs from τὰ οὐκ ὄντα in that it presents the non-existence as conditional: if they are not; or as relative only, inasmuch as all things preëxist ideally and subjectively in the Divine mind before they are created and set forth objectively.—P. S.]. Two explanations: * 1. Reference to the creative agency of God (Tholuck, and most expositors). Καλῶν often denotes God's creative call, to summon into being, into existence (Isa. xli. 4; xlviii. 13; 2 Kings viii. 1; Book of Wisdom, xi. 25; comp. Ps. xxxiii. 9). Philo [De creat. princ., p. 728 B.]: τὰ μὴ ὄντα ἐκάλειν εἰς τὸ εἶναι. This explanation admits of several modifications: a. The first creative act is thought of (Estius). b. God's continued creation is in mind (Köllner; reference to the particip. pres.). c. A constant attribute of God is denoted (Tholuck). Meyer holds that this whole interpretation is destroyed by the ὡς ὄντα; for, in the New Testament, ὡς is nowhere the same as εἰς. Yet Tholuck adduces proof in favor of the signification εἰς τὸ εἶναι ὡς ὄντα. [He refers to 1 Cor. i. 8; 2 Cor. iii. 6; 1 Thess. v. 23; Jude 24. Comp. Phil. iii. 21, where the accusative σὺμμορφον, like unto his glorious body, is the accusative of effect = so as to be like.—P. S.] De Wette: ὡς ὄντα can indeed not be a substitute for εἰς ὄντα = εἰς τὸ εἶναι, but it can be a substitute for ὡς ὁδόμενα, or for εἰς τὸ εἶναι ὡς ὄντα (Reiche, and others). 2. Meyer, and others (Rückert, Philippi): Who pronounces his enacting command over what does not exist, as over what does exist.† It is not necessary to prove that, even in reference to the creation, this is the full sense (see Heb. xi. 3); the ideal preëxistence of things in the mind of God is therewith intimated. Nevertheless, the idea of the καλῶν—to call into existence, or into appearance—must be retained. Meyer holds that the things which are not, that God called into existence, are, according to Gen. xv., the posterity

* [Or three, rather; but the third, which refers καλῶν to the effectual calling of unborn men by the Holy Spirit, and explains: "God calls to be His children those who were not children," is entirely foreign to the context. It is strange that even the rationalistic Fritzsche explains: "homines nondum in lucem editos tantquam editos ad vitam æternam invitat." The ἐκλογή and πρόγνωση of God precedes the birth, but the ἐλπίς only refers to living men.—P. S.]

† [Tholuck doubts that καλῶν, נָקַד, ever means, to command, to dispose of; but comp. Ps. i. 1; Isa. xl. 26; xlv. 3; xlviii. 3. Meyer and Philippi quote two striking parallel passages from Philo, De Jos., p. 544, C., where he speaks of the imagination as forming τὰ μὴ ὄντα ὡς ὄντα, and Artemidor, i. 53, where it is said of the painter that he represents τὰ μὴ ὄντα ὡς ὄντα. To these quotations I may add the famous lines of Shakespeare on the creative power of the poet's genius (Midsummer-Night's Dream, Act v. Scene 1):

"The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven
And, as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name."—P. S.]

of Abraham. But Abraham's faith undoubtedly presupposed earlier deeds of omnipotence. The elements of God's creative power, and of His renewing power, are comprehended together in the conception of His miraculous power. The creative word is a symbol and pledge of every new creative word which is spoken subsequently.

Ver. 18. Who against hope believed in hope [ὅς παρ' ἐλπίδα ἐν' ἐλπίδι ἐπιστεύει]. Faith in miracles, which is itself a miracle, corresponds to the gracious God who worketh miracles. Established on the ground of hope, he believed against the appearance of hope. Meyer solves the oxymoron incorrectly: Abraham's faith was against hope in an objective relation, and yet it was established on hope in a subjective relation. Tholuck's view is better: His faith is a "Yea" established on the word of God, in opposition to the "No" in the sphere of finite causes. 'Εν' ἐλπίδι, 1 Cor. ix. 10. [ἐν' ἐλπίδι is not adverbial = confidently, but ἐν signifies the subjective ground of his faith. Faith is the organ of the supernatural, and holds fast to the Invisible as if it saw Him. Hope is faith itself, as directed to the future.—P. S.].

That he might become. Three explanations of εἰς: 1. Of the result—so that he might become (Flatt, Fritzsche, and others). 2. He believed that he should be. That is, εἰς τὸ γεν. is the object of ἐπιστ. (Beza, Reiche, and others). 3. It contains the purpose of the ἐπιστ. ordained by God (Meyer, and others). This is favored by the following κατὰ τὸ ὑποσχεθὲν. [So also Alford, Hodge: He believed, in order that, agreeably to the purpose of God, he might become the father of many nations.]—According to that which was spoken. See, in Gen. xv. 5, the reference to the stars of heaven. Codd. F. and G. insert the comparison: as the stars of heaven, and as the sand upon the sea-shore (the latter from Gen. xxii. 17).

Ver. 19. And being not weak in faith. A meiosis [μείωσις, diminution], according to Theophylact and Beza [i. e., the negative form for the positive: being strong]. So also Tholuck and Meyer.] The sense is rather that, in the long trial, his faith did not grow weary, but stronger, in spite of the difficulties in his path.—He considered [not, οὐ, κατενόησεν. Tholuck says: "The omission of the οὐ in important MSS., such as A. C. [to which must be added Cod. Sin. and B.—P. S.], the Syriac Version, and others, was occasioned by having regard to Gen. xvii. 17, where Abraham does certainly reflect upon finite causes. For this reason the sense was thought to be, that he reflected without being weak in faith. But Paul had in view only Gen. xv. 5, 6, according to which Abraham accepted the promise at once without hesitation." [So also Meyer.] But Paul means plainly a steadfast faith, which became more vigorous by the trial of many years of waiting, and whose strength was augmented by the temptations occurring in the meantime.*—

* [Stuart, Hodge, and Wordsworth take no notice of this important difference of reading. Alford brackets εἰς, but prefers it as being better suited to the context; the object being to extol Abraham's faith. Omitting οὐ, the sense will be: "And not being weak in the faith, he was indeed well aware of," &c., "but (ὅς) did not stagger at the promise," &c.; or, "although he was aware of," &c., "yet did he not." This agrees better with εἰς in ver. 20; but we miss in this case εἰς after κατενόησεν. The dogmatic idea of the passage is well brought out by Calvin, who is followed by Philippi and Hodge. A similar obstruction of faith, as the one recorded of Abraham, Gen. xvii. 17, occurred in the life of John the Baptist; Matt. xi. 2 ff.—P. S.]

His own body now dead. Abraham was more than ninety-nine years old when the promise was fulfilled (after the circumcision, Gen. xvii. 24), and Sarah was more than ninety years old. The terms γενεαρχωμένων and γένεσις, in reference to generative death (Heb. xi. 12), must not be taken absolutely, but be considered according to the measure of experience and the usual course of nature. Bengel: "Post Semum (Shem) nemo centum annorum generasse Gen. xi. legitur." [The difficulty concerning the later children of Abraham and Keturah, Gen. xxv. 1, 2, Augustin (De civit. Dei, xvi. 28) and Bengel removed, by assuming that the generative power miraculously conferred upon Abraham continued to his death. Bengel: Novus corporis vigor etiam mansit in matrimonio cum Keturah. So also Philippi and Meyer.—P. S.]

Ver. 20. He staggered not at the promise of God. The δέ, which is an expression of antithesis, appears at first sight to favor κατενόησεν, the reading of the Codd. A. C., instead of οὐ κατενόησεν. But it constitutes another antithesis. Ver. 19 says, that he continued steadfast in faith, in spite of the contradiction of sensuous experience; that he did not regard natural appearance. Ver. 20, on the contrary, expresses the idea: Neither was he doubtful by unbelief concerning the promise itself. For unbelief is not produced merely by reflecting doubtfully on the contradiction of sensuous experience, but also by an immediate want of confidence in the miraculous promise itself which belongs to the sphere of invisible life. He was not only not weak in faith in his disregard of sensuous improbability, but, while looking at the promise, he grew even stronger in faith; for he overcame the temptation of a subtle misinterpretation of the promise. According to Meyer, the δέ is only explanatory; but Tholuck, and most expositors, regard it as expressing an antithesis. According to Rückert, the article in τῇ ἀπιστίᾳ denotes the unbelief common to man; but it denotes unbelief as such, whose nature is to doubt the promise of God. Therefore other explanations are superfluous (Meyer: in consequence of the unbelief which he would have had in this case).^{*} The passive form, ἐνεδυναμώθη, arises from his undoubting aim toward the promise. The promise has the effect of always strengthening the faith of him who looks at it. Therefore Grotius disturbs the real meaning of the word, when he takes it in the middle voice, he strengthened himself. Even the intransitive meaning which Tholuck accepts, "to grow strong," fails in the same way to satisfy the relation between the promise and the steadfast gaze of faith.

Ver. 20. Giving glory to God. To give God the glory (גָּבַד or נָתַן, or שָׁבַח); a mark of faith which God, as the revealed God, can demand. John ix. 24 was spoken hypocritically; John xii. 48 is indirectly expressed. Comp. also Luke xvii. 18, 19; Rom. i. 21; 1 John v. 10; Rev. xix. 7; comp. Philippi and Meyer on this passage, both of whom amplify the meaning. Tholuck says better: "Then unbelief is a robbery of God's glory. It does not easily occur except in a state of trial (?), but it does so occur in such a state. Therefore Calvin says: Extra certamen quidem nemo Deum omnia posse negat; verum simulac obijciatur aliquid, quod carum promissionum Dei impediatur, Dei virtutem e suo gradu deicimus."

* [Meyer and Philippi take τῇ ἀπιστίᾳ as an instrumental dative; τῇ πίστει as a dative of reference: "Er schwankte nicht vermöge des Unglaubens (den er in diesem Falle gehabt haben würde), sondern wurde stark an Glauben (den er hatte).—P. S.]

Ver. 21. And being fully persuaded. According to Lachmann (contrary to Tischendorf), the καὶ before πληροφορηθεὶς is strongly attested by the Codd. A. B. C., &c. If the καὶ is omitted, we have here the reason for the fact that he gave God the glory. With the καὶ, the words suitably explain the manner in which he gave God the glory; for he was fully convinced that He was the El Shaddai, and that, by virtue of His omnipotence, He was able to fulfil what He in His truthfulness had promised. It was by this confident looking at the El Shaddai's word of promise that he was made strong ("heroic;" Meyer) in faith. The πληροφ. denotes intellectual activity, knowledge in living faith.*

Ver. 22. Wherefore also it was reckoned to him as righteousness. We must retain καὶ, as authorized by the Codd. A. C. [g.], and others. But we must not overlook the fact that we have here a justification of justification in its essential adaptation. The διδοῦναι δόξαν τῷ θεῷ in faith is a return to the paradisaical or angelic (Isa. vi. 3) attitude to God (Rom. i. 21). Since man gives God the glory, he again participates in the δόξα θεοῦ which he had lost as a sinner (Rom. iii. 23). In justification, believers embrace in their hearts the righteousness of Christ as the principle of the δόξα (Rom. viii. 30; comp. ver. 18). Therefore the spirit of δόξα rests upon them (1 Peter iv. 14) until the revelation of the δόξα of the Lord (1 Peter iv. 13).

B.—The Faith of Christians (vers. 23–25).

[Application of the Scripture testimony of Abraham, the father of the faithful, to the believers in Christ. His method of justification is our method of justification. Calvin: "Abraham persona specimen communis iustitiae, quæ ad omnes spectat." This completes the argument for the vindication of the law through faith; iii. 31.—P. S.]

Ver. 23. Now it was not written for his sake alone. Explanations: 1. Not to his praise, non in ipsius gloriam (Beza, Tholuck). 2. To explain the manner of his justification (Meyer). The sense is this: not only for the purpose of a historical appreciation of Abraham (Rom. xv. 4; 1 Cor. x. 11; Gal. iii. 8), but also to represent him as the type of believers. In the same way the entire Bible has a universal destination for the believers of all times. Meyer quotes Beresh R. 40. 8: Quidquid scriptum est de Abrahamo, scriptum est de filiis ejus. [The aorist ἔγραψεν, it was written, denotes the past historical act of writing, and is used here in order to emphasize the design of God's Spirit

at the time of composition; while the more usual perf. ἔγραπται, it is written, is used in quotations of Scripture passages as we now find them, and as valid for present purposes. Comp. Philippi.—P. S.]

Ver. 24. But for us also, to whom it [viz., the faith in God, or Christ, τὸ πιστεῖν τῷ θεῷ] shall be reckoned [supply: for righteousness, εἰς δικαιοσύνην, as ver. 22]. The μέλλει refers to the divine determination of Christianity as righteousness by faith in all time to come; but, contrary to Fritzsche, it does not refer to justification at the general judgment.

If we believe on him who raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead. [τοῖς πιστεύουσιν "specifies the ἡμᾶς; and the belief is not a mere historical, but a fiducial belief;" Alford.—P. S.] Christian faith is specifically a faith in the risen Christ, or also in the living God of resurrection who raised Him from the dead. It is in this its central point that the finished faith of the New Testament is perfectly in harmony with the central point of Abraham's faith. The germ and fruit of this faith are identical in substance, though they differ very much in form and development. The nearest formal analogy to Abraham's faith is the birth of Christ from the Virgin. The highest exhibition of omnipotence was at the same time the highest exhibition of grace. [Christ's resurrection was a triumph of God's almighty power, similar, though much higher, than the generation of Isaac from the dead body of Abraham; by faith in the miracle of the resurrection, the resurrection is spiritually repeated in us, as we become new creatures in Christ, and walk with Him in newness of life; comp. vi. 3; Eph. i. 19, 20; Col. iii. 1.—P. S.]

Ver. 25. Who was delivered up, &c. ["In these words the Apostle introduces the great subject of chaps. v.—viii., Death, as connected with Sin, and Life as connected with Righteousness;" Alford and Forbea. "Ver. 25 is a comprehensive statement of the gospel;" Hodge. The διὰ means in both clauses, on account of, for the reason of, but with this difference, that it is retrospective in the first, prospective in the second: διὰ τὰ παραπτώματα, because we had sinned, or, in order to secure the remission of our transgressions; διὰ τὴν δικαιοσύνην, not because we had been, but that we might be justified.* To the first διὰ we must supply: for the atonement, or, for the destruction of; to the second: for the procurement of. De Wette zur Büssung—zur Bestätigung. παρεδόθη, a frequent designation of the self-surrender of Christ to death; Isa. liii. 12; Rom. viii. 32; Gal. ii. 20; Eph. v. 25: παρέδωκεν ἑαυτὸν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν. δικαιοσύνης, from δικαίωσις, (only here and v. 18, in opposition to κατάραμα) justification, i. e., the effective declaratory act of putting a man right with the law, or into the status of δικαιοσύνη, righteousness.—P. S.] The antithesis in ver. 25 [παρεδόθη διὰ τὰ παραπτώματα ἡμῶν—ἡγέρθη διὰ τὴν δικαιοσύνην ἡμῶν, the negative ἀπὸ and the positive δικαιοσύνης] is difficult. Tholuck [p. 194]: "This separation, as also that in chap. x. 10, is generally taken as a rhetorical μερ-

* [Bishop Horsley, as quoted by Alford and Wordsworth, takes διὰ, in the second clause, in the sense that Christ was raised because our justification had already been effected by the sacrifice of His death. But this is inconsistent with 1 Cor. xv. 17. Newman explains: because our justification is by the Second Comforter, whom the resurrection brought down from heaven."—P. S.]

πρός, separating that which is in substance indivisible. Yet, in the contemplation of the Apostle, the δικαιώσεις certainly is more nearly related to the resurrection of Christ than to His death, as is shown by the climax of Rom. viii. 34, and by the πολλῶν μᾶλλον of chap. v. 10; comp. 2 Cor. xiii. 4." But the passages cited do not contain the same antithesis. According to Roman Catholic interpretation, δικαιώσεις refers to sanctification (Thomas Aquinas, and others). The old Protestant explanation, on the contrary, referred the first clause to the destruction of sin, and the second to the ratification of the atonement secured thereby (Calvin). Meyer refers the first part to the expiation of our sins, and the second to our justification; with reference to 1 Cor. xv. 17. Tholuck distinguishes between the negative and positive abolition of guilt. In the latter—the δικαιώσεις—Christ's intercession is also included; for the Lutheran theology (Quenstedt) denotes the applicatio acquisita salutis as the purpose of the intercessio [the Reformed theology: patrocinium perpetuum coram Patre adestus Salutaris criminationes]. Melancthon also remarks in this sense: "Quamquam enim præcessit meritum, tamen ita ordinatum fuit ab initio, ut tunc signalis applicaretur, cum fide acciperent." We must bear in mind, however, that the antithesis is not: Christ's death and resurrection, but the deliverance of Christ for our offences, and his resurrection on God's part. The principal weight of the antithesis therefore rests upon the Divine deed of Christ's resurrection; with which justifying faith was first called into living existence. This justifying faith is analogous to Abraham's faith in the God of miracles, who calls new life into being. To this, the deliverance of Christ to death for our sins (transgressions, falls, παράπτωματα) forms a complete antithesis; and to this corresponds, in the single work of redemption, the antithesis: the abolishment of our guilt, and the imputation of His righteousness. Yet, in reality, these two cannot be separated from each other, and the δικαιώσεις here means the general and potential justification which is embraced in the atonement itself, and which, in individual justification by faith, is appropriated by individuals only by virtue of its eternal operation through the intercessio, the gospel, and the spirit of Christ. [See Doctrinal and Ethical, No. 10.—P. S.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. As Paul has proved from the Old Testament the truth of the New Testament, and especially the doctrine of righteousness by faith, so can the evangelical Church confirm the truth of its confession by the best testimonies of the best fathers of the Catholic Church. The evangelical confession of sin and grace is defended against the Romanists by Augustine, and others, in the same way that Abraham defended the believing Gentiles against the Jews. [On Augustine's doctrine of sin and grace, comp. my Church History, vol. iii. pp. 788-865. Augustine differs in form from the Protestant doctrine of justification, since he confounded the term with sanctification; but he agrees with it in spirit, inasmuch as he derived the new life of the believer exclusively from the free grace of God in Christ, and left no room for human boasting. The same may be said of Anselm, St. Bernard, and the forerunners of the Reformation.—P. S.]

2. Here, as in the Epistle to the Galatians, and especially in chap. iii, the Apostle characterizes the Old Testament according to its real fundamental thought—the promise of God, which was revealed in Abraham's faith, and perfectly fulfilled in the New Testament covenant of faith. Accordingly, the Mosaic legislation is only a more definite Old Testament signature; but, as a stage of development, it is subordinate to Abraham's faith (see chap. v. 20; Gal. iii. 17).

Some errors of the present day concerning the Old Testament have in many ways obscured its true relation by the following declarations: (1.) "The Old Testament is essentially Mosaism." In this way the patriarchal system in the past, and the prophetic system in the future, are abolished. (2.) "Mosaism is legal and statutory stationariness." But, on the contrary, the Old Testament is a continuous and living development. (3.) "This stationariness is theocratical despotism; the Jew is absolutely enslaved under the law." This is contradicted by Moses' account of the repeated federal dealings between Jehovah and His people, by the introduction to the Decalogue, as well as by the whole spirit of the Old Testament. It is particularly contradicted by the fact that Jehovah abandons the people to their apostasy, in order to visit them in justice.

3. The signification of Abraham for the doctrine of justification by faith is supplemented by David's example and testimony. Abraham was justified by faith, notwithstanding his many good works; David was likewise justified by faith, notwithstanding his great offence. The righteousness of faith is therefore thus defined: (1.) It does not presuppose any good works; but, (2.) It presupposes a knowledge of sin. On the signification of the passage, vers. 3-5, for justification by faith, see Tholuck, p. 175.

4. As Abraham became the natural father of many nations, so did he become the spiritual father of the believing people of all nations, both Jews and Gentiles.

5. The designation of circumcision as a seal of the righteousness of faith, is important for the doctrine of the sacraments. See the Exeg. Notes.

6. The great promise of faith (ver. 13). Its development (chap. viii.; Isa. lxi., lxvi.; Rev. xx.-xxii.). There is a grand view in the reasoning of ver. 14. The men who are ἐκ νόμου, of the law, cannot be the heirs of the world: (1.) Because they are particularists. But also, (2.) Because the legal, human ὀργή, provokes the historical, divine wrath—the destruction of the world. Thus did legalistic fanaticism bring on the destruction of Jerusalem, the fall of Byzantium, the exhaustion of Germany by the Thirty Years' War, the disorders in Spain, Italy, Poland, and other countries (see Matt. v. 5).

7. The identity of the faith of Abraham with that of Paul. We must define: (1.) Its object; (2.) Its subject; (3.) Its operations. The difference, on the contrary, must be determined according to the developing forms of the revelation of salvation, and in such a way that the initial point will appear in the faith of Abraham, and the concluding or completing point shall appear in the saving faith of the New Testament. But it is a mistake to suppose that faith can be the same thing in a subjective view, and another in an objective. The objective and subjective relations will always thoroughly correspond to each other here; and the operations of faith will be shaped in accordance with them. For historical information on the question under consideration, see Tholuck, p. 173.

8. On the nature of saving faith, see the Ezcg. Notes on ver. 19. Likewise, on the signification of the resurrection for faith, those on ver. 25.

9. The importance of the sentiment, "He gave God the glory." See the Ezcg. Notes on ver. 20.

[10. On ver. 25. This important and comprehensive passage clearly shows the inseparable connection between Christ's death and Christ's resurrection, as also the connection between the remission of sins and justification to a new life (comp. v. 10; vi. 4). By His atoning death Christ has abolished the guilt of sin (iii. 25), and secured our pardon and peace; and hence it is generally represented as the ground of our justification (δικαιώσις)—i. e., the non-imputation of sin, and the imputation of Christ's merits; comp. iii. 24, 25; v. 9; 2 Cor. v. 21; Eph. i. 7; 1 John i. 7. But, without the resurrection, the death of Christ would be of no avail, and His grave would be the grave of all our hopes, as the Apostle clearly says, 1 Cor. xv. 17. A gospel of a dead Saviour would be a miserable failure and delusion. The resurrection is the victory of righteousness and life over sin and death. It is by the fact of the resurrection that Christ's death was shown to be the death of the innocent and righteous One for foreign guilt, and that it was accepted by God as a full satisfaction for the sins of the world. If man had not sinned, Christ would not have died; if Christ had sinned, He would not have been raised again. In the next place, as the resurrection is the actual triumph of Christ, so it is also the necessary condition of the appropriation of the benefits of His death. It is only the risen Saviour who could plead our cause at the mercy-seat, and send the Holy Spirit to reveal Him, and to apply the benefits of the atonement to believers. Just as little as the death and the resurrection, can we separate the effects of both—the remission of sins and the new life of Christ. The sinner cannot be buried with Christ, without rising with Him as a new creature; the death of the old Adam is the birth of the new, and the life of the new presupposes the death of the old.—P. S.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-8. Abraham and David as examples of the righteousness of faith. 1. Abraham; 2. David.—What hath father Abraham found? 1. No reward by works; but, 2. Righteousness by faith (vers. 1-5).—Abraham not only the natural, but also the spiritual father of his people (vers. 1-5).—Glory before God is better than the glory of works (ver. 2).—If the reward is reckoned of debt, man loses; but if it is reckoned of grace, he gains (vers. 4, 5).—How blessed is the man to whom God imputeth not sin, but righteousness! (vers. 6-8).—Two beatitudes from the mouth of David (vers. 6-8).

Vers. 9-12. Why must even the Jews acknowledge the Gentiles' righteousness of faith? Answer: Because, 1. Faith was not counted to Abraham for righteousness while in circumcision; but, 2. His faith had already been counted to him for righteousness.—As the sign of circumcision was to the Jews a seal of the righteousness of faith, so are the signs of Baptism and of the Lord's Supper seals to Christians of the righteousness of faith.—Abraham, a father of all believers: 1. From among the Gentiles; 2. From among the Jews (vers. 11, 12).—Walking in the footsteps of Abraham (ver. 12).—The promise to Abraham of the inheritance of the world is, first, obscure, as a germ-like word. But, second, it is of infinitely rich meaning; for, in addition to the redemption of the world, it also embraces the renewal of the world and the heavenly inheritance.—To what extent does the law work wrath? (ver. 15).—It is only by faith that the promise holds good for all (ver. 16).

Vers. 18-22. The strength of Abraham's faith. It is shown: 1. In his believing in hope, where there was nothing to hope; 2. In holding fast to this hope against external evidence; 3. He did not doubt, but trusted unconditionally in the words of promise.—Believing in hope, when there is nothing to hope (ver. 18).—We must not grow weak in faith, even if it be long before our hopes are realized (ver. 19).—The worst doubt is doubting the promises of God (ver. 20).—How precious it is to know to a perfect certainty that God can perform what He has promised (ver. 21).

Vers. 23-25. As Abraham believed that life would come from death, so do we believe in the same miracle: 1. Because God has given us a pledge in the resurrection of Christ; 2. Because this God is a living and true God, who will keep His promises for ever.—Our faith in the Lord Jesus Christ is a faith in the Redeemer, who: 1. Was delivered for our offences; and, 2. Was raised for our justification (vers. 24, 25).

LUTHER: Faith fulfils all laws; but works cannot fulfil a tittle of the law (James ii. 10). A passage from the preface to the Epistle to the Romans is in place here: "Faith is not the human delusion and dream which some mistake for faith. . . . But faith is a Divine work in us, which changes us, and gives us the new birth from God (John i. 13); which slays the old Adam, and makes us altogether different men in heart, spirit, feeling, and strength; and which brings with it the Holy Spirit. Oh, faith is a living, creative, active power, which of necessity is incessantly doing good! It also does not ask whether there are good works to perform; but, before the question is asked, it has already done them, and is continually doing them," &c.—He who believes God, will give Him the glory, that He is truthful, omnipotent, wise, and good. Therefore faith fulfils the first three (four) commandments, and justifies man before God. It is, then, the true worship of God (chap. iv. 20).

STARKE: The Holy Scriptures must not be read superficially, but with deliberation, and with careful reference to their order and chronology (chap. iv. 10).—The holy sacraments assure believers of God's grace, and forgiveness of sins and eternal salvation (chap. iv. 11).—It is vain to boast of pious ancestry, if you do not walk in the footsteps of their faith (chap. iv. 12).—God has His special gracious gifts and rewards, which He communicates to one of His believers instead of another (chap. iv. 17).—We should rely on and believe in God's word, more than in all the arguments in the world. It should be enough for us to know, "Thus saith the Lord" (chap. iv. 18).—The heart can be established by no other means than by grace. But there can be no grace in the heart except by faith, which brings in Christ, the source of all grace (chap. iv. 21).—Blessed are they who only believe, though they see not (chap. iv. 22).—The Epistle to the Romans was also written for us, and it has been preserved until our day, and given to us as a precious treasure by Divine Providence.—If Christ has been raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, His death is truly a sufficient offering and ransom for our sins (chap. iv. 25).—HEDINGER: Away with the leaven of Pharisaic delusion, that our own righteousness must build a ladder to heaven! God will glorify His compassion to publicans and sinners, but not to proud saints.—Faith is in its highest degree, strength, and adornment, when it beholds nothing but heaven and water, God and despair, and yet believes that all will be well, glorious, and happy (chap. iv. 18).

QUESNEL: The more faith in a soul, the less pride there is in it (chap. iii. 27).—Ye magistrates, fathers, and mothers, if you set an example of faith, fear of God, love, righteousness, and other virtues, before those committed to you, you will truly become their fathers, just as Abraham became the father of the faithful by his faith (chap. iv. 11).—He who makes a parade of himself, may easily despair afterwards because of his insufficiency in every respect; but he who trusts in the omnipotent God, gets strength and consolation from his own nothingness (chap. iv. 18).—CRAMER: The sacraments do not help for the work's sake; otherwise Abraham would have been immediately justified and saved on account of circumcision (chap. iv. 10).—All promises spring from the fountain of eternal grace (chap. iv. 18).—Nova Bibl. Tub.: The laws of nature are set by God for nature, but they are not binding on God Himself. Faith looks beyond them (chap. iv. 19).—LANG: As sin, because of its magnitude and multiplicity, is denoted by different words, so is justification, as something great and important, explained by three words: to forgive, to cover, and not to impute (chap. iv. 7).—The creation and resurrection of the dead are those great works of God which confirm and explain each other. Therefore he who believes in creation will find it easy to believe in the resurrection of the dead (chap. iv. 17).

BUNDEL: The divine promise is always the best support of faith and confidence (ver. 20).—Why do we believe in God? Because He has raised Christ (ver. 25).

GERLACH: Abraham only received the promise that his seed should possess the land of Canaan; but beyond the earthly, there lies the heavenly Canaan—the renewed world—which he and his real children, the believers, shall possess in Christ, his seed. The earthly Canaan was the prophetic type of this heavenly Canaan; it was the external shell which enclosed the kernel—the bud which bore and enclosed the still tender flower (chap. iv. 13).—By the clearer knowledge of the commandment sin becomes more sinful, destruction appears more prominently, lust is not subdued but becomes more violently inflamed; therefore transgression increases (chap. iv. 15).—If Abraham's clear eye of faith could penetrate the veil with so much certainty of God's majesty, how powerfully should we—to whom God has spoken by His own Son—be kindled by this love to raise our idle hands and to strengthen our weary knees (chap. iv. 23).

LISCO: Abraham's faith is an example worthy of our imitation by faith in Christ (chap. iv. 18-25).—The resurrection of Jesus was a testimony and proof of what His death has accomplished for us (for, without the resurrection, He could not have been considered the Messiah, and His death could not have been deemed a propitiatory sacrifice for the blotting out of our sins), Isa. liii. 10 ff.; chap. iv. 25.

HEUBNER: The appeal to Abraham's example is 1. Right in itself; 2. Was important for the Jews (chap. iv. 1-6).—Why does Paul cite Abraham's circumcision, and not rather the offering of Isaac? Answer: 1. Circumcision was the real sign which Abraham received by the command of God Himself 2. It was that which all the Jews, equally with Abraham, bore in their own person, and on which they founded their likeness to Abraham and their glory (chap. iv. 1).—David's feeling in the Psalms is humble, and was exalted only by grace.—The universal confession of God's children is, We are saved by grace (chap. iv. 6-8).—In the historical statement of ver. 10 there is an application to us; namely, that justification by faith must precede all good works because no good work is possible without the attainment of grace.—The preaching of the law alone with the threatened penalty repels our heart from God; and when carried to excess, it makes man angry with God, because he is driven to despair (chap. iv. 15).—Yea, if every thing were brought to us ante oculos pedesque, there would be no room for faith (chap. iv. 18).—Abraham is an example of a holy paternal blessing, of holy paternal hopes, and the founder of the most blessed family among men (chap. iv. 18).

DRÄSEKE: Easter: the Amen of God, the Hallelujah of men.—Our faith must be preserved, and grow amid temptations (chap. iv. 20).—The object of his faith is just as certain to the believer, as a demonstration is to the mathematician (chap. iv. 21, 22).—All the history of the Old Testament is applicable to us. The circumstances are different, but there are the same conflicts, and it is internally and fundamentally the same faith which is engaged in the struggle (chap. iv. 23, 24).—Similarity of the Christian's faith to that of Abraham.

BESSER: Luther calls ver. 25 a little covenant in which all Christianity is comprehended.

J. P. LANG: Abraham, the original, but ever-new witness of faith: 1. As witness of the living God of revelation and miracle; 2. As witness of the perfect confidence and divine strength of a believing reliance on God's word; 3. As witness to the blessed operation of faith—righteousness through grace.—The life of faith not dependent: 1. On natural ancestry; 2. On works of the law; 3. On visible natural appearances.—Justification and sealing.—All faith, in its inmost nature, is similar to that of Abraham: 1. As faith before God in His word; 2. As faith in miracles; 3. As faith in the renewal of youth; 4. As faith in the rejuvenation of life from righteousness as the root.—The glorious operation of Christ's resurrection.

[BURKITT: We must bring credentials from our sanctification to bear witness to the truth of our justification.—On the sacraments in general, and circumcision in particular. There is a fourfold word requisite to a sacrament—a word of institution, command, promise, and blessing. The elements are ciphers; it is the institution that makes them figures. Circumcision was a sign: 1. Representative of Abraham's faith; 2. Demonstrative of original sin; 3. Discriminating and distinguishing of the true church; 4. Initiating for admission to the commonwealth of Israel; and 5. Prefigurative of baptism.—On faith. It has a threefold excellency: 1. Assenting to the truths of God, though never so improbable; 2. Putting men on duties though seemingly unreasonable; and 3. Enabling to endure sufferings, be they never so afflictive.—Dow

BRIDGE: We are saved by a scheme that allows us not to mention any works of our own, as if we had whereof to glory before God, but teaches us to ascribe our salvation to believing on Him who justifieth the ungodly. He who has promised, is able to perform; for with Him all things are possible. Already He hath done for us that for which we had much less reason to expect, than we now have to hope for any thing that remains. He delivered His own Son Jesus for our offences.—HENRY: It is the holy wisdom and policy of faith to fasten particularly on that in God which is accommodated to the difficulties wherewith it is to wrestle, and will most effectually answer the objections. It is faith indeed to build upon the all-sufficiency of God for the accomplishment of that which is impossible to any thing but that all-sufficiency.—CLARKE: Ver. 18. The faith of Abraham bore an exact correspondence to the power and never-failing faithfulness of God.

HODGE: 1. The renunciation of a legal self-righteous spirit is the first requisite of the gospel; 2. The more intimately we are acquainted with our own hearts, and with the character of God, the more ready shall we be to renounce our own righteousness, and to trust in His mercy; 3. Only those are happy and secure who, under a sense of helplessness, cast themselves on the mercy of God; 4. A means of grace should never be a ground of dependence. 5. There is no hope for those who take refuge in a law, and forsake God's mercy; 6. All things are ours, if we are Christ's; 7. The way to get your faith strengthened, is, not to consider the difficulties in the way of the thing promised, but the character and resources of God who has made the promise; 8. It is as possible for faith to be strong when the thing promised is most improbable, as when it is probable; 9. Unbelief is a very great sin, as it implies a doubt of the veracity and power of God; 10. The two great truths of the gospel are, that Christ died as a sacrifice for our sins, and that He rose again for our justification; 11. The denial of the propitiatory death of Christ, or of His resurrection from the dead, is a denial of the gospel.—BARNES: On the resurrection of Christ (ver. 25). If it be asked how it contributes to our acceptance with God, we may answer: 1. It rendered Christ's work complete; 2. It was a proof that His work was accepted by the Father; 3. It is the mainspring of all our hopes, and of all our efforts to be saved. There is no higher motive that can be presented to induce man to seek salvation, than the fact that he may be raised up from death and the grave, and made immortal. There is no satisfactory proof that man can be thus raised up, but by the resurrection of Jesus Christ.—J. F. H.]

WITH SECTION.—The fruit of justification: Peace with God, and the development of the new life into the experience of Christian hope. The new worship of Christians: They have the free access to grace into the Holy of holies. Therefore they rejoice in the hope of the glory of God, and of the revelation of the real Shekinah of God in the real Holy of holies. They even glory in tribulation also, by which this hope is consummated. The love of God in Christ as security for the realisation of Christian hope; Christ's death our reconciliation; Christ's life our salvation. The bloom of Christian hope: The solemn joy that God is our God.

TEXTUAL.

¹ V. 1.—[The reading ἐκ μὲν (subjunctive, with a hortatory sense) is strongly attested by κ^1 , A. B¹, C. D. E. L. many cursive and versions (including Syriac and Vulgate), also by many fathers; adopted by Lechmann (in the margin), Scholz, Britsch, Alford (5th ed.). This array of authorities would compel us to adopt it instead of ἐκ μὲν (Rec. κ^1 , B¹, F.), were it not for the following considerations: 1. The early transcribers frequently interchanged ἐκ and ἐν. The change having been made, it would be retained by the fathers, since it "indicates the incipient darkening of the doctrine of the righteousness of faith" (Lange). 3. The hortatory meaning is not in keeping with the context. Ever Alford, after adopting the subjunctive, and alleging that it can only have the force of the imperative, denies this meaning. An exhortation on a new subject just here, would introduce a foreign element (Meyer). These reasons have been deemed, by many of the best editors, sufficient to outweigh the preponderant MSS. authority. Comp. the Exeg. Notes.—R.]

² Ver. 2.—[The perfect ἐσχηκεν is rendered erlangt haben by Lange; have had is the literal meaning, implying continued possession. We obtained (Amer. Bible Union) is open to the objection urged in Exeg. Notes. The article should be retained with access, as conveying a slight emphasis.—R.]

⁵ Ver. 2.—[Lange's view of this passage requires the insertion of the article, which is not found in the Greek. See Exeg. Notes.—R.]

⁸ Ver. 4.—[Approval is certainly preferable to experience; and yet it is not altogether satisfactory. Lange, Meyer: Bewährung; Wordsworth: proof; Alford, Amer. Bible Union, as above.—R.]

¹⁰ Ver. 8.—[Ὁ θεός is wanting in B. Its position varies in other MSS. κ . A. C. K. insert it after εἰς ἡμᾶς (so Rec.); D. F. L. before (so Tischendorf, Meyer). Alford rejects it, mainly on account of this variation in position. It is far more likely to have been omitted, because it was thought that Christ should be the subject. The most probable view is, that the Apostle intended to emphasize the fact that God thus showed His (ἐαυτοῦ) love; hence the position at the end of the clause. This not being understood, it was moved forward and then rejected.—R.]

¹¹ Ver. 9.—[Literally: having been then justified. The E. V. means to convey this thought. It should be noticed that ἐν follows (E. V., by). The idea of instrumentality is not prominent; the sense seems to be pregnant. So also in ver. 10: ἐν τῇ ζωῇ, by his life.—R.]

¹² Ver. 10.—[The parallelism is marred in the E. V.—R.]

¹³ Ver. 11.—[Rec.: καυχόμεθα, poorly attested. Nearly all MSS. read καυχόμενοι, which is adopted by modern critical editors. On the meaning, and for justification of the above emendation, see Exeg. Notes.—R.]

¹⁴ Ver. 11.—[Atonement is a correct rendering etymologically, but not theologically. Reconciliation is preferable also on the ground that it corresponds with reconcile (ver. 10), as the Greek noun does with the preceding verb.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

GENERAL SURVEY.—1. Peace with God arising from justification, as hope of the glory of God (vera. 1, 2). 2. The continuance in, and increase of, this peace, even by tribulations, amid the experience of the love of God (vera. 3-5). 3. The proof of the continual increase of the peace, and the certainty of salvation of Christians (vera. 6-9). 4. Reconciliation as the pledge of deliverance (salvation), and, as the appropriated atonement, the fountain of blessedness. On vera. 1-8, Winzer, Commentat., Leipzig, 1832. [Chap. v. 1-12 and chap. viii. describe the effect of justification upon the feelings, or the emotional man; chap. vi., the effect upon the will, or the moral man. It produces peace in the heart and holiness in the character of the believer.—P. S.]

Ver. 1. Therefore, being justified by faith [δικαιωθέντες οὖν ἐκ πίστεως]. The οὖν expresses the conclusion that arises from the preceding establishment of the truth of the δικαιώσις by faith [iii. 21-iv. 25]. Therefore δικαιωθέντες is closely connected with δικαιώσις. [The aorist tense δικαιωθέντες, which is emphatically placed at the head of the sentence, implies that justification is an act already done and completed when we laid hold of Christ by a living faith, but not necessarily at our baptism (Wordsworth), which is a sealing ordinance, like circumcision (iv. 11), and does not always coincide in time with regeneration and justification (remember the case of Abraham and Cornelius on the one hand, and Simon Magus on the other). ἐκ πίστεως, out of faith, as the subjective or instrumental cause and appropriating organ, while the grace of God in Christ is the objective or creative cause of justification, by which we are transferred from the state of sin and damnation to the state of righteousness and life.—P. S.] Meyer: "The extent of the blessedness of the justified (not their holiness, as Rothe would have it) shall now be portrayed." It is a description of the blessedness of Christians in its source, its maintenance, its apparent imperfection yet real perfection, its certainty, and its ever more abundant development. The condition of one who is not justified is that of fighting with God (see ver. 9).

[We have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, εἰρήνην ἔχομεν πρὸ τοῦ θεοῦ, καὶ αὐτοῦ. The bearing of the difference of reading here deserves more attention than it has yet received. We reluctantly adopt, for internal reasons, with Dr. Lange and the great majority of commentators, the indicative ἔχομεν, we have, for the subjunctive ἔχωμεν (Vulg.: habeamus). The latter, it must be admitted, has in its favor not only the overwhelming weight of ancient MSS., Versions, and Fathers,* but also the critical canon: lectio difficilior principatim tenet; being the more difficult reading, its alteration into the easier ἔχομεν can be better accounted for than its introduction. If we retain ἔχωμεν (with Lachmann, Tregelles, and Alford, 5th ed.), we must consistently take καυχώμεθα, vers. 2, 3, likewise in the subjunctive mood; and thus the whole passage, instead of being, as usually understood, a statement of the blessed effects of justification upon the heart, becomes an exhortation to go on from peace to peace and from glory to glory, on the ground of the accomplished fact of justification. Different explanations, however, may be given to ἔχωμεν. (1.) The deliberative sense: shall we have? But the deliberative subjunctive is only used in doubtful questions, as Mark xii. 14: δοῦμεν ἢ οὐκ δοῦμεν; Rom. vi. 1: ἐπιμένωμεν τῇ ἀμαρτίᾳ; (2.) The concessive sense: we may have, it is our privilege to have. This would give excellent sense. But such a use of the Greek subjunctive approaching the meaning of the future, though easily derived from the general principle that the subjunctive mood signifies what is objectively possible, as the indicative expresses what is actual, and the optative what is desirable or subjectively possible, is somewhat doubtful, and not mentioned by Winer (p. 248, 7th ed.), who, in independent sentences, admits only the conjunctivus adhortativus and the conjunctivus deliberativus; comp. Kühner, §§ 463, 464, and Jelf, § 415. (3.) There remains, therefore, only the hortative sense: let us have peace. But here arises the doctrinal difficulty, that peace is not the result of man's exertions, but a gift of God bestowed, and the object of prayer in the epistolary inscriptions; comp. 1 and 2 Peter i. 2: "Grace and peace be multiplied unto you;" yet two analogous passages might be quoted—viz., 2 Cor. v. 19: καταλλάγητε τῷ Θεῷ, reconciliamini Deo; and especially Heb. xii. 28: ἔχομεν χάριν, let us have grace (where, however, some MSS. read ἔχομεν, the Vulg. habemus, and where χάρις is understood by some in the sense of gratitude).† It might be said, also, in support of this explanation, that faith, hope, love, and all Christian graces, are likewise gifts of grace, and yet objects to be pursued and maintained. (4.) A few commentators, quite recently Forbes (not in the translation, but in the comments, p. 179), take ἔχωμεν = κατέχωμεν, let us hold fast and enjoy peace; comp. Heb. x. 23: κατέχομεν τὴν ὁμολογίαν τῆς ἐλπίδος ἀληθείᾳ. But in this case we should expect the article before εἰρήνην, and a previous mention of peace in the argument. The indicative ἔχομεν, on the other hand, is free from all grammatical and doctrinal difficulty, and is in keeping with the declaratory character of the section.—Peace with God, εἰρήνην πρὸς τὸν Θεόν, in our relation to God. It expresses the state of reconciliation (opposite to the state of condemnation, viii. 1), in consequence of the removal of God's wrath and the satisfaction of His justice by the sacrifice of Christ, who is our Peace; Eph. ii. 14–16. Comp. Herodian 8, 7. 8: ἀντὶ πολλοῦ μὲν εἰρήνην ἔχοντες πρὸς τοὺς, and other classical parallels quoted by Meyer and Philippi. On πρὸς τὸν Θεόν comp. Acts ii. 17; xiv. 16; 2 Cor. vii. 4. This objective condition of peace implies, as a necessary consequence, the subjective peace of the soul, the tranquillitas animi, the pax conscientia, which flows from the experience of pardon and reconciliation; Phil. iv. 7; John xvi. 33. Sin is the source of all discord and war between man and God, and between man and man; and hence there can be no peace until this curse is removed. All other peace is an idle dream and illusion. Being at peace with God, we are at peace with ourselves and with our fellow-men. Paul often calls God the "God of peace;" xv. 33; 2 Cor. xiii. 11; 1 Thess. v. 23; 2 Thess. iii. 16; Heb. xiii. 20. Comp. also Isa. xxxiii. 17: "the work of righteousness is peace."—P. S.]

Ver. 2. Through whom also we. These words do not announce a climax in the description of the merit of Christ (Köllner); nor do they state the ground of the preceding διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χ. (Meyer), but the immediate result of the redemption. [καί, also, is not accumulative, but indicates that the προσαγωγή εἰς τὴν χάριν, itself a legitimate consequence of justification, is the ground of εἰρήνην.—P. S.]—Have obtained access. [τὴν προσαγωγὴν εἰσῆκαμεν; literally, have had the (well-known, the only possible) introduction (in the active sense), or better, access (intransitive). The perfect refers to the time of justification and incorporation in Christ, and implies the continued result, since in Him and through Him, as the door and Mediator, we have an open way, the right and privilege of daily approach to the throne of grace; in distinction from the one yearly entrance of the Jewish high-priest into the Holy of Holies. This is the universal priesthood of believers.—P. S.] Explanations of the προσαγωγή: 1. Meyer: admission, introduction (Hineinführung). This is claimed to be the only grammatical signification.* It certainly denotes the entrance effected by mediation, where it means admission, audience. But this requirement [the προσαγωγὴς, sequester, the mediator or interpreter, who introduces persons to save

* [See Text. Note 1. The Sinaitic MS. reads ΕΧΟΜΕΝ, the small o on the top of e being a correction by a later hand, though this correction may possibly have been taken from an older MS. Tischendorf, in his recent edition of the Vatican MS., credits the correction ἔχομεν to B², instead of B¹, as is done by Alford, Meyer, and others. Dr. Hodge, who pays little or no attention to the different readings, and ignores Cod. Sin. altogether, although it was published two years before the revised edition of his Commentary on Romans, incorrectly says (p. 205) that "the external authorities are nearly equally divided" between ἔχομεν and ἔχωμεν. Alford, in the 5th ed., has a long note and calls this "the crucial instance of overpowering diplomatic authority compelling us to adopt a reading against which our subjective feelings rebel. Every internal consideration tends to impugn it." Retaining ἔχωμεν in the text (with Lachmann and Tregelles), he gives it up in the notes. Forbes very strenuously contends for ἔχωμεν, and consistently takes also καυχώμεθα in the hortative sense.—P. S.]

* [By Pape (Lex.) and Meyer, who quotes passages from Xenophon, Thucydides, Plutarch, &c., and explains: "Wir haben DURCH CHRISTUM DIE HINEINFÜHRUNG ZU DER Gnade u. s. w., gehabt, dadurch nämlich dass Er selbst (1 Peter iii. 18) vermöge seines dem Vorn Gottes folgenden Stühnschiffers unser προσαγωγὴς geworden ist, oder, wie es Chrys. treffend ausdrückt: μακρὰν ὄντας προσηγάγε." Comp. Harless (p. 251) and Braune, on Eph. ii. 18. Chrysostom distinguishes, Eph. ii. 18, προσαγωγή and πρόσδοξ: οὗς εἴως πρόσδοξ, ἀλλὰ προσηγάγη. But πρόσδοξ, in classic Greek, has both the active and passive meaning. Hieronymus defines προσαγωγή: "προσάγειν, recte: accessio, nempe ad DEORUM ARAS, SUPPLICATIONE." The word occurs only three times in the New Testament—here, and Eph. ii. 18, and iii. 12, where the intransitive meaning, access, is the most natural.—P. S.]

reigns, Lamprid. in Alex. Sev. 4.—P. 8.] is secured here by ἐν οὐ, which does not well suit this interpretation. 2. Access. [Vulg.: accessum; πρόσδος, εἰσόδος.] The view of Ecumenius, and most expositors [Philippi, Ewald, Stuart, Hodge, Alford]; see Eph. ii. 18; iii. 12. (Tholuck finally decides for the active sense.) The image, at bottom, is plainly not that of a worldly audience with an Eastern king, but the type of the entrance of the high-priest into the Holy of Holies (see 1 Peter iii. 18: Χριστὸς ἑλθὼν, ἵνα ἡμᾶς προσάγαγῃ τῷ θεῷ; Heb. x. 19: ἔχοντες τὴν παύρησιαν εἰς τὴν εἰσόδον τῶν ἁγίων ἐν τῷ αἵματι Ἰησοῦ). This view is also in harmony with the idea of the Epistle, by which Christianity is the true worship restored, or rather first realized; and in this connection the δόξα θεοῦ has reference to the Shekinah of the Holy of Holies.—Obtained (erlangt haben). Tholuck justly regards it as pedantic prudery in Meyer (after Fritzsche) to hold that ἐσχήκαμεν does not mean nacti sumus or habemus, but habuimus (when we became Christians). Meyer more appropriately says: "The divine grace in which the justified participate is represented as a spacial compass." But he has not made good this remark. We have free access into the real Holy of Holies, which is grace; and hope to behold in it the real Shekinah, the δόξα of God; and, looking at it, to participate of it.—Into this grace. [The ταύτην is emphatic—such a glorious grace.—P. S.] Those who adhere to the reading ἐν πίστει in ver. 2 [see Textual Note *] connect therewith ἐκ τῆν χάριν (a connection which Meyer properly rejects, πίστις ἐκ τῆν χάριν!), and understand προσάγωγη absolutely: access to God.* But the προσάγωγη can refer only to χάρις (Meyer, and others), and, indeed, to grace as justifying grace; and does not denote saving favor in general (Chrysostom), although that central idea of grace comprehends all. For other untenable explanations: the gospel (Fritzsche); hope of blessedness (Beza); apostleship (Semler); see De Wette. The access to this grace is more particularly explained by the addition, wherein [ἐν ᾗ refers to χάριν, not to the doubtful πίστις.—P. S.] we stand, or into which we have entered. The ἐσχήκαμεν therefore does not denote here, standing fast (Tholuck, Meyer), either in the sense of subjective activity (Beausobre),† or of objective, secure possession (Calvin).‡ It refers back to the act of the δικαίωσις, with which the introduction into the χάρις has begun, and accordingly the προσάγωγη denotes the free and permanent access of all believers into the χάρις, in contrast with the once yearly entrance of the high-priest into the Holy of Holies. We need hardly mention that this permanent access is effected and conditioned by the life of prayer, and especially by daily purification, in the comfort of the atonement (Heb. x. 22, 23).

And triumph (glory) in the hope of the glory of God [καὶ καυχώμεθα ἐν ἐλπίδι].

τῆς δόξης τοῦ θεοῦ]. The verb καυχώμεθα [usually with ἐν, also with ἐντὶ, ἐντὸς, and with the accusative of the object] denotes the expression of a joyous consciousness of blessedness with reference to the objective ground of blessedness; in which true glorying is distinctly contrasted with its caricature, vain boasting in a vain state of mind, and from a vain ground or occasion. Reiche emphasizes the rejoicing, Meyer the glorying. The ἐντὶ, explained as propter (by Meyer), denotes more definitely the basis on which Christians establish their glorying.* The ground of the glorying of Christians in their present state is not the δόξα θεοῦ itself, but the hope of the glory of God, as one conception; indeed, the whole Christianity of this life is a joyous anticipation of beholding the glory.* Tholuck: "δόξα θεοῦ is not, as Origen holds, the genitive of object, the hope of beholding this glory, which would need to have been expressed more definitely; still less is Chrysostom's view right, that it is the hope that God will glorify Himself in us. Neither are Luther, Grotius, Calixtus, Reiche, correct in calling it the genitive of author, the glory to be bestowed by God; but it is the genitive of possession, participation in the glory possessed by God; comp. 1 Thess. ii. 12." But more account should be made of beholding, as the means of appropriation. To behold God's glory, means also, to become glorious. This is definitely typified in the history of Moses (2 Cor. iii. 18; Exod. xxxiv. 38). Tholuck also remarks: "The θεωρεῖν τὴν δόξαν τοῦ Χριστοῦ, John xvii. 24, is the participation in the δόξα θεοῦ, the συγκληρονομίαν, the συμβασιλείαν, and συνδοξασθῆναι τῷ Χριστῷ; Rom. viii. 17; 2 Tim. ii. 11. Cocceius: 'Hæc est gloriatio fidelium, quod persuasum habent, fore, ut Deus gloriosus et admirabilis in ipsis fiat illuminando, sanctificando, iustificando, glorificando in ipsis; 2 Thess. i. 10.'" As the seeing of man on God's side perfects the vision of man, according to 1 Cor. xiii. 12, it is the beholding of the glory of the Lord on man's side by which he shall become perfectly conformed to the Lord, and thus an object of perfect good pleasure, according to 1 John iii. 2; Matt. v. 8; comp. 2 Peter i. 4. The goal of this reciprocal δοξάζειν and δοξαῖσθαι is, in a conditional sense, the removal to the inheritance of glory in the future world; 2 Cor. v. 1; and, in the absolute sense, the time of the second coming of Christ; Rev. xx.

[This triumphant assurance of faith is incompatible with the Romish doctrine of the uncertainty of salvation. A distinction should be made, however, between assurance of a present state of grace, which is necessarily implied in true faith, as a personal apprehension of Christ with all His benefits, and assurance of future redemption, which is an article of hope (hence ἐν ἐλπίδι), and must be accompanied with constant watchfulness. Christ will lose none of those whom the Father has given Him (John xvii. 12; x. 28, 29); but God alone knows His own, and to whom He chooses to reveal it. We must give diligence to make our calling and election

† (The reading of the Vulgate: glorie Altiorum Dei, is according to Meyer, a gloss which admirably hits the sense. But δόξα θεοῦ is more expressive in this connection. It is the glory which God Himself has (gen. possessionis), and in which believers shall once share; comp. John xvii. 22; 1 Thess. ii. 12; Apoc. xxi. 11; 1 John iii. 2.—P. S.]

sure to ourselves (2 Peter i. 10), and work out our own salvation with fear and trembling, because God worketh in us both to will and to do of His good pleasure (Phil. ii. 12, 13). The possibility of ultimate failure was a powerful motive and stimulus to faithfulness and holiness even in the life of an apostle, who exercised severe self-discipline, lest, having preached to others, he might himself at last be rejected, and lose the incorruptible crown of the Christian race (1 Cor. ix. 27). How much more, then, should ordinary Christians, who stand, take heed lest they fall (1 Cor. x. 12)—P. S.]

Ver. 3. And not only so [sc., do we triumph in the hope of glory; comp. the parallels in Meyer]. Tholuck appropriately says: "This hope of the Christian—sure of its triumph—seems to be put to scorn by the present condition, as those first Christians had to bear the scorn of the Gentiles by contrasting their gloomy present with their abundant hope. [Quotations from Minucius Felix, Arnobius, and Melancthon.] But the Apostle's lofty mind shows how that δοξα is not an outward accident, but a moral glorification, having its root in this θλιψις; therefore this itself, as the means of perfection, is the subject of triumph." See viii. 17, 28, 35; 2 Cor. xi. 30; xii. 9, 10 [ὅταν γὰρ ἀσθενῶ, δυνατός εἰμι]; 2 Tim. ii. 11; Matt. v. 10, 12; Acts v. 41; 1 Peter iv. 12; James i. 3, 12. [It is a universal law, acknowledged even in the world, that no great character can become complete without trial and suffering. As the firmness of the root is tested by the storm, and the metal is purified in the heat of the furnace, so the strength and purity of character is perfected by trial. The ancient Greeks and Romans admired a good man struggling against misfortune as a spectacle worthy of the gods. Plato describes the righteous man as one who, without doing injustice, yet has the appearance of the greatest injustice, and proves his own justice by perseverance against all calumny unto death; yea, he predicts that the perfect man, if such a one should ever appear, would be scourged, tortured, and nailed to the post (Politia, p. 74 sq. ed. Ast.). Seneca says (De prov. iv. 4): "Gaudent magni viri rebus adversis non aliter quam fortes milites bellis triumphant." Edmund Burke: "Obloquy is a necessary ingredient of all true glory. Calumny and abuse are essential parts of triumph." But what a difference between the proud stoicism of the heathen, who overcomes the misfortunes by haughty contempt and unfeeling indifference, and the Christian's gentle patience, forgiving love, and cheerful submission to the holy will of God, who ordered tribulation as a means and condition of moral perfection! Comp. my book on The Person of Christ, p. 90 ff., 216 f.—P. S.]

In [on account of] tribulations. [Comp. 2 Cor. vii. 4.] The ἐν must express the antithesis to the preceding; it must therefore not be explained as local, in [amidst] the tribulations (as Köllner, Glöckler, Baumgarten-Crusius). In that case, the very object of the καυχᾶσθαι would be wanting. [Gloriamur de calamitatibus, not, in calamitatibus. The θλιψις (or their moral results rather) are the object and ground of the καυχῆσθαι; καυχᾶσθαι being mostly constructed with ἐν; v. 11; Gal. vi. 18; 2 Cor. x. 15. The Jew is said to glory in the law, the Christian in the cross, &c. So also Tholuck, Meyer, Alfrod, Hodge. The tribulations are to the Christian what the scars of the battlefield are to an old soldier; comp. Gal. vi. 17.—P. S.]*

Knowing [because we know] that tribulation. This is the normal development of the believer's life out of its tribulation. Yet this development is not a natural necessity (see Matt. xiii. 21). Yet it is assumed in the exceptions that the faith was somehow damaged. [The following climax is remarkably vivid and pregnant.]

Ver. 4. Constancy (endurance, steadfastness). The ὑπομονή is not patientia here (Vulgate, Luther, E. V.). Yet steadfastness cannot be acquired without patientia. Luke xxii. 28: οἱ διαμνησκότις μετ' ἐμοῦ ἐν τοῖς πειρασμοῖς. Comp. James i. 3. [The virtue of ὑπομονή, which Chrysostom calls the βασίλις τῶν ἀρετῶν, is patient endurance (Ausdauer, Standhaftigkeit), and combines the Latin patientia and perseverantia. It involves the element of ἀνδρία, the bravery and manliness with which the Christian contends against the storms of trials and persecutions. Meyer adduces, as applicable here, Cicero's definition of perseverantia: "in ratione bene considerata stabilis et perpetua permansio." On the difference between ὑπομονή, μακροθυμία, and ἀντοχή, comp. Trench, Synonyms of the New Testament, Second Series, ed. 1864, p. 11.—P. S.]

Approval (proof), δοκιμή. [Comp. 2 Cor. ii. 9; viii. 2; ix. 13; Phil. ii. 22.] Not trial (Grotius), for the θλιψις itself is trial; nor experience (Luther [E. V.]), for experience is the whole Christian life. It is the condition of approval, whose subjective expression is the consciousness of being sealed; Eph. ii. 13. [Bengel: "δοκιμή ἐστὶν qualitas ejus, qui est δοκιμῶς." Hodge: "The word is used metonymically for the result of trial, i. e., approbation, or that which is proved worthy of approbation. It is tried integrity, a state of mind which has stood the test." James i. 3: τὸ δοκιμῶν ἡμῶν τῆς πίστεως κατεργάζεται ὑπομονήν, does not contradict our passage; for δοκιμῶν, as Philippi remarks, corresponds to θλιψις, and is a means of trial, or = δοκιμασία, trial, probation, the result of which is δοκιμή, approval.—P. S.]

Hope [ἐλπίδα, viz., τῆς δόξης τοῦ θεοῦ], which is naturally suggested by ver. 2. Hope, like faith and love, and every other Christian grace, is never done in this world, but always growing, and as it bears flower and fruit, its roots strike deeper, and its stem and branches expand. Every progress

* [We add the comments of Hodge: "Afflictions themselves are to the Christian a ground of glorying; he feels them to be an honor and a blessing. This is a sentiment often expressed in the word of God. Our Lord says: 'Blessed are they who mourn'; 'Blessed are the persecuted'; 'Blessed are ye when men shall revile you.' He calls on His suffering disciples to rejoice and be exceeding glad when they are afflicted; Matt. v. 4, 10-12. The apostles departed from the Jewish council, 'rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for Christ's name'; Acts v. 41. Peter calls upon Christians to rejoice when they are partakers of Christ's sufferings, and pronounces them happy when they are reproached for His sake; 1 Peter iv. 13, 14. And Paul says: 'Most gladly therefore will I glory in (on account of) my infirmities' (i. e., my sufferings). 'I take pleasure,' he says, 'in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake'; 2 Cor. xii. 10, 11. This is not irrational or fanatical. Christians do not glory in suffering, as such, or for its own sake, but as the Bible teaches: 1. Because they consider it an honor to suffer for Christ. 2. Because they rejoice in being the occasion of manifesting His power in their support and deliverance; and, 3. Because suffering is made the means of their own sanctification and preparation for usefulness here, and for heaven hereafter. The last of these reasons is that to which the Apostle refers in the context"—P. S.] a Christian life strengthens its foundations.—P. S.] Thus the apparent opposite of Christian hope, affliction, or tribulation, is changed into pure hope, so that the stock of Christian hope ever becomes more intensive and abundant. Eternal profit is derived from all temporal loss and harm.

Ver. 5. Make not ashamed. Strictly: it does not shame, by causing to be deceived. [Calvin: Habet certissimum salutis certum. Bengel: Spes erit res. Comp. Pa. cxix. 116: $\text{יְהִי עֵצְךָ לִי$; Sept.: $\mu\eta\ \kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\sigma\chi\iota\sigma\chi\eta\varsigma\ \mu\epsilon\ \alpha\pi\omicron\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \pi\rho\omicron\varsigma\delta\omicron\upsilon\lambda\iota\alpha\varsigma\ \mu\omicron\upsilon$. Meyer quotes parallels from Plato.—P. S.] Christian hope is formed from the same material of divine spiritual life as faith and love; it is really faith itself, tending toward completion; or it is love itself as it here lives in the principles of perfection. Therefore it is infallible.

Because God's love [genitive of the subject, not of the object, as in ver. 8: $\tau\eta\eta\ \epsilon\alpha\iota\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \alpha\gamma\alpha\pi\eta\eta$ $\epsilon\iota\varsigma\ \eta\mu\acute{\alpha}\varsigma$. The ground of our assurance that hope shall not put us to the shame of disappointment, is not our own strength or goodness, but the free love of God to us and in us.—P. S.] It is plain from the context that God's love to us is meant (Origen, Chrysostom, Luther, Calvin, and down to Philippi [Meyer, De Wette, Tholuck, Stuart, Alford, Hodge]), and not our love of God (Theodoret, Augustine, Klee, Glöckler [Anselm, St. Bernard, several Catholic expositors (amor infusus, justitia infusa), Hofmann], and others). Our love of God can at best be a testimony of our hope, but not the ground of the infallibility of our hope. See also ver. 8. Yet the antithesis should not be too strongly pressed: the love of God for us shed abroad in the heart, becomes our love to God.—Has been (and continues to be) poured out [as in a stream, $\epsilon\kappa\epsilon\chi\upsilon\tau\alpha\iota$]. Alford (after Olshausen): " $\epsilon\nu$ may be taken pregnantly, $\epsilon\kappa\epsilon\chi\upsilon\tau\alpha\iota$ $\epsilon\iota\varsigma\ \kappa\alpha\delta\ \mu\epsilon\tau\epsilon\iota\ \epsilon\nu$ —or better, denotes the locality where the outpouring takes place—the heart being the seat of our love, and of appreciation and sympathy with God's love."—P. The gift of the Holy Spirit is the causality of the experience of the love of God. Chap. viii. 15, 16; Gal. iv. 6. [The Holy Spirit mediates all the gifts of grace to us, and glorifies Christ in us. Olshausen and Alford refer the aorist participle to the pentecostal effusion of the Spirit. But this could not apply to Paul, who was called afterwards. Hence it must be referred to the time of regeneration, when the pentecostal fact is repeated in the individual.—P. S.]

Ver. 6. For Christ, when we were yet [$\epsilon\tau\iota\ \gamma\alpha\rho\ \chi\rho\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\varsigma\ \omicron\upsilon\tau\omega\nu\ \eta\mu\acute{\omega}\nu$, $\kappa\tau\lambda$. On the different readings, $\epsilon\tau\iota\ \gamma\alpha\rho$, for yet, or still, with a second $\epsilon\tau\iota$ after $\alpha\sigma\theta\epsilon\iota\omega\nu$ (A), $\epsilon\gamma\epsilon$, if indeed, with the second $\epsilon\tau\iota$ (B), $\epsilon\tau\iota\ \gamma\alpha\rho$, without the second $\epsilon\tau\iota$ (text. rec.), $\epsilon\iota\varsigma\ \tau\iota\ \gamma\alpha\rho$ (D. F.), $\epsilon\iota\ \gamma\alpha\rho$, $\epsilon\iota\ \delta\epsilon$, see Textual Note.—P. S.] The $\epsilon\tau\iota$ [tunc adhuc], according to the sense, belongs to $\omicron\upsilon\tau\omega\nu$, &c. [Comp. Matt. xii. 46: $\epsilon\tau\iota\ \alpha\iota\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \lambda\alpha\lambda\omicron\upsilon\tau\omicron\varsigma$; Luke xv. 20: $\epsilon\tau\iota\ \delta\epsilon\ \alpha\iota\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \mu\alpha\kappa\rho\acute{\alpha}\nu\ \alpha\pi\iota\theta\alpha\iota\omicron\varsigma$. Similar transpositions of $\epsilon\tau\iota$ among the classics. See the quotations of Meyer in loc., and Winer, Gramm., p. 515.—P. S.] Seb. Schmid, and others, have incorrectly understood $\epsilon\tau\iota$ as insuper [moreover, furthermore; but this would be $\epsilon\tau\iota\ \delta\epsilon$, Heb. xi. 86, not $\epsilon\tau\iota\ \gamma\alpha\rho$.—P. S.]; contrary not only to the meaning of the word, but also to the context. They hold that the $\epsilon\tau\iota$ does not enhance the preceding, but gives the ground why the confidence of salvation is an ever-increasing certainty. Tholuck, with Meyer, favoring the $\epsilon\tau\iota$ at the beginning of the verse, says that $\epsilon\tau\iota$ has been removed at the beginning because a Bible-lesson began with the verse [with the word $\chi\rho\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\varsigma$]. The result was, that it was partly removed, partly doubled, and partly corrected. We hold that the twofold $\epsilon\tau\iota$, which Lachmann reads [and which Cod. Sin. sustains] has a good meaning as emphasis.

When we were yet weak, or, without (spiritual) strength [$\omicron\upsilon\tau\omega\nu\ \eta\mu\acute{\omega}\nu\ \alpha\sigma\theta\epsilon\iota\omega\nu\ \epsilon\tau\iota$]. The state of sin is here represented as weakness or sickness in reference to the divine life, and consequently as helplessness, in order to declare that, at that time, believers could not do the least toward establishing the ground of their hope. [Comp. Isa. liii. 4, Septuagint: $\tau\alpha\varsigma\ \alpha\mu\alpha\rho\tau\iota\alpha\varsigma\ \eta\mu\acute{\omega}\nu\ \phi\epsilon\mu\iota$, with Matt. viii. 17: $\tau\alpha\varsigma\ \alpha\sigma\theta\epsilon\iota\alpha\varsigma\ \eta\mu\acute{\omega}\nu\ \epsilon\lambda\alpha\beta\epsilon$. Sin is here represented as helpless weakness, in contrast with the saving help of Christ's love.—P. S.] The $\alpha\sigma\theta\epsilon\iota\alpha\iota\varsigma$ are then denominated $\alpha\sigma\epsilon\beta\epsilon\iota\varsigma$, ungodly, in order to express the thought that we, as sinners, could not add any thing to the saving act of Christ, but did our utmost to aggravate the work of Christ. Sinfulness is represented, therefore, not merely as "the need of help," and thus "as the motive of God's love intervening for salvation" (Meyer), but as the starting-point of redemption, where the love of God accomplished the great act of salvation without any co-operation of sinners—yea, in spite of their greatest opposition.

At the proper time (or, in due season). $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\ \kappa\alpha\iota\rho\acute{\omicron}\varsigma$. Two * connections of the $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha$ $\kappa\alpha\iota\rho\acute{\omicron}\varsigma$: 1. It is united to $\omicron\upsilon\tau\omega\nu$, &c. We were weak according to the time [pro temporum ratione], in the sense of excuse (Erasmus); in the sense of the general corruption (according to Calvin, Luther, Hofmann). Against this are both the position of $\kappa\alpha\iota\rho\acute{\omicron}\varsigma$, and its signification. 2. It is referred to $\alpha\pi\iota\theta\alpha\iota\epsilon\nu$, but in different ways. Origen: at that time, when He suffered. Abelard: held awhile in death. time] for the deliverance of those who lived at that time. Better: It was the fit time in the history of humanity. This by no means weakens the principal thought, which rather requires the definite statement that the sacrificial death of Christ was according to Divine wisdom; since the necessity for salvation and the capacity for salvation were decided with the fullness of natural corruption. The highest heroism of the self-sacrifice does not exclude its reasonableness. See Rom. xvi. 26; Gal. iv. 4; Eph. i. 10; 1 Tim. ii. 6; Titus i. 8. [κατὰ καιρὸν is = ἐν καιρῷ, τὴν καιρὸν, ἐπὶ καιρῷ, καιρῶς, tempore opportuno; in opposition to παρὰ καιρὸν, tempore alieno, untimely. Here it is essentially the same with the πλήρωμα τῶν καιρῶν, Eph. i. 10, and the πλήρωμα τοῦ χρόνου, Gal. iv. 4; comp. Mark i. 15. Christ appeared when all the preparations for His coming and His kingdom in the Jewish and Gentile world were completed, and when the disease of sin had reached the crisis. This was God's own appointed time, and the most, or rather the only, appropriate time. Christ could not have appeared with divine fitness and propriety, nor with due effect, at any other time, nor in any other race or country. We cannot conceive of His advent at the time of Noah, or Abraham, or in China, or among the savage tribes of America. History is a unit, and a gradual unfolding of a Divine plan of infinite wisdom. Christ is the turning-point and centre of history, the end of the old and the beginning of the new humanity—a truth which is confessed, wittingly or unwittingly, by every date from A. D. throughout the civilized world.—P. S.]

For the ungodly. ὑπὲρ, for, for the good of. It is a fuller conception than the idea instead of, ἀντὶ, if we remember that, where the question is concerning a dying for those who are worthy of death, the conception naturally involves a well-understood ἀντὶ. See Matt. xx. 28. The terms ὑπὲρ and πρὸς [which Paul uses synonymously, Gal. i. 4] are more comprehensive; but the expression ἀντὶ is the most definite one. [Meyer contends that ὑπὲρ and πρὸς always mean for, in behalf of, for the benefit of, and not ἀντὶ, in the place of, loco, although, in the case of Christ, His death for the benefit of sinners was a vicarious sacrifice; iii. 25; Eph. v. 2; 1 Tim. ii. 6. Sometimes the ὑπὲρ, like the English preposition for, according to the context, necessarily involves the ἀντὶ, as in 2 Cor. v. 15, 20, 21; Gal. iii. 13; Philem. 13. The Apostle says ὑπὲρ ἀσεβῶν, instead of ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, in order to bring out more fully, by this strong antithesis, the amazing love of Christ.—P. S.]

Ver. 7. For scarcely for a righteous man will one die, though, for the good man, perhaps some one may even dare to die [Μόλις γὰρ ὑπὲρ δικαίου (without the article) τις ἀποθάνεται; ὑπὲρ γὰρ (the second γὰρ seems to be exceptive, and introduces a correction of the preceding with reference to μόλις: with difficulty, I say, for it is a fact that) τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ (with the article) τάχα τις καὶ τολμᾷ ἀποθάνειν.—P. S.]. The difficulty of this verse has led to various conjectures.* The Peshito reads ὑπὲρ ἀδίκων (unrighteous), instead of ὑπὲρ δικαίων; Erasmus, Luther, Melancthon, &c., read δικαίου and ἀγαθοῦ as neuter words; Hofmann [formerly, not now.—P. S.]: at least the latter is neuter; Origen, on the contrary, held merely δικ. as neuter, and understood by ἀγαθός, Christ as the perfectly good One. But, as Meyer properly observes, that both substantives are masculine, is evident from the antithesis ἀσεβῶν, by which the question is generally concerning a dying for persons. [δικαίου, without the article, must be masculine—a righteous person (not the right τὸ δίκαιον); but τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, with the article may, grammatically, be taken as neuter = summa bonum (the country, or any good cause or noble principle for which martyrs have died in ancient and modern times). Yet, in this case, the antithesis would be lost, since Christ likewise died for the highest good, the salvation of the world. The antithesis is evidently between men who scarcely are found to die for a δικαίος, though occasionally perhaps for ὁ (their) ἀγαθός, and Christ who died for ἀσεβῶν, ver. 6; or ἀμαρτωλοῖς, ver. 8; and even for ἐχθροί (the very opposite of ἀγαθός), ver. 10. In both cases, the death for persons, not for a cause, is meant.—P. S.]

Explanations of the masculines:

(1.) There is no material difference between δικαίος and ἀγαθός. "After Paul has said that scarcely for a 'righteous' man will one die, he will add, by way of establishing his assertion, that there might occur instances of the undertaking of such a death." Meyer, in harmony with Chrysostom, Theodoret, Erasmus, Calvin, &c. But δικαίος is not ἀγαθός, and μόλις (scarcely) is not τάχα (possibly).

(2.) ὁ ἀγαθός is the benefactor. Knachtbull [Animadv. in libros N. T., 1659, p. 120], Estius [Cocceius, Hammond], and many others; Reiche Tholuck: The Friend of Man. This is too special.

(3.) The ἀγαθός stands above the merely righteous or just one. Ambrosiaster: the noble one, the ἀγαθός by nature; Bengel: homo innoxius exempli gratia, &c. ["δικ., indefinitely, implies a harmless (guiltless) man; ὁ ἀγαθός, one perfect in all that piety demands, excellent, bounteous, princely, blessed—for example, the father of his country."—P. S.]

Meyer regards all these as "subtle distinctions." [He quotes, for the essential identity of δικαίος and ἀγαθός, Matt. v. 45; Luke xxiii. 50; Rom. vii. 12, where both are connected.—P. S.] Then the difference between the Old and New Testament would also be a subtle drawing of distinctions. The Old Testament, even in its later period, scarcely produced one kind of martyrdom; but the New Testament has a rich martyrdom. Yet we would understand the ἀγαθός in a more general sense. The δικαίος instills respect, but he does not establish, as such, a communion and exchange of life; but the ἀγαθός inspires. Paul's acknowledgment here, which was supported by heathen examples, is a proof of his apostolic considerateness, and of his elevation above all slavery to the letter. An ecclesiastical rhetorician would have suppressed the concession. The selection of the expression with τάχα and τολμᾷ is admirable; such self-sacrifices are always made headlong in the ecstasy of sympathetic generosity.

* [Calvin: "Rarissimum sane inter homines exemplum casti, ut pro justo quis mori sustineat: quamquam illud nonnunquam accidere possit." The exception establishes the rule. Fritzsche, Hofmann (in the second edition of his Schriftbeweis, ii. 1, p. 348), and Meyer (4th ed.) have returned to this view. In the 1st ed. (which Hodge, p. 214 seems alone to have consulted, Meyer took τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, on account of the article, as neuter (as did Jerome, Erasmus, Luther, Melancthon, Rückert, and Hofmann in the 1st edition of his Schriftbeweis), and rendered the latter clause of the verse interrogatively: "denn wer wagt's auch leichtlich für das Gute zu sterben?"—P. S.]

* [Jerome, Ep. 121 ad Algas., mentions five explanations; Tholuck.—P. S.]

4. It is hardly necessary to mention the view [maintained by Meyer in the first edition, but now given up by him.—P. S.], that the second member of the sentence is interrogative: for who would dare to die readily even for the good?

[I can see no material difference between interpretations 2 and 3. The principal point in both is the distinction made between δικαίος (taken in a narrower sense) and ὁ ἀγαθός, corresponding to our distinction between just and kind. Such a distinction is made by Irenæus Adv. har. i. 27, quoted also by Eusebius, H. E. iv. 11: τὸν μὲν δίκαιον, τὸν δὲ ἀγαθὸν ὑπάρχειν, alterum quidem JUSTUM, alterum autem BONUM esse; and by Cicero, De offic., iii. 15: "Si vir bonus is est qui prodest quibus potest, nocet nemini, recte (certe) JUSTUM virum, BONUM non facile reperiemus" (but some editions read: "certe istum virum bonum").* The righteous man, who does all that the law or justice requires, commands our respect and admiration; the good man, the benefactor, who is governed by love, inspires us with love and gratitude. Then we would have the following sense: "It is hardly to be expected that any one would die for a righteous man, though for the good man (i. e., for a kind benefactor or intimate friend), this self-denial might possibly be exercised, and does occasionally occur. So Olshausen, Tholuck, Philippi, Turner, Stuart, Hodge, Alford, Wordsworth. The latter refers to the death of Orestes for Pylades, his alter ego, and of Alcestis for Admetus, her husband. Webster and Wilkinson: "To make the admission less at variance with the first assertion, he substitutes for δικαίου, τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, the man of eminent kindness and philanthropy, the well-known benefactor, κρηστός, 'bonus,' in advance of δικαίου." The article before ἀγαθοῦ may be pressed as justifying the distinction: a righteous man, the good man, good to him, his benefactor. I confess, I am not quite satisfied with this interpretation, but it is better than any other.—P. S.]

Ver. 8. But God doth establish [giveth proof of, συνίστησιν, as in iii. 5; comp. *Textual Note, on p. 118.—P. S.]. God proves not merely His love in the death of Christ for sinners, according to ver. 6, but He makes it conspicuous and prominent; He exhibits it; He makes it the highest manifestation of His gospel. See John iii. 16; 2 Cor. v. 19-21. Luther: He praises [E. V., He commends] His love toward us [τὴν ἀγαπὴν ἀγάπην, His own love, in contrast with the love of men, ver. 7.—P. S.].

Ver. 9. Much more, therefore, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved through him from the wrath [ἀπὸ τῆς ὀργῆς, from the well-known and well-deserved wrath to come.—P. S.]. According to Estius, a conclusion a minori ad majus; according to Meyer, a conclusion a majore ad minus.† Both are in part right and in part wrong, because neither view exactly applies. It is a conclusion from the principle to the consequence, and a conclusion from the truth of the almost incredible to the truth of that which is self-evident. The conclusion is still further strengthened by the antithesis: as enemies, we were justified by His blood, and, as being His fellow-participants in peace, we shall be preserved from the wrath by the glorious exercise of His authority, and then by His life Preservation from wrath is a negative expression of perfect redemption. 1 Thess. i. 10. Compare the positive expression of 1 Tim. iv. 18.—[By his blood. αἷμα is the concrete expression for the atoning death of Christ, which is the meritorious cause of our justification. This does not rest on our works, nor our faith, nor any thing we have done or can do, but on what Christ has done for us comp. iii. 25.—P. S.]

Ver. 10. For if, being enemies [ἐν γὰρ ἔχθρῳ ὄντες]. It may be asked whether ἔχθρῳ—that is, God's enemies—is to be explained actively or passively; whether it denotes the enemies [haters] of God, according to chap. viii. 7 [ἔχθρα εἰς θεόν]; Col. i. 21 (Eph. ii. 15 does not belong here), or those who are charged with God's wrath [hated by God], for which view Rom. xi. 28 [where ἔχθρῳ is the opposite of ἀγαπητοί; comp. also θεοστυγεῖς, i. 13, and τέκνα ὀργῆς, Eph. ii. 3.—P. S.] has been cited. The passive interpretation has been supported by Calvin, Reiche, Fritzsche, Tholuck, Krehl, Baumgarten-Crusius, De Wette, Philippi, Meyer [Alford, Hodge], and the active or subjective interpretation by * Spener, Tittmann, Usteri, and Rückert [among English commentators, by Turner]. Meyer says in favor of the first view: 1. "Christ's death did not destroy the enmity of men toward God; but, by effecting their pardon on the part of God, it destroyed the enmity of God toward men, whence the cessation of man's enmity toward God follows as a moral consequence, brought about by faith. 2. And how could Paul have been able to infer properly his πολλῷ μᾶλλον, &c., since the certainty of the σωτηρίᾳ rests on the fact that we stand in a friendly relation (grace) to God, and not on our being friendly toward God?" These two arguments have a very orthodox sound, but are without a vital grasp of the fact of the atonement, and here without force. For, first of all, the death of Christ is as well a witness and seal of God's love, which overcomes man's enmity and distrust, as it is an offering of reconciliation, which removes the ὀργή θεοῦ in His government and in the conscience of man. This element constitutes the principal motive force in the living preaching of the gospel; for example, among the Moravians. In the next place, if we look away from God's work in man, we have no ground for assuming an increase [πολλῷ μᾶλλον] in God's love and grace in itself. God is unchangeable; man is changeable. The changed relation of man to God is indeed conditioned by a changed relation of God to him; but it is by virtue of God's unchangeableness that the work of God, which has begun in man, bears the pledge of completion. See Phil. i. 6. The sealing signifies, not a sealing of God, but of man by God's grace. It is not biblical to say, that Christ, by His death, has removed God's enmity toward us. And yet the Apostle is alleged to say that here, just after he has said: But God sets forth and commends His love, &c. Then the odd sense would be: We have been even reconciled when we were not yet reconciled!

† [So also Hodge: "It is an argument a fortiori. If the greater benefit has been bestowed, the less will not be withheld. If Christ has died for His enemies, He will surely save His friends."—P. S.]

We were reconciled to God [κατηλλάγημεν τῷ Θεῷ].

[Some preliminary philological remarks on this important term, which occurs here for the first time, may be found useful. The verbs διαλλάσσω, καταλλάσσω, ἀποκαταλλάσσω, συναλλάσσω (from ἀλλάσσω, to change), express the general idea of a change of relation of two parties at enmity into a relation of peace, or the idea of reconciliation (Veröhnung, Aussöhnung), with a slight modification, indicated by the prepositions—κατά, in relation to; διά, between; ἀπό, from; σύν, with, but without reference to the question whether the enmity be mutual, or on one side only—which must be decided by the connection. The noun διαλλαγή is more frequently used in the classics than καταλλαγή, but nowhere in the New Testament; the verb διαλλάσσω, or διαλλάττω occurs only once; in the pass. aor. 2 imperat., Matt. v. 24: διαλλάγηθι τῷ ἀδελφῷ σου, be reconciled to thy brother. The noun καταλλαγή is used four times in the New Testament; Rom. v. 11 (E. V., atonement); xi. 15 (the reconciling); 2 Cor. v. 18, 19 (reconciliation, twice); the corresponding verb καταλλάσσω occurs six times—Rom. v. 10 (twice); 1 Cor. vii. 11; 2 Cor. v. 18, 19, 20—and is always rendered in our E. V. to reconcile. The translation atonement, at the close of Rom. v. 11, is etymologically correct (at-one-ment = reconciliation), but theologically wrong in the present use of the term = propitiation, expiation (which corresponds to the Greek ἵλασμός; 1 John ii. 2; iv. 10). The καταλλαγή, in the Christian sense, signifies the great change in the relation between God and man, brought about by the voluntary atoning sacrifice of Christ, whereby God's wrath has been removed, His justice satisfied, and man reunited to Him as His loving and reconciled Father. Some confine the word simply to a reconciliation of man to God, on the ground that no change can take place in God, or that God never hated the sinner. Others forget that the death of Christ is itself the most amazing exhibition of God's love, whereby He attracts the sinner to Him. The two sides must not be abstractly separated. It is God who, in His infinite love, establishes a new relation between Himself and mankind through the atoning sacrifice of His Son, and removes all legal obstructions which separated us from Him; and on the ground of this objective and accomplished expiation (ἵλασμός) and reconciliation (καταλλαγή), we are called upon to be reconciled to Him (καταλλάγητε τῷ Θεῷ; 2 Cor. v. 20; comp. σῶθητε ἀπὸ, κ.τ.λ., Acts ii. 40), i. e., to lay aside all enmity and distrust, and to turn in love and gratitude to Him who first loved us. Both sides are beautifully connected in 2 Cor. v. 18–20 (which is often one-sidedly and wrongly quoted against the doctrine of the vicarious sacrifice), viz., the reconciliation effected once for all by God Himself through the death of His Son, having the world for its object and remission of sins for its effect; and the reconciliation of men to God as a moral process, in which men are exhorted to take part. The first is a finished act of infinite mercy on the part of God in Christ; the second, a change of feeling and a constant duty of man in consequence of what has been done for him. Comp. Kling and Wing on the passage in Lange on 2 Cor., p. 98 f., Amer. edition. Archbishop Trench (Synonymes of the New Testament, Second Part, p. 137 f.) gives the following judicious explanation of the term: "The Christian καταλλαγή has two sides. It is first a reconciliation, 'quā Deus nos sibi reconciliavit,' laid aside His holy anger against our sins, and received us into favor—a reconciliation effected once for all for us by Christ upon His cross; so 2 Cor. v. 18, 19; Rom. v. 10; in which last passage καταλλάσσεισθαι is a pure passive, 'ab eo in gratiam recipi, apud quem in o. io fueris.' But καταλλαγή is secondly, and subordinately, the reconciliation, 'quā nos Deo reconciliamus,' the daily deposition, under the operation of the Holy Spirit, of the enmity of the old man toward God. In this passive middle sense καταλλάσσεισθαι is used; 2 Cor. v. 20; and cf. 1 Cor. vii. 11. All attempts to make this, the secondary meaning of the word, to be the primary, rest not on an unprejudiced exegesis, but on a foregone determination to get rid of the reality of God's anger against sin. With καταλλαγή connects itself all that language of Scripture which describes sin as a state of enmity (ἐχθρα) with God (Rom. viii. 7; Eph. ii. 15; James iv. 4); and sinners as enemies to Him, and alienated from Him (Rom. v. 10; Col. i. 21); Christ on the cross as the Peace, and Maker of peace between God and man (Eph. ii. 14; Col. i. 20); all such language as this, 'Be ye reconciled with God' (2 Cor. v. 20).—P. S.]

Meyer: "Accordingly it is necessary to understand κατηλλάγημεν and καταλλάγεντες not actively, but passively: reconciled with God, so that He is no more hostile to us, having given up His wrath against us." On Tittmann's attempt to distinguish between διαλλάττειν and καταλλάττειν, see Tholuck on The Sermon on the Mount, Matt. v. 24.* The definition of these expressions is certainly connected with the explanation of ἐχθροί. It may be asked, however, whether the meaning is: God has been reconciled toward us (Meyer, Philippi); or: we have been reconciled toward God; or: there has been a mutual reconciliation? The first cannot be said [?], since the καταλλαγή denotes a change [from enmity to friendship]; also the καταλλαγή in 2 Cor. v. 18, "τοῦ καταλλάξαντος ἡμᾶς ἐαυτῷ," must be carefully distinguished from the ἵλασμός (see my Angewandte Dogmatik, p. 858).† The sense is, therefore: While we were still enemies, adversaries of God, we were delivered by the death of Jesus, and the expiating ἵλασμός, which is identical with it, from guilty subjection to the punishment of the ὀργή, and have been made objects of His conquering operation of love; and now, in the light of this operation of love, we have a heart delivered from the enmity of alienation from God—a heart which, in the train of love, has joy in God. But how can we distinguish between the objective and subjective change of humanity? It is plain, from the risen Redeemer's salutation of peace and His gospel-message, that the love of Christ on the cross conquered the hatred of humanity. The risen Saviour's salutation of peace contains the "peace on earth." Add to all this the difference and antithesis between vers. 8, 9, 10, which are completely ob-soured by the prevalent explanation above alluded to. The clause, God commendeth his love toward us, is the inscription to the antithesis, namely: 1. Christ died for us when we were yet sinners. Through His (atoning) blood we have been justified, delivered from the sense of the ὀργή. The effect is, that much more, as being justified (negatively), we shall be saved from the ὀργή which will finally come upon the world. All this is ἵλασμός, expiating destruction of the guilt of sin. 2. The Son of God suffered death while we were enemies. Through His death we are reconciled to God. The effect is, that much more, as being reconciled (positively), we shall be delivered in the mighty power and rule of His life. καταλλαγὴ is all this.

[In (i. e., in vital union with) his life, ἐν τῇ ζωῇ αὐτοῦ, in antithesis to δὲ (through, by means of) τοῦ θανάτου. If even the death of Christ has such a saving efficacy, how much more His risen life, which triumphed over the realm of death and hell, ascended to the right hand of God Almighty, is clothed with all power in heaven and earth, and which, being communicated by the Holy Ghost to the believer, will conquer in him all opposition, and bring the work of salvation commenced here to a final and glorious consummation. Comp. John xiv. 19: "Because I live, ye shall live also;" Rom. viii. 11; Gal. ii. 20; 1 Cor. xv. 28; Heb. vii. 25. Salvation is effected by the death of Christ, but actually applied by His life; or His death is the meritorious, His life the efficacious cause of our salvation. Hodge: "There is, therefore, most abundant ground for confidence for the final blessedness of believers, not only in the amazing love of God, by which, though sinners and enemies, they have been justified and reconciled by the death of His Son, but also in the consideration that this same Saviour that died for them still lives, and ever lives, to sanctify, protect, and save them."—P. S.]

Ver. 11. And not only that, but also triumphing in God [Οὐ μόνον δέ, ἀλλὰ καὶ καυχώμενοι (which is the correct reading, instead of the rec. καυχώμεθα, see Textual Note 19) ἐν τῷ Θεῷ]. Explanations: 1. The participle καυχώμενοι stands for the finite verb; therefore we must supply ἵσμεν (hence the readings καυχώμεθα, καυχώμεν). Rückert, Tholuck. Only σωθῆσόμεθα must be supplied to μόνον δέ. The construction then runs thus, according to De Wette: We have not only the hope of escaping from the wrath of God, but we also glory in God. 2. The participle cannot stand for the finite verb (see, on the contrary, the discussions with Meyer, in Tholuck). But even here σωθῆσόμεθα only is to be supplied. The sense, then, is this: but not only shall we be saved by His life, but so that with this σώζεσθαι we shall also glory in God. [Alford: "Not only shall we be saved, but that in a triumphant manner and frame of mind."] 3. Καταλαγνύντες must be supplied. Not only reconciled, but also glorying. Thus formerly Fritzsche, Köllner, Glöckler, Baumgarten-Crusius, and Meyer in his earlier editions. This explanation is proved to be relatively the most correct, as the σώζεσθαι denotes not a mere degree of salvation, but comprises salvation to the point of completion, and as καταλαγνύντες is repeated in δὲ οὐκ ἔστιν τὴν καταλλαγὴν ἱλάσμεν. Our view is, however, that we have here an antithesis of climax. Οὐ μόνον σωθῆσόμεθα—καταλαγνύντες ἐν τῇ ζωῇ Χριστοῦ—ἀλλὰ καὶ καυχώμενοι ἐν τῷ Θεῷ διὰ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. The rising climax is the following: 1. We are delivered from the wrath. 2. We are safely harbored in the life of Christ. 3. God, in His love, has become, through Christ, our God, in whom we glory. We glory not only in the hope of the δόξα of God, and not only conditionally in tribulations, &c., but we glory absolutely in God as our God; see chap. viii.

Through whom we have now. Reference to the future glory, as it is grounded in the experience of the present salvation, and ever develops itself from this base.—Have appropriated [τὴν καταλλαγὴν ἱλάσμεν]. So we translate the ἱλάσμεν (angerignel haben), to emphasize the fact of the ethical appropriation, which is very important for the beginning of the following section.

[It is safe to infer from ἱλάσμεν that καταλλαγὴ primarily means here a new relation of God to us, which He has brought about and which we receive, not a new relation of man to God, or a moral change in us, although this is a necessary moral consequence of the former, and inseparable from it. Hence καταλαγνύντες, in Rom. v. 10, is parallel with δικαιωθέντες, ver. 9: δικαιωθέντες σωθῆσόμεθα—καταλαγνύντες σωθῆσόμεθα. The article before καταλλαγὴν indicates the well-known, the only possible reconciliation, that which was brought about by the atoning sacrifice of Christ. The E. V. here exceptionally renders κατ. by atonement, which, in its old sense (= at-one-ment), meant reconciliation, but is now equivalent to expiation, propitiation, satisfaction. The expiation of Christ (ἵλασμός, ἱλαστήριον, the German Versöhnung) is the ground and condition of the reconciliation of God and man (καταλλαγὴ, Versöhnung). Bengel says, on Rom. iii. 24: "Propitiation (ἵλασμός) takes away the offence against God; reconciliation (καταλλαγὴ) has two sides (est duplex): it removes (a.) God's indignation against us; 2 Cor. v. 19; (b.) our alienation from God; 2 Cor. v. 20." In the same place Bengel distinguishes between καταλλαγὴ and ἀπολύτρωσις (redemption, Erlösung), by referring the former to God, the latter to enemies—i. e., sin and Satan. He remarks, however, that ἵλασμός and ἀπολύτρωσις are fundamentally one single benefit, namely, the restitutio peccatoris perdati.—P. S.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Ver. 1. The effect of justification is peace with God. Peace with God takes the place of our guilty relation, in which God seemed to be our enemy, because He was hostile to our sins—with which we were identified—and in his ὀργή separated us from Him, in order to separate us from sin. In this relation of guilt we were really His enemies, although we wished to appear to be the contrary. God, in His government, likewise seemed to oppose us unto death, as we opposed Him. And therefore we were at variance also with the best portion of the world, and with the kingdom of all good spirits, as we were at variance with ourselves and with God. But, with our justification, peace is established, and with it the reverse relation in all these respects. We should not speak of the peace of God as of a mere sensation; in the feeling of peace, the most glorious actual relation is reflected. We are not only in harmony, but in covenant union with God; not only in harmony with ourselves, but true to ourselves; not only in harmony with God's presence and government in the world, and in all events, but also in con-nation with and under the protection of "all the stars of heaven."

2. [Ver. 2. The access to the throne of grace.] The high-priest, who went into the Holy of Holies in the hope of beholding there the glory of God, was chiefly a type of Christ, who has gone into the real Holy of Holies for His own people, and has become the real atonement for us (Heb. ix.); but he was also the type of believers, who, through Christ, likewise have free access to the Holy of Holies of grace, in the hope of beholding there the δόξα of God, and being glorified in it (see chap. viii.). On the certainty of the Christian's hope, see Tholuck, p. 202.

3. We glory in tribulations also, ver. 3. Tribulations—subjectively, sorrows; and, taken together, the cross which the Christian must bear after His Saviour—are not only the ordained way to glory, but also the means of promoting glory. For believers shall attain not merely the glory of the Adamic paradise, but rather the higher glory of Christ's paradise; and this they reach because they are similarly situated, and become like Him in death as in life. The Cross effects the enriched and established consummation.

4. The glorifying of Christians is their joyous testimony of a blessed experience—the personal shape which the gospel takes. It is always conditioned according to its changing forms by a fundamental form of salvation; that is, established on the glory of God and Christ, in opposition to all the forms and disguises of self-glory.

5. The sortes, tribulation worketh constancy, &c. (vers. 3-5), represents tribulation also as a spiritual experience. Therefore a merely external suffering, such as any body may have, is not meant thereby, but the cross as a consequence of Christian faith. Faith leads into tribulation, because, as peace with God, it leads into conflict with the kingdom of darkness, and also with sin in ourselves, because it endows the ordinary suffering of this life with a spiritual character. Such a bearing of the cross looks to constancy, or steadfastness (passive patientia has active patientia as a result); steadfastness reaches its preliminary issue, as well as its final issue, in approval (experience); approval converts hope to confident assurance, which cannot deceive, because it is itself the prophecy of approaching glory. The Apostle's sortes describes a chain of blessed experiences, which cannot be broken unless the first links to approval are rendered brittle by insincerity, but whose strength increases from link to link to that unconquerable assurance of hope.

6. The elder dogmatics, especially the Reformed, have made prominent the doctrine of approval and perseverance in grace; or, what is the same, the doctrine of sealing. They made sealing follow justification. If this great truth had been carefully guarded, the controversy between the Lutheran and Reformed theology, as to whether a pardoned person can fall from grace, could have been regarded as a mere question of words, to be solved by the further inquiry as to whether the question concerns Christians before, or after, they are sealed. The heart's experience of justification must be put to proof, in which it becomes the historically established experience of life. Steadfastness in such proofs results inwardly in sealing by the Holy Spirit (2 Tim. ii. 19; Rev. vii. 3; ix. 4; Eph. i. 13; iv. 30), and outwardly in the establishment of the Christian in the character of his new nature (δοξμῇ). The nomen et omen indelebile of baptism, confirmation, and ordination, becomes the real character indelebilis only by approval, or sealing. This is ethically connected with the fact that, by the test of tribulation and steadfastness, a purifying process has taken place, by which a separation of the most combustible material has been effected.

7. The way which Christians pursue with Christ goes downward, according to appearance, and often according to feeling; but it goes upward, according to internal operation and experience. This occurs in a threefold relation: (1.) Since all the high stand-points of worldly consciousness are without support, the Christian's position in the fellowship of Christ, who is above, is established as his second nature. (2.) The persevering fellowship in the historical ignominy of Christ, is fellowship in the historical honor which shall be received in the harvest of the world. (3.) There is forming a dynamical nature of light and heat of the inner man, which, by its impulsive and sustaining power, as well as by the still stronger upward attraction, ascends to the kingdom of glory.

8. The experience of the love of God in Christ for us is changed, with its joy, into pure reciprocal love; and from the complete life of love of this new birth there arises pure salvation, which, in this world, is divided into hope and patience. See chap. viii. 24, 25; 1 John iii.

9. As the Holy Spirit caused the birth of Christ, so does He cause the new birth of Christians; ver. 5.

10. The contemplation of the love of God for us, which was revealed in the death of Jesus, in His dying for us (ver. 8), remains the ground of the life of love of believers. See Philippi, p. 166. On the ὑπέρ, see Meyer, p. 150. [P. 189 f., fourth edition. Meyer maintains here that in all the passages which treat of the object of the death of Christ (as Luke xxii. 19, 20; Rom. viii. 32; xiv. 15, &c.), the prepositions ὑπέρ and ἐπὶ mean in commodum, for the benefit of, and must not be confounded with ἀντί, loco, instead of, which Paul never uses (but Christ Himself uses it, Matt. xx. 28, δοῦναι τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ ὑπὲρ ἀντι πολλῶν, comp. Mark x. 45, ὑπὲρ ἀντι πολλῶν); but that Paul nevertheless teaches a satisfactio vicaria, by representing Christ's death as a propitiatory sin-offering, Rom. iii. 25; Eph. v. 2, &c.—P. S.]

11. After the Apostle has represented the sortes of the Christian's subjective certainty of salvation (vers. 1-5), he makes a sortes of his objective certainty of salvation (vers. 6-11). The thesis from which he proceeds is the fact that, among men, there is scarcely one who will die for a righteous man, though perhaps one would die for the good man (see the Exeg. Notes; comp. Tholuck, p. 208). The sentence must be enlarged by the farther definition: No one would die for the ungodly, or for his enemy; but God has performed this miracle of love in the death of Christ. For Christ died for us when we were, in a negative view, incapable, and, in a positive view, even ungodly. Therefore the objective certainty of salvation is established in the following conclusions: (1.) We were sinners, debtors, for whom Christ died; much more shall we, since we are justified and reconciled, be preserved from the wrath to come. (2.) The death of the Son of God has overcome our enmity, and reconciled us; much more shall His life perfectly redeem us as reconciled until the consummation. (3.) Since we have obtained reconciliation, we are happy even now in the triumphant joy that God is our God.

12. On the difference between the ἔλεος and the κατάλλαξις, see the Exeg. Notes [p. 166].

[Bishop Horaley (Serm. on Rom. iv. 25) on the atonement and reconciliation: "Those who speak of the wrath of God as appeased by Christ's sufferings, speak, it must be confessed, a figurative language. The Scriptures speak figuratively when they ascribe wrath to God. The Divine nature is insusceptible of the perturbations of passion, and, when it is said that God is angry, it is a figure, which conveys this useful warning to mankind, that God will be determined by His wisdom, and by His providential care of His creation, to deal with the wicked, as a prince in anger deals with rebellious subjects. It is an extension of the figure when it is said that God's wrath is appeased by the sufferings of Christ. It is not to be supposed that the sins of men excite in God an appetite of vengeance, which could not be diverted from its purpose of punishment till it had found its gratification in the sufferings of a righteous person. This, indeed, were a view of our redemption founded on a false and unworthy notion of the Divine character. But nothing hinders but that the sufferings of Christ, which could only, in a figurative sense, be an appeasement or satisfaction of God's wrath, might be, in the most literal meaning of the words, a satisfaction to His justice. It is easy to understand that the interests of God's government, the peace and order of the great kingdom, over which He rules the whole world of moral agents, might require that His disapprobation of sin should be solemnly declared and testified in His manner of forgiving it. It is easy to understand that the exaction of vicarious sufferings on the part of Him, who undertook to be the intercessor for a rebellious race, amounted to such a declaration. These sufferings, by which the end of punishment might be answered, being once sustained, it is easy to perceive that the same principle of wisdom, the same providential care of His creation, which must have determined the Deity to inflict punishment, had no atonement been made, would now determine Him to spare. Thus, to speak figuratively, His anger was appeased; but His justice was literally satisfied, and the sins of men, no longer calling for punishment, when the ends of punishment were secured, were literally expiated. The person sustaining the sufferings, in consideration of which the guilt of others may, consistently with the principles of good policy, be remitted, was, in the literal sense of the word—so literally, as no other victim ever was—a sacrifice, and His blood shed for the remission of sin was literally the matter of expiation."]

13. This section contains, in narrow compass, a sketch of the whole development of Christian salvation, in which its principal perfection* is made emphatic at the beginning as well as at the conclusion, in order that the peripheral imperfection of the state of faith in this world may not be regarded in an Ebionitic way as a principal one. We must observe that, in Rom. viii., this designation is further elaborated under a new point of view, and that there, too, the subjective and objective certainty of salvation can be distinguished.

14. The idea of the real worship of God reappears definitely here in the beginning as well as at the end of the section.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The fruits of the righteousness of faith. They are: 1. Peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ (ver. 1); 2. Hope of future glory in the tribulations of the present time (vers. 2-5); 3. Confidence of salvation established on the love of God for us as made known in the propitiatory death of Christ (vers. 6-11).—Peace with God: 1. In what does it consist? 2. By whom do we obtain it? (ver. 1).—The peace of heart with God is the source of all other peace: 1. In homes; 2. In churches; 3. In nations.—By Christ we have obtained access to the grace of justification. In this are comprised: 1. A strong consolation (we are no more rejected from God's face; the door is opened; we can come in); 2. A serious admonition (we should not disregard this access, but make use of it; and 3. We should often come with all our burdens).—In what should and can we glory as Christians? 1. In the future glory which God shall give; 2. But also in the tribulations which He sends us (vers. 2-5); 3. In God Himself as our God.—Why should we, as Christians, glory also in tribulations? Because we know: 1. That tribulation worketh patience (endurance); 2. Patience (endurance) worketh experience (strictly, approval); comp. 2 Cor. ii. 9; ix. 13; James i. 3; 3. Experience (approval) worketh hope; and 4. Hope maketh not ashamed (vers. 2-5).—Why does Christian hope prevent shame? 1. Because it is not a false hope; but, 2. It has its ground in the love of God, which is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us (ver. 5).—In what respect does God commend (prove) His love toward us? 1. In Christ's dying at the appointed time for us; 2. But still more in His dying for us when we were yet sinners (vers. 6-8).—It is noble to die for a benefactor, but it is divine to die for evil-doers (ver. 7).—The importance of Christ's life and death for men: 1. His death brings reconciliation when we are enemies; 2. His life brings salvation when we are reconciled (vers. 9-11).—Christ's life our salvation (ver. 10).—Salvation by the life of Christ is necessary for Christians of the present time.—Let us speak of Christ's death, but let us also speak continually of His life (ver. 10).

LUTHER: One has experience when he has been well tempted, and can therefore speak of it as having been in it himself (ver. 4).—God is our God, and we are His people, and we have all good things in common from Him and with Him, in all confidence (ver. 11).

STARKE: Ver. 2. Future glory is connected with justification by an indissoluble chain; chap. viii. 18, 30, 32.—Ver. 2. Nothing can make so happy as the hope of the incorruptible, undefiled, and imperishable inheritance which is reserved in heaven; 1 Peter i. 4.—Ver. 5. He who has the Holy Spirit, is the only one who is certain that God's love is shed abroad in his heart.—Ver. 10. The death of Christ is the principal agency toward our reconciliation; but His resurrection is the seal and assurance that we are truly reconciled to God.—Ver. 10. Christ's resurrection is the ark of life and royal city of our salvation.—Ver. 11. No one can glory in God but he who has Christ; for He is the way by which we come to the enjoyment of God; John xiv. 6. He, therefore, who does not have Him, is also without God in the world, Eph. ii. 12.—HEDINGER: To be certain of the forgiveness of sin, is the fountain of all joy and consolation (ver. 1).—Beware of the hypocrite's hope, which destroys! The believer clings to God's love in Christ as an anchor to the rock; Heb. vi. 19. Would to God we understood this well! If we did, nothing could grieve and afflict us (ver. 5).—A Christian must regard the suffering of Christ not only as a mirror of wrath, but also as a mirror of love (ver. 8).—What a glory! God's child, and in good favor with Him! How incomprehensible, how glorious, and how blessed! (ver. 11).—CRAMER: If we are justified by faith, we have free access to God, so that we do not need any patron or saint to prepare the way for us (ver. 2).—The suffering of Christians is their glory; for they suffer without guilt, and for Christ's glory (ver. 3).—OSIANDER: The cross and tribulation make us humble and patient; they are therefore the most precious gems and best ornament of the children of God (ver. 3).—Nova Bibl. Tub.: Oh, how blessed is the cross! Though it pain the flesh, it brings eternal good. We are better purified by it, than gold is by fire; our hope is strengthened, and the love of God is shed abroad in the heart (ver. 5).—Love is rare among men, yet there are remarkable examples of some who have given up their lives for their fellow-citizens and brethren. But there is no comparison between all this and the love of Christ (ver. 7).—Who would not love in return a God so full of love, and prefer fellowship with Him to that of all others? (ver. 10).

GERLACH: Justification by faith not only gives free access to God's grace at the present time, but it also confers the certainty of future glory (ver. 2).—In justification the believer receives the first germ of the whole new life. But since the germ grows into a tree, and the tree ever becomes more firmly rooted amid storms, all that the believer had at the beginning is renewed and established at every new stage of trial (ver. 5).—Since God has performed for sinners and enemies the greatest service, He will certainly not leave unfinished for the reconciled and righteous the much smaller remaining part of His work (ver. 9).—The Apostle begins to indicate here what he treats more at length in chap. vi.: Faith so transposes us into Christ, that His life, death, resurrection, and glory, become ours. Each circumstance from His history becomes the history of mankind believing in Him, as well as of each individual believer (ver. 10).

LISCO: The saving fruits of the righteousness acquired by faith in Jesus Christ (vers. 1-11).—The fruit of this righteousness (vers. 1-5).—The most certain sign of the love of God toward us just mentioned, is the redemption made by Christ (vers. 6-8).—The blessed result of this love of God and Christ, is the certain hope of the eternal duration of this love, and, finally, of our attainment of glory (vers. 9-11).

HUBNER: Paul here strikes the note of the triumphal song of the justified. Listen: His readers should participate in his joy; we are reconciled, we are pardoned.—Without justification, there is no joy, no love, no happiness in life; without it, nothing can make us happy—neither nature, nor the love of men (ver. 1).—Grace is prepared, and offered to all. Many accept it, but all do not remain steadfast (ver. 2).—He on whom God has placed many burdens, has much entrusted to him; God has made him an object of distinction. Therefore, the higher and more joyous the Christian's spirit is in suffering, the greater will be the increase of his joy and strength in conflict (ver. 3).—What influence does suffering exert on the Christian? (ver. 3).—The sacred hope of the Christian maketh not ashamed; it is holy in its object and ground.—Faith in the love of God is the ground of all hope (ver. 5).—The helplessness of the unimproved heart is followed by the saddest results of sin; just as severe sickness is succeeded by weakness (ver. 6).—God's holy love of His enemies (ver. 8).—The greatest misery of a created being, is, to bear the wrath of God (ver. 9).—God's love of us is a prevenient love (ver. 10).—Christ's life is the ground of our salvation (ver. 10).

BESSER: The salvation of those who are justified by faith. It is: 1. A present salvation; 2. Also a future one (vers. 1-11).—Tribulation is praiseworthy, because the evergreen of hope is sprinkled with the tears of tribulation (vers. 3-5).—God's wrath is not human; God is love, and Divine wrath is connected with the love which takes no pleasure in the death of the sinner, but is an ardent, compassionate desire to save the sinner. Reconciliation is the execution of this loving determination of God by means of the atonement through the death of His Son (ver. 10).—God unites in the Church with pardoned sinners—who have faith in Jesus, and glory in God as their God—more intimately and gloriously than in Paradise with innocent man (ver. 11).

SCHLEIERMACHER, on vers. 7, 8: The death of Christ is the highest glorification of God's love toward us. 1. God imposed death on our Redeemer as the most perfect proof of obedience; 2. Many are justified by this obedience.

SPENER: 1. The fruits of justification: (a.) Peace; (b.) Access to God; (c.) The joy of future hope; (d.) Victory in tribulation and the cross; (e.) The gift of the Holy Ghost. 2. The causes of justification (vers. 1-11).

BURKITT: One grace generates and begets another; graces have a generation one from another, though they all have one generation from the Spirit of God.—He that does not seek reconciliation with God, is an enemy of his soul; and he that rejoices not in that reconciliation, is an enemy to his own comfort.—LOGAN (sermon on Jesus Christ Dying for Sinners, Rom. v. 7, 8): The greatest trial and exercise of virtue is when an innocent man submits to the imputation of a crime, that others may be free from the punishment. This Christ did. He was betrayed like an impostor by one of His own disciples, apprehended like a robber by a band of soldiers, led like a malefactor through the streets of Jerusalem, nailed like a murderer to the accursed tree, and, in the sight of all Israel, died the death of a traitor and a slave, that he might atone for the real guilt of men.—Comp. Comm.: He that puts himself to the charge of purchasing our salvation, will not decline the trouble of applying it.—HODGE: As the love of God in the gift of His Son, and the love of Christ in dying for us, are the peculiar characteristics of the gospel, no one can be a true Christian on whom these truths do not exert a governing influence.—Annot. Paragraph Bible: God establishes His love toward man by demonstration; it is a love worthy of Himself, and which none but Himself can feel.

SECOND DIVISION.

SIN AND GRACE IN THEIR SECOND ANTITHESIS (AS IN THEIR SECOND POTENCY); ACCORDING TO THEIR NATURAL EFFECTS IN HUMAN NATURE, AND IN NATURE IN GENERAL. THE SINFUL CORRUPTION OF THE WORLD, PROCEEDING FROM ADAM, AND INHERITED IN COMMON BY ALL MEN, AND THE LIFE OF CHRIST AS THE INWARD LIVING PRINCIPLE OF THE NEW BIRTH TO NEW LIFE IN INDIVIDUAL BELIEVERS, IN ALL MANKIND, AND IN THE WHOLE CREATED WORLD. (THE PRINCIPLE OF DEATH IN SIN, AND THE PRINCIPLE OF THE NEW LIFE; AS WELL AS THE GLORIFICATION OF THE NEW LIFE, AND OF ALL NATURE, IN RIGHTEOUSNESS.)

CHAPTERS V. 12-VIII. 39.

FIRST SECTION.—Adam's sin as the powerful principle of death, and God's grace in Christ as the more powerful principle of the new life in the nature of individual men, and in mankind collectively. The law as the direct medium of the complete manifestation of sin for the indirect mediation of the completed and glorious revelation of grace.

CHAP. V. 12-21.

- 12 Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death¹ passed upon all men, for that [ἐφ' ᾧ, i. e., on the ground that, because]
- 13 all have [omit have] sinned: ([omit parenthesis]² For until the law sin was in the world: but sin is not imputed when there is no law [where the law is not].
- 14 Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned [those that sinned not]³ after the similitude [likeness] of Adam's transgression, who is the figure [a type] of him that was to come [the coming one,
- 15 i. e., the second Adam]. But not as the offence [fall, transgression],⁴ so also is the free gift: for if through the offence [transgression] of [the] one [the] many be dead [died], much more [did]⁵ the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man [the gift by the grace of the one man], Jesus Christ, hath
- 16 abounded [abound] unto [the] many. And not as it was [omit it was] by [the] one that sinned,⁶ so [omit so] is the gift: for the judgment was [came] by [ἐξ, of] one (fall) to condemnation, but the free gift is [came] of many offences [falls, transgressions] unto justification [δικαίωμα, sentence of acquittal,
- 17 righteous decree, or, righteous act]. For if by one man's offence [by one transgression, or, by the transgression of the one]⁷ death reigned by [through the] one; much more they which [who] receive [the] abundance of [the] grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by [the] one, Jesus Christ.)
- 18 [omit parenthesis.] Therefore, as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life [So then, as through the transgression of one, or, one transgression, it came upon all men to condemnation; so also through the δικαίωματος, righteous act of one, or, one righteous act, it came
- 19 upon all men unto justification of life].⁸ For as by one man's disobedience [through the disobedience of the one man] [the] many were made [constituted]⁹ sinners, so [also, οὕτως καί] by the obedience of [the] one shall [the]
- 20 many be made [constituted] righteous. Moreover the law entered [came in besides],¹⁰ that the offence [transgression] might abound [multiply]. But where 21 sin abounded [multiplied], grace did much more [exceedingly]¹¹ abound: That as sin hath [omit] hath] reigned unto [éy, in] death, even so [so also] might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by [through] Jesus Christ our Lord.

TEXTUAL.

¹ Ver. 12.—[‘Ο θάνατος (Rec.) is found in N. B. C. K. L., some versions and fathers; is adopted by Lachmann, Meyer, Wordsworth, and Lange. Tischendorf and Alford omit it, on the authority of D. E. F. G., and many fathers. Alford considers it a marginal gloss, to define the subject of θάλαθον. But the external authority for it is sufficient to overcome the doubt arising from the variation in position found in some authorities, especially as the omission may have readily arisen from the transcriber's mistaking -ους, which precedes, for the close of the word he was about to write: -τος (Meyer).]

¹⁰ Ver. 20.—[Παρεσιγήθεν, only Gal. ii. 4; there, in malam partem. The above rendering is literal and exact. Lange translates: came in between. See Exeg. Notes.]

[INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.—This section is difficult in proportion to its depth, grandeur, and world-historical comprehensiveness. Only a mind of the very highest order—to say nothing of inspiration—could conceive such vast thoughts, and compress them within so few words. The beginning, the middle, and the end of history, are here brought together in their representative moral powers and principles. Paul deals with religious truths and facts, which are much broader and deeper than the after-thoughts of our logic and theology, and cannot be squeezed into the narrow limits of particular schools and schemes. The exegesis of this part of the Romans began in earnest with Augustine, in his contest with the Pelagian heresy; it was resumed in the Reformation period, and carried further, philologically and doctrinally, in the present century, but is by no means exhausted, and puts exegetical skill again and again to the severest test. Every line bears the marks of theological controversy about original sin, free agency, imputation, limited atonement, universal salvation, and other questions which will occupy the human mind to the end of the world. The section is not a mere episode, but a progress in the argument from the doctrine of justification to the broader doctrine of a life-union of the believer with Christ, which prepares the way for the doctrine of sanctification, in chap. vi., and glorification, in chap. viii. Like a skilful physician, the Apostle goes not only to the root and fountain-head of the evil,* but also to the root and fountain head of the cure. In bold antithetical contrasts, and on the basis of a vital, organic union of humanity, both in the order of fallen nature and the order of redeeming grace, he presents the history of the fall by the first, and the redemption by the second Adam. Adam and Christ are the two representative heads of the whole race, the one the natural, the other the supernatural: from the one, the power of sin and the power of death have proceeded upon all men through their participation in his fall; from the other, righteousness and life have come upon all on condition of faith, or a living apprehension of Christ. But the gain by the redemption greatly surpasses the loss by the fall. The main stress lies on the idea of life in its progress from Christ to the believer. The same parallelism between the first and second Adam, but with exclusive reference to the contrast of death and the resurrection, occurs in 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22, 45-48, which should be kept in view. It is impossible to understand this section from the standpoint of a mechanical and atomistic conception of humanity and of sin, such as Pelagianism and cognate systems maintain. On the surface, all things appear separate and isolated; in the hidden roots, they are united. It is characteristic of all deep thinking, to go back to principles and general ideas. Paul evidently views the human race as an organic unit. Adam and Christ sustain to it a central and universal relation, similar to that which the fountain sustains to the river, or the root to the tree and its branches. Adam was not merely an individual, but the natural head of the human family, and his transgression was not an isolated act, but affected the whole race which sprung from his loins; just as the character of the tree will determine the character of its branches and fruits. So it is with Christ. He calls himself emphatically the (not a) Son of Man, the universal, normal, absolute Man, the representative head of regenerate humanity, which is from heaven, heavenly, as Adam's fallen humanity is "of the earth, earthy" (1 Cor. xv. 47, 48). Both were tried and tempted by the devil, the one in the garden of innocence, the other in the desert; but the one succumbed, and dragged his posterity into the ruin of the fall; while the other conquered, and became the author of righteousness and life to all who embrace Him. Christ has gained far more for us than Adam lost—namely, eternal reunion with God, in the place of the temporary union of untried innocence. The resurrection of humanity in Christ is the glorious solution of the dark tragedy of the disastrous fall of humanity in Adam. In view of the greater merit of Christ and the paradise in heaven, we may reverently and thankfully rejoice in the guilt of Adam and the loss of his paradise on earth—always, of course, detesting the blasphemous maxim: Let us do evil, that good may come. It is God's infinite wisdom and mercy alone which overrule the wrath of man for His own glory.—P. S.]

Meyer inscribes this section: The drawing of a parallel between salvation in Christ and the ruin produced by Adam. But this does not do justice to the context of the section. Tholuck adopts Bengel's view: "Respicit totam tractationem superiorem, ex qua hæc infert apostolus, non tam digressionem faciens quam regressum de peccato et de justitia." [Bengel continues: "In imitation of Paul's method, we should treat first of actual sin (chaps. i.-iii.), and then go back to the source in which sin originated." Philippi also regards this section as a comparative or contrastive retrospect and comprehensive conclusion; De Wette and Rothe as an episode.—P. S.] We differ from all these, and refer to our division of the Epistle, and to the superscription here.

1. The principle of sin and death become immanent (hereditary) in humanity (vers. 12-14).

2. The opposing principle of the gift of grace and of the new life made immanent (spiritually hereditary) in humanity (vers. 15-19).

3. The coöperation of the law for the finished revelation of sin and for the communication of the finished revelation of the grace of justification (vers. 20, 21).

1. Arrangement of the first paragraph, vers 12-14.

(a.) Sin and death proceeding from Adam's

* (As Chrysostom remarks in the beginning of his tenth Homily on Romans, Opera, tom. ix. p. 619, ed. Montfaucon, but he omits the positive part, which is more important.—P. S.)

παράβασις upon all, under the form of an ethical appropriation by all (ver. 12).

(b.) Death as revealer of the improperly apprehended sin, from Adam to Moses, or to the law (not by the law, vers. 13, 14).

2. The second paragraph, vers. 15-19.

(a.) The actually manifested contrast in the effects of the two principles. (aa.) The contrast between the natural and actual effects, according to their quantitative extension to persons; or the contrast in its personal relation (ver. 15). (bb.) The contrast between the positive effects, according to the qualitative intensity of judgment and justification; or, the contrast in its essential relation (ver. 16).

(b.) The contrast in the potential and prospective effects of the two principles. (aa.) The contrast between the enslavement of all personal life by impersonal (merely personified) death, and the future glory of the pardoned, immortal, and reigning personalities in the new life (ver. 17; at the same time a proof for ver. 16). (bb.) The contrast in all its ideal magnitude: One condemnation came upon all men, because of the power of the fall of one man; so, by the righteousness of one, can all men attain to the justification of life (that is, not merely of faith, ver. 18).

(c.) The contrast in the final effects disclosed by the gospel. By the effect of one man's disobedience, the many are represented in the light of the gospel as sinners exposed to the judgment; finally, by the obedience of one, the many are to be represented as righteous in the judgment (ver. 19).

3. Third paragraph, vers. 20-21.

The law is designed to effect directly the developing process of sin to historical completion, in order to effect indirectly that revelation of grace which far preponderates over the development of sin (vers. 20, 21).

FIRST PARAGRAPH (VERS. 12-14).

The principle of sin and death in humanity.

Ver. 12. Wherefore [διὰ τοῦτο]. Rückert, Köllner [Tholuck, Reiche, Stuart], &c., refer διὰ τοῦτο to the entire discussion from chap. i. 17; * Rothe, to the previous section, v. 1-11, which he claims to treat of holiness; Tholuck, to vers. 11, 10, 9, &c.; Meyer, to ver. 11 alone.† We refer it merely to ἐλάβομεν in the previous verse. The verb λαμβάνειν does not denote, in the New Testament, a passive reception, but an ethical, religious, and moral appropriation; for example, John i. 12. And this is here the point of comparison between vers. 11 and 12.

Because this point has been overlooked, an incredible amount of vexation has been produced in reference to the presumed anacoluthon, or ἀνάρτησις πόδοτον [an incomplete sentence, a protasis without an apodosis]. Conjectures [concerning the construction or the apodosis corresponding to ἵνα ἵνα ἵνα]:

* [So also Bengel: "διὰ τοῦτο refers to the whole of the preceding discussion, from which the Apostle draws these conclusions, herein making not so much a digression as a retrogression." Hodge: "The wherefore is to be taken as illative, or marking an inference from the whole of the previous part of the Epistle, and especially from the preceding verses."—P. S.]

† [Meyer: "DARUM, weil wir nämlich durch Christum die καταλλαγή und die Gewissheit des ewigen Heils empfangen haben, ver. 11." But Meyer regards ver. 11 as the summary of the whole preceding doctrine of justification and salvation. Philippi likewise refers διὰ τοῦτο to ver. 11 in such a way that it looks at the same time to the whole deduction from i. 17-v. 11. This to us seems to be the most satisfactory connection.—P. S.]

1. According to Calvin, Tholuck, Philippi, and others, the conclusion is indicated in the words ὅς ἐστι τύπος τοῦ μέλλοντος, ver. 14. [Meyer also regards the clause: "who is a type of the future (Adam)," as a substitute for the apodosis, which was swept away by the current of ideas in vers. 13 and 14.—P. S.]

2. According to Rückert, Fritzsche, and De Wette [?], Paul dropped the comparison between Adam and Christ after enumerating the points of analogy, because their dissimilarity occurred to his mind (ver. 15). De Wette translates ver. 12: Therefore (is it) as by one man, &c. According to Origen, Bengel [Rothe], and others, the Apostle designedly suppresses the conclusion. [Bengel says simply: "Apodosis, variata oratione, latet in seq.," is concealed in what follows. But Rothe holds that Paul designedly omitted the apodosis, to prevent the illegitimate doctrinal inference of a universal salvation. See below.—P. S.]

3. According to Grotius, [E. V., Stuart, Barnes, Hodge], &c., vers. 13-17 are parenthetical; and the conclusion follows in ver. 18. [Against this construction may be urged, with Meyer, the unexampled length and importance of the supposed parenthesis, and that ver. 18 is not so much a reassumption as a recapitulation.—P. S.]

4. According to Clericus, Wolf, and others, the conclusion is already in ver. 12, and begins with καὶ οὕτως [as if this could be synonymous with οὕτω καὶ, so also, which is impossible.—P. S.]; according to Erasmus, Beza, and others, it begins with καὶ διὰ [which makes διὰ τοῦτο superfluous, and sets aside the comparison between Adam and Christ.—P. S.]

5. The proper view is the one defended by Koppe, in harmony with [Cocceius] Elsner, and others. The apodosis begins as a comparative statement with ἵνα, since ἐλάβομεν καταλλαγήν δι' αὐτοῦ is brought over from ver. 11. [In other words, ἵνα introduces the second member of the comparison, while the first must be supplied from ver. 11 in this way: Therefore (we received and appropriated the reconciliation through Christ in the same manner) as by one man sin entered into the world, &c.—P. S.] *

* [This construction is favored, upon the whole, by De Wette (who, however, objects to it: "Ergänzt man die καταλλαγήν ἐλάβομεν δι' αὐτοῦ, so weiss man nicht recht, was man mit der Vergleichung anfangen soll"), Umbreit, Theo. Schott, Wordsworth, Alford, Jowett, Conybeare and Howson. I subjoin Alford's note in full, though I dissent from it: "This verse is one of acknowledged difficulty. The two questions meeting us directly, are: (1.) To what does διὰ τοῦτο refer? (2.) ἵνα, like as, may introduce the first member of a comparison, the second being to be discovered; or may introduce the second, the first having to be discovered. I shall endeavor to answer both questions in connection. I conceive διὰ τοῦτο to refer to that blessed state of confidence and hope just described: 'on this account,' here meaning, 'quæ cum ista sint.' 'This state of things, thus brought about, will justify the following analogy.' Thus we must take ἵνα, either (a) as beginning the comparison, and then supply, 'so by Christ, in His resurrection, came justification into the world; and by justification, life;' or (b) as concluding the comparison, and supply before it, 'it was,' or 'Christ wrought.' This latter method seems to me far the best. For none of the endeavors of commentators to supply the second limb of the comparison from the following verses has succeeded: and we can hardly suppose such an ellipsis, when the next following comparison (ver. 16) is rather Tholuck remarks, that then we do not know exactly what to do with the comparison.† But the comparison is contained in the already indicated conception of the ethical appropriation of the principle of the reconciliation on one hand, as of the principle of sin and death on the other. The antithesis, more fully extended, is the following: Διὰ τοῦτο ἐλάβομεν τὴν καταλλαγὴν, ἐφ' ᾧ πεπιστεύκαμεν—ὥσπερ ἂν ἑνὸς ἀνθρώπου ἡ ἁμαρτία εἰς τὸν κόσμον ἐξῆλθεν καὶ διὰ τῆς ἁμαρτίας ὁ θάνατος, καὶ οὕτως ὁ θάνατος εἰς πάντας ἀνθρώπους διήλθεν, ἐφ' ᾧ πάντες ἥμαρτον. It is very plain that, without the conception of λαμβάνειν, the whole of the following antitheses would appear as a series of blind natural necessities; see Book of Wisdom i. 18; ii. 24, and the explanation of ἐφ' ᾧ, which follows below. Rothe thinks that the Apostle's supposed anacoluthon was even premeditated—according to the idea of Origen—in order to conceal the doctrine of the apocatastasis which might be deduced from the protasis. See thereon Tholuck, p. 215.

[I cannot bring my mind to adopt Dr. Lange's construction, which evades a grammatical difficulty only to give room for a more serious logical one, and mars the beauty and completeness of the analogy. It seems to me that the most natural solution of the difficulty is either (1.) to take ὥσπερ elliptically: "This is therefore like the case when;" comp. Matt. xxv. 14: ὥσπερ γὰρ ἄνθρωπος, as a man going abroad, where ὥσπερ neither has, nor necessarily requires, a corresponding οὕτως (see Textual Note in the Amer. edition of Lange on Matthew, p. 442); Gal. iii. 6; 1 Tim. i. 3, where καθὼς, and Mark xiii. 34, where ὡς is used elliptically; or (2.) to assume an intentional anacoluthon (comp. Winer, Gramm., p. 527 ff., on the two kinds of anacolutha, involuntary and intentional). I prefer the latter solution. The complete antithesis would read thus: "As (ὥσπερ) by one man (Adam) sin (ἡ ἁμαρτία) entered into the world, and death (ὁ θάνατος) through sin, and thus death extended (διήλθεν) to all men, inasmuch as all sinned (ἥμαρτον): so also (οὕτως καὶ) by one man, Jesus Christ, righteousness (ἡ δικαιοσύνη) entered into the world, and life (ἡ ζωὴ) through righteousness, and thus life shall extend (διελίσσεται) to all men, inasmuch as (on condition that) all shall believe (πιστεύουσιν)."^{*} We might also supply, after the second "righteousness": "in order that all, being justified by faith, may be saved." Rothe (p. 61) supplies as the last clause of the apodosis: ἐφ' ᾧ πάντες δίκαιοι κατασταθήσονται; Philippi: ἐφ' ᾧ πάντες δικαιοσύνησονται. But these are unessential differences. The great points of comparison are: (1.) Sin and death, as a principle and power, proceeding from Adam; righteousness and life, as a counteracting and conquering principle and power, proceeding from Christ, upon the whole human race. (2.) Death passing upon all men by participation in the sin of Adam; life passing upon all men by participation in the righteousness of Christ. But the analogy is not absolute; for (1.) the participation in Adam's sin is universal in fact, while the participation in the righteousness of Christ, though this righteousness is equally universal in power and intention, is limited in fact to believers; in other words, all are sinners, but not all are believers; all men are one with Adam, but not all are one with Christ (hence the past tense καταστάθηναι in the case of the ἁμαρτία, but the future κατασταθήσονται in the case of the δίκαιοι, ver. 19). (2.) What Christ gained for us is far greater (πολλῷ μᾶλλον ἐπερίσσεισιν, ver. 15, comp. τὴν περισσίων τῆς χάριτος, ver. 17, and ἐπερίσσεισιν ἡ χάρις, ver. 20) than what was lost by Adam. Paul, therefore, in the rush of ideas suggested by the parallel, intentionally suspends the apodosis, to make first some explanatory and qualifying statements in regard to the difference in the mode, extent, and quality of the effects proceeding respectively from Adam and Christ, and then, after hinting at the second member of the comparison, at the close of ver. 14, he brings out the double parallel of similarity and dissimilarity in full as a conclusion, vers. 18, 19, and 21. The whole section, as Meyer justly remarks, bears the impress of the most studied and acute premeditation; and this must apply also to the apparent grammatical irregularity in the absence of the apodosis. The Apostle might have spared the commentators a great deal of trouble, if he had, according to the ordinary rules of composition, first stated the comparison in full, and then given the explanations and qualifications; but such grammatical difficulties in the Scriptures are generally overruled for a profounder investigation and elucidation of the sense.—P. 8.]

As by one man [ὥσπερ δὲ ἑνὸς ἀνθρώπου], "by one man, single and singular in his position, and so presented as the τύπος τοῦ μέλλοντος, the type of the one greater man;" Webster and Wilkinson.—P. 8.] Not by his guilt (Meyer) [δὲ ἑνὸς ἁμαρτήσαντος, ver. 16], which would by no means suit the antithesis: Christ. But rather by one man, as the human principle, as the historical cause.* The one man is Adam, as representative of the first human pair in their unity. The sin of Eve (Sir. xxv. 24; 2 Cor. xi. 3; 1 Tim. ii. 14) did not fully decide concerning the future of the human race, because Adam was the head. It was with his sin that the sin of Eve was consummated as the guilt of the first man [and acquired its full power over posterity]. Therefore Adam is meant as the head, as the principle, and not merely with regard to propagation. [Webster and Wilkinson: "Adam, not Eve, is charged with the primal sin, as he received the command direct from God, and his sin was without excuse. Here, only the guilt of the transgression is in view; in 2 Cor. xi. 3; 1 Tim. ii. 14, the mode, instrument, and process." Bengel assigns three reasons for the omission of Eve: (1.) Adam had received the commandment; (2.) He was not only the head of his race, but also of Eve; (3.) If Adam had not obeyed his wife, one only would have sinned. The omission of the mention of Satan, the primary cause of sin (comp. Gen. iii.; John viii. 44; 2 Cor. xi. 3), he accounts for because (1.) Satan is opposed to God, Adam to Christ, whose economy of grace is here described; (2.) Satan has nothing to do with the grace of Christ. It should be rea weakening than a strengthening the analogy. We have examples for this use of ὥσπερ in Matt. xxv. 14, and of καθὼς, Gal. iii. 6.—P. 8.]

[This objection was made by De Wette, from whom Tholuck, p. 215, quotes. Meyer calls this explanation illogical, because the universality of Adam's corruption, which is the prominent idea in ver. 12, has no corresponding parallel in the protasis which is supplied from the preceding verses.—P. 8.]

* [And also the efficient cause in the same sense in which Christ is the efficient cause of righteousness and life. According to the Pelagian and Unitarian theory Adam was merely the occasion: he sinned, and set a bad example to others, as Christ set a good example. Here Christ sinks to the position of a mere teacher.—P. 8.]

membered, also, as Forbes remarks, that in Genesis the very name of Adam, with the article prefixed (אָדָם, the Adam, the man), is treated as an appellative more than as a proper name, and that, in Gen. i. 27, it includes generically both sexes: "So God created Adam (in Hebrew) in his own image, in the image of God created he him: male and female created he them;" comp. Gen. v. 1, 2. It was man, or human nature which we have in common with him, that was put on trial in Adam. Paul draws a parallel between Adam and Christ, but never between Eve and Mary. The latter analogy is an unjustifiable inference, first hinted at by Irenæus, and more fully developed by Roman Catholic divines, and became a fruitful source of Mariolatry, which virtually makes the human mother of Christ the fountain of the Christian salvation.—P. S.]

Sin. [ἡ ἁμαρτία. The definite article before ἁμαρτία, and also before θάνατος, denotes sin and death as a power or principle which controls man and reveals itself in hereditary corruption, and in every form of actual sin. So ἡ δυνάμις, which corresponds to it as its opposite, vers. 17, 21, is not a single righteous act, but the power of good as a state and as a working principle. Sin is personified as a fearful tyrant, who acquired universal dominion over the human race; he "reigns in death," ver. 21; "works death in us," vii. 13; "lords it over us," vi. 14; "works all manner of concupiscence," vii. 8; "deceives and slays" the sinner, vii. 11, &c. In all these cases the force of the definite article can be rendered in German, but in English, on the contrary, the absence of the article has the force of generalizing, not so much, as far as I know, from any rule of grammar, as from usage, and perhaps for euphony's sake.—P. S.] In what sense? Explanations: 1. Original sin, or natural depravity (Augustine, Calvin); 2. Sinfulness [Sündhaftigkeit, habitus peccandi], (Koppe, Olshausen [also Webster and Wilkinson: sinfulness personified; a sinful disposition, our sinful nature; vi. 12, 14]); 3. Actual sin (Limborch, Fritzsche); 4. Sin as a ruling power (Meyer [De Wette], Tholuck), or better as a principle (Rothe). Philippi, on the contrary, understands sin as the unity of propensity and deed, as also Aret., Schmid, J. Müller. But sin, as an individual deed, is expressed by ἐφ' ᾧ, &c. It is therefore the principal or fundamental power (die principielle Macht) of sin as the mother of death (James i. 15). [The Apostle very carefully, throughout this whole section, distinguishes between ἁμαρτία, as the generic idea, and παράβασις and παράπτωμα, as a concrete act, the transgression of a law; compare vers. 12, 13, 20, 21, with 15, 16, 17, 18. By the παράπτωμα of Adam the ἁμαρτία entered into the human world, and this ἁμαρτία again became the fruitful mother of the innumerable παραπτώματα of his descendants.—P. S.]

Entered into the world. [εἰς τὸν κόσμον ἐσῆλθεν; comp. the Book of Wisdom ii. 24 (in explanation of Gen. iii.): φθόνῳ διαβόλου θάνατος ἐσῆλθεν εἰς τὸν κόσμον. Sin ἐσῆλθε, came in; death διήλθε, passed through; the Mosaic law παρεσῆλθε; (ver. 20), came in by the side, or between.] Limborch: a popular personification. On the excessive personification of sin and death in Fritzsche, see Tholuck, p. 219.—Into the world. Not merely into the human world (Meyer), or into human nature (Rothe) but as ruin and destructive power in the whole sphere of humanity in general (see Rom. vii. 20). It is plain that the human sphere of the world alone is assumed here (according to Abelard: in hac partem mundi sc. terrenam, in qua homines habent), as Tholuck remarks, from the fact that "according to the Apostle's conviction, evil is already in existence in another world." [Comp. 1 Cor. xi. 8; Gen. iii.; Book of Wisdom ii. 24; John viii. 44.—P. S.] The expression indicates not only the tendency to sin and death in human nature (Rothe), but also the propagation of sin (Augustine), because the κόσμος is a conjunction of things, and means an organic connection. The words διήλθε and ἐφ' ᾧ refer to the individual and ethical appropriation of sin which is in the κόσμος since Adam's fall.

Death (namely, entered into the world). Explanations: 1. Physical death (Chrysostom, Augustine, Calov., Meyer. Reference to Gen. ii. 17; iii. 19); * 2. Spiritual death (Pelagius); 3. Physical, spiritual, and eternal death; or the collected evil result of sin (Olshausen, De Wette, Tholuck [Philippi, Schmid, Jon. Edwards, Alford, Stuart, Hodge]). This is no doubt correct, for physical death in itself has no biblical and ethical significance (see Rom. viii. 6; 1 Cor. xv. 56; James i. 15).

[The Bible uniformly connects sin and death as cause and effect; comp. Gen. ii. 17; Ezek. xviii. 4 ("The soul that sinneth, it shall die"); Jer. xxxi. 30; Rom. vi. 16, 21, 24; vii. 10; viii. 13; James i. 15, &c. "Jeder Sündenfall," says Dr. Nitzsch, "ist ein Todesfall, und jeder Fortschritt in der Sünde ein neues Sterben." Without sin, there would be neither spiritual nor physical death. This was symbolically intimated by the tree of life in paradise, of which fallen man was forbidden to eat, "lest he live for ever." Adam, if he had not sinned, might have passed to higher forms of life, but without a violent separation of body and soul, without being "unclothed," but by being "clothed upon" (2 Cor. v. 2-4), or, in the beautiful figure of the Rabbins, "by a kiss of the Almighty." Death and life are very deep and comprehensive terms in the Scriptures, and the connection must decide whether all, or which of the meanings are exclusively or prominently kept in view. There are three kinds of death: (1.) The death of the soul (1 John iii. 14; comp. Matt. viii. 22; Eph. ii. 1), which is properly the first and immediate effect of sin, since sin is a separation of the soul from God, the fountain of life; (2.) The death of the body (Rom. v. 10; Matt. xx. 18; xxvi. 66 John xi. 4, 13; Acts xiii. 28; Phil. i. 20; ii. 8), which is the culmination and end of all physical malady and evil in this world; (3.) The eternal death of soul and body (Rom. i. 32; 2 Cor. iii. 16; vii. 10; James v. 20; 1 John v. 16), which is also called the second death, ὁ θάνατος ὁ δεύτερος (in the Apoc. ii. 11; xx. 6, 14; xxi. 8). In our passage (as also Rom. vii. 21, 23; vii. 5; 2 Tim. i. 10), ὁ θάνατος is as comprehensive as ἡ ἁμαρτία, its cause, and as ἡ ζωή, its opposite. It embraces all physical and moral evil, as the penal consequence of sin; it is death temporal and spiritual, viewed as one united power and principle ruling over the human race. That the Apostle meant physical death is clear from ver. 14, and from his unmistakable ref erence to Gen. ii. 17; iii. 8, 19; while from vers. 17, 18, 21, we may infer that he had also in mind spiritual and eternal death, as the contrast to eternal life, ζωὴ αἰώνιος, in which the Scripture idea of life culminates, as the idea of death culminates in eternal damnation. Ewald has an excellent note on this passage (Die Sendschreiben des Ap. Paulus, p. 378): "Paul knew that, notwithstanding the words Gen. ii. 17, Adam did not literally die immediately after his sin; consequently he must mean by death that entire inner corruption (jenes ganze innere Verderben) by which even the physical death only becomes true death; just as, on the other hand, he ascribes true life to the genuine Christians even now before the resurrection of the body. All this is so well founded in his constant use of language, that it needs no explanation." Comp. also the remarks of Philippi in loc., and Cremer, Bibl. Theol. Wörterbuch, sub θάνατος, p. 232: "Daher ist Tod zusammenfassender Ausdruck für die GESAMTE GERICHTLICHE CONSEQUENZ der Sünde, Rom. v. 12, 14, 17, 21; vi. 16; James v. 20, in welchem alles durch die Sünde bedingte Uebel sich concentrirt, synonym. Verderben, ἀπώλεια."—P. S.]

And so (death) passed upon all men. The second θάνατος was left out probably because διήλθεν would be referred equally to sin and death. But both are comprehended in the θάνατος in its spiritual character. The διερχέσθαι denotes the extension, the universal progress; though a germ-like development is not contained in the word, but in the thing itself. [οὕτως (demzufolge, dergestalt, consequently) connects the universal reign of death, chronologically and logically, with the universal reign of sin, as its preceding cause. Some make καὶ οὕτως, and thus, equivalent, by transposition, to οὕτω καὶ, so also, and regard this as the apodosis of the first clause of the twelfth verse; but this is entirely ungrammatical, and inconsistent with the main object of this section, which is to draw a parallel, not between Adam and his posterity, or sin and death, but between Adam and Christ. — εἰς πάντας ἀνθρώπους, upon all men, is equivalent to the preceding κόσμος, but differs from it "as as the concrete parts from the abstract whole; and διερχέσθαι differs from εἰσερχέσθαι as the going from house to house differs from entering a town;" De Wette. Luther well translates διήλθεν: ist durchgedrungen, passed through and pervaded, as a destructive and desolating power.—P. S.]

In such a manner that [solcherweise dass, or, on the ground that; better: inasmuch as]. ἐφ' ᾧ (= ἐφ' οὗ) is as much as ἐπὶ τούτῳ ὅτι. It can therefore mean here: on the ground that; διότι, propter ea quod (Meyer); under the supposition that (Baur); on condition that (Rothe); in conformity with it, that. Tholuck [p. 234] favors the meaning because, with reference to 2 Cor. v. 4; Phil. iii. 12; yet he makes the because relative, and translates, so far as they all.

[It is almost unanimously agreed now, that ἐφ' ᾧ, for which the Greeks generally use the plural, ἐφ' οἷς (propter ea quod), has here the sense of a conjunction, and that ᾧ is the neuter, not the masculine to be referred back either to εἰς ἀνθρώπους (with Augustine, some Roman Catholics, older Lutherans and Calvinists), or to θάνατος (with Glöckler, Hofmann). It can mean neither in quo, ἐν ᾧ (Augustine), nor per quem, δι' οὗ (Grotius), nor propter quem or cum quo, δι' ὅν or ὅν ᾧ (Chrysostom, Theophylact, Oecumenius, Elmsler). But it must be resolved either into ἐπὶ τούτῳ ὅτι, ea conditions ut, ea ratione ut, unter der Voraussetzung, un'er der näheren Bestimmtheit dass, on the premissposition, on the definite ground that, on condition that (so Rothe, in a learned and subtle discussion, l. c. pp. 17-38, and Schmid, Bibl. Theol. des N. T., ii. 261 f.); or into ἐπὶ τούτῳ ὅτι = διότι (Thomas Magister and Phavorinus: ἐφ' ᾧ, ἀπὸ τοῦ διότι), propter id quod, auf Grund dessen dass, darum dass weil, on this account that, because; comp. 2 Cor. v. 4; Phil. iii. 12, and classical passages quoted by Meyer, p. 204 f. (so Fritzsche, Rom. I. 299 sq., Meyer, Tholuck, Philippi, Winer, Gr. mm., p. 368, who are followed, without further discussion, by Alford, Webster and Wilkinson, Stuart and Hodge). The latter explanation gives the plain sense, that the universal reign of death is caused by universal sin, while Rothe's explanation conveys the more subtle idea that the actual sin of individuals is a consequence of the same proceeding by which death, through Adam's sin, passed upon all men, or that the sin of Adam has caused the sin of all others in inseparable connection with death. I prefer the translation, so far as, inasmuch as, which gives good sense in all the Pauline passages (2 Cor. v. 4: ἐφ' ᾧ οὐ θέλομεν ἐκδύσασθαι, ἀλλ' ἐπειθύνασθαι; Phil. iii. 12: ἐφ' ᾧ καὶ κατελήφθην). It is not so much a causal, as a qualifying and conditioning conjunction (a relative or modified ὅτι), which in our passage shows more clearly the connection of death with sin. It implies that a moral participation of all men in the sin of Adam is the medium or cause of their death; just as faith on our part is the moral condition of our participation in Christ's life. It is unfavorable to the doctrine of a gratuitous imputation. The legal act of imputation is not arbitrary and unconditioned, but rests on a moral ground and an objective reality.—P. S.]

[All sinned (not, have sinned, E. V.), πάντες ἥμαρτον. The aor. II. presents the sinning of all as a historical fact, or a momentary action of the past; comp. ἀπέθανον, in ver. 15: οἱ πάντες ἀπέθανον, 2 Cor. v. 14; and especially Rom. iii. 23, where precisely the same phrase occurs: "all sinned," as in one act (in Adam), and consequently became sinners (comp. *Textual Note, p. 128). Some take the aorist in the sense of the perfect ἥμαρτήκασι = ἡμάρτησαν; but the aorist was chosen with reference to the past event of Adam's fall, which was at the same time virtually the fall of the human race as represented by him, and germinally contained in him.* Ἀμαρτάνειν cannot mean: to be, or to become sinful (= ἀμαρτωλὸν εἶναι, or γίνεσθαι), although this is the necessary result of the first sinful act; still less, to suffer the punishment of sin; but it means real, actual sinning. In what sense? The choice in the following list lies between interpretations (4) and (5), which are both equally consistent with the natural grammatical sense of ἥμαρτον; while the other interpretations are more or less strained or false.—P. S.]

Explanations of πάντες ἥμαρτον:

(1.) In quo, namely, in Adam, the whole race

* [Winer, p. 259, denies that the aorist is ever confounded with the perfect. Even in Luke i. 1 (ἐπεχείρησαν); John xvii. 4 (ἐβόησαν, ἐκτελέσασα); Phil. iii. 12 (ἐλαβον), and similar cases, the action is related simply as passed. The perfect expresses the past action in its relation to the present, so that the result of the action is generally, though not necessarily (see Krüger, 151, and Winer, 254), supposed to be continued.—P. S.]

sinned. (Origen,* Chrysostom,† Theophylact, Augustine ‡ [Beza, Brenz, Bucer, Este, Erasmus Schmid], and, as probably "the last among Protestant expositors" [?], Benjamin Carpov, 1758). § The supposition here is the organic unity of the human race.

(2.) Because all have become sinful [vitiosi sunt, peccatores facti sunt]¹—that is, sinners by original sin (Calvin, Melancthon, Platt).]

(8.) Metonymically, because all have been punished as sinners, or are involved in the consequences of the fall (Chrysostom,* Grotius,† Arminians and Socinians [and Calvinists of the Federal school, Mac knight, Hodge].) ‡

(4.) Some supply even Adamo peccante after ἐφ' ᾧ (Pareus, and others; Bengel, Olshausen, &c.) Philippi, p. 179: "We must mentally supply de Adam, or more specifically, Adamo peccante, to ἡμαρτον." Meyer, likewise, "because all sinned when Adam sinned, in and with him." 1 Cor. iv

* [Origen taught a personal fall of all men in a pre-existent state. In Ep. ad Rom. (Opp. iv. p. 546): "Si Levi in lumbis Abraham fuisse perhibetur, multo magis homines in lumbis erat Adam, cum adhuc esset in paradiso, et omnes homines cum ipso vel in ipso expulsi sunt de paradiso."—P. 8.]

† [Chrysostom (Homilia A.) explains rather loosely and superficially: τι δὲ ὁρῶν, ἐφ' ᾧ ἡμῶν ἡμαρτον; ἡμαρτον ὁρῶντες, καὶ οὐ μὴ φάμεντες, ἀπὸ τοῦ γούλου γενόμενοι ἐφ' ἡμαρτον ἡμῶν θύγοι, ἰ. e., by the fall of Adam, even those who did not eat of the forbidden tree have all become mortal. This is all he says, and then he passes immediately to ver. 18.—P. 8.]

‡ [Augustine, following the wrong translation of the Vulgate—in quo—used this passage as an argument for the doctrine of original sin and the fall of the human race in Adam. De pecc. mer. et rem. iii. 7: "In Adam omnes uno peccaverunt, quando in eius natura, illa insita ut quae cognere poterat, adhuc omnes ille unus fuerunt." Omnia Jul. v. 12: "Fuerunt omnes ratione seminis in lumbis Adams quando damnatus est. . . . quemadmodum fuerunt Israelitae in lumbis Abraham, quando decimatus est." Heb. vii. 9, 10. De Civitate Dei, l. xlii. c. 14: "Omnes enim fuimus in illo uno, quando omnes fuimus ille unus, qui per seminum lapsum est in peccatum. . . . Nondum erat nobis singularem creatura distributa forma, in qua singuli viveremus; sed jam natura erat seminalis, ex qua propagaremur." i. e., the form in which we were to live, as individuals, had not yet been created and assigned to us, but that seminal nature was already in existence, from which we were to be propagated." From this last passage it is evident that Augustine did not teach, as he is sometimes misrepresented, a personal and conscious coexistence and coagency of Adam's posterity in Adam and his fall (which involves the contradiction of an existence before existence), but simply a potential or germinal coexistence. The genus homo or human nature which he represented, was not a receptacle of millions of human beings, but a single, simple essence, which became manifold by propagation. As in the doctrine of the Trinity and of the Person of Christ we distinguish between nature and person, so also here. Our human nature was one in Adam, and fell in him; consequently we all fell as partaking of that nature, and share in his guilt. This seems to me to be Augustine's view. Estius, one of the best Roman Catholic commentators, gives the same interpretation on the basis of the Vulgate translation: "Discitur omnes peccasse in Adam, tanquam in principio et radice totius generis, quoniam in lumbis eius erat, quando ille peccabat." Then, after quoting several passages from Aug., he continues, in explanation of the Augustinian theory: "Il vero sia intellige: quia tunc quando ille propria voluntate peccavit, in quo tanquam in principio generis, omnes erant, causa data est, per quam deinceps universum genus incurreret, et singuli constituerentur peccatores, videlicet a suo quisque peccato, quod ex illa origine contraheret; quomodo, si pater alienatus lpro filios signal leprosus, dicuntur filii facti leprosi a patre, licet unusquisque suam ex illo contrahat lepram." This, in a certain sense, is theologically true, but exegetically false.—i. e., the doctrine of original sin, or total depravity as derived from Adam, is implied in the whole passage, especially in ἡμῶν ἡμαρτον, but not in ἐφ' ᾧ. For ἐφ' ᾧ is not equivalent to ἐφ' ᾧ (see above); ἀναρῶν is too far separated from the relative ᾧ, and the who's phrase, ἀναρῶν ἐφ' ᾧ, meaning, in sin in some one, or by one, is without example. For a modification of the Augustinian interpretation, see (4) below.—P. 8.]

§ [Sum. J. Baird, Elohim Reviv'd, Philad. 1880, p. 417, defends the same view; taking ἐφ' ᾧ = ἐν ᾧ, as in ver. 14; Mark ii. 4; Luke v. 25; ἐν τῷ Ἀδᾶμ, 1 Cor. xv. 22.—P. 8.]

1 [Melancthon: "Omnes habent peccatum, scilicet pravatum propagatum et reatum." Calvin: "Nempe, inquit, quoniam omnes peccavimus. Porro istud peccare est corruptos esse et vitiosos. Illa enim naturalis pravitas, quam e matris utero afferimus, tametsi non illa cito fructus suos edit, peccatum tamen est coram Domino, et ejus ultionem meretur. Alique hoc est peccatum, quod vocant naturale." According to Calvin, then, the inherent, hereditary depravity derived from Adam is the reason why all die. This interpretation is not only ungrammatical, since ἀναρῶν cannot mean, to become corrupt, but it also vitiates the analogy between Adam and Christ.—P. 8.]

* [Ἐφ' ἡμῶν ἡμῶν θύγοι.—P. 8.]

† [Grotius: penam lueri, to suffer punishment. He appeals to Gen. xxi. 36; Job vi. 24; 1 Kings i. 2, for this metonymy of the effect; ἐφ' ᾧ he takes = through whom. The same interpretation is more fully defended by Whitby, as Arminian, on Rom. v. 19.—P. 8.]

‡ [Meyer calls this interpretation sheer ungrammatical arbitrariness (nur sprachliche Willkür), for ἀναρῶν means, they sinned, and nothing else (p. 234). Nevertheless, it is defended by Dr. Hodge, of Princeton, even in the revised edition of his Comm. (p. 236 ff.), with a degree of dogmatic positiveness, as if there could be no doubt about it. He holds that all men sinned in Adam merely in a representative or putative, not in any real sense, and that ἡμαρτον has the passive meaning; they became legally guilty, and were regarded and treated as sinners on account of Adam's sin by virtue of a natural and federal relationship between Adam and his posterity. "The only possible way," he says, "in which all men can be said to have sinned in Adam, is putatively." [This is begging the question.] "His act, for some good and proper reason [?], was regarded as their act, just as the act of an agent is regarded as the act of his principal, or the act of a representative as that of his constituent." [although in this case they never elected him]. "The act of the one legally binds the other. It is, in the eye of law and justice, their act." But ἀναρῶν never has this meaning of putative sinning. It is obviously impossible in ἀναρῶν, ver. 14. In the parallel passage, iii. 23, Hodge himself understands it of actual sinning ("all have sinned, and are sinners, or, all sinned." p. 140). The two solitary passages which he quotes from the Septuagint (Gen. xliii. 9 comp. xlv. 32: ἡμαρῶντες ἑστέ, and 1 Kings i. 21: ὁρῶντες . . . ἀναρῶντες, i. e., in the view of the reigning prince), are neither parallel nor decisive, as has often been shown by older commentators. When Hodge confidently appeals to the authority of "theologians of every grade and class of doctrine, Calvinists, Arminians, Lutherans, and Rationalists," in favor of his interpretation (p. 241), he is greatly mistaken. I know of no recent commentator of note, German or English, who agrees with him on this point. Philippi and Wordsworth, whom he quotes on his side, hold the realistic Augustinian view (which Hodge repudiates as nonsense. See next foot-note.) So does even Robert Haldane, the most rigorous Scotch Calvinistic commentator on the Romans, who says (p. 211 of the Amer. edition): "Adam's sin was as truly the sin of every one of his posterity, as if it had been personally committed by him. It is only in this way that all could be involved in its consequence. Besides, it is only in this light that it is illustrative of justification by Christ. Believers truly die with Christ, and pay the debt in Him by their union or oneness with Him. It belongs not to us to inquire how these things can be. We receive them on the testimony of God." . . . "If God deals with men as sinners on account of Adam's sin, then it is self-evident that they are sinners on that account. The just God could not deal with men as sinners on any account which did not make them truly sinners." The metonymical interpretation arose from opposition to the doctrine of original sin. Hodge tries to defend the dogma of imputation on a Socinian exegesis. But by rejecting the realistic theory of a participation of Adam's posterity in his fall, he loses the basis for a just imputation, and resolves it into a legal fiction. Only a sinful and guilty being can be the subject of the displeasure of a righteous and holy God. We do not object to the doctrine of imputation in itself, but simply to that form of it which ignores or denies the vital nature of our connection with Adam and with Christ, as plainly taught in this whole section. Adam is our natural representative de facto as well as de jure. He is the root of humanity, and his fall affected the stock, and every branch, by the inherent law of organic life-union. "Not Adam's transgression outwardly reckoned, but Adam's sinfulness and mortality inwardly communicated or imparted," are the chief points of comparison, and placed in contrast with the righteousness and life of Christ, with whom we hold even a more intimate life-union by faith, than with Adam by sin.—P. 8.]

92 [ἐν τῇ Ἀδὰμ πάντες ἀποθνήσκουσιν] has been alleged as proof of this.*

(5.) The expression must be understood of the personal sins of individuals (Reiche, Rückert, De Wette, Tholuck [Fritzsche, Baur, Van Hengel, Stuart],

* [This interpretation, which Dr. Lange treats rather severely, agrees theologically with Augustine's (No. 1), though it differs from it grammatically. It is defended by two of the ablest modern commentators, Philippi, and in recent editions by Meyer. Philippi, whom Dr. Hodge (p. 241) wrongly quotes in favor of his purely legal imputation theory (see the preceding note), says, after criticizing other views: "Wir werden deshalb mit Nothwendigkeit zu derjenigen Auffassung zurückgeführt, welche, obgleich sie von den neueren Auslegern aufgegeben ist (vgl. jedoch Olshausen) und fernliegende erscheint, dennoch die nächste, einfachste und natürlichste ist. Es ist nämlich zu ἡμᾶς im Gedanken: ἐν Ἀδὰμ, oder noch präciser: 'Adamo peccante' zu ergänzen. 'Non agitur de peccato singulorum proprio,' sagt Bengel. 'Omnes peccant, Adamo peccante,' oder, wie Koppe es ausdrückt, 'ipso actu peccavit Adamus.' Dafür spricht auch der momentane Sinn des Aoristes ἡμᾶς. Der Tod ist zu Allen hindurchgedrungen, weil sie Alle sündigten, als Adam sündigte, weil in der Sünde Adam's ihre eigene Sünde mitbeschlossen war. So würden wir also dem wesentlichen Sinne nach, wenn auch auf anderem grammatischem Wege, das AUGUSTINISCHE 'IN QUO OMNES PECCAVUNT,' wieder gewinnen. Fassend lässt sich 1 Cor. v. 16 vergleichen: εἰ εἰς ὅρα πάντων ἀπέθανον, ἅρα οἱ πάντες ἀπέθανον, wozu wir hier den entsprechenden Gegensatz: εἰ εἰς ὅρα πάντων ἡμᾶς, ἅρα οἱ πάντες ἡμᾶς finden. Wie ferner hier von dem ἀμαρτάνειν, so ist 1 Kor. xv. 22 von dem ἀποθνήσκειν Alles ἐν τῇ Ἀδὰμ die Rede. Der Apostel stellt demnach die Menschheitsründe als objectiv in Adam beschlossen dar, gerade so wie er die Menschheitsgerechtigkeit als objectiv in Christo beschlossen denkt, und die Parallele erhält nun erst die rechte Präcision und plastische Anschaulichkeit." Meyer, who is misrepresented by Dr. Hodge (p. 233) as charging Paul with forgetfulness in stating what is not true in point of fact, holds the same Augustinian view, and stated it plainly not only in the fourth edition (1865, p. 201), but in the third (1859, p. 187), and even in the second edition (1854, ten years before the appearance of Hodge's revision!) as follows: "(16.) ὅτι πάντες ἡμᾶς) AUF GRUND DESSES DASS, d. h., WEIL ALLE SÜNDIGTEN, NÄMLICH (beachte den momentanen Sinn des Aor.) als durch den Einen die Sünde in die Welt eintrat. Weil, als ADAM sündigte, ALLE Menschen in und mit ihm, dem Vertreter der ganzen Menschheit (nicht: 'EXEMPLE ADAMI,' PELAG.), geründigt haben, ist der Tod, welcher durch die in die Welt gekommene Sünde in die Welt kam, vermöge dieses ursächlichen Zusammenhanges der durch Adam in's Vorhandensein getretenen Sünde und des Todes auf ALLE vererbt worden. ALLE wurden durch Adam's Fall sterblich, weil dieses Geründigthaben Adam's ein Geründigthaben ALLER war. μήτις τοῦ τοῦ ἔθους παρὰ τὸ μᾶλλον οἱ πολλοὶ ἀπέθανον, ver. 15. So ist es allerdings in Adam begründet, dass Alle sterben (ἐν τῇ Ἀδὰμ πάντες ἀποθνήσκουσιν, 1 Kor. xv. 22), weil nämlich, als Adam sündigte, Alle sündigten, Alle als ἀμαρτωλοὶ κατεστῆσαν (ver. 19), und somit der durch seine Sünde eingekommene Tod ihnen vererbt werden kann." The same interpretation is substantially adopted by the best English commentators of the age. Alford says: "All sinned in the seed, as planted in the nature by the sin of our forefather, and in the fruit, as developed by each conscious responsible individual in his own practice. . . . Observe how entirely this assertion of the Apostle contradicts the Pelagian or individualistic view of men, that each is a separate creation from God, existing solely on his own exclusive responsibility, and affirms the Augustinian or realistic view, that all are evolved by God's appointment from an original stock, and though individually responsible, are generically involved in the corruption and condemnation of their original." Wordsworth: "Observe the aorist tense, ἡμᾶς, they all sinned; that is, at a particular time. And when was that? Doubtless, at the Fall. All men sinned in Adam's sin. All fell in his fall. All men were that one man, Adam (Augustine). All men were in him, as a river is in its source, and as a tree is in its root. We are all by nature in the first Adam, as we are all by grace in the second Adam, Christ." Webster and Wilkinson: "All sinned virtually when Adam sinned, because in him their nature became sinful."

This good orthodox interpretation, supported by the most respectable array of authorities from Augustine and the Reformers down to Philippi and Meyer, Dr. Hodge calls mystic and pantheistic nonsense, which "does not rise even to the dignity of a contradiction, and has no meaning at all;" adding: "It is a monstrous evil to call the Bible contradictory the common sense and common consciousness of men" (p. 236). We hold that all men sinned in Adam, not indeed personally by conscious actual transgression (which Augustine never said or meant; see the passages quoted in the third foot-note on p. 178), but virtually or potentially; in other words, that Adam fell, not as an individual simply, but as the representative head of the human race, and that his fall vitiated human nature itself, and prospectively his whole posterity, in the same manner in which the disease of the germ and root will affect the tree and branches proceeding from it. This may be uncommon sense (as is the whole fifth chapter of Romans), but it is certainly no nonsense. The human race is not a sandheap, but an organic unity; and only on the ground of such a vital unity, as distinct from a mechanical or merely federal unity, can we understand and defend the doctrine of original sin, the imputation of Adam's sin, and of Christ's righteousness. Without an actual communion of life, imputation is an arbitrary legal arrangement. We readily admit that the Augustinian view is liable to objections (see Lange's and our strictures in Doctrinal and Ethical, No. 2 and 3), but it is far preferable to the legal fiction theory.—P. 8.]

* [So Theodoret: οὐ γὰρ τὴν τοῦ προπάτορος ἀμαρτίαν, ἀλλὰ τὴν οἰκίαν ἡμεῶν δέχεται τὸ θάνατον τὴν ὅρα. Pelagius may be ranked here, for in his brief comments on Romans he explains ὅτι ὅτι πάντες ἡμᾶς: "In eo quod omnes peccaverunt, exemplo Adæ peccant," or "per imitationem," in opposition to "per propagationem." Julian of Eclanum, the ablest champion of Pelagianism, takes ὅτι ὅτι in the sense of propter quod (Aug. Contra Jul. vi. 75; Op. imperf. ii. 66). But both denied original sin, which may be held in perfect consistency with this interpretation of ἡμᾶς. Among American commentators it is advocated especially by Barnes and Stuart. We quote from Moses Stuart: "There remains, therefore, only the first plain and simple method of interpretation, viz., all men have sinned in their own persons; all men have themselves incurred the guilt of sin, and so subjected themselves to its penalty; or at least, all men are themselves sinners, and so are liable to death." Prof. Dwight, in his article against Hodge, seems to adopt this view; taking, however ἡμᾶς in a semi-figurative sense, "so that Paul conceives of our individual, personal sinning, as summed up and centred in Adam, not because we sinned either really or putatively when he did, but because, when he sinned, the whole future results were then made certain, and so, in a sense, were accomplished" (I. c. p. 560).—P. 8.]

† [The German original reads: "Dagegen sagt Meyer, das Wort passe nicht auf die geründigt habenden Kinder, children who have sinned, instead of 'in Betreff der vielen Millionen noch nicht geründigt habenden K.'" (see Meyer, p. 203). The printer's omission of noch nicht, not yet, makes sad work here with the argument, and caused some perplexity to the translator. Flatt, and others, raised the same objection to the above interpretation, viz., that it would include infants among actual sinners, which is not true. Hodge, p. 232 f., urges five arguments against it.—P. 8.]

‡ [So also Hodge: "It would make the Apostle teach that, as all men die because they personally sin, so all men live because they are personally and inherently righteous. This is contrary not only to this whole passage, but to all Paul's teaching, and to the whole gospel."—P. 8.]

takes place by faith, so in the actual sharing in the guilt of Adam does an ethical participation by unbelief take place (see Rom. xi. 32). It is a great error to imagine that, in order to avoid the Pelagian heresy, we must cast ourselves into the arms of the Augustinian theory, and do violence to the plain text. This is done by Beza, Calvin, Philippi, and Meyer, though by each in a different way.

(6.) The ἐπ' ᾧ is understood as causa finalis: unto which, viz., death or punishment; thus making ἐπὶ to mark the end, or consequence, to which sinning came. (Venema, Schmid, Glöckler, and Ewald [formerly, not now].)* Meyer observes, that this telic view implies a necessary, though not intended effect, in accordance with the idea of fate.

(7.) Hofmann: Under whose (death's) dominion they sinned. This view might be better supported by the thought in Heb. ii. 15, than by the language in Heb. ix. 15. Yet it is untenable.†

(8.) Thomasius: Under which relation (namely, that sin and death came into the world by one man) all sinned, &c.

It is evident that the most of these explanations are attempts, from doctrinal considerations, to avoid the idea of individual personal guilt, and by this means a relation, clear enough in itself, is obscured. The Apostle's assumption is the priority of sin in relation to death, and the causal connection of the two. Accordingly, the meaning is, since sin came into the world as an abnormal ethical principle, death came into the world with it as the corresponding abnormal physiological principle. Therefore the propagation of the abnormal principle of death presupposes the preceding propagation of the principle of sin in the real sinning of all. It arises from the unity and solidarity of humanity, that certain cases—for example, children born dead, or dying [and idiots]—do not here come into consideration. The definition of the ἐπ' ᾧ, under the presupposition that, is therefore the most natural. In view of the death of innocent children, we may assume different degrees of guilt and death: "in proportion as," or "in what measure, they all sinned."

Ver. 13. For until the law, &c. [Ἀρχὴ γὰρ νόμου],—i. e., from Adam to the Mosaic legislation, comp. ver. 14—ἡ ἀμαρτία ἥν ἐν κόσμῳ. Alford: "How, consistently with chap. iv. 15, could all men sin, before the law? This is now explained." But iv. 15 is too far off, and treats of παράβασις, not of ἀμαρτία. γὰρ connects this verse with πᾶντες ἥμαρτον, ver. 12.—P. S.] The Apostle did not need to show first that the death of all was grounded in Adam's sin (Meyer); this he could presuppose from Jewish and Christian knowledge. But he proves rather that the actual extension of death took place always under the supposition of preceding sin in the world. Therefore his first proposition: Even in the period between Adam and Moses, sin was universal in the world. It was indeed not imputed, not placed directly in the light of the conscious judgment of God, because the law, as the rule of conduct and the accuser, was not yet present. But, indirectly, its presence was made manifest by its effect, the despotic government of death; although a transgression in such a definite way as that committed by Adam could not occur in the period designated (notwithstanding many analogies: Cain, the Cainites, Ham, Ishmael, Esau). Even the transgression again made manifest by the Mosaic law does not remove the great antagonism by which, in principle, sin and death proceeded from Adam, the type of Christ, the antitype, from whom, in principle, righteousness and life proceeded. Meyer supposes the Apostle to say: "The death of individuals, which passed also upon those who have not sinned, as Adam did, against a positive commandment, cannot be derived from sin committed before the law, because, the law not being present, the imputation was wanting [absolutely?]; and the conclusion which Paul draws therefrom, is, that it is by Adam's sin (not by individual sins) that death has been produced" (!). Now, how does this agree with the history of the Deluge, and of Sodom and Gomorrah? Here, definite death is everywhere traced to definite offences. Tholuck's view of the connection [p. 238 ff.] is similar to Meyer's. The most of the later commentators, on the contrary, properly regard vers. 13 and 14 as an argument for πᾶντες ἥμαρτον (Rückert, De Wette, Neander, and others; and formerly Diodorus, Calvin, and others). Calov. has correctly concluded: Since they were punished because of sin, they must have had some law.*

But sin is not imputed [reckoned, in Rechnung gebracht, ἡ ἀμαρτία οὐκ ἐλλογείται]. (Philem. ver. 18 [text. rec.] is the only other place).† Meyer explains: Is brought to account by God for punishment [wird in Rechnung gebracht, viz., zur Bestrafung]. His citation (chap. iv. 15) is sufficient to correct him. It is with the νόμος, and the consciousness of it, that the ἀμαρτία (which is also transgression, according to the measure of the natural conscience) first receives the impressed character of conscious transgression, παράβασις, and therewith the ὀργή is first finished by the κατηγοριεσθαι of the νόμος. Therefore even the sin of the generations before the flood was not yet definitely settled by its overthrow (1 Peter iii. 20; iv. 6); therefore the people of Sodom and Gomorrah were guilty of less sin than the contemporaries of Jesus. The ἐλλογισθαι of sin constitutes therefore the reverse side of the λογισθαι εἰς δικαιοσύνην; it does not denote any preliminary attribution, but the final imputation, or settlement.—Explanations: Is not imputed, a. By God; (1.) Not in general (the Deluge

* [In his Jahrbücher der bibl. Wissenschaft, ii. p. 171, Ewald explained, with the rejection of the second ἀνάσσειν: "und so zu allen Menschen durchdrang das, woraufhin alle stündigten," "and so passed upon all men that unto which all sinned," viz., death, which in Gen. ii. 17 is decreed as the punishment of sin, so that whosoever sins, sins unto death—i. e., must die. But subsequently, in his Comm. on the Pauline Epistles (1857, p. 327), Ewald translated: "sofern alle stündigten," "inasmuch as all sinned," and remarks (in a foot-note on p. 373) that this meaning of ἐπ' ᾧ (as a conjunction) is similar to the preceding ὅτι, showing death to be the consequence of sin.—P. S.]

† [Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, vol. i. p. 529, 2d ed., takes ἐπὶ as a preposition of time, and refers τῷ to the preceding ὅτι (which is wanting in several MSS.) in the sense: bei dessen Vorherrschen, i. e., during the reign of death all sinned. He quotes, in support, Heb. ix. 15: ἐπὶ τῇ σπέρμῃ διαθήκῃ παρὰβασιν. But this simple and almost trivial idea could have been expressed much more clearly. The interpretation of Thomasius (sub b.) resembles that of Hofmann, except that he takes ἐπ' ᾧ as neuter: beim Vorherrschen welches Verhältnisses. But the preceding words pronounce a fact, not an abstract relation. Comp. Meyer, p. 206.—P. S.]

* [Hodge makes the whole doctrine and argument of the Apostle to be, "that there are penal evils which come upon men antecedent to any transgressions of their own; and as the infliction of those evils implies a violation of law, it follows that they are regarded and treated as sinners on the ground of the disobedience of another" (p. 252).—P. S.]

† [Outside of these two passages in the New Testament, the word, according to Meyer, occurs but once, viz., in Bockh, Inscript. i. p. 850, A. 35. It means εὐλογεῖσθαι λογισθαι, to reckon in, to put to one's account.—P. S.]

Sodom and Gomorrah, &c., were exceptions); (2.) Not in the usual manner of sin (Bengel: peccatum non notat scelera insignia [qualia Sodomitæ ante Moysa tempora fuerunt, sed malum commune]); (3.) The Arminians: the θάνατος was only natural evil; (4.) Calov., better than all: the word must be understood only hypothetically. The men of the ante-Mosaic period also had a kind of law. δ. By man (Ambrose, Augustine, Theodore Mopsevestia, Luther: "Sin is not minded," man achiet ihrer nicht). : Zwingli: By the human judge. Altogether foreign to the context. Hofmann: the proposition laid down refers only to humanity in general, and not to individuals. This is a modification of Schleiermacher's representation of penal justice.—We must add the remark, that the imputing judge is God, but that, in the imputation, the human knowledge of the παράβασις in the light of the judgment is to be taken fully into consideration. [Alford explains ill., "reckoned, 'set down as transgression'—'put in formal account,' by God. In the case of those who had not the written law, ἀναπρία is not formally reckoned as παράβασις, set over against the command; but, in a certain sense, as distinctly proved, chap. ii. 9-16, it is reckoned, and they are condemned for it."—P. S.]

When there is no law [μὴ ὄντος νόμου]. Not: Where the law is not. [So Alford, and those who refer νόμος to the Mosaic law exclusively.—P. S.] The Apostle appears to lay down the proposition in the form of a general maxim ("where there is no accuser, there is no judge") in order to suggest the idea of degrees of legality and imputation (see the explanation of Calov.). Here, too, Meyer would relieve the death of the generations before Moses from being caused by individual sin (see, on the contrary, Pa. xc.). We say, with chap. i. 18 ff., that the falling of those generations into sin was, in general, a great judgment of God; but an ethical because [i. 19] always precedes.

Ver. 14. Nevertheless [notwithstanding the relative non-imputation of sin] death reigned [Ἀλλὰ ἐβασίλευσεν, emphatically put first, ὁ θάνατος]. Death, already personified, appears here as a ruler, and, according to its nature, as a tyrant.* The universal reign of death implies the universal reign of sin as its cause, in proof of ver. 12 (against Meyer and Hofmann). The dominion of death embraces not only physical death with all its historical terrors, but also the consciousness of death, or the sting of death (1 Cor. xv. 56), and the consequence of death, the dreary, wretched existence in Sheol.† [μέχρι (until) Μωϋσ. = ἄχρι νόμου, ver. 13. There is no clear difference between μέχρι and ἄχρι, except that μέχρι, from μακρός, etymologically, denotes primarily extension, or length of time; ἄχρι, from ἄκρος, point of time.—P. S.]

‡ [Βασίλευσεν with ἐπὶ is a Hebrewism (על מלך); comp. Luke i. 33; xix. 14; 1 Sam. viii. 9, 11; in classical Greek it rules the genitive or dative. The preposition signifies the persons over whom the sovereignty is exercised. The second ἐπὶ before τῶν ὁμοιωμάτων expresses the model to which the act is conformed; comp. ἐπὶ τῇ δοξασί, Luke i. 15. The whole phrase corresponds to the Hebrew מִלְּפָנֵי מֶלֶךְ, ἀμαρτήσαντας ἐπὶ τῷ ὁμοιωματι τῇ παραβάσει Ἀδάμ]. Over those who, unlike Adam, were not guilty of a definite παράβασις, or transgression of a definite command of God. The καὶ may be understood as antithetical to Adam, or better, as making a distinction between sinners in the general sense, and the wicked transgressors of special laws of God, who effect, as it were, new falls of man, such as Cain, Ham, &c. Athanasius explains thus: those who committed no mortal sin. Grotius: no gross sins; Crell, and others: transgressed no law to which the threat of death was attached. But the measure is simply the παράβασις, as in chap. iv. 15. The elder expositors have included here also the children [and idiots] subjoined "by Adam's sin to the pæna damni;" Brenz makes this the exclusive reference [against which Calvin correctly protests. Children are included, but not specially intended.—P. S.] Indirectly, this verse refers definitely to the connection between sin and death in the period from Adam to Moses, as has been also perceived by De Wette, Fritzsche, and Baur, but is opposed in vain by Meyer.

Who is a type of the coming one [i. e., the second Adam, ὁς ἐστὶν τύπος τοῦ μέλλοντος]. Koppe comes in positive conflict with the context, when he takes μέλλοντος as neuter: of that which should come. The first Adam is the type of the second (1 Cor. xv. 45), and is the principle of the first eon, as Christ is the principle of the second, but according to the antagonism between the first and second eons. See Meyer, for similar expressions of the Rabbis; e. g., Adamus postremus est Messias. According to Tholuck, the deduction of the antithetical side should now have followed, but Paul was contented with the ὅς ἐστι, &c., in order to indicate the other half. But in our view the antithesis has already preceded (vers. 9-11), and is fully elaborated in chap. vi.—viii., after the transitional individual antitheses that now follow.

[This important clause points back to ver. 12, and indicates the apodosis, the other member of the comparison. Τύπος, from τύπτω, to strike, to wound, has a variety of significations which are closely related, and yet may seem in some cases contradictory (comp. the German Abbild, Urbild, Vorbild). It means (1.) a blow; (2.) a print, or impression, made by a blow (John xx. 25, τὸν τύπον τῶν ὧλων); (3.) a form, image, figure (Bild, Abbild; so often in the classics, and in Acts vii. 43, τοῖς τύποις, οἷς ἐποιεῖσθε προσκυνεῖν αἱ τοῖς); (4.) a pattern, model (Muster, Modell, Urbild; Rom. vi. 17, τύπον διδασχῆς; Acts vii. 44; Heb. viii. 5; in the two last passages, however, τύπος is taken by some in the sense of copy; comp. Bleek on Heb. viii. 5, vol. iii. p. 439 f.); (5.) a moral model or example for imitation (Vorbild; 2 Thess. iii. 9, ἵνα ἑαυτοῖς τύπον δώμεν ἵνῃς ἐς τὴν μιμήσθαι ἡμῶς; 1 Tim. iv. 12; Tit. ii. 7; Phil. iii. 17; 1 Pet. v. 3); (6.) a historical prefiguration (Vorbild), or type in the usual theological sense—i. e., a person or thing designed to foreshadow or symbolize a future person or thing which is the ἀντίτυπος (Urbild); so 1 Cor. x. 6, 11, and here. Generally the New Testament antitype is related to the Old Testament type, as the substance is to the shadow, or the

and is equivalent to ὁμοίος τῇ παραβάσει. It must not be connected with ἐβασίλευσεν (Chrysostom and Bengel), but as is usually done, with καὶ ἀμαρτήσαντας.—P. S.]

original to the copy.* But Christ corresponds to Adam in the antithetical sense: Adam being the author of death for all, Christ the author of life for all. The prefigurative feature in Adam was his central and universal significance for the whole race, which was fulfilled in a much higher sense and with opposite effect in Christ, the absolute and perfect Man. In 1 Cor. xv. 45, Paul likewise contrasts ὁ πρῶτος Ἀδάμ and ὁ ὕστατος Ἀδάμ, with reference, no doubt, to the Rabbinical theology, in which the Messiah is called הַמָּלְאָךְ הַפְּרִיט, Adamus preteritus, in opposition to הַמָּלְאָךְ הַבָּרִא.† To this personal contrast corresponds the contrast of two epochs and orders of things, ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος and ὁ αἰὼν μέλλων. The coming one (τοῦ μέλλοντος) is not to be referred to the second coming of Christ (Fritzsche, De Wette), but to the first. Paul speaks from the historical standpoint of the first Adam.—P. S.]

SECOND PARAGRAPH (VERS. 15-19).

Tholuck remarks on the train of thought to ver. 19: In the explanations of the elder expositors there is no attempt to trace the connection and progress of thought to ver. 19; many of the later ones doubt altogether the possibility of such a proof. Morus says: "De hac dissimilitudine agitur jam per quinque versus ita, ut quinquies idem illud repetatur, variatis quidem verbis, at re manente semper eadem." Köllner and Rückert similarly; against whom, see Rothe. According to Tholuck, the train of thought is as follows: In ver. 15, the quantitative "more" on the side of the operation proceeding from Christ; in vers. 16, 17, the qualitative "more;" in vers. 18, 19, resumption of the parallel, including the differences pointed out. Our construction is given above.

[Vers. 15-17 occupy an intermediate position between ver. 12 and vers. 18 and 19; and as vers. 18 and 19 are explanatory of the reign of death in connection with sin, asserted in ver. 12, so vers. 15-17 are qualifying, by stating as briefly and tersely as possible the disparity in the parallel between Adam and Christ, in favor of the superabounding grace of Christ. The admirable symmetrical adjustment of parts will appear from the following arrangement of the text in literal translation:

15. { But not as the fall (παράπτωμα)
so also (:) the grace (χάρισμα):
- { for if by the fall of the one man (τοῦ ἑνός)
the many died;

did the grace of God and the gift by the grace of the one man Jesus Christ abound unto the many.

* [Ἀντίτυπος, ἀντίτυπος (literally, counterblow), is, however, sometimes equivalent to τύπος in the sense of copy (Abbild), as Heb. ix. 24, ἀντίτυπα τῶν ἀληθινῶν; 1 Pet. iii. 21; and Apost. Const. iv. 14, where the sacramental bread and wine are called the antitypes of the body and blood of Christ. Comp. Bleek on the Hebrews, vol. iii. p. 391.—P. S.]

† [Tholuck, p. 246, quotes a remarkable passage from the book, Neve Shalom R. Abraham Ben Isaac (died 1593), which shows perhaps the reflex influence of Paul upon the Rabbinical theology: "The last Adam is the Messiah; He will be higher than Moses, higher than the angels who serve Him, and the old sin by which death has been introduced will be abolished by Him, for in His days the dead will rise. This was the Divine intention at the creation of man, that he should be eternal; but sin occasioned death: now the Divine intention is fulfilled by the second Adam, who is the antitype of the first."—P. but the grace (issued in, cause) from many falls unto a righteous act (δικαίωμα)

Death reigned through the one;

will they who receive the abundance of the grace and the gift of righteousness reign in life through the one Jesus Christ.—P. S.]

A. The contrast in the effects of the principles made manifest. 1. The natural consequences in relation to persons (ver. 15); 2. The positive consequences in relation to the intensity, the essential gradation of the effects (ver. 16). Ver. 15 refers to the opposition of Christian salvation to the ruin in the non-legal period and sphere; ver. 16, to its opposition to the ruin in the legal world.

Ver. 15. But not as the fall (transgression), so also is the gift of grace † [ἄλλ' οὐχ ὡς τὸ παράπτωμα, οὕτως καὶ τὸ χάρισμα]. We hold that the Apostle, in his brief and pregnant expressions in vers. 15 and 16, lays down axioms in negative construction. Meyer translates ver. 15: "Not as the trespass, so also the gift of grace;" and quite unintelligibly ver. 16: "And not as by one who sinned is the gift." The παράπτωμα is ἥμις, the χάρισμα ἥμις. As principles which enter humanity and permeate it, Adam and Christ are alike; but in the nature of their effects they constitute contrasts.—Rosenmüller, and others, would neutralize the negation by regarding οὐκ as interrogative; but this, as Meyer remarks, is forbidden by the contrasting character of the contents. We see no reason for taking the παράπτωμα, contrary to its most natural signification, as "offence;" it denotes, with sin, a fall, an ethical defeat; yea, the fall as a medium of the fall, just as the χάρισμα of Christ is not merely χάρις, but a medium of the χάρις. [Παράπτωμα, from παράπτω, to fall, is not a sinful state or condition, but a concrete actual sin, the transgression of the law (παράβασις), the act of disobedience (παράνομή) by which Adam fell; comp. vers. 16, 18, 19, and Book of Wisdom x. 1, where it is likewise used of the fall. τὸ χάρισμα and ἡ χάρις mean nearly the same as ἡ δωρεά in this verse, τὸ δῶγμα, ver. 16, δικαίωμα, ζωή, ver. 18, but they emphasize the idea that salvation is of free grace. Forbes ingeniously refers τὸ χάρισμα, the Grace which pardons the sinner, antithetically to Death, the penalty of transgression, and τὸ δῶγμα, the Gift of righteousness, antithetically to Sin, which it removes and supercedes; the one is mainly the grace that justifies, the other the grace that sanctifies. See his note, p. 243 f.—P. S.] Tholuck thinks that we should expect δικαίωμα [δικαίωμα] would correspond better.—P. S.]

* [Or, "by the one that sinned," if we read ἁμαρτήσαντος. See *Textual Note, and Exeg. Note below.—P. S.]

† [τῷ ἑνὶ ἁμαρτήσαντι, the reading of Cod. Sin. Lachmann, Alford, and the text. rec. Lange prefers, with Meyer, the reading: ἐν ἑνὶ ἁμαρτήσαντι, "by one fall." See *Textual Note, and Exeg. Notes below.—P. S.]

‡ [According to Lange's translation: Aber nicht steht's (im Sinn der gleichmässigen Adams und Christi) wie wir dem Sündenfall also mit dem Gnadengut (der persönlichen Gnaden, z. B. Christus). Alford translates: But not (in all points) as the act of transgression, so also is the gift of grace.—P. S.]

instead of χάρισμα. But the question here is concerning the natural or historical effects of both principles, while in ver. 16 they are presented in their relation to law and right.

For if through the fall of the one the many died [Ἐν γὰρ τῷ τοῦ (mark the definite article, which is overlooked in the E. V.) ἑνὸς παραπτώματι οἱ πολλοὶ (the many, i. e., the immense multitude of all the descendants of the one Adam) ἀπέθανον.—P. S.]. The εἰ is not hypothetical. There is an oxymoron in the expression: one fell, many died (not only the one). Why οἱ πολλοὶ, and not πάντες, as in vers. 12 and 18? Meyer: "The antithesis to the εἰς is made more sensible and stronger by marking the totality as multitude; for 'possunt aliqua esse omnia, quæ non sunt multa,' Augustine. Grotius wrongly: 'ferè omnes, excepto Enochæ,' which is contradicted by vers. 12 and 18." [ἀπέθανον must be taken in the same comprehensive sense as θάνατος in ver. 12; see p. 176. It is parallel to ἡμαρτον, ver. 12, and must be explained accordingly; see p. 177.—P. S.]

Much more. Is πολλῶ ἄλλον the expression of a logical plus, that is, of an inference ([Chrysostom, πολλῶ γὰρ τοῦτο εὐλογώτερον] Theodoret, Philippi [Fritzsche, Hodge, Stuart], and others), or of a real plus, a comparison (Calvin [Bengel*], Rothe [Alford: much more abundant], &c.). [In other words, does πολλῶ ἄλλον express a stronger degree of evidence, as an argumentum a minore ad majus (here a peiori ad melius), as it certainly does vers. 9 and 10, or a higher degree of efficacy?—P. S.] Meyer: This latter is contrary to ver. 17. This is so far right as death, viewed absolutely, is an absolute negation, and a real plus [a higher degree of abundance] is comprised already in περισσιν. But the logical plus involves also a real plus. [So also Tholuck.] It rests on the following antitheses: 1. The εἰς introduced here without name, and opposite to him, ὁ θεὸς and ὁ εἰς ἄνθρωπος Ἰησοῦς Χριστός; 2. παραπτώμα, and the opposite ἡ χάρις καὶ ἡ δωρεὰ ἐν χάριτι; 3. ἐπερίσσειαν, in opposition to the simple fact, ἀπέθανον. The χάρις τοῦ θεοῦ is the source and spirit of the universal and personal charisma, which is Christ himself; the δωρεὰ ἐν χάριτι, &c., is its form and appearance, the positive gift of Divine adoption, with the Divine inheritance, in the pardon of sin. Both must not be resolved into an ἐν διὰ διωῖν (Rosenmüller, and others). According to Rothe, Tholuck, and others, ἐν χάριτι must be connected with δωρεὰ; according to De Wette and Meyer, δωρεὰ stands absolutely, and ἐν χάριτι, &c., belongs to ἐπερίσσειαν, on account of the antithesis to παραπτώματι. But in that case the article should be expected before χάριτι. Besides, δωρεὰ ἐν χάριτι forms the idea of δωρημα. The aorist indicates an event which had already taken place.

Ver. 16. And not as by one transgression [Καὶ οὐχ ὡς δὲ ἑνὸς ἀμαρτήματος, which Lange renders Verschuldung, transgression accompanied with guilt.—P. S.]. We must first of all substitute the reading ἀμαρτήματος of the Codd. D. E. F. G., and of the Itala [Vulg.: Et non sicut per unum peccatum] for ἀμαρτήσαντος [by one that transgressed], although the latter has better authority.* The reason lies in the text; ver. 16 contains only definitions of things, not persons. The opposite of ἀμαρτήμα is παραπτώματα; besides, we have δωρημα, κρίμα, κατάκριμα, χάρισμα, and δικαίωμα. Tholuck observes: "Those Codd. present frequently a corrupted text, one conformed to the Latin translation; and as ἀμαρτήματος is not even sufficiently attested by external authorities, it must give way to the more difficult reading." But, at first appearance, δὲ ἑνὸς ἀμαρτήσαντος was the easier reading, for it was supposed that in every antithesis Adam himself must have been mentioned again. Meyer explains: "Ἀνά το by one that sinned (ἀμαρτήσαντος) so is the gift, that is, it is not so as if it would be caused δὲ ἑνὸς ἀμαρτήσαντος."† Tholuck: "The gift has an other character than that which came by the one who sinned." These explanations are no recommendation to the reading ἀμαρτήσαντος. For, first, the thought that the δωρημα may have come by one that sinned himself, is far-fetched and unnatural. Second, the antithesis between the effects of the two principles is obliterated. Those who adopt the reading ἀμαρτήσαντος, propose different supplements. Grotius, and others, θάνατος ἐκλήθη [after ἀμαρτήσας]; Bengel [Webster and Wilkinson, Stuart, Hodge], and others, τὸ κρίμα; Reiche, after Theophylact, τὸ κατάκριμα; Fritzsche, and others, παραπτώμα; Beza, and others [after ὡς], τὸ (De Wette: and not like that which resulted from one who sinned, is the gift).‡ Rothe, Tholuck, and Meyer, supply merely ἐστὶ [after δωρημα]; Philippi, ἐγένετο [after ἀμαρτήσας, and ἐστὶ after δωρημα.—P. S.]. This [which? ἐστὶ, or ἐγένετο?—P. S.] is sufficient with ἀμαρτήμα, which means more than ἀμαρτία, and expresses the idea of guilt (Verschuldung) in connection with sin (see Mark iii. 28; Luke iv. 12, &c.).

For the judgment (passes) from one (transgression) to condemnation [τὸ μὲν γὰρ κρίμα ἐξ ἑνὸς εἰς κατάκριμα. Lange supplies, from the preceding clause, ἀμαρτήματος after ἐξ ἑνὸς, and translates it, in both cases, Verschuldung.—P. S.]. Here, too, the verb is wanting. Meyer supplies ἐγένετο, or resulted; De Wette turned out. But the verb is indicated by the εἰς which requires the idea of progress, development. (For the antithesis, Rothe has attempted to substitute an untenable division, τὸ μὲν, τὸ δέ). The κρίμα might mean judgment in general (Meyer),§ if it did not refer to ἀμαρτήμα, by which it becomes judgment to punishment. Explanations: reatus (Beza,

* [The Codex Sinaiticus, in the octavo edition of Tischendorf (1866), reads ἀμαρτήσαντος, but this is a correction by a second or third hand. In the original MS. and the large uncial edition the word is broken by the line, and reads, ΑΜΑΡΤΗ-ΤΟΣ, which may be a mistake for ἀμαρτήματος, as well as for ἀμαρτήσαντος. The absence of the article, before ἐνός is in favor of Lange's preference for ἀμαρτήματος, for Paul always uses the article when ἐνός refers to a person, except in ver. 12, where it is first introduced and connected with ἀνθρώπου.—P. S.]

† [Meyer: "Es ist damit nicht so, als wenn es δὲ ἑνὸς ἀμαρτήσας (wie der Tod durch Adam) verursacht wäre (so ist vielmehr ἐξ πολλῶν παραπτώματων sum δικαίωμα gewonnen)."] Meyer emphasises the one and many, and supplies simply ἐστὶ after δωρημα. Similar is the explanation of Rothe, Ewald, Van Hengel.—P. S.]

‡ [So also Alford, who supplies τὸ γινόμενον: "And not as (that which took place) by one that sinned, so is the gift."—P. S.]

§ [Meyer: "τὸ κρίμα ganz allgemein: das Urtheil, welches Gott als Richter fällt. Denn zu was für einem Urtheil dirres in connection zu schlagen ist, sagt erst das folgende εἰς κατάκριμα"—P. S.]

Docceus); the threatened punishment, Gen. ii. 17 (Fritzsche, Tholuck); the sentence of punishment pronounced on Adam and his posterity, Gen. iii. 19 (Reiche, Baumgarten-Crusius [Rückert, De Wette], and others).—From one (transgression). We simply supply the foregoing ἀμάρτημα, and translate the incurring of guilt, because the deed is connected with its consequence, and the word is connected with the idea of guilt. ἐξ ἐνός is taken by Meyer as masculine.—To condemnation [εἰς κατάκριμα]. Explanations of the antithesis τὸ κρίμα, τὸ κατάκριμα: 1. Fritzsche: The threat of punishment, Gen. ii., and the sentence of punishment, Gen. iii.; similarly Tholuck. Reiche: the sentence of punishment pronounced on Adam, and that on his posterity. 2. Rückert: the Divine sentence and its result, death, was declared against the one who had sinned; but from him the sentence has extended to all. Plainly, the κρίμα, as the principle of judgment, proceeds from the one ἀμάρτημα of Adam, and passes through gradations of judgment to the κατάκριμα, which is completed ideally as the sentence of fitness for condemnation by the appearance of the gospel, and will be actually completed as real judgment to condemnation at the end of the world. Yet the antithesis here does not pass beyond the ideal judgment to condemnation. The antithesis of the one Adam and of the whole race, which Baumgarten-Crusius finds here, is only presumed; the numerical antithesis, rather, in this passage is ἐν ἀμάρτημα, πολλὰ παραπτώματα. It must be borne in mind that the expression παραπτώματα is much stronger than ἀμάρτηματα, and denotes the gradations of the one fall by many new apostasies (see the Second Commandment).

But the gift of grace (passes) from many falls (lapses) unto the good of justification [τὸ δὲ χάρισμα ἐκ πολλῶν παραπτωμάτων εἰς δικαίωμα, which Lange translates: das Gnadengut aber geht von vielen Sündenfällen aus fort bis zum Rechtfertigungsgut; or, in the Exeg. Notes, Rechtfertigungsmittel.—P. S.]. The personal charisma is Christ himself (see ver. 15), the source of all special gifts of grace (see Titus ii. 11).—From many falls, or lapses (Sündenfällen). Caused by them. As the κρίμα of Adam has become the universal κατάκριμα of humanity, so has the χάρισμα of Christ grown to be the universal and absolute δικαίωμα. As Christ, as the Risen One, has come forth ἐκ νεκρῶν, so has He, as the Just One, the personal δικαίωμα, come forth from the place of the παραπτώματα. It was thus with the advent of Christ on earth; but the finished παράπτωμα was the same crucifixion by which He was perfected as δικαίωμα. The usual explanations rest mostly on a misconception. Meyer: Since God declared sinners righteous. Augustine: Quia non solum illud unum solvit, quod originaliter trahitur, sed etiam quia in uno quoque homine motu propria voluntatis adduntur. Better De Wette [and Alford]: "The gift of grace became, by occasion of many transgressions, justification." Philippi: "From out of many lapses." The δικαίωμα is neither the condition of righteousness (that would be δικαιοσύνη; Luther, Tholuck, and others), nor the declaration of God by which He executes the δικαίωμας (Meyer), but, according to Rückert and [Adelbert] Maier, the means or medium of justification (Rechtfertigungsmittel), which is in harmony with the form of the word. Meyer asks for the empirical proof; it lies right before us: Were δικαίωμα the real justification of mankind, κατάκριμα would be its real condemnation, and that would be a contradiction. Comp. also ver. 18, where the δικαίωμα is the pre-supposition of the δικαιοσύνη. (The explanation of Rothe, after Calvin: legal compensation in the sense of satisfactio is partly too general, and partly impinges very much on δικαιοσύνη.) An elaborate discussion see in Tholuck, p. 258.

[Δικαίωμα, in Hellenistic usage, means usually statutum, ordinance, a righteous decree, or righteous judgment (Rechtspruch, Rechtsbestimmung); comp. i. 32; ii. 26; viii. 4; Luke i. 6; Heb. ix. 1, 10 Apoc. xv. 4; or also (as in classical usage) a righteous act, a just deed, as Rev. xix. 8 (τὰ δικαιώματα τῶν ἁγίων); Baruch ii. 19 (δοῦναι δόξαν καὶ δικαίωμα τῷ κυρίῳ); comp. the Hebrew צדקה as distinct from מִשְׁפָּט in Prov. viii. 20, where both are translated δικαιοσύνη in the Septuagint, while the Vulgate distinguishes them as judicium and justitia. I see no good reason for departing from this meaning. It is either, in opposition to κατάκριμα, the righteous decree which God declared on account of the perfect obedience of Christ; or it is, as ver. 18, in opposition to παράπτωμα, the righteous act of Christ as the objective basis (or, as Lange has it, the means) of our δικαιοσύνη. Tholuck, after a full discussion of the various interpretations, favors (p. 261) the translation, Rechtfertigungsgut, actio justificativa, which would differ from δικαιοσύνη, justificatio, as the accomplished fact differs from the process. Wordsworth explains it here, and in ver. 18, to mean a state of acceptance as righteous by God, a recognized condition of approval; but this is without any authority. The Latin Vulgate (justificatio, ver. 16, but justitia, ver. 18), the E. V., and even De Wette, Olshausen, Robinson (sub δικαίωμα, No. 3), Stuart, Alford, and Hodge, take δικαίωμα in ver. 16 as equivalent to δικαιοσύνη. (Alford: "As κατάκριμα is a sentence of condemnation, so δικαίωμα will be a sentence of acquittal. This, in fact, amounts to justification." Hodge: "It means justification, which is a righteous judgment, or decision of a judge, pronouncing one to be just.") Rothe (p. 108) calls this interpretation a piece of "exegetical levity;" and it is evident that, in ver. 18, δικαίωμα is distinguished from δικαιοσύνη. He goes back (with Pareus, J. Gerhard, Calov, Wolf, B Carpzov) to classical usage, quoting a passage from Aristotle (Eth. Nicom. v. 10), who defines δικαίωμα to be τὸ ἐναντιόρθωμα τοῦ ἀδικήματος; the amendment of an evil deed.* Rothe consequently translates it, full satisfaction of justice, legal adjustment (Rechtserfüllung, Rechtgutmachung, Rechtsausgleichung). This meaning suits admirably here, and in

* [This passage affords a striking parallel, and has some bearing on the question whether Paul was acquainted with the works of the great Stagira (which, from a remote resemblance of style, the mode of close, dialectic reasoning, from Paul's educational advantages in Tarsus, from his acquaintance with the spirit and working of the Hellenic philosophy, and even with inferior Greek authors, as Aratus and Cleanthes, Acts xvii. 28, Menander, 1 Cor. xv. 33 and Epimenides, Tit. i. 2, seems to me highly probable). I give it, therefore, in full. In his Nicomachean Ethics Book v. chap. 10 (according to Bekker's ed., ii. 1135; or chap. 7, in Didot's and other editions), Aristotle says: "Διαφέρει δὲ τὸ δίκαιον καὶ τὸ δίκον καὶ τὸ δικαίωμα καὶ τὸ δίκαιον. Δίκον μὲν γὰρ ἐστὶ τῇ φύσει ἢ ῥέσει· τὸ ἀπὸ δὲ τοῦτο, ὅταν πρᾶξῃ, ἀδικημὰ ἐστὶ, πρὶν δὲ πράξῃ οὐκ ὄντα, ἀλλ' δίκον. Οὐκ οὖν δὲ καὶ δικαίωμα. Καλὸν δὲ μᾶλλον δικαιοσύνην τὸ κοινόν, δικαίωμα δὲ τὸ ἐκείνου ῥέσει τὸ ἀδικήματος. "An unjust act differs from the unjust (injustice in the abstract), and so does a just act from the (abstract) just: for a thing is unjust either ver. 18 (where, however, the word is opposed to παράπτωμα, not, as in ver. 16, to κατάκριμα), and does not materially differ from the explanation of Lange. In ver. 18, δικαίωμα, being the opposite of παράπτωμα, and essentially equivalent to ὑπακοή, in ver. 19, must denote the righteous deed, i. e., the perfect obedience of Christ, and is so understood by Calvin, Esté, Grotius, and Bengel. As it is not likely that the same word should be used in one breath in two different senses, it is safe to explain δικαίωμα in ver. 16 from its more obvious meaning in ver. 18. I prefer this (with Lange) to the other alternative chosen by Meyer (Rechtfertigungsanspruch), Ewald (Gerechtspruch), Van Hengel, Umbreit, who give it in both verses the meaning, righteous decree. I quote, in addition, the excellent note of Bengel on δικαίωμα in ver. 18, which throws light on its meaning in ver. 16: "*Δικαίωμα est quasi materia δικαιοσύνης (justificationis) substrata, obediencia, justitia praeiusta. B. The contrast of potential, prospective effects.

1. The contrast between the enslavement and negation of all personal life by personified death, and of the future glory of pardoned persons in the new life (ver. 17).

2. The contrast in all its ideal magnitude: owing to the power of the fall of one, judgment and condemnation came upon all men; all men can attain to justification of life (that is, not merely of faith) by the justifying righteousness of one (ver. 18).

Ver. 17. "For if by one man's fall, &c. [Ἐὰν γὰρ τῷ τοῦ ἑνὸς παραπτώματι, κ.τ.λ.]. This verse (which Rothe has improperly treated as a parenthesis,* and which Er. Schmid has even conceived to be the contradiction of an opponent) is, in form, first of all a proof of the δικαίωμα and κατάκριμα in ver. 16; but it develops the consequence of the δικαίωμα, as of the κατάκριμα, to a new and glorious contrast. Here, now, the personal element in ver. 15 is united with the material one in ver. 16; yet the personal predominates. From one by nature or by order (ordinance). But the very same thing which, when done, is an unjust act, is not so before it is done, but it is unjust. The same may be said of a just act. But the common term is rather a deed justly done (δικαιοπράγμια); but the correction of an unjust act is a just act (δικαίωμα)."—P. S.]

* [This is a slight mistake, occasioned by a statement of Tholuck (p. 261 f.). Dr. Rothe regards not ver. 17, but ver. 16, as a parenthesis (l. c. p. 132), and ver. 17 as a corroborative and explanatory re-assumption of ver. 15, to which it corresponds in all its parts as follows:

Ver. 15.
 αὶ τῇ τοῦ ἑνὸς παραπτώματι οἱ πολλοὶ ἀπέθανον,
 πολλὴν μὲλλον
 ἡ χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ ἡ δωρεὰ ἐν χάριτι τῇ τοῦ ἑνὸς ἀνθρώπου Ἰησ. Χρ. εἰς τ. π. ἐπερίσυσσεν.

Ver. 17.
 αὖ τῇ τοῦ ἑνὸς παραπτώματι ὁ θάνατος ἐβασ.,
 πολλὴν μὲλλον
 αὖ τὴν περισσείαν τῆς χάριτος κ. τῆς δωρεᾶς τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ καὶ τοῦ ἑνὸς Ἰησ. Χριστοῦ, κ.τ.λ.—P. S.]

proceeded, through one offence, the tendency toward destruction; death tyrannized over and defaced the personal life, and threatened to extinguish it; but much more shall believers become by the one Christ, on the ground of the δικαιοσύνη, the βασιλευνόντες, the ruling, royal personalities in eternal life. The point of the antithesis is therefore ἐβασίλευσεν and βασιλεύουσιν. The πολλῶ μᾶλλον is also here a logical conclusion, which involves the higher degree of real power, as brought out in the antitheses: ἐν παραπτώματι, and the opposite ἡ περισσεία τῆς χάριτος καὶ τῆς δωρεᾶς τῆς δικαιοσύνης; to which is yet added the λαμβάνοντες in contrast with the bondage of the former slaves of death (Heb. ii. 14); then again, the nameless ἐκ and the one Jesus Christ; and finally, to a certain extent, ὁ θάνατος and ἡ ζωή. Meyer well remarks: "Bear in mind that Paul does not say in the paradox, in conformity with the protasis: ἡ ζωὴ βασιλεύσει ἐπὶ τοῖς . . . λαμβάνοντας, but, in harmony with the matter in question, and corresponding to the active nature of the relation, he places the subjects in the active first." This is the chief point just here. (Menochius: "maius et gloriosius sonat.") Tholuck: "To be ruled, is a bound and passive condition, while, on the other hand, the quality of free movement lies in life. The eschatological idea of a ruling in the finished kingdom of God, was brought over by Christ in a more profound sense from Judaism (Matt. xix. 28; Luke xii. 29). Paul has especially appropriated it (1 Cor. iv. 8; vi. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 12)." Tholuck questions the right to make prominent, according to Thomas Aquinas, Grotius, Stier, and others, the element of subjective spontaneousness, here, "where the whole weight falls on the Divine work of grace." But the Apostle speaks of the self-active appropriation of the work of grace in the life of believers.

Ver. 18. Therefore, as through the fall of one, &c. [Better: through one fall (ἐνός in the neuter), Ἀρα οὖν ὡς δι' ἐνός παραπτώματος εἰς πάντας ἀνθρώπους εἰς κατάκριμα, οὕτω καὶ δι' ἐνός δικαιομάτος εἰς πάντας ἀνθρώπους εἰς δικαιοσύνην ζωής.]

* [The Greek is here, like an exclamation, as brief and concise as possible, and cannot be intelligibly rendered without supplying some words. The E. V. supplies, the

This verse is, as Meyer and others remark, a resumption of the preceding contrasts compressed in one sentence (συλλογίζεται ἐνταῦθα τὸ πᾶν, Theodore of Mopsvestia). But we must not overlook the new contrast brought out here. (On the use of ἀπαὼν, see Meyer.* As far as the verb that is wanting is concerned, De Wette remarks: It is usual to supply here (likewise Rückert and Fritzsche), in the first member, τὸ κρίμα ἐγένετο, and in the second, τὸ χάρισμα ἐγένετο; but better, something indefinite, as ἐγένετο (thus Meyer and Tholuck); Winer, ἀπέβη. We call up the pregnant expressions in chap. ii. 28, 29, and repeat accordingly παράπτωμα after παράπτωματος, and δικαίωμα after δικαιώματος. ἀπέβη is sufficiently contained in εἰς. The contrast in that case is simply this: The fall of one man came ideally and dynamically as a fall upon all men unto condemnation; that is, by the common fall, all men would, without redemption, be subject to condemnation; on the other hand, the δικαίωμα of one came ideally and dynamically as δικαίωμα upon all men unto justification of life in the last judgment; that is, the δικαίωμα of Christ is sufficiently powerful to justify and perfect all men. Meyer [with Rothe, Ewald, Alford, Wordsworth.—P. S.] construes δι' ἐνός here both times as neuter (one trespass, one sentence of justification), which Tholuck has properly rejected. The Greek writers, Theodoret and Theophylact [as also Erasmus, Luther, Calvin, E. V., Bengel, Fritzsche, Philippi, Hodge.—P. S.], have taken it as masculine.† Here, as in sides the verb came, two nouns, viz., judgment (κρίμα) and free gift (χάρισμα), from ver. 16. Lange supplies παράπτωμα and δικαίωμα from ver. 18, and translates: "Demnach also: wie durch den Sündenfall des Einen (ein Sündenfall) auf alle Menschen (kommt) zur Verdammnis, so auch (kommt) durch Eines Rechtfertigungsgut (ein Rechtfertigungsgut) auf alle Menschen hin zur (wirklichen) Rechtfertigung des Lebens (welche Leben ist)." Rothe takes ἐνός in both clauses not in the masculine, but in the neuter gender, and supplies only the verb came: "Wie es durch Eine Überretung für alle Menschen zur Verdammnis (kommt), in eben derselben Weise (kommt es) auch durch Eine Rechtfertigung für alle Menschen zur Rechtfertigung des Lebens." Meyer: "Wie es also durch Ein Vergehen für alle Menschen zum Verdammungsurtheil (gekommen ist), so ist es auch durch Ein Rechtfertigungsurtheil für alle Menschen zur Rechtfertigung des Lebens (gekommen)." Alford in the same way (except that he gives δικαίωμα a different meaning): "Therefore as by means of one trespass it came (ἐγένετο being supplied) upon all men unto condemnation, so also by means of one righteous act it came upon all men unto justification of life." Wordsworth likewise takes ἐνός here as neuter, and translates: "Therefore, as through one transgression the sentence was unto all men to condemnation, so through one state of acceptance with God (so he interprets δικαίωμα), the sentence now is unto all men to justification of life." Ewald most literally: "Also denn—wie durch Einen Fehltritt für alle Menschen zur Verurtheilung, so auch durch Einen Gerechtspruch für alle Menschen zur Rechtfertigung vom Leben." Dr. Hodge adopts the translation of the E. V., from which he very seldom departs. The new version of the Amer. Bible Union likewise agrees with the E. V. in supplying judgment came, and free gift, but more correctly renders δι' ἐνός παραπτ., through one trespass, and δι' ἐνός δικαιώματος, through one righteous act.—P. S.]

* Meyer says: "ἀπαὼν is conclusive: demnach nun (accordingly then, so then, therefore now); it is of frequent occurrence in Paul (vii. 2, 25; viii. 12; ix. 16, 18; xiv. 1, 16; Gal. vi. 10; Eph. ii. 19 al.), and, contrary to classical usage (Herm. ad Antig. 628, ad Viger. p. 823), at the beginning of the sentence." Klotz distinguishes between ἀπαὼν and οὖν, in that the former "ad internam potius causam spectat," the latter "magis ad externam." The ratiocinative force of ἀπαὼν is weaker, and is supported by the collective power of οὖν. See Elliott on Gal. vi. 10.—P. S.]

† The antithesis εἰς πάντας, and the analogy of vers. 12, 15, 17, 19, where τοῦ ἐνός is masculine, are in favor of Lange's view, which is also that of the translators of the E. V.; but the absence of the article before ἐνός is almost conclusive against it; for in all the eight cases of this section, where it is indisputably masculine, it has uniformly ver. 16, Meyer makes the δικαίωμα to mean judgment of justification (Rechtfertigungsspruch), and rejects the translations: fulfillment of the right (Rechtsbefriedigung, Rothe and Philippi); deed of justification (Rechtfertigungsthat, Tholuck); virtuousness (Tugendhaftigkeit, Baumgarten-Crusius); obedience (Gehorsam, De Wette); the recte factum of Christ (Fritzsche). It is simply the same everywhere. If it be said that Christ is our righteousness, it is the same as saying that Christ is the personal medium of our justification. [Comp. the remarks on p. 184 f.—P. S.] The future ἀποβήσεται supplied by Winer and Philippi in the apodosis, is sufficiently implied in εἰς δικαίωσιν ζωῆς. We hold that the Apostle here means the final δικαίωσις, justification, which, in the general judgment, constitutes the antithesis of the κατάκριμα, condemnation. The δικαίωμα is offered to all men, and the δικαίωσις ζωῆς is its purpose; but the realization of the purpose takes place merely according to the measure of faith. The Roman Catholic expositors assert that justification of faith itself is denoted here as justification of life [i. e., progressive justification = sanctification.—P. S.] According to Calvin, and others, it is the justification whose result is life. Tholuck: The δικαίωσις with the effect of the future completion of life. Augustine likewise. Thomas Aquinas describes correctly the ideal universality of the δικαίωμα: "Quamvis possit dici, quod justificatio Christi transit in justificationem omnium, ad sufficientiam, licet quantum ad efficientiam procedit in solos fideles."

[Πάντες ἄνθρωποι are, in both clauses, all men without exception, as in ver. 12; but this does not justify a Universalist inference, for Paul speaks of the objective sufficiency and intention of Christ's δικαίωμα, not of its subjective application to individuals, which depends upon the λαβάνειν of faith, as intimated in ver. 17. The distinction drawn by Hofmann and Lechler between πάντες ἄνθρωποι, all men without distinction, and πάντες οἱ ἄνθρωποι, all, without exception, lacks proof (Meyer calls it, rein erdichtet). More of this in ver. 19.—P. S.]

C. The Contrast of the Final Effects.

Ver. 19. For as through the disobedience of the one man, &c. [Ἰσπερ γὰρ διὰ τῆς παρακοῆς τοῦ ἐνός ἀνθρώπου ἁμαρτηλοὶ κατεστάθησαν οἱ πολλοί, οὕτως καὶ, κ.λ. According to Meyer, ver. 19 furnishes only a grand and conclusive elucidation of ver. 18 (γὰρ). Tholuck likewise, in harmony with Calvin. But this contrast denotes the final antithesis of the judgment and of justification as made manifest by the gospel (see chap. ii. 16). The sense is: As, in consequence of the disobedience of the one man Adam, the many (as many as there are) have been presented in the light of the gospel as sinners subject to condemnation, so, in consequence of the obedience of the one man Christ, shall the many (as many as believe) be the article (ver. 15, τὸ τοῦ ἐνός παραπτῶμα . . . τῇ τοῦ ἐνός ἀνθρώπου; ver. 17, three times; ver. 19, twice), except in ver. 12, where it is connected with a noun (δι' ἐνός ἀνθρώπου), and therefore unnecessary; while in ver. 16, where ἐξ ἐνός must be neuter, in opposition to πολλῶν παραπτῶματων, it is, as here, without the article. The Apostle is therefore quite careful and consistent. The objection that the comparison is between Adam and Christ, rather than between the fall of one and the righteousness of another, does not hold, for it is clearly a comparison of both persons and effects. The E. V. has much obscured the force of this section by omitting the article throughout before εἰς, as also before πολλοί.—P. S.]

presented in the same light as just. It is self-evident that the effect of the gospel is included in the second clause; but from vers. 20 and 21 we must infer that it is presumed also in the first clause. It is only through the gospel that this ideal general judgment is brought to pass, by which all men are presented and exposed as condemned sinners in consequence of their connection with the sin of Adam see John xvi. 8, 9; comp. Ps. li. 5, 6). We are authorized by the language in maintaining that καθιστάνω possesses here the full idea of setting down, exhibiting, making to appear as what one is. [See below.]

[Through the disobedience of the one man, διὰ τῆς παρακοῆς τοῦ ἐνὸς ἀνθρώπου. The trespass, or fall, of Adam, τὸ παράπτωμα, is here definitely described as an act of disobedience, which is the mother of sin, as obedience to the Divine will is the mother of virtue; for disobedience is essentially selfishness in actual exercise, the rebellion of the human will against the Divine, the false self-assertion or independence in opposition to God, to whom we owe life and all, and whose service is true freedom.—P. S.]*

The many were constituted sinners [ἁμαρτωλοὶ καταστάθησαν].† Meyer: "According to ver. 12, they were, through Adam's disobedience, actually placed in the category of sinners, because they sinned in and with Adam's fall." This is Augustinian dogmatics, but no exegesis warranted by the context. [? see below.—P. S.] Tholuck: Were made, became. In this sense, according to his account, certain commentators have found the imputatio forensis expressed; others, a real becoming, in which the element of spontaneity is included. On the further complications which have arisen between Romish and Protestant commentators on the supposition of really becoming, see Tholuck, p. 268. The παρακοή of Adam himself has certainly set forth the many as sinners, but only because it has come into the light of the law, and finally of the gospel, and so far as it has now become clear: 1. As an ethico-physical causality, but not as a purely physical fatality; 2. So far as the offence of Adam has become the clear type of the sinfulness and sin of every man; 3. So far as the judgment of the finished revelation comprehends the many as in one.

So by the obedience of one shall the many be made (constituted) righteous [οὕτως καὶ διὰ τῆς ὑπακοῆς τοῦ ἐνὸς δίκαιοι κατασταθήσονται οἱ πολλοί]. That is, not merely by the death [the passive obedience] of Christ, but also by the [active] obedience of His whole life, which was finished in His death.* But why the future? Meyer: "It relates (corresponding to βασιλείουσι) to the future revelation of glory after the resurrection (Reiche, Fritzsche, Hofmann)." Tholuck also, together with Abelard, Cocceius, and others, refers the future to the final judgment. But the setting forth of believers as righteous extends from the beginning of the preaching of the gospel through all subsequent time. Beza properly observes, that the future denotes the continua vis justificandi; and Grotius, Calov., Rückert, De Wette, and Philippi, regard it similarly as præsens futuribile. Tholuck objects: Is not objective justification a single act? Certainly, but only for individuals; but in the kingdom of God these acts are repeated through all the future to the end of the world.

[The interpretation of ἁμαρτωλοὶ καταστάθησαν (passive Aor. I.) and δίκαιοι κατασταθήσονται has been much embarrassed and obscured by preconceived dogmatic theories. Καθιστάνω (also καθιστάνω and καθιστάνω) means: (1.) to set down, to place (this would give good sense here: to be set down in the rank of sinners; but see below); (2.) to appoint, to elect (this is inapplicable here, as it would make God directly the author of sin); (3.) to constitute, to cause to be, to make (reddere aliquem aliquid); hence the passive: to be rendered, to become; (4.) to conduct, to accompany on a journey (only once in the New Testament). Reiche has spent much learning to establish a fifth meaning: to show, to exhibit; but this is somewhat doubtful. The verb occurs twenty-two times in the New Testament, three times only in Paul (twice here, and once in Titus i. 5). In sixteen of these cases (including Titus i. 5) it clearly refers to official appointment, in one it means, to accompany (Acts xvii. 15); in the remaining five, viz., Rom. v. 19 (twice); James iii. 6; iv. 4; 2 Peter i. 8, it is, to constitute, to render. So it is taken in this verse by nearly all the recent commentators.† But in what sense? Figuratively, or really? Chrysostom, and the Greek commentators who did not believe in original sin, started the figurative or metonymic interpretation, which was subsequently more fully developed by the Arminians and Socinians (Grotius, Limborch, Wetstein, Socinus, Crell), and advocated also by Storr and Flatt, of the school of the older German supernaturalism, namely, that καταστάθησαν ἁμαρτωλοὶ means: they were only apparently made sinners, or accounted, regarded, and treated as sinners—i. e., exposed to the punishment of sin, without actually being sinners.‡ The same view has been strenu-

* [Tholuck quotes here the quaint and pointed remark of Luther: "Wohl setzt Adam seinen Zahn in einen Apfel, aber in Wahrheit setzt er ihn in einen Stachel, welcher ist das öffentliche Gebot." Bengel says that παρά, in παράκοή, very aptly points out the principle of the initial step, which ended in Adam's fall, namely, the carelessness of his understanding and will, which simultaneously gave way; as the first step towards the capture of a city is remissness on the part of the guards on watch.—P. S.]

† [Vulgate: peccatores constituti sunt. So also Calvin. E. V.: were made sinners. Lange translates: als Sündner herausgestellt worden sind, set forth, made to appear (in their real character) as sinners. So also Ewald: als Sündner dargestellt wurden. Meyer and Philippi: "als Sündner hingestellt, in die Kategorie von Sündnern versetzt wurden" set down in the rank, or category, of sinners. Alford (with De Wette): "were made actual sinners by practice, not, 'were accounted as' (Grotius, al.); nor 'became by imputation' (Beza, Bengel); nor 'were proved to be' (Koppe, Reiche, Fritzsche)."—P. S.]

* [Meyer refers ὑπακοή, as the opposite of Adam's παράκοή, specifically to the expiatory death of Christ, which was κατ' ἐξουσίαν, His obedience to the will of God; Phil. ii. 8. But Leohler, Hofmann, Stuart, Barnes, and others, agree with Lange.—P. S.]

† [Philippi doubts the meaning reddere, suocere, in the N. T., and insists upon the fundamental meaning (1.) to set down, sisere, constituere, hinstellen, einsetzen, and translates: in die Kategorie von Sündnern gesetzt werden. But also in this case the setting down or the imputation must be based on the fact that they really are sinners, and so it is taken by Philippi.—P. S.]

‡ [Chrysostom is generally set down as the first advocate of this interpretation, but it should be remembered that he puts the metonymy not in the verb καταστάθησαν but in the noun ἁμαρτωλοὶ, which he makes to mean obnoxious to punishment and condemned to death, καταδικασμένοι θανάτῳ. He says that the Apostle designed merely to state the fact, that all became mortal through Adam, but not the why and wherefore (Rom. x. Tomi ix., p. 523, ed. Bened.)? It is unnecessary to prove that ously advocated even by so sound and orthodox a commentator as Dr. Hodge, but from the very opposite doctrinal standpoint, and in the interest of immediate forensic imputationism. He takes κατεράθησαν, like ἡμαρτον, ver. 12, in a purely legal and forensic sense: they were regarded as sinners independently of, and antecedently to, their being sinners, simply on the ground of the sin of Adam, their federal representative; as, on the other hand, they are regarded as righteous solely on the ground of Christ's righteousness, without any personal righteousness of their own.* This interpretation, though less artificial than the corresponding passive rendering of ἡμαρτον, ver. 12, is not supported by a single passage of the New Testament where κατίστημι occurs, and conflicts with the connection. For ver. 19 gives the reason (γὰρ) for the statement in ver. 18, why "judgment came upon all men to condemnation," and it would be sheer tautology to say: they were condemned because "they were regarded and treated as sinners." The phrase, then, can be taken only in the real sense, like ἡμαρτον in ver.

ἡμαρτωλός, in the N. T., means a real sinner, and nothing else. Glorius explains Rom. v. 19: "Here again is a metonymy. They were so treated as though they had actually sinned; that is, they were subject to death. So the word 'sinner' is used in 1 Kings i. 21, and elsewhere." So also Whitby, one of the best English commentators of the Arminian school.—P. 8.]

* [Dr. Hodge, though otherwise a strict Calvinist, rejects the realistic Augustinian view of a fall of the whole race in Adam, and yet makes all the descendants of Adam legally responsible for his fall. To maintain this ground of an exclusively forensic imputation, he must resort to this forced interpretation of ἡμαρτον and κατεράθησαν. "Κατίστημι," he says (p. 271), "never (!) in the N. T. means to make, in the sense of effecting or causing a person or thing to be in its character or nature: other than it was before. Κατίσταναι τινα ἡμαρτωλόν does not mean, to make one sinful, but to set him down as such, to regard or appoint him to be of that class." [To regard, and to appoint are two very different things.—P. 8.] "Thus, when Christ is said to have been 'constituted the Son of God,' He was not made Son, but declared to be such." [But in this passage, Rom. i. 4, ἀποθνήσκων is used, not κατεράθησαν, and even that means more than declared; see Textual Note on p. 56.] "Who constituted thee a ruler or judge?"—i. e., Who appointed thee to that office? So, "Whom his lord made ruler." [These two passages, Matt. xxiv. 45; Acts vii. 35, imply that neither was a ruler before being appointed, and they would lose their force, were we to substitute regarded for constituted.] "When, therefore, the Apostle says that the many were constituted (κατεράθησαν) sinners by the disobedience of Adam, it cannot mean that the many thereby were rendered sinful, but that his disobedience was the ground of their being placed in the category of sinners. It constituted a good and sufficient reason for so regarding and treating them. The same remark applies, of course, to the other clause of this verse: δικαιοὶ κατεράθησαν οἱ πολλοί. This cannot mean, that by the obedience of one the many shall be made holy. It can only mean, that the obedience of Christ was the ground on which the many are to be placed in the category of the righteous—i. e., shall be so regarded and treated. It is not our personal righteousness which makes us righteous, but the imputation of the obedience of Christ. And the sense in which we are here declared to be sinners, is not that we are such personally (which indeed is true), but by the imputation of Adam's disobedience." With the same assurance, as in ver. 12 (see p. 178), Dr. Hodge claims that this dogmatic κατεράθησαν is the obvious grammatical meaning of the phrase, "adopted by commentators of every class, as to theological opinion." Of all respectable modern commentators, Philippi (a high-church Lutheran) is the only one who apparently favors it by pressing the meaning, to set down, as distinct from reddere, facere, but he does so in the realistic Augustinian sense, which he expressly vindicates in the interpretation of ἡμαρτον (see p. 178). De Wette calls the Socinian interpretation of κατεράθησαν factus, and Meyer insists that the verb means, "die wirkliche Einwirkung in den Sündenstand, wodurch sie zu Sündnern THATSÄCHLICH GEWORDEN SIND, peccatores constituti sunt;" and he quotes James iv. 4; 1 Peter i. 8; Heb. v. 1; vii. 3: where the metonymic sense is impossible.—P. 8.]

12. It means: they were made sinners either by virtual participation in the fall of Adam, or by actual practice, by repeating, as it were, the fall of Adam in their sinful conduct. Both interpretations are perfectly grammatical, and do not exclude each other. Even if the verb under consideration, in the passive, could be made out to mean: to be exhibited, to appear (κατεράθησαν = εἰσενεχθήσαν, see Wetstein, Reiche, Fritzsche), it always presupposes actual being: they were made to appear in their true character as sinners, or what they really were.* Comp. Lange above.† This is very different from: they were regarded and treated as sinners, without being such. The metonymic interpretation confounds the effect with the cause, or reverses the proper order that death follows sin. We are regarded and treated as sinners because we are sinners in fact and by practice. So, on the other hand, δικαιοὶ κατεράθησαν is more than the declaratory δικαιωθήσονται, and means, that by Christ's merits we shall be actually made righteous, and appear as such before His judgment seat. It denotes the righteousness of life, as a consequence of justification by faith (comp. εἰς δικαιοσύνην ζωῆς, ver. 18). Luther says: "Wie Adam's Sünde unsere EIGENE geworden ist, also auch Christi Gerechtigkeit;" as Adam's sin has become our own, so also Christ's righteousness. Calvin correctly translates: "peccatores constituti sunt, . . . justi constitutur," and remarks in loc.: "Unde sequitur, justitia quae in latere est in Christo: sed nobis acceptum ferri, quod illi proprium est." David Pareus, one of the ablest among the older Reformed commentators, explains δικαιοὶ κατεράθησαν: "multo plus est, quam justificabuntur. Nam justificari est a condemnatione absolvi iustitia imputata; justum constitui est etiam iustitia habituali sanctificari, hoc est, simul justificationis et sanctificationis beneficium complectitur." Bengel in loc.: "Ἀποστόλος talem iustorum CONSTITUTIONEM videtur praedicare, quae justificationis actum subsequatur, et verbo INVENIRI includitur (Phil. iii. 9; coll. Gal. ii. 17);" i. e., the Apostle seems to set forth such a constituting of men as righteous, as may follow upon the act of justification, and as is included in the expression, bring fründ. Alford: "be made righteous, not by imputation merely, any more than in the other case; but, 'shall be made really and actually righteous, as completely so as the others were made really and actually sinners.'" When we say that man has no righteousness of his own, we speak of him as out of Christ: but in Christ, and united to Him, he is made righteous, not by a fiction or imputation only of Christ's righteousness, but by a real and living spiritual union with a righteous head, as a righteous member, righteous by means of, as an effect of, the righteousness of that head, but not merely righteous by transference of the righteousness of that head; just as, in his natural state, he is united to a sinful head as a sinful member, sinful by means of,

* [Tholuck, p. 267: "So ergiebt sich denn für das Pass nicht die Bedeutung: 'dargestellt werden' im Sinne von 'erscheinen als etwas, was man nicht ist,' sondern 'ermacht werden, werden'—P. 8.]

† [The latest commentator of Rom. v., Ad. Stähling (Beiträge zur Exegese der Paulinischen Briefe, Göttingen, 1869, p. 40), nearly agrees with Lange in giving the verb a special reference to the judgment. "Κατεράθησαν," he says, "hat hier die endliche Bedeutung des Hinsinkens vor den Richter, wie ja die richterliche Thätigkeit Gottes auf Adam'scher Seite im Vorhinein durch apine zu καταρτία auf das Kluge bezogen ist."—P. 8.]

as an effect of, the sinfulness of that head, but not merely by transference of the sinfulness of that head."—P. S.]

On the question raised by Tholuck, and others, whether this passage does not lead to the doctrine of the ἀποκατάστασις, see Doct. and Ethical, No. 12.

[The inference of a universal salvation from this verse, as also from ver. 15 (εἰς τοὺς πολλοὺς ἐπιτίθειν) and 18 (εἰς πάντας ἀνθρώπους εἰς δακτύλου ζωῆς), is very plausible on the surface, and might be made quite strong if this section could be isolated from the rest of Paul's teaching on the terms of salvation. The same difficulty is presented in 1 Cor. xv. 22: "As in Adam all die (πάντες ἀποθνήσκουσιν), so in Christ shall all be made alive (πάντες ζωοποιθήσονται)." It has been urged by some that the apocatastasis is implied partly in the indicative future, κατασταθήσονται and ζωοποιθήσονται, but especially in the fact that, as πάντες, all, and οἱ πολλοί, the many,* are confessedly unlimited in the first clause, we have no right to limit them in the second clause. (The advocates of eternal punishment forcibly derive the same argument for their doctrine from the double αἰώνος, Matt. xxv. 46). The popular explanation that πάντες and οἱ πολλοί means, in one case, Adam's natural seed (οἱ ἀματωτοί), in the other, Christ's spiritual seed (i. e., οἱ πιστεύοντες), though true as to practical result, fails to do justice to the superabundance of God's grace over man's sin. Paul unquestionably teaches emphatically the universal sufficiency of the gospel salvation, without any restrictions which might break the force of the parallel between Adam and Christ.† All men are capable of salvation, or salvable (ἐλπίδωρ), which must by all means be maintained against Manichæism and fatalism. If any are ultimately lost, it is not from metaphysical or constitutional inability, nor from any defect in Christ's atonement, which is of infinite value in itself, and was made for the sins of the whole world (1 John ii. 2), nor from any unwillingness on the part of God, who, according to His benevolent purpose, will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth (1 Tim. ii. 4; comp. iv. 10; 2 Peter iii. 9). But we must make a distinction between the objective sufficiency and the subjective efficacy of Christ's atonement, between the possibility and the actuality of a universal salvation. All men may be saved, since abundant provision has been made to that end, and under this view we must approach even the worst sinner; but which, and how many, will be saved, is a question of the future which God only knows. From the great stress which Paul lays in this passage on the superabundance of grace which greatly exceeds the evils of the fall, we have a right to infer that by far the greater part of the race will ultimately be saved, especially if we take into consideration that the half of mankind die in infancy before having committed actual transgression, and that, in the days of millennial glory, the knowledge of Christ will cover the earth. It is a truly liberal and noble sentiment of Dr. Hodge when he says (p. 279): "We have reason to believe that the lost shall bear to the saved in greater proportion than the inmates of a prison do to the mass of the community." But from all our present observation, as well as from the word of God (comp. Matt. vii. 13, 14), we know that many, very many—yes, the vast majority of adults even in Christian lands—walk on the broad path to perdition, although they may yet be rescued in the last moment. Paul himself speaks of the everlasting punishment of those who obey not the gospel of Christ (2 Thess. i. 9), and teaches a resurrection of the unjust as well as of the just (Acts xxiv. 15). We know, moreover, that none can be saved except by faith, which is God's own express condition. For salvation is a moral, not a mechanical process, and requires the free assent of our will. Now Paul everywhere presents faith as the subjective condition of justification; and in ver. 17 he expressly says, that those who receive (λαμβάνοντες) the abundance of the grace and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by the one, Jesus Christ. He contrasts the whole generation of Adam and the whole generation of Christ, and, as the one die in consequence of their participation in Adam's sin, so the other shall be made alive by virtue and on condition of their union with Christ's righteousness. In Gal. iii. 22 he states the case beyond the possibility of mistake: "The Scripture hath concluded all (τὰ πάντα) under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe (τοῖς πιστεύουσιν)."—Universalism must assume a second probation after death even for those who lived in Christian lands, with every opportunity of saving their soul. But such an assumption is contrary to Gal. vi. 7, 8, and the whole practical tenor of the Bible, and is in itself untenable and illusive. A new trial, instead of improving, would greatly lessen the chance of building up a good character. For as it is impossible, without a new creation, to return to the mother's womb and live the old life over again, the second trial would have to commence where the first left off—that is, with a dismal outfit of neglected opportunities, broken vows, sad reminiscences, abused faculties, bad habits, and in the corrupting company of moral bankrupts, with every prospect of a worse failure and a more certain ruin. God wisely and mercifully gave to men but one state of probation, and those who improved it best, would shrink most from running the risk of a second.—P. S.]

THIRD PARAGRAPH (VERS. 20, 21).

How the law is designed to bring about directly this process of the development of sin, in order also to bring about indirectly the revelation of grace.

* [The E. V. has much obscured the meaning by omitting the article before many, as if it were antithetical to some, while the many are opposed to the one, & c.—P. S.]

† [According to Rothe, l. c. p. 155, Paul meant to suggest the idea of the possibility of the ultimate salvation of all men, but no more. "VÖLLIG BESTIMMT UND UNZWEIFELHAFT WIRD DER APOSTEL NUR DIE REALE MÖGLICHKEIT DER BEWEGUNG ALLER DURCH CHRISTI DAKALAPSAUSGEGANGEN; ALLEIN DAGEGEN WILL ER DOCH GLEICH MIT VÖLLIG BEWUSSTER ABSICHT (UND ER ERREICHT DIESE ABSICHT DURCH DAS γὰρ EINERSEITS UND DURCH DAS ΣΩΤΗΡΙΟΝ ΟΙ ΠΟΛΛΟΙ ANDERERSEITS), IN DEM LEZTERE BESTIMMTE VERMUTHUNG ERREGEN, DASS AUCH DIE GERECHTIGKEIT VERWIRKLICHUNG JENER REALEN MÖGLICHKEIT VON IHM ALLGEMEIN SEIN MÖGE; ABER AUCH EBEN NUR ALLE VERMUTHUNG, DIE ER DURCHAUSS NICHT SOLL AUS DEM GEBIET DER BLOßEN WAHRSCHEINLICHKEIT! IN DAS DER BILDERS ANSCHAUEN KÖNNEN. GENAU, DIE MEISTERLICHE KUNST IN DER DURCHFÜHRUNG DER SEIN BEZUGNIRTEN INTENTION IST WOHL ZU BEWUNDERN."—P. S.]

Ver. 20. But the law. [Νόμος δέ, καὶ. The Mosaic law is meant, though the article is wanting, as is often the case where there can be no mistake.—P. S.] The Apostle now cannot avoid to state the relation of the law or of Moses to this antithesis—Adam and Christ—especially since he has already intimated this relation in ver. 18. Grotius thought the following discussion induced by an objection. But chaps. vi. and vii. show that Paul could not avoid to answer this question.—Came in between [zwischen, parenthetically, as it were] παρεσθῆεν. Not besides, thereto (Meyer); nor subintravit (Vulg.); † nor incidentally, subordinately (nebensächlich, Rothe, † Tholuck [Reiche, Philippi], and others [contrary to the pedagogic mission of the law; iii. 20; Gal. iv. 24]). The coming to, in addition to, lies in the παρά; the coming into, in the εἰς. Therefore, properly to enter between, to come between [Adam and Christ] (Theodoret, Calvin, Luther [Estius, § Grotius, Usteri, Ewald], &c.), which Meyer opposes without warrant. The reference to the position of Moses between Adam and Christ may, indeed, be only an intimation; but to say that sin merely supervened in addition to sin (Beza, De Wette, &c.), is not satisfactory, because the question in the foregoing is not concerning sin alone, but the antithesis of sin and grace. Tholuck concludes incorrectly from this consideration, that the law is characterized as an incidental factor. The law incidental? (Chrysostom [Theophylact, Cornelius a Lapide, without any foundation], have understood παρά as denoting obiter, ad tempus). The Apostle has evidently the idea of an ethico-chemical process. The law had to enter into the process of the development of sin, in order to force it to a crisis. [Olshausen: "Paul regards the law as a salutary medicine, which forces the disease that rages in the inward, nobler parts, to the surface." So also De Wette and Rothe.—P. S.]

That the fall might multiply [ἵνα πλεονάσῃ τὸ παράπτωμα; Lange: damit der Sündenfall völliger werde (erscheine); Alford: in order that the trespass might multiply. The Apostle uses παράπτωμα here (not παρὰπτώματα, nor ἀμαρτία), because the law does not aim to multiply sin as such, but to make it appear and to reveal it to the conscience as a παράπτωμα—i. e., a transgression of the positive will of God; comp. iii. 20; iv. 15; vii. 7; and Rothe, p. 167.—P. S.] The boldness of this thought has troubled the commentators. It is indeed not satisfactory to alleviate it by supposing that the law is intended merely to enhance the knowledge of sin (Grotius, Baur, and others); but this is one important element of its mission (see chap. vii.), and must not be rejected, with Meyer, as false. To explain ἵνα of the consequence or result (merely ἐπακρίως, with Chrysostom: [οὐκ ἀπὸ αἰτίας, ἀλλ' ἐπακρίως; Estius: "non finalem causam denotat, sed eventum."—P. S.], Koppe, Reiche [Stuart, Barnes]), is likewise unsatisfactory; yet the Apostle has certainly inferred from the result the design and intention in the ἵνα.* Gal. iii. 19 does not serve as an elucidation of this passage, as Meyer would have it; and Rom. vii. 14 proves that, by the law, the knowledge of sin comes; while 1 Tim. i. 9 shows that the law constitutes a weapon against the ungodly. Reiche has called the telic construction blasphemous; in reply to which, comp. Meyer [p. 224]. He properly remarks, that sin had to reach its culminating point, where it will be outdone by grace. Only this culminating point should not be merely objective, but subjective also, in accordance with the sentence quoted from Augustine, on Pa. cii.: "Non crudeliter hoc fecit Deus, sed consilio medicinarum; . . . augetur morbus, crescit malitia, quæritur medicus et lotum sanatur." It is a fact both that the misunderstood law, according to God's decree, induced the crucifixion of Christ—the climax of the world's guilt—and that the same law, well understood, prepared the way for the saving faith of the New Testament. For this reason there is truth in Rothe's explanation: All sin should ever stand out more complete under the form of the παράπτωμα. Tholuck also takes ground with Olshausen, De Wette, and Neander, in favor of the telic rendering. Reasons: 1. Nititur in retitum; 2. Thomas: "When the passions dare not manifest themselves, they become more intense." Does this apply here? Sin, even in the form of anti-Christianity, undoubtedly becomes more intense in opposition to the gospel, but still this is mostly ecclastic consequence; 3. Luther: The accusing and condemning law awakens enmity to God. For this reason, Judaism, like all fanaticism, is angry at God. It is a prime consideration that here the law is specifically understood as the law of the letter, as designed to finish, both objectively and subjectively, the sinful process of the old world. Therefore the second ἵνα in ver. 21, as Tholuck well remarks, takes the sting from the first. [In other words, the first ἵνα indicates the mediate, the second ἵνα the ultimate end and purpose.—P. S.] Philippi understands by παράπτωμα merely the παράπτ. of Adam inhering in sinners. But it denotes here rather the completion of the fall of humanity itself.

But where sin multiplied [οὐ δὲ ἐπλήθυνασεν ἡ ἀμαρτία]. Where it was completed, came to full revelation. It is very strange that Rothe regards the head of the whole deduction from οὐ δὲ τὸ χάρις as parenthetical. (It is not temporal [Grotius [De Wette, Fritzsche, Stölting]], but spacial [Meyer, Tholuck]—perhaps both; time being considered as an expansion—[Grace exceedingly abounded (not, much more, E. V.), ὑπερπερισσεύσας ἡ χάρις]. ὑπερπερισσεύσας [supra modum redundavit] is superlative [not comparative; comp. ὑπερπλουσῶν, ὑπερπλουσίων, ὑπερπληρῶν]; (2 Cor. vii. 4 [the same verb] 1 Tim. i. 14; Mark vii. 37; 2 Thesa. i. 8).

Ver. 21. That, as sin reigned in [not unto, E. V.; Lange, mittelst, by means of] death [ἵνα,

* [As προσέρθη, Gal. iti. 19. Beza: praeterea intravit, supervened, came in the way of addition. Meyer: es kam noch dazwischen ein, viz., in addition to sin, which had already entered into the world, ver. 12. Similarly Alford: "came in besides the fact of the many being made sinners, and as a transition-point to the other result." Hodge: "The law was superinduced on a plan already laid, and for a subordinate (†) although necessary purpose."—P. S.]

† [The idea of secrecy, or surreptitious entrance, is not necessarily implied in παρά (comp. παρεσθῆναι, παρεσθῆναι, παρεσθῆναι), and must be either derived from the context, as in Gal. ii. 4 (the only passage in the New Testament where the verb occurs besides our own), or be expressed by ἀόφρα. Its use in our passage such an idea would be inconsistent with the holy character of the law, the solemn manner of its promulgation, and the Apostle's reverence for it (Rom. vii. 12 ff.). From Meyer.—P. S.]

‡ [Rothe, p. 158, translates: nebenbei zwischen—in gekommen, it came in incidentally between. He thus combines the idea of the incidental coming in of the law with that of the medial position between Adam and Christ. So Olshausen: "*In dem παρεσθῆναι ist sowohl das mitten inne Treten, als auch das Bräutigam, nicht absolut Nothwendige Freiwerden angedeutet*."—P. S.]

§ Estius: "Lex, prohibens peccatum, medio tempore inter Adam et Christum subingressa est."—P. S.]

θεοῦ βασιλεύσει ἡ ἀμαρτία ἐν τῷ θανάτῳ. The second ἐν indicates the more remote and ultimate purpose of the coming in of the law, as the first ἐν, ver. 20, denotes its nearer and mediate aim and effect; the increase of sin served merely as a means for the triumphant and eternal reign of grace. Hodge: "The design of God in permitting sin, and in allowing it to abound, was to bring good out of evil; to make it the occasion of the most wonderful display of His glory and grace, so that the benefits of redemption should infinitely transcend the evils of the apostasy."—P. S.] As sin wrought death, so again did death work sin (see Heb. ii. 14). But here the priority in the βασιλεία is ascribed to sin. It reigned [hor., the historic past]. It reigns no more. ἐν before θανάτῳ is not a substitute for ἐκ (Beza, and others). Meyer opposes also the explanation: by death (Tholuck, Philippi). Death denotes the sphere of the dominion of sin. But death is also the medium of the reign of sin; see the antithesis, διὰ δικαιοσύνης.

So also grace may reign, &c. [οὕτως καὶ ἡ χάρις βασιλεύσει, κ.τ.λ.] The law would thus bring to pass the dominion of grace; and it now reigns in reality. The material medium is righteousness unto (leading to) life eternal; the personal medium is Jesus Christ our Lord; and both are identical. The δικ., and not the ζωή, is named as the medium of the dominion of grace, because the ζωή αἰώνιος is the goal. The righteousness of faith and the righteousness of life are comprised here in the idea of the δικ. (βασιλεία is aorist, not future. Meyer against Reiche, see Col. iii. 4.)

[The last word in this section is, Jesus Christ our Lord, the one glorious solution of the Adamic fall and the dark problem of sin. Adam disappears, and Christ alone remains master of the field of battle, having slain the tyrants, Sin and Death. Forbes concludes his notes on Rom. v. 12-21 with the exclamation (p. 257): "Who can rise from the study and contemplation of this wondrous passage, full of such profound views and pregnant meanings, with all its variously complicated yet beautifully discriminated relations and interplacements of members and thoughts, without an overpowering admiration and irresistible conviction of the superhuman wisdom that must have dictated its minutest details!"—P. [2. HISTORICAL STATEMENTS ON THE DIFFERENT THEORIES OF ORIGINAL SIN AND IMPUTATION.—The Apostle clearly teaches, and our religious experience daily confirms, the fact of the universal dominion of sin and death over the human race, which dominion goes back in unbroken line to our first parents; as, on the other hand, the power and principle of righteousness and life go back to Jesus Christ, the second Adam. Sin existed before Christianity, as disease existed before the science and art of healing; and, however explained, the stubborn, terrible fact remains. It is all-important, as we stated in the introductory remarks, to distinguish clearly between the fact itself and the different modes of explanation, or between the primitive truths of the Bible and the after-thoughts of human philosophy and theology. Here lies the reason why Christian men, holding very divergent views on the why and wherefore, or the rationale of Scripture truths, may yet in their inmost heart and religious experience be agreed. The commentators have so far dwelt mainly on the negative clause of Paul's parallelism, viz., the propagation of sin and death from Adam; but he lays the chief stress upon the positive clause, the antitype, and the life-union of the justified believer with Christ, which prepares the way for chap. vi.]

The following are the principal theories on this subject:

(1.) The PANTHEISTIC and NECESSITARIAN theory regards sin as an essential attribute (a limitation) of the finite, and a necessary stage in the development of character; it consequently destroys the radical antagonism between good and evil, and places itself outside of the Christian system. Where there is no real sin, there is no room for redemption.

(2.) The PELAGIAN heresy denies original sin, and resolves the fall of Adam into an isolated and comparatively trivial childish act of disobedience, which indeed set a bad example, but left his character and moral faculties essentially unimpaired, so that every child is born into the world as innocent and perfect, though as fallible, as Adam was created. It offers no explanation of the undeniable fact of the universal dominion of sin, which embraces every human being with the one solitary exception of Jesus of Nazareth. It rests on an atomistic anthropology and hamartiology, and is as anti-scriptural as the opposite extreme of pantheism. Socinianism, Unitarianism, and Rationalism likewise deny original sin and guilt in the proper sense of the term.

(3.) The assumption of a PRE-ADAMIC FALL of all men, either in time—i. e., in a state of individual preëxistence of the soul prior to its connection with the body (as Origen held it), or timeless and transcendental (so Dr. Jul. Müller: ein auserzeitlicher Urzustand und Urfall). This is a mere hypothesis, without support in human consciousness, and inconsistent with the plain sense of Rom. v. 12, which, in harmony with Gen. iii., derives sin from the one historical Adam.

(4.) The AUGUSTINIAN or REALISTIC theory of a real though impersonal and unconscious participation of the whole human race in the fall of Adam, as their natural head, who by his individual transgression vitiated the generic human nature, and transmitted it in this corrupt and guilty state to his descendants by physical generation. As an individual act, Adam's sin and guilt was his own exclusively, and is not transferable to any other individual; but as the act of mankind in their collective, undistributed, and unindividualized form of existence, it was, virtually or potentially, the act of all who were germinally or seminally contained in their first parent, as Levi was in the loins of Abraham (Heb. vii. 9, 10). Persona corrumpit naturam, natura corrumpit personam. In other words: Adam's individual transgression resulted in a sinful nature; while, in the case of his descendants, the sinful nature or depraved will results in individual transgressions. See the passages from Augustine quoted on p. 178, third foot-note. His view rests on his deep religious experience and his interpretation of Rom. v., but it presupposes, as a necessary prerequisite, the original organic unity of the human race, a distinction between person and nature (which must be made also in the doctrine of the Trinity and the Incarnation), and may be philosophically supported by the Platonico-Aristotelian realism concerning the doctrine of the general conceptions, as the original types of individual things.

This realistic view of the fall of the race in Adam became the orthodox doctrine of the Latin Church. It was defended by the great schoolmen, Anselm, Peter the Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, &c. (yet with a material modification of Augustine's conception of original sin and guilt, which scholastic theology made to consist only in the loss of original righteousness; viewing it more as a negative state of privation than as positive corruption). It was even more earnestly and vigorously maintained by the Reformers, both Lutheran and Calvinistic (who advocated afresh the Augustinian view of hereditary sin and guilt in all its severity). The various writings of Luther, Melancthon, Calvin, and the symbolical books of the sixteenth century, abound with quotations and reminiscences from Augustine on the doctrines of Sin and Grace.

But within the Augustinian system different views of imputation were developed, especially in the Reformed Church:

(a.) Imputation, immediate and mediate,* conjoined and inseparable. This makes the guilt of Adam's first sin imputed, and the guilt of inherent depravity inseparable and conditional to one another. Both kinds of imputation are held in fact; but the distinction was not made before the seventeenth century. Participation is assumed as the ground of imputation. Nati e corruption is itself sin, and likewise punishment for guilt incurred in Adam's sin. Hereditary guilt coexists with hereditary sin; man is condemned, both on account of the act of disobedience which he committed in the loins of Adam, and for hereditary depravity.

Here we must distinguish again a minor difference relating to the order of the two kinds of imputation:

(aa.) Some put immediate imputation before mediate in the order of things. So Augustine and his strict followers in the Catholic Church, and the Calvinists of the Montauban school, David Pareus, Andrew Rivet,* the elder Turretin,† and Heidegger; ‡—with this difference, that the Dutch and French Calvinists of the seventeenth century combined, with the Augustinian theory of participation, the federal theory of representation (see below, No. 5); and, while still holding to both kinds of imputation, they laid the chief stress upon immediate imputation—thus preparing the way for exclusive immediate imputationism.

(bb.) Others give mediate imputation, or the imputation of inherent depravity, the logical priority, so that Adam's sin is imputed to us only because it becomes our own by propagation (to which some add, by actual transgression). Here belong, in all probability, Anselm among the schoolmen,§ Calvin,||

* [In opposition to Placcens, and in vindication of the decree of the Synod of Charenton, the distinguished Professor Rivet, of Leyden, made a collection of passages on imputation from the Reformed and Lutheran Confessions, and prominent divines, as Calvin, Besa, Bullinger, Wolfgang Musculus, Viret, Bucanus, Peter Martyr, Wolleb, Whitaker, Davenant, Zanchius, Olevianus, Ursinus, Pareus, Piscator, L. Crocius, Melancthon, Chemnitz, Hunnius, and many others (including also Roman Catholics). But these testimonies are to a great extent general, and make no distinction between immediate and mediate imputation. The collection of Rivet is translated in part in the Princeton Review, vol. xi. (1839), pp. 553-579.]

† [Turretin (l. c. Pars I. p. 557) defines imputation thus: "Imputatio est ad nos ALIENÆ, vel PROPRIÆ. Aliquando imputatur nobis id quod nostrum est personaliter, quo sensu Deus imputat peccata peccatoribus, quos propter propria crimina punit, et in bonis dicitur etiam Phineas illi imputatus ad justitiam (Ps. cxi. 31); aliquando imputatur id quod est EXTRA NOS, nec a nobis est præditum, quomodo justitia Christi dicitur nobis imputari, et peccata nostra ipsi imputantur, licet nec ipsi peccatum in se habeant, nec nos justitiam."]

‡ [The Formula consensus Helvetica, a strongly partisan theological Confession, drawn up in 1675 by Heidegger of Zürich, at the solicitation of Turretin of Geneva, and Gernler of Basel, in opposition partly to the mediate imputationism of La Place, asserts that the imputatio culpæ is not the consequence, but the cause of the propagatio vitiositatis, or the corruptio hereditaria, and condemns the doctrine of those who "sub imputationis mediatæ et consequentis nomine, non imputationem duntaxat primi peccati tollunt, sed hereditariæ etiam corruptionis assertionem gravi periculo obijciunt." Arts. x.-xii. (in Niemeyer's Collect., p. 733). The same Confession teaches also a limited atonement, and verbal, even punctual inspiration; but it soon lost all authority. Ebrard (Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichte, iii. p. 556) calls it, rather too severely, the "ridiculous after-birth of a symbolical book."]

§ [Anselm (De conc. virg., c. 7) says we are not condemned because "we ourselves sinned in Adam, as we did not yet exist, but because we were to descend from him (sed quia de illo futuri eramus)."]

|| [Calvin on Rom. v. 17: "We are condemned for the sin of Adam not by imputation alone, as if the punishment of the sin of another were exacted of us (peccato Adæ non propter solam imputationem damnamur, ac si alieni peccati irigeretur a nobis pœna), but we bear its punishment because we are guilty of the sin also (quia et culpæ sumus rei), in so far as our nature, vitiated in him, is held bound with the guilt of iniquity before God (quatenus scilicet de naturâ nostrâ in ipso vitia iniquitatis reatu obstringitur apud Deum). He then goes on to say, that we are in a different manner restored to salvation by the righteousness of Christ, viz., not because it is in us, but it is freely given to and Bullinger among the reformers;* and, more clearly and expressly, Stapfer and President Edwards,† who are often inaccurately quoted as mediate imputationists; also the orthodox Lutherans of the seventeenth century.‡ It is certain that we have all to bear the consequences of Adam's sin, and this sin is therefore the cause of our native corruption; but it is not our personal guilt independently of this corruption, and our assent to it.

(b.) Mediate or consequent imputation makes inherent depravity derived from Adam, and this alone, the ground of condemnation. "Vitiositas præcedit imputationem." So the Reformed school of Saumur, in France, especially Joshua Placeus (La Place), who denied that the imputation of Adam's sin was prior to, and independent of, inherent depravity, but who claimed to be in full harmony with the teaching of Calvin on this subject. This view, "so far as it restricts the nature of original sin to the mere hereditary corruption of Adam's posterity, excluding the imputation of the first sin by which he fell," was condemned by the French Reformed Synod at Charonton, near Paris, in 1645, yet without mentioning the name of Placeus, who contended that he was not touched by this decree, since he admitted a mediate imputation of Adam's sin, consequent and dependent on corruption.

(c.) Immediate or antecedent imputation as opposed to mediate imputation, makes, on purely legal grounds, the sin of Adam, as the sin of the federal us by gratuitous imputation (gratuitam justitiam imputationem). Ebrard (Dogmatik, I., p. 512 f.) and Hodge (on Romans, p. 334) represent Calvin as a mediate imputationist; the former assenting, the latter dissenting. Calvin and the Reformed Confessions draw no line of demarcation between original sin imputed and original sin inherent. Calvin always guards against the supposition that we are condemned by an arbitrary imputation of a foreign act personal to Adam.]

* [Ebrard says, I. c. I. p. 513: "Bullinger knows of such a reatus only which takes place in consequence of the corruption or vitiositas, but not of a reatus which is the cause of the innate vitiositas. This would be likewise mediate imputation only. But compare the passages of Bullinger quoted by Rivet, I. c.]

† [The aim of Edwards, in his treatise on Original Sin, written against the Arminian, Dr. John Taylor, of Norwich, was to show that it is no absurd or impossible thing for "the race of mankind truly to partake of the sin of the first apostasy, so that this, in reality and propriety, shall become their sin; and therefore the sin of the apostasy is not theirs merely because God imputes it to them, but it is truly and properly theirs (by virtue of a real union between the root and the branches of mankind, established by the Author of the universe), and on that ground God imputes it to them" (Works, II. p. 559). He says, moreover, that the arguments which prove the depravity of nature, establish also the imputation of Adam's first sin, and that both are included in the usual conception of original sin. "The first depravity of heart, and the imputation of that sin [of Adam], are both the consequences of that established union [between Adam and his posterity]; but yet in such order, that the evil disposition is first, and the charge of guilt consequent, as it was in the case of Adam himself" (p. 544). Then, in a foot-note, he quotes with approbation a long extract from Stapfer's Theologia Polemica, to the effect that the mediate and the immediate imputation are inseparable, and that one should never be considered without the other. Dr. Shedd, History of Christian Doctrine, II. p. 163, seems to hold the same view. Edwards speaks, however, of imputation only incidentally; his main object was to defend the doctrine of native depravity by the theory of identity; i. e., a divinely constituted oneness of Adam and his race, by which his posterity should be born in his moral image, whether good or bad, according to the law that like begets like.]

head of the race, the only and exclusive ground of condemnation independently of, and prior to, native depravity and personal transgression; so that hereditary guilt precedes hereditary sin, and not vice-versa. This exclusive immediate imputationism is held by Calvinists of the supralapsarian and federal school, and gives up the Augustinian ground of participation. See below, No. (5.) (6). In antagonism to this view, the New School theology of New England has departed to the opposite extreme of rejecting imputation under any form. (See No. 6.)

(5.) The federal theory of a vicarious representation of mankind by Adam, in virtue of a covenant made with him. It arose in Holland in the seventeenth century, simultaneously with the development of representative federal government, and gained advocates among Calvinistic or Presbyterian divines in France, England, Scotland, and the United States. It supposes a (one-sided, μονόπλευρος) contract or covenant of the sovereign Creator with the first man, called the covenant of works (fœdus operum, fœdus naturæ), as distinct from the covenant of grace (fœdus gratiæ), to the effect that Adam should stand a moral probation on behalf of all his descendants, so that his act of obedience or disobedience, with all its consequences, should be judicially imputed to them, or accounted theirs in law. Adam's position is compared to the relation of a representative to his constituents, or rather of a guardian to his wards, since in this case the wards were not consulted, and did not even exist at the time of his appointment. The transaction must be resolved at last into the sovereign pleasure of God.*

Here again we must distinguish two schools:

(a.) The Augustino-federal school is a combination, and superadds the federal scheme on the realistic basis of participation, so that imputation is made to rest on moral as well as legal grounds. This was the view of the founders and chief advocates of the federal theory, Cocceius (originally John Koch, or Cook, born at Bremen, 1603, died as professor at Leyden, 1669), Burmann, Witsius, and is taught by the Westminster standards,† and even in the Consensus Helveticus, although in this the Augustinian idea of participation is almost absorbed by the idea of the covenant.‡

(b.) The purely federal school (from nominalistic premises, according to which the general conceptions are mere names, not things, subjective abstractions, not objective realities) denies the Adamic unity of the race in the realistic sense, consequently also all participation of Adam's descendants in the

* [See the different definitions of this fœdus operum from the writings of Cocceius, Witsius, Heidegger, &c., in Heppes Dogmatik, pp. 204 ff. It is called fœdus morale, quia unius tantum partis dispositione et promissione constat, as distinct from a fœdus mutuum or si-cilicet. There is no Scripture proof whatever for such a primal covenant. The solitary passage quoted, Hosea vi. 7: "For they" (Ephraim and Judah) "like men" (not, "like Adam") "have transgressed the covenant," refers to the Mosaic covenant. Even Turretin (Inst. theol. elenchice, Pars I. p. 519, of the Edinb. and N. Y. ed., 1847) admits that it is inconclusive, and may be explained of the inconsistency of men, "ut dicantur transgressi fœdus sicut homines facere solent, qui sua natura vani, levissique sunt et Adam esse fallunt."]

† [On the Westminster divines, see Balrd, Elphin & Neal's, pp. 39 ff., and especially the learned articles of Dr. Lauder in the Danville Review for 1861-62.]

‡ [Art. X.: "Sicut Deus fœdus operum cum Adam inivit non tantum pro ipso, sed etiam in ipso, ut CAPITE I. STIPUL, cum toto genere humano, . . . ita Adamus tristi proleptu, non sibi duntaxat sed toti etiam humano generi, . . . bona in fœdere promissa perdidit." act of the primal apostasy; yet it holds that, by virtue of his federal headship on the ground of a sovereign arrangement, his sin and guilt are justly, directly, and immediately imputed to them. The imputation of Adam's sin, and in the same way also the imputation of Christ's righteousness or justification, is thus made a purely forensic process, which affects our legal relation, but by no means our moral character.

This forensic theory of imputation, which excludes participation in Adam's sin, dates from the time of Turretin, in the latter part of the seventeenth century,* and is upheld by a number of Calvinistic divines in England and America, but has no advocate of note, as far as I know, among modern Continental divines.†

Legal representation seemed to offer an easier vindication of Divine justice than the Augustinian

* [Turretin, like Heidegger, holds indeed to a double unity of the race with Adam, a natural or real, and a federal or forensic, but he evidently lays the chief stress upon the latter, and prepares the way for giving up the former. He says (in his Institutes, first published in 1688, Pars I. p. 557, Qu. XI.): "Adamus duplici vinculo nobiscum junctus est: (1.) NATURALI, quatenus pater est, et nos ejus filii; (2.) POLITICO ac FORENTE, quatenus fuit princeps et caput representationis totius generis humani. Fundamentum ergo imputationis non est tantum communio naturalis, quo nobis cum Adamo intercedit—alias omnia ipsius peccata deberent nobis imputari—sed PRECIPUE MORALIS ET FEDERALIS, per quam factum est, ut Deus cum illo, ut cum nostro capite, factus pateretur. Unde Adamus se habuit in illo peccato, non ut PERSONA PRIVATA, sed ut PUBLICA ET REPRESENTATIVA quæ omnes suos posteror in actione sua representant, cujus proinde demeritum ad omnes pertinet." In Qu. XII. he quotes with approbation from Augustine, "in illo uno multi unus homo erant," adding, by way of explanation, "unitate non specificæ vel numerica, sed partim UNITATE ORIGINIS, quia omnes ex uno sunt sanguine, partim UNITATE REPRESENTATIONIS, quia unus omnium personarum representabat, ex ordine Dei." In Qu. XVI. p. 558 f., he establishes his view from Rom. v. 12-14. He says of serpes quapropter correctly, that it cannot mean the habit of sin, nor inherent corruption, but actual sin committed in the past (peccatum aliquod actuale, idque præteritum), which can be no other than the sin of Adam itself (quod non potest aliud esse, quam ipsum Adam peccatum); but then he turns it into the meaning of representative sinning: "Ergo eo peccante censeretur et ipsi peccasse." He proves this from the analogy of Christ: "In Christo just constituitur per justitiam imputationem: ergo et peccatores in Adam per peccatum ipsius imputationem." This is precisely the exegesis of Dr. Hodge, except that Turretin translates et with Augustine, in quo (viz., Adamo), while Hodge, more correctly, takes it as a conjunction.]

† [Drs. Ridgely, Doddridge, Watts, and Cunningham, of Scotland (in his Historical Theology, Edinb., 1863, vol. I., p. 515, and in his Reformers and the Theology of the Reformation, Edinb., 1862, pp. 371 ff.), are counted on this side. Dr. Hodge, of Princeton, is the ablest advocate of immediate forensic imputationism. He states it (on Romans, p. 279) as follows: "The doctrine of imputation is clearly taught in this passage (Rom. v.). This doctrine does not include the idea of a mysterious identity of Adam and his race, nor that of a transfer of the moral turpitude of his sin to his descendants. It does not teach that his offence was personally or properly the sin of all men, or that his act was, in any mysterious sense, the act of his posterity. Neither does it imply, in reference to the righteousness of Christ, that His righteousness becomes personally and inherently ours, or that His moral excellence is in any way transferred from Him to believers. The sin of Adam, therefore, is no ground to us of remorse; and the righteousness of Christ is no ground of self-complacency in those to whom it is imputed. This doctrine merely teaches that, in virtue of the union, representative and natural, between Adam and his posterity, his sin is the ground of their condemnation—that is, of their subjection to penal evils—and that, in virtue of the union between Christ and His people, His righteousness is the ground of their justification. This doctrine is taught almost in so many words in vers. 12, 15-19. It is so clearly stated, so often repeated or assumed, and so formally proved, that very few commentators of any class fail to acknowledge, in one form or another, that it is the doctrine of the Apostle." The last is a mistake, as we have shown in the Exeg. Notes. Dr. Hodge's hostility to the realistic Augustinian view pro-view.* It involves, undoubtedly, an element of truth, but, if detached from the idea of moral participation, it resolves itself into a mere legal fiction, and greatly enhances the difficulty of the problem by removing the best reason for imputation. For how can an infinitely just and holy God punish countless millions of human beings simply and solely for the sin of another, in which they had no part whatever? The passage, Ezek. xviii. 1-4, where God rebukes the Israelites for using the proverb of the sour grapes, which Julian of Eclanum and his sympathizers have quoted ad nauseam against the Augustinian theory, returns here with double force. The analogy of forensic justification is not to the point, for the righteousness of Christ is not imputed to the impenitent sinner, but only on the subjective condition of faith, by which Christ is apprehended and made our own. Justification presupposes regeneration, or an action of the Holy Spirit, by which He creates repentance of our sins and trust in Jesus Christ, and makes us one with Him. By "being in Christ" is meant, not merely a nominal, putative, or constructive relation, but a real, substantial union; so also our "being in Adam," by which the other relation is illustrated, is real and vital. This analogy, therefore, leads to the opposite conclusion, that moral participation, either potential or personal, or both, must be the ground of the imputation of Adam's sin.

(6.) The New School Calvinists of New England (since the days of the younger Edwards), in radical opposition to Princeton, reject imputation altogether; but maintain that the sinfulness of the descendants of Adam results with infallible certainty (though not with necessity) from his transgression; the one class holding to hereditary depravity, prior to sinful choice, the other class teaching (with Dr. N. W. Taylor, of New Haven) that the first moral choice of all is universally sinful, yet with the power of contrary choice. This is a peculiar modification of the Pelagian conception of liberum arbitrium, but differs from it in making a nice distinction between natural ability and moral inability.†

(7.) The SEMI-PELAGIAN, and the cognate ARMINIAN theories (of which the former, since the fifth century, has gained large influence in the Latin, the latter, since the seventeenth century, in a considerable portion of the Reformed Churches, and was adopted by the Wesleyan Methodists), though by no means explicit and uniform on this point, agree in that they admit the Adamic unity, and the disastrous effects of the primal apostasy upon the whole posterity of Adam, but regard the native or hereditary corruption not properly as sin and guilt exposing us to just punishment, but only as an evil, an infirmity, malady, and misfortune, for which the most benevolent God provided a sufficient remedy for all. Zwingle taught a similar view, and distinguished original sin as a moral defect or disease (he called it, in the Swiss dialect, Brester) from sin proper. Semi-Pelagianism holds a medium position between Pelagianceeds, I think, from a misunderstanding. He does not distinguish between a virtual or potential, and a personal or individual coexistence and coagency of the race in Adam. Augustine taught the former only; the latter is impossible and absurd, unless we hold it in the form of preëxistence, which Augustine expressly rejects.]

* [Watts, as quoted by Prof. Fisher, l. c. p. 506, naively confesses that he would gladly renounce this theory if he could find any other way to vindicate Providence.]

ism and Augustinianism; Arminianism wavers between semi-Pelagianism and Calvinism; both may, according to the elastic nature of compromises, lean now more to the one, now to the other extreme; putting at times the Augustinian phraseology, but putting, after all, a different interpretation upon it.

The stationary anthropology and hamatology of the Greek Church occupies a similar position, but it never passed through the mill of Western controversies, and remains to this day theologically incomplete.

Most evangelical divines of the present day are divided between the Augustinian or realistic, the federal or forensic, and the Arminian theories, or they look for a still more satisfactory solution of the difficult problem by a future Augustine, who may be able to advance, from a deeper study of the Scriptures, the knowledge of the Church, and reconcile what now seem to be irreconcilable contradictions. It should be remembered that the main difficulty lies in the fact itself—the undeniable, stubborn, terrible fact—of the universal dominion of sin and death over the entire race, infants as well as full-grown sinners. No system of philosophy has ever given a more satisfactory explanation than the great divines of the Church. Outside of the Christian redemption, the fall, with its moral desolation and ruin, remains an impenetrable mystery. But immediately after the fall appears, in the promise of the serpent-bruise, the second Adam, and throws a bright ray of hope into the gloom of despair. In the fulness of the time, according to God's own counsel, He appeared in our nature, to repair the loss, and to replace the temporary reign of sin by the everlasting reign of superabounding grace, which never could have been revealed in all its power without the fall.* The person and work of the second Adam are the one glorious solution of the problem of the first, and the triumphant vindication of Divine justice and mercy. This is the main point for all practical purposes, and in this, at least, all true Christians are agreed.—P. 8.]

3. [In Lange, No. 2.] Criticism of the Augustinian doctrine of Sin and Grace. Augustine, in his controversy with Pelagius, has undoubtedly expressed and defended the Church's sense of religious truth, and thereby become a rich source of blessing to Western Christendom. It cannot be denied, however, that the theologico-dogmatical expression of his sense of truth—especially his doctrine of original sin—far transcends the Scriptural bounds, and has done harm by its erroneous features. Augustine has not only supported, but also obstructed the Reformation. His explanation of ἐν ᾧ in ver. 12, which has obscured the exegesis of this passage even in Meyer (not to speak of Tholuck and Philippi), is of itself a sufficient testimony of this. See the Exeg. Notes. It sets aside the formal freedom which remains even within the material bondage and slavery, and which, under the power of sin, becomes a λαβάρων of death by means of unbelief but, under the exercise of the gratia praeveniens, becomes a λαβάρων of the marks of salvation by means of faith. It thus destroys or weakens the ethical signification of the λαβάρων itself [comp. vers. 11 and 17, and Notes] in the interest of the Augustinian dogmatics. The biblical doctrine of original sin is distinguished from the Augustinian mainly in the following respects:

(a.) The Bible teaches an ethico-physical fall of the human race from Adam, as a fall in principle; Augustine, a physico-ethical fall of the human race in Adam, as a completed fact.* Therefore Augustine ignores the distinction between the inheritance of the propensity and curse of sin, or of death—which inheritance oppresses all who are Adamically begotten—and the ethical appropriation of the corruption.

(b.) With Augustine, the ideal and potential condition of condemnation—that is, the condemnableness of men, apart from redemption—coincides with a judicially completed condition of condemnation; therefore, with him, redemption is properly a new creation.

(c.) With Augustine, the exercise of grace, of the Logos, and of the Spirit of God, is theocratically and ecclesiastically bound and limited; his Christ is, in substance, not greater than the extent (rayon) of the Church; therefore he does not perceive the gradations of the hereditary blessing and of the hereditary curse within the general corruption of mankind, and still less the significance of the antithesis in chap. ii. 14, 15, within the whole world. His acceptance of mere gradations of evil downwardly, is in contradiction with his own system.

(d.) A consequence of this extreme view of original sin is his extreme view of the government of grace. He had in mind, probably, the great religious truth of the ethical irresistibility of all-conquering love; but in his theological system he gave it a fatalistic character in opposition to formal freedom.

(e.) Because, with him, the ideal and potential condemnation of all is aggravated into an actual condition of condemnation, he has also—in consequence of the fact that only a part of humanity within the ecclesiastical pale of this world believe and are saved—limited the extent of the effects of the ideal and potential δικαίωμα, or righteous act of Christ; while Paul teaches that the δικαίωμα has come εἰς δικαιοσύνην ζωῆς upon all men.

[There is considerable force in these objections to the Augustinian system which apply a fortiori to Calvinism. But they cannot diminish the great merits of the African father, who searched the problem of sin more profoundly than any divine before or after him. He was right in teaching the (virtual or potential) fall of the whole race in Adam, and the sinfulness of our nature, or depraved will, as the source of all sinful volitions, words, and acts. But he did not take into sufficient account that there is a Divine πάρεσις and ἀνοχή, which hold the arm of God's ὀργή, and suspend the full and final execution of the well-deserved judgment, until men make the full of Adam their personal, individual act and reject the offer of redemption (comp. the remarks on Rom. iii. 24, 25, p. 134). Hence August

* [This idea has found familiar expression in devotional lines such as those of Watts:

"In Christ the tribes of Adam boast More blessings than their father lost."

Bishop Ken (Christian Year, Sunday next before Easter):

"What Adam did amiss,
Turned to our endless bliss;
O happy sin, which to atone,
Drew Filial God to leave his Throne!"

A. L. Hillhouse:

"Earth has a joy unknown in heaven—
The new-born peace of sin forgiven!
Tears of such pure and deep delight,
Ye angels! never dimmed your sight.")

* [Comp., however, my remarks on pp. 178 and 192.]

tine consigns even all unbaptized children to condemnation, although in the mildest form (De pecc. orig., c. 86: "Infans perditione punitur, quia pertinet ad massam perditionis." Enchir., c. 93: "Mitissima sane omnium poena erit eorum, qui propter peccatum quod originale traxeunt, nullum inuaper adiderunt.") In this respect even the strictest Calvinistic divines of our age decidedly dissent from him, and are disposed to hold that all children who die in infancy, whether baptized or not, will be saved by the infinite mercy of God. This charitable belief and hope has a strong support in the universal sufficiency of the atonement, and especially in the words of our Saviour concerning little children, spoken without qualification or limitation (Matt. xix. 14; Mark x. 14). There can be no salvation without Christ, even for children; but God is not bound to the use of His own appointed means, by which the benefits of Christ are ordinarily applied to men.—P. S.]

4. On the question why Eve is not the one human being by whom sin came into the world (Pelagius and Ambrosiaster have really held that Eve is meant),* compare, in addition to the Ezeg. Notes, Tholuck, p. 216.

5. The Apostle does not speak here of the first origin of sin, or of the fall of Satan, as Christ does, John viii. 44. Although the doctrine of the devil is by no means wanting in his writings, it does not stand out very prominently. He here speaks merely of the entrance of sin into our human world from an unknown world beyond this, where it is assumed that it already existed in personified form. Now, this human world is neither the whole universe, nor merely human nature, but the human race in connection with the earth and the cosmic nature as far as it is organically connected with man (see 2 Peter iii. 10, and other passages). The personification of sin and of death exhibits both as (pseudo-formative) principles which have pervaded the organism of the human world, but under the ethical conditions under which they can alone become thoroughly dominant. The individual man, in his organic nature, is connected with humanity, but as an individual intellectual being he has an existence in himself. Pelagius denied the former, while Augustine has largely ignored the latter. The organic connection implies the propagation of the sinful propensity and guilt, according to John iii. 6, as well as according to chaps. vi.—viii. of this Epistle. In the broader sense, Christ also stood in the organic connection of humanity as the Son of Man, but only in the historical sense. Therefore He bore the burden of humanity for its reconciliation.

6. Paul calls the sin of Adam παράβασις, as the transgression of the Divine commandment standing clearly before him; παράπτωμα, as the sin which resulted in a fall; ἀμαρτία, as a starting-point of many sins; παρακοή, as disobedience to the known will of God. These designations and statements set aside such theories on the origin of sin as that of J. Müller (that there was a previous or timeless fall of the human souls), and that of R. Roth (that sin was the original, abnormal condition of humanity proceeding from their material constitution).

7. The relation of sin to death. Sin is death, says John (1 John iii. 14, 15); sin brings forth death, says James (chap. i. 15); sin has, as its wages or punishment, death as a consequence, says Paul (Rom. vi. 23). This is all the same relation, but from different points of view. The physical dying of the creature in itself is not thereby meant, but the perishableness of the creature is increased by ethical or spiritual death (Rom. viii.); and the original transformation destined for man (2 Cor. v. 1 ff.) has, by sin, become fearful death, in connection with corruption and the gloom of Sheol. Therefore Death itself is conquered by the death of Christ, because its sting is taken from it (1 Cor. xv. 51, 56). The ethical character of death and the salvation of the redeemed from death are brought to light not only in the resurrection, but also in the revelation of the original transformation at the end of the world (1 Cor. xv. 51); while the ungodly, in spite of the general resurrection, are subject to the second death (Rev. ii. 11; xx. 6, &c.).

8. In the period between Adam and Moses, death appeared to be merely the order of nature, because the paradisaical law had disappeared from knowledge by the fall, and the Mosaic law had not yet appeared. Nevertheless, sin was also at that time the causality of death, but not as transgression in the light of legal knowledge. The concealed sin against the law dwelling in all men (chap. ii. 14, 15) was, indeed, attested by the manifest, tyrannical, and terrible dominion of death. Sin, says Paul, is not imputed where there is no law—that is, not fully settled until the law. But since it is with the gospel that the full significance of the law becomes clear, it follows that condemnation can only come with final hardening of the heart against the gospel.

9. Adam and Christ appear here as principles of the old and new humanity, of the first and second æon, so far as their posterity is determined by their life. Yet it is not Adam in himself who is the principle of sin and death, but Adam in his deed—his disobedience. From the nature of sin, the disobedience (παρακοή) cannot coincide in him with personality. In Christ, on the contrary, personality and the obedience (ὑπακοή) are one. In reference to personal issue, Adam is the natural ancestor of the whole human race. Christ is the spiritual founder of the whole human race. Both constitute together a harmonious antithesis in historical consequence (1 Cor. xv. 45). But they represent the principal antithesis in so far as sin and death proceeded from one (through him), and righteousness and life from the other. The Apostle sets forth these antitheses in a series of parallels, in which, first, their homogeneity comes into consideration (the through one, the organic development), and second, the dissimilarity (the much more on Christ's part); then the removal of sin by grace, and the triumph of the new principle (so far as by means of the law it makes sin itself serviceable to its glory). On the construction of these antitheses, compare the general groundwork of the Ezeg. Notes.

10. While doctrinal theology has ascribed to the law a threefold use or purpose (bar or bridle, mirror, rule—Zügel, Spiegel, Regel), the Apostle seems here to add a usus quartus, or rather primus, in so far as he says that the law must have brought sin to full manifestation and development. This thought is not altogether included in the use of the mirror (see the Ezeg. Notes), but it is most intimately connected with it. As the knowledge of sin must come by the law, so also the revelation, the bringing of sin to light, must come by the law. The law has not produced real inward sin, but, like a chemical element, it has introduced a fermenting process into humanity, in which human nature and sinfulness seem to be identical; and by this means the external manifestation of sin is finished, in order to render possible its distinction and separation from human nature itself. The holiness of this effect is properly understood when we distinguish properly between the inward sin and its outward realization, its phase, in which the judgment has already commenced. Hence it is clear that the use of the law is the effecting of the knowledge of sin. The manifestation of sin for bringing to pass the knowledge of sin, comes by the law. The law, as letter, has completed the development of sin; the law, as the word of the Spirit, has brought the perfect knowledge of sin.

11. Although Paul, in this section, has mostly contrasted the many on the one side with the many on the other—because this expression makes more apparent the grandeur of the fundamental developments from the one—he yet declares definitely, in ver. 18, that the δικαίωμα of the one Christ is available for all men, with the tendency to become for them the δικαίωσις ζωῆς.

12. The Apostle makes prominent in many ways the great preponderance of the antitheses of grace over the theses of sin. The author of sin becomes to him a nameless being, who is opposed by God in His grace, and by the man Jesus Christ as the personal gift of grace. Sin itself falls immediately into the χρῖμα, and meets the κατάχρῖμα. But the work of grace breaks through many offences, as if invited and augmented by them, like a mountain stream from the rocky cliff; and the dominion of death on one side is only a measure of the much more powerful revelation of grace on the other. But the so-called ἀνοκατάστασις, as a necessary, natural result of salvation, is no more declared in the πάντες of ver. 15, than the expression οἱ πολλοί is designed to abridge the universality of grace. The ethical part of the organized process, the λαμβάνειν on one or the other side, is opposed to such a conclusion. Nevertheless, it is the Apostle's aim to glorify the unfathomableness, immeasurableness, and illimitableness of the stream of grace, and its absolute and universal triumph in the history of the world.

["Sin reigns in death, grace reigns unto life." On this, Dr. Hodge remarks (p. 279): "That the benefits of redemption shall far outweigh the evils of the fall, is here clearly asserted. This we can in a measure comprehend, because, (1.) The number of the saved shall doubtless greatly exceed the number of the lost. Since the half of mankind die in infancy, and, according to the Protestant doctrine, are heirs of salvation; and since, in the future state of the Church, the knowledge of the Lord is to cover the earth, we have reason to believe that the lost shall bear to the saved no greater proportion than the inmates of a prison do to the mass of the community. (2.) Because the eternal Son of God, by His incarnation and mediation, exalts His people to a far higher state of being than our race, if un-fallen, could ever have attained. (3.) Because the benefits of redemption are not to be confined to the human race. Christ is to be admired in His saints. It is through the Church that the manifold wisdom of God is to be revealed, throughout all ages, to principalities and powers. The redemption of man is to be the great source of knowledge and blessedness to the intelligent universe."—I add a fine passage from Dr. Richard Clerke (Sermon on Titus ii 11, quoted by Ford): "Grace will not be confined. For God's goodness cannot be exhausted. He is dives in omnes, saith the Apostle, rich enough for all (x. 12). It is an excellent attribute, which is given him by St. James, πολυεισπλῆγνος [in some MSS., but the usual reading in James v. 11 is πολύσπλῆγνος.—P. 8.] In God's mercy, there is both εὖ and πολύ: it is both free and rich; both gratiosa et copiosa (Pa. cxxx.), both bountiful and plentiful: not only περισσύνουσα, bursting forth round about, round about all ages, round about all nations, round about all sorts, but ὑπερπερισσύνουσα (ver. 20), surrounding all those rounds, and with surplus and advantage overflowing all. I say, not only περιβάτουσα, an abounding grace, abounding unto all, to the whole world, but ὑπερπεριβάτουσα (1 Tim. i. 14), a grace superabounding; that, if there were more worlds, grace would 'bring salvation' even unto them all. St. Paul's own parallel shall end this point (1 Tim. ii. 4). It is God's will that 'all men should be saved.'—P. 8.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

What follows from the comparison of Adam with Christ? 1. That by the one Adam, sin, death, condemnation, and the dominion of death have come; 2. But by the one Christ, life, righteousness, and the dominion of grace have come upon all men (vers. 12-21).—Sin and death passed upon all (vers. 12-14).—Sin as the cause of death: 1. Original sin; 2. Sins of commission (ver. 12).—They too have sinned who have not committed the same transgression as Adam; comp. chap. ii. 12 (ver. 14).—All sin is transgression of the law, but not in the same way (ver. 14).—Adam is a figure of Him that was to come (ver. 14).—Man a figure of the Son of Man (ver. 14).—The first and second Adam: 1. Resemblance; 2. Difference (vers. 14-19).—The difference between sin and gift. It consists herein: 1. That, through the sin of one, many have died, but that, on the other hand, God's grace and gift have freely abounded unto many; 2. By one man's sin many have become condemned, but one gift has abounded from many offences to righteousness; 3. By the sin of the one, death has reigned over many, but by the one Jesus Christ will many still more rejoice in the dominion of life (vers. 15-17).—The sole man Jesus Christ; not only (1.) one, but also (2.) the only one of His character (ver. 15).—Yet how different are the fruits of sin and righteousness! 1. The fruit of the former is condemnation; 2. The fruit of the latter is justification of life (ver. 18).—As condemnation is come unto all men, so also is justification of life (ver. 18).—The universality of Divine grace brought to pass by the righteousness of Christ (ver. 18).—The different effects of Adam's disobedience and Christ's obedience (ver. 19).—For what purpose did the law enter? 1. Not merely to make sin prominent; but, 2. To bring it to a crisis; and so, 3. To prepare for grace by Jesus Christ our Lord (vers. 20, 21).

LUTHER: As Adam has corrupted us with foreign sin without our fault, so has Christ saved us with foreign grace without our merit (ver. 14).—Notice that he speaks here of original sin, which has come from Adam's disobedience; therefore every thing is sinful which pertains to us (ver. 18).—As Adam's sin has become our own, so has Christ's righteousness become our own (ver. 19).

BENGL: God's gift is grace, flowing from the Father upon Him, and through Him to us.

STARKE: Believers are, by the spiritual life of the new birth, reigning kings over sin on earth, as they shall also be fellow-kings in the heaven of glory (ver. 17).—O universal grace of God, by which all may be saved by Christ! 1 Tim. ii. 4; Acts xvii. 30, 31 (ver. 18).—A small drop of grace can calm and engulf the raging waves of corruption (ver. 20).—CRAMER: As no one can deny that he is mortal, so also must no one say that he is not sinful (ver. 14).—Nova Bibl. Tibl.: Sin has a mighty kingdom and dominion. Let nobody regard it as small and contemptible! Yet the kingdom of grace is much more mighty. The purpose of the latter is to destroy the former; where the kingdom of grace increases, the kingdom of sin declines. The former brings life, the latter death.

GERLACH: There is this great difference between the effects of the fall and of redemption: the effects of the former consist in a strongly legal judgment, which must ensure condemnation in consequence of a single transgression; but the effects of the latter are a free gift, which made amends not merely for one sin, but for all the repetitions of Adam's transgression that have arisen from that first one; and it has made amends so completely, that it has really effected in fallen men the righteousness required by the law (ver. 16).—So powerfully does grace operate on those who have received its fulness, that they, by grace, become rulers in life through Jesus Christ (ver. 17).

LISCO: Mankind is united in Adam and Christ; therefore the sin of Adam became the sin of all, and Christ's offering became the propitiation for all. As every leaf of the tree suffers by disease of the root, so does every one recover by its restoration; thus it is with mankind in Adam and Christ (vers. 12-21).—Death is the great evil that was begotten by sin (ver. 12).—As Adam's sin has become ours, so has Christ's righteousness become ours (ver. 19).

RIGGS: This little passage is as the pillar of fire in the wilderness; dark and threatening toward the Egyptians and impenitent, but bright and clear toward the Israelites. This passage lightens and thunders against hard sinners, who treat every thing lightly; but it shines with the lovely splendor of grace upon penitent and anxious souls (ver. 20).

HEUBNER: The dominion of sin in the world is not God's work, but man's guilt.—The universality of corruption should not comfort, but humiliate us: 1. We should each be ashamed before all the rest; 2. We should be ashamed before the inhabitants of other worlds, who perhaps do not know any thing about sin; 3. We should so much the more bear in mind, that, amid the universal sinfulness, we shall not be the only pure ones; 4. We must therefore work out our salvation the more earnestly by prayer, and faith in Christ (ver. 12).—Adam is the natural, Christ is the spiritual ancestor; the former is the transgressor of the Divine commandment, the latter the fulfiller of the whole Divine law; the former is the cause of death and human corruption, the latter the author of life, redemption, and holiness (ver. 14).—The real ground why the operation of Divine grace is as universal as the sinful corruption from Adam, is this: that grace knows no other limits than those which man himself sets by unbelief (ver. 17).—The more man is pervaded by the knowledge of his sin, the richer will be his reception of grace (Luke vii. 47).

BESSER: By one upon all (vers. 12-21).—The saving counsel of God has always been one and the same to all men, not only to the children of Abraham, but to all the sons of Adam (ver. 12).—Death, having once stepped its foot into the world, has forced its way to all men (ver. 12).—Sin has become a natural power over persons, which cannot be dislodged by the blows of any club; but grace—which does not enter with compulsory power, but with the evangelical drawing of the word of God—is so powerful that it breaks the power of nature (ver. 12).—Death reigned. Well for us that this is said as of a ruler who is dead (ver. 17).—The new decree, "You shall live," which is warranted by the empty grave of Jesus Christ, is higher and stronger than the old decree, "You must die," which is confirmed by millions of graves (ver. 17).—The Apostle once more recapitulates the abundance of doctrine which he has demonstrated all along from ver. 12: Sin, death, grace, righteousness, life. These five stand thus: grace rises highest in the middle; the two conquering giants, Sin and Death, at the left; the double prize of victory, Righteousness and Life, at the right; and over the buried name of Adam the glory of the name of Jesus blooms (ver. 21).

SCHLEIERMACHER, on ver. 19: The effects of the death of the Redeemer, so far as it was a work of His obedience.—DRICHT: Has the Christ who died for us become the Christ within us?—How much more blessed to live under grace than under the law!

LANG: Adam and Christ in the internal and historical life of mankind.—As all men are comprehended in the fall of Adam, so, and still more, are they in the righteousness of Christ.—As sin and death have assumed the appearance of personal, princely powers, in order to extinguish the personal life of mankind, so does the personal God again elevate men, by the glorious personality of Christ, to a personal life in royal freedom.—The antithesis between Adam and Christ: 1. In personal effects (ver. 15); 2. In essential effects (ver. 16); 3. In the destruction of the apparently personal life of sin, and the restoration and glorification of the true personal life of grace, or the false and the true basileus (ver. 17); 4. In the final aims of both (ver. 18); 5. In the full manifestation of both in the light of the gospel (ver. 19).—The glory of God's grace in the exercise of its authority. How it has not only, 1. Conquered sin and death; but, 2. Even made them of service.—The Divine art of distinguishing the effect of the law.—The twofold character of the law: 1. Apparently a promotion of sin; but, 2. Really a communication of grace.—Adam, Moses, and Christ.—How far does Moses appear to stand on Adam's side; but how far does he rather stand on Christ's side?—The twofold effect of the law and of legality in the history of the world.—The twofold curse of the law: 1. The curse of the law, well understood, leads to salvation; 2. The curse of the law, misunderstood, leads to ruin.

[BURKITT (condensed): Every sin we commit in defiance of the threatenings of God is a justifying of Adam's rebellion against God. Our destruction is in ourselves, by our actual rebellion; and at the great day we shall charge our sin and misery upon ourselves—not on God, not on Satan, not on instruments, and not on our first parents.—HENRY: We are by Christ and His righteousness entitled to, and instated in, more and greater privileges than we lost by the offence of Adam. The plaster is wider than the wound, and more healing than the wound is killing.—SCOTT: Instead of perplexing ourselves about the incomprehensible but most righteous dispensation of God, in permitting the entrance of sin and death, let us learn to adore His grace for providing so adequate a remedy for that awful catastrophe.—As our children have received a sinful and suffering nature from the first Adam, let us be stirred up by their pains and sorrows to seek for them the blessings of the second Adam's righteousness and salvation.—WESLEY (Sermon on God's Love to Fallen Man, Rom. v. 15): The more we deal our bread to the hungry and cover the naked with garments, and the more kind offices we do to those that groan under the various ills of human life, the more comfort we receive even in the present world, and the greater the recompense we have in our own bosom.—DWIGHT: The subject of moral evil is too extensive and mysterious to be comprehended by our understanding. Many things connected with it lie wholly beyond our reach. But where knowledge is unattainable, it is our duty and interest to trust humbly and submissively to the instructions of Him who is the Only Wise.—CLARKE: The grace of the gospel not only redeems from death and restores to life, but brings the soul into such a relationship with God, and into such a participation of eternal glory, as we have no authority to believe would have been the portion of Adam himself, had he even eternally retained his innocence.—HODGE: We should never yield to temptation on the ground that the sin to which we are solicited appears to be a trifle (merely eating a forbidden fruit), or that it is but for once. Remember the one offence of one man. How often has a man, or a family, been ruined forever by one sin!—Compare Isaac de la Peyrere's Men before Adam (London, 1656), in which the author attempts to prove that the first men were created before Adam, and builds up a curious theological system on that supposition.—Compare also W. BUCKLAND's Inquiry whether the Sentence of Death pronounced at the Fall of Man included the Whole Animal Creation, or was restricted to the Human Race. London, 1839.—J. F. H.]

PRELIMINARY REMARKS ON THE CONSTRUCTION OF CHAPTERS VI.-VIII.

After the Apostle has exhibited the antithesis of Adam and Christ in its principal or fundamental form and significance, chap. v. 12-21, he passes on to exhibit the same antithesis in all its consequences, first of all for believers, but then also for the whole world.

The negative side of this consequence is exhibited in chaps. vi. and vii.: The dying with Christ to sin and to the entire old form of life.

The positive side is exhibited in chap. viii.: The new life in Christ.

I. The first division is again divided into four parts.

A. As Christians have fundamentally (objectively by the death of Christ himself, and subjectively through the faith sealed by baptism) died with Christ to sin in order to walk in newness of life, so should they act as those who are dead to sin. For their new life is an organic connection with Christ, an organic development; yet it is not a life subject to fatalistic natural necessity, but, in conformity with fellowship with Christ, it is a life in true freedom, as life after Adam has been one in false freedom, or the seeming freedom of hard service. It is a religiously or ethically organic relation; chap. vi. 1-11.

B. Because believers are dead to sin, they are free from its dominion. They should therefore take knowledge of the fact that they are delivered, and keep themselves from the bondage of sin; and in the power of their freedom, they should yield themselves under grace to be the servants of righteousness; chap. vi. 12-23.

C. But their being dead to sin means also that they, as those who passed into newness of life, have received in themselves the new principle of life, which is righteousness, or the inward substance of the law. Therefore, by Christ, they are dead to the law in the narrower sense, in which they lived in matrimonial alliance. They should serve, not in outward ordinances, but inward principle—from the force of grace, the impulse of the heart; chap. vii. 1-6.

D. But if to be dead to sin means also to be united to the law, as well as the reverse, there follows nothing therefrom contrary to the holiness of the law. The law, rather, was designed, by its constant operation in awakening and increasing the conflict with sin, to effect the transition from the state of sin to the state of grace; chap. vii. 7-25.

II. The second or positive part is thus prepared. The condition of believers is free from all condemnation, because, in harmony with its character, it is a life in the Spirit of Christ. But it is a life in the Spirit which is prepared by the Spirit through the glorification of the body and the whole nature; for the Spirit, as the Spirit of adoption, is the first security for it, and the believer is certain of it beforehand in blessed hope; chap. viii.

A. This life in the Spirit now demands, first of all, the laying off, in the conduct of the Christian, of all carnal lusts, which must, however, be distinguished from a positively ascetic mortification of the body; chap. viii. 1-10.

B. As the Spirit of God testifies to adoption, so does it, as the Spirit of the risen Christ, secure the inheritance—that is, the renewal of the body, and the glorification of life; vers. 11-17. The certainty of this blessed hope is established: a. On the development of life in this world, vers. 18-30; b. On the future or heavenly administration of the love of God and the grace of Christ, which make all the forces that apparently conflict with salvation even serviceable to its realization; vers. 31-39.

Meyer's inscription over chaps. vi.-viii. is: "Ethical Effects of the δικαιοσύνη θ.ο.υ. Chap. vi. 7 shows that the δικ., far from giving aid to immorality, is the first to exclude it, and to promote, restore, and vitalize virtue; and chap. viii. exhibits the blessed condition of those who, being justified are morally free." Tholuck: "It has been shown down to this point how much the Christian has received by that δικ. πιστ.; chap. i. 17. It is the mention of the fullness of grace called forth by the power of sin, that now leads the Apostle to exhibit the moral consequences of this communication of grace, which in turn leads him further (chap. vii.) to the statement of the insufficiency of the legal economy; and in antithesis thereto (chap. viii.), to the moral effects of the economy of grace and its saving issue; so that the Apostle, after amplifying and enriching the explanations between chap. i. 18 and chap. v., returns to the same point with which chap. v. concluded." The Apostle does indeed, return to the same point with which, not the whole of chap. v. concluded, but with which chap. v. 11. concluded, but in a sense altogether different, inasmuch as from chap. v. 12 on, the Apostle brings out, not merely the actual antagonism of sin and grace in humanity, as before, but the principal antagonism of the two principles in its ethical and organic aspect.

SECOND SECTION.—The contradiction between sin and grace. The calling of Christians to newness of life, since they were translated by baptism into the death of Christ from the sphere of sin and death into the sphere of the new life.

CHAP. VI. 1-11.

1 What shall we say then? Shall [May]¹ we continue in sin, that grace may 2 abound? God forbid [Let it not be!]² How shall we, that are dead [who died]
3 to sin, live any longer therein? Know ye not, that so many of us as [all we 4 who]³ were baptized into Jesus Christ [Christ Jesus]⁴ were baptized into his 5 death? Therefore we are [were] buried with him by [through] baptism into 6 death: that [in order that] like [omü like] as Christ was raised up from the 7 dead by [through] the glory of the Father, even [omü even] so we also should 8 walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in [become 9 united⁵ with]⁶ the likeness of his death, we shall be also in [with] the likeness
10 of his resurrection: Knowing this, that our old man is [was] crucified with 11 him, that [in order that]⁷ the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth 12 we should not serve [be slaves to]⁸ sin. For he that is dead [hath died]⁹ is 13 freed [acquitted] from sin. Now if we be dead [died] with Christ, we believe 14 that we shall also live with him:¹⁰ Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him [dominion over 15 him no more]. For in that [or, the death that]¹¹ he died, he died unto sin once 16 [for all]: but in that [or, the life that] he liveth, he liveth unto God. Like-17 wise [Thus] reckon ye also yourselves to be [omü to be]¹² dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord [ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, in Christ Jesus. omü our Lord].¹³

TEXTUAL.

¹ Ver. 1.—[The reading of the Rec. (ἐπιμένοντες) is poorly supported. A. B. C. D. F. read ἐπιμένοντες; adopted by Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Wordsworth. The above emendation is supported by the last two editors. K. K., and some cursives, have ἐπιμένοντες.

² Ver. 2.—[Μὴ γένοιτο is a very forcible negative. How it should be rendered, is perhaps a matter of taste, but the God forbid expresses its forcibleness as no other English phrase can. Comp. Galatians, ii. 17; p. 49, note.

⁴ Ver. 3.—[B., and a number of cursives and fathers, omit Ἰησοῦν. The order in almost all authorities is Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν.

⁶ Ver. 5.—[In of the E. V. is not found in the Greek. With, in both clauses, is borrowed from σύμφυτοι. Any further emendation must be based on exegetical views of the verse.

⁷ Ver. 6.—[ἵνα, telic, in order that. The next clause is telic also; but as a different form is chosen in Greek, it is better to let the simple that remain. Amer. Bible Union reverses the position of in order that, that, leaving it indefinite whether the first clause is telic.

⁹ Ver. 7.—[This verse has an aorist (ἀποθανόν) in the first part, and a perfect (δεδικαίωται) in the second. Yet the rendering: He that died has been justified from sin (Amer. Bible Union) does not convey its meaning properly. The aorist refers to something antecedent to the perfect, while the perfect states what continues to be true; hence, in English, we must invert, rendering the aorist by has died, the perfect by is acquitted. The Apostle is stating a general proposition, which is not theological, but legal; hence, acquitted is preferable to justified.

¹⁰ Ver. 8.—[The reading συζύγομεν is found in K. B. D. F., and is now generally adopted. Rec.: συζύγομεν found in B. I. C. K., have συζύγομεν; which Lange considers a legal correction to the hortatory. F. has συζύγομεν.

Ver. 10.—[The grammatical question respecting δ is indicated by the two renderings given in each member of this verse. The meaning is essentially the same, whichever be adopted (Meyer).]

Ver. 11.—[Rec., $\delta\kappa$. E. L., insert $\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\alpha\iota$ after $\nu\alpha\pi\alpha\delta\epsilon\ \mu\epsilon\tau$, $\delta\kappa$. B. C., before; it is omitted in A. D. E. F. G., by most modern editors.]

Ver. 11.—[The E. V. is unfortunate in rendering $\delta\iota$, through, since the point of the whole passage is, that we are alive in virtue of our union to Christ—i. e., in Christ Jesus. The Rec. adds $\tau\epsilon\ \kappa\alpha\tau'\ \epsilon\mu\omega\varsigma$, on the authority of C. K. L., some versions and fathers. The words are omitted in A. B. D. F., most versions, by many fathers. Waver, Alford, Wordsworth.—B.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The section chap. vi. 1-11. Survey The death of Christians to sin, and their new life.

a. The effect and demand of grace: death and life, vers. 1, 2.

b. According to baptism, vers. 3, 4.

c. According to the connection with Christ in His death and resurrection, vers. 5, 6.

d. According to the power and import of death, especially as a dying with Christ, vers. 7, 8.

e. According to the power of the new life as an incorruptible life with Christ, vers. 9-11.

Ver. 1. What then shall we say? The $\alpha\iota\omega$ introduces the true conclusion from the previous verses, chap. v. 20, 21, by repelling the false conclusion which might be deduced from what is said there. [$\epsilon\pi\iota\mu\epsilon\tau\omega\mu\epsilon\tau$, the deliberative subjunctive. See note on $\epsilon\gamma\omega\mu\epsilon\tau$, p. 160.—P. S.]

Ver. 2. Let it not be [$\mu\eta\ \gamma\iota\gamma\iota\sigma\tau\omicron$]. See anap. iii. 4, 6 [and Textual Note, p. 112.—P. S.].

How shall we who died to sin [$\alpha\pi\epsilon\theta\alpha\upsilon\omicron\mu\epsilon\tau\ \tau\epsilon\ \hbar\alpha\mu\alpha\tau\iota\alpha$] $\alpha\pi\epsilon\theta\alpha\upsilon\omicron\mu\epsilon\tau$ [$\alpha\pi\epsilon\theta\alpha\upsilon\omicron\mu\epsilon\tau$], as such who. Living in sin is utterly contradictory to the character of Christians. And the contradiction is very intense, not simply because of the aversion and repulsion between natural death and life referred to by Rungius (see Tholuck).^{*} The Christian is specifically dead to sin; and the life in sin, as a definitely false life, is opposed to this definite death. We have here an expression, therefore, not merely of "freedom from all life-fellowship with sin" [so Meyer], but also of the positive contradiction and repulsion between sin and Christian life. The reality of this contradiction is decided, figuratively exhibited, and sacramentally sealed by baptism. Yet the Apostle does not simply borrow his expression of it from baptism; but, rather, the death and resurrection of Christ underlie the figurative meaning of baptism.

[$\alpha\pi\epsilon\theta\alpha\upsilon\omicron\mu\epsilon\tau$, we died (not, are dead, E. V.), is the historic aorist, as $\hbar\mu\alpha\tau\omicron\upsilon$, v. 12, and $\alpha\pi\epsilon\theta\alpha\upsilon\omicron\mu\epsilon\tau\ \sigma\iota\upsilon\ \tau\omega\ \chi\omega\sigma\tau\omega$, Col. ii. 20; comp. Gal. ii. 19, $\rho\omicron\mu\epsilon\iota\ \alpha\pi\epsilon\theta\alpha\upsilon\omicron\mu\epsilon\tau$; Rom. vii. 4. The act of dying refers to the time of baptism, ver. 3 (Bengel, Meyer, Philippi, Alford, Wordsworth), which, in the Apostolic Church, usually coincided with conversion and justification, and implied a giving up of the former life of sin, and the beginning of a new life of holiness. The remission of sin, which is divinely assured and sealed by baptism, is the death of sin. Sin forgiven is hated, sin unforgiven is cherished. This, too, shows the inseparable connection between justification and sanctification; and yet they are kept distinct: the justified is sanctified, not vice versa; first we are freed from the guilt (reatus) of sin, then from the dominion of sin; and we are freed from the one in order to be freed from the other. $\tau\epsilon\ \hbar$

$\hbar\mu\alpha\tau\iota\alpha$, as far as regards sin; it is the date of reference, as Gal. ii. 19; 1 Peter ii. 24; while in Col. ii. 20 Paul uses $\alpha\pi\omega$ with the genitive in the same sense. A similar phrase is $\sigma\tau\alpha\upsilon\omicron\upsilon\sigma\theta\alpha\iota\ \tau\omega\ \kappa\omicron\sigma\mu\omicron$, Gal. vi. 14, to be crucified to the world, so as to destroy all vital connection with it, and to have no more to do with it, except to oppose and hate it. $\pi\omega\varsigma$ expresses the possibility, which is denied by the question (Meyer), with a feeling of indignation (Grotius: indignum est si loti in lutum revolvimur). $\zeta\hbar\sigma\omicron\mu\epsilon\tau$ covers the whole future. To live in sin, to hold any connection with it, is henceforth and forever incompatible with justification.—P. S.]

Ver. 3. Know ye not [Or are ye ignorant, $\heta\ \alpha\gamma\gamma\omega\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon$]. This form of speech, like chap. vii. 1, is undoubtedly a reminder of something already known to the readers (Tholuck), yet it imparts at the same time a more definite consciousness and a fuller view of what is known. "It is very questionable," says Tholuck, "whether other apostles exhibit baptism with the same mystical profoundness as Paul did." But 1 Peter iii. 17-22 is a modification of the same fundamental thought. So, too, 1 John v. 4-6. [Paul evidently regarded baptism not merely as a sign, but also as an effective means of grace (comp. Gal. iii. 27; Col. ii. 12; Titus iii. 5; Eph. v. 26); else he would have reminded his readers of their conversion rather than their baptism. We must always remember, however, that in the first missionary age of the Church the baptism of adults implied, as a rule, genuine conversion—the baptism of Simon Magus being an exception.—P. S.]

That so many of us (all we who were). " Ὅσοι, quotquot . [It denotes universality, as many of us, all without exception, but it is not stronger than $\alpha\iota\omega\varsigma$, which indicates the quality, such of us as.—P. S.] The phrase $\beta\alpha\pi\tau\iota\sigma\mu\omicron\varsigma$ $\epsilon\iota\varsigma$ retains the most direct figurative reference of baptism. It means strictly, to immerse into Christ (Rückert)—that is, into the fellowship of Christ. [Comp. ver. 4: $\beta\alpha\pi\tau\iota\sigma\mu\omicron\varsigma$ $\epsilon\iota\varsigma$ $\theta\alpha\upsilon\omicron\tau\omicron\upsilon$; Gal. iii. 27: $\epsilon\iota\varsigma$ $\chi\omega\sigma\tau\omega\iota\varsigma$ $\hbar\beta\alpha\pi\tau\iota\sigma\theta\eta\iota$; Matt. xxviii. 19: $\epsilon\iota\varsigma$ $\tau\omega\ \delta\omicron\upsilon\mu\alpha$. Alford: "'Into participation of,' 'into union with' Christ, in His capacity of spiritual Mastership, Headship, and Pattern of conformity."—P. S.] The explanation of Meyer [accepted by Hodge], that it never means any thing else than to baptize in reference to, with relation to, and that the more specific definitions must arise from the context, fails to do justice to this original meaning. [Comp. Lange and Schaaf on Matthew, pp. 555 (Textual Note), 557, 558, 560.—P. S.] But the baptizing into the full, living fellowship of Christ, is, as the Apostle remarks, a baptism into the fellowship of His death. And there is implied here, according to the idea of a covenant, the Divine adjudication of this saving fellowship on the one hand, and the human obligation for an ethical continuance of the fellowship on the other. The explanation of Grotius and others, the idea of imitation, is digressive, and weakens the sense. See Gal. iii. 27; Col. ii. 11; Titus iii. 5.

Ver. 4. Therefore we were buried with him [$\sigma\upsilon\upsilon\tau\epsilon\tau\alpha\phi\eta\mu\epsilon\tau\ \sigma\iota\upsilon\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omega\ \delta\iota\alpha\ \tau\omicron\iota$

βαπτίσματος εἰς τὸν θάνατον. To be buried is a stronger expression than to die, for the burial confirms death and raises it beyond doubt; it withdraws the dead from our sight, and annihilates him, as it were. The same figure in Col. ii. 12. The mystic σύν in συντάφει, as also in συναποθήσει, συσταυροῦμαι, &c., signifies the life-union of the believer with Christ; comp. the remarks of Tholuck, p. 281 f.—P. S.]. Buried in death; an oxymoron, according to which burial precedes and death follows, as is illustrated in the immersion into the bath of baptism. The analogous feature in the life of Christ was His rejection by the world, and His violent death on the cross. The expression denotes not only a burial before death and for death, but it is likewise an expression of the decision and completion of death, and, finally, a reference to the transition from death to the resurrection. The finished κατάβασις, as the bringing about of the ἀνάστασις; Col. ii. 12.*

Into death [εἰς τὸν θάνατον]. The death of Christ is not merely a death of the individual Jesus, but the death which, in principle or power, comprehends all mankind, and which absolutely separates the old world and the new world. Therefore it must not here be particularized (Calov.: the declared death of sin; others give different interpretations). [Εἰς τὸν θάνατον must be closely connected with βαπτίσματος, baptism into the death of Christ for the appropriation of its full benefit, viz., the remission of sins and reconciliation with God.—P. S.]

In order that, as Christ was raised up [ἵνα ὡς περ ἡγήθη Χριστὸς ἐκ νεκρῶν δὲ αὐτῆς δόξης τοῦ Πατρὸς, κ.τ.λ.]. The purpose of dying with Christ. The power that raised our Lord was the δόξα of the Father. Thus the resurrection of Christ is traced back to the highest Cause. God is the Father, as Origin and Author of the spiritual world comprehended in Christ. Before the Father's name the creature-world ascends into the spiritual world, and the spiritual world is conjoined in the Son. The glory of the Father is the concentrated revelation of all the attributes of the Father in their unity, especially of His omnipotence (1 Cor. vi. 14; Eph. i. 19), wisdom, and goodness; or of His omnipotent love in its faithfulness, and of His personality in its most glorious deed.* Before the glory of the Father the whole living world goes to ruin, is doomed to death, in order that the dead Christ may be made alive as Prince of the resurrection. Applications of the δόξα to the divinity of Christ (Theodoret [ἡ οὐκία θιότης], and others), in gloriam patris (Beza [inadmissible on account of διά with the genitive]); in paterna gloria resurra (Castalio).

* [All commentators of note (except Stuart and Hodge) expressly admit or take it for granted that in this verse, especially in συντάφει and ἡγήθη, the ancient prevailing mode of baptism by immersion and emersion is implied, as giving additional force to the idea of the going down of the old and the rising up of the new man. Chrysostom on John iii., Hom. xlv. (al. xlv., Opp., tom. viii. p. 151): Καθάρσις ἐν τῇ τάφῳ, τῇ ὁδοῦ καταβύοντων ἡμῶν τὰς κεφαλὰς, ὁ παλαῖος ἄνθρωπος βάπτεται, καὶ καταβύς αὐτῷ κρήνηται ὁ καιρὸς καθάρσις. εἰτα ἀναγεννῶνται ἡμῶν, ὁ καιρὸς πάλιν. H. then quotes Col. ii. 12; Rom. vi. 6. Bloomfield: "There is a plain allusion to the ancient mode of baptism by immersion; on which, see Suicer's Thes. and Bingham's Antiquities." Barnes: "It is altogether probable that the Apostle has allusion to the custom of baptizing by immersion." Conybeare and Howson: "This passage cannot be understood, unless it be borne in mind that the primitive baptism was by immersion." Webster and Wilkinson: "Doubtless there is an allusion to immersion, as the usual mode of baptism, introduced to show that baptism symbolized also our spiritual resurrection, ὡς περ ἡγήθη Χ." Comp. also Bengel, Bökert, Tholuck, Meyer. The objection of Philippi (who, however, himself regards this allusion probable in ver. 4), that in this case the Apostle would have expressly mentioned the symbolic act, has no force in view of the daily practice of baptism. But immersionists, on the other hand, make an unwarranted use of this passage. It should be remembered, that immersion is not commanded here, but simply alluded to, and that the immersion, or katharsis, is only one part of the baptismal act, symbolising the going down of the old man of sin; and that the emersion, or ἀνάστασις, of the new man of righteousness, is just as essential to complete the idea. Hence, irrespective of other considerations, the substitution of the oned and secular term immersion for baptism, in a revision of the English Bible, would give a merely negative view of the meaning of the sacrament. Baptism, and the corresponding verb, which have long since become naturalised in the English language, as much so as Christ, apostle, angel, &c., are the only terms to express properly the use of water for sacred, sacramental purposes, and the idea of resurrection as well as of death and burial with Christ. Immersion is undoubtedly a more expressive form than sprinkling; yet the efficacy of the sacrament does not depend upon the quantity or quality of water, nor upon the mode of its application.—P. S.]

From the dead, ἐκ νεκρῶν. The world of the dead is regarded as a connected sphere. Also antithesis to εἰς θάνατον.

So we also should walk in newness of life [οὕτως καὶ ἡμεῖς ἐν καινότητι ζωῆς περιπατήσωμεν]. In newness of life; that is, in a new kind and form of life, which is subsequently denoted as incorruptibility, and therefore also by implication as continual newness and perpetual renewal of existence. Consequently, more than ζωή καινή (Grotius).† [Meyer, Alford: "Not 'a new life';—nor are such expressions ever to be diluted away thus."—P. S.] Walk gives prominence to the practical proof of this newness in new, free conduct of life.

Ver. 5. For if we have grown together [εἰ γὰρ σύμφυτοι γεγόναμεν]. The expression σύμφυτος, denoting originally innate [innate]; born with [congenital, connate], means here the same as συμφυής, grown together by nature. [Grotius: coalmatus; Tholuck, Philippi, Meyer: zusammengewachsen, verwachsen mit, concretus; Stuart: become homogeneous; Alford: intimately and progressively united.—P. S.] The expression complantati (Vulgate, Luther [E. V.: planted to ether]) goes too far, and is not justified by the language; † while the interpretation grafted i to (Erasmus [Calvin, Estius, Conybeare and Howson], and others) does not express enough here [and would require ἐμφύτευτος, inestitus.—P. S.] The figure denotes believers as a unity of different branches in one root or one trunk. These characters, which are united in one spirit, as the grapes of a cluster, have sprung from one gospel or new principle of life. Thus believers have grown into an image or analogue of the death of Jesus (τῷ ὁμοιώματι, dative of direction), but not with such an analogue (Meyer, Tho.

* [δόξα and δύναμις are closely related; comp. the Hebrew ḥāḏā, and ḥāḏā of the ḥāḏā. Col. i. 11. Meyer explains δόξα, die göttliche Gesamtheit Gottes.—P. S.]

† [So also Koppe, Reiche, Stuart: "Καινήτης τῆς ζωῆς I regard as a Hebraistic form, in which the first noun applies the place of the adjective." Against this dilution, comp. Winer, p. 211, Meyer and Alford in loc. The abstract noun καινότης gives greater prominence to the quality of newness, which is the chief point here; comp. 1 Thes. ii. 11; 1 Tim. vi. 17.—P. S.]

luck), with which we cannot connect any clear thought. [Philippi and Meyer explain: grown together, or, intimately connected with the likeness of His death; the ὁμοίωμα being spiritual death, so that the meaning is: If we are spiritually dead to sin, as Christ was physically dead, &c. So in the other clause our spiritual resurrection is the ὁμοίωμα of the bodily resurrection of Christ.—P. S.] Neither can τῷ ὁμοιώματι be the dative of instrument: We have grown together with Christ [τῷ Χριστῷ being understood as in ver. 6] through the resemblance of His death-baptism, the likeness of His death (Erasmus [Beza, Grotius], Fritzsche, Baur [Van Hengel], and most others). For [this would require αὐτῷ after συνήμωτος, and] believers are not grown together by the likeness of the death of Christ, but by His death itself in a religious sense, as cause (through the medium of the gospel), in order that, as an organism, they should now exhibit as a copy His death in the ethical sense.

We shall be also with his resurrection [ἀλλὰ καὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως ἐσόμεθα]. The antithesis is strengthened by ἀλλὰ [which is used sometimes also by the classics for the rapid and emphatic introduction of the antithetical idea in the apodosis after a hypothetical protasis; see Meyer in loc., and Hartung, Partikellehre, ii. p. 40.—P. S.]. We shall also be grown together with Him into the likeness of His resurrection (Beza, Grotius, Meyer, Philippi; Tholuck: "abbreviated comparative"). Not συνήμωτος τῆς ἀναστάσεως (Erasmus, Calvin, Olshausen, and others).^{*} The reference of the expression to the resurrection of the body (by Tertullian, and others) is not in harmony with the context (see ver. 4); yet is altogether authorized by ver. 9, if we regard the new life as continuing to the bodily resurrection (therefore an ethical and physical resurrection, which Meyer and Tholuck oppose). The future, ἐσόμεθα, is indeed not imperative (Reiche [Olshausen, Stuart: expressive of obligation]); nor does it denote willingness (Fritzsche), but the certainty of the result, the necessary consequence of dying together with Christ [Tholuck, Meyer, Hodge], if we understand thereby not merely a natural consequence, but an ethical one, which involves an ever-new willingness. This is likewise indicated by what immediately follows.

Ver. 6. Knowing this. That objective relation of the resurrection is not only confirmed by the subjective consciousness (Meyer), but it is also conditioned by it.

That our old man [ὁ παλαιὸς ἡμῶν ἄνθρωπος]. Meyer: our old ego. This is liable to misunderstanding, and expresses too much. Meyer further explains: "Personification of the entire state of sinfulness before the παλιγγενεσία (John iii. 3; Titus iii. 5; Eph. iv. 22; Col. iii. 9)." This expresses too little. The old man is the whole sinfulness of man, which, proceeding from Adam, and pervading the old world and making it old, has become, in the concrete human image, the pseudo-plasmatic phantom of human nature and the human form † (see chap. viii. 3). Tholuck's explanation is almost unintelligible: "Indication of the ego of the earlier personality; as in ἔσω ἄνθρωπος, ἡ καρπὸς ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ ἄνθρωπος, 1 Peter iii. 4."

Was [not is, as in the E. V.] crucified with him [συνσταυρώθη, comp. Gal. ii. 20: Χριστῷ συνσταυρούμαι: ὡς δὲ οὐκ ἐστὶ ἐγώ, ὅτι ἐγὼ οὐκ εἰμι Χριστός]. "Namely, at the time when we were baptized," says Meyer [referring to vers. 3, 4]. But this is rather a superficial view. Baptism has actually and individually realized a connection which had already been realized potentially and generally in the death on the cross; see 2 Cor. v. 14, 15; Gal. ii. 19; Col. iii. 1. Tholuck: "Calovius says very properly against Grotius: sin non SIMILITUDINEM notat, verum SIMULTATEM, ut ita dicam, et COMMUNIONEM. The accessory idea of pain, or of gradual death [advocated by Grotius, Stuart, Barnes], could hardly have been thought of in this connection by the Apostle." Yet we are also reminded of the violence and effective energy of the death on the cross by the following: in order that the body of sin might be destroyed. The destructive power of the death on the cross involves not merely pain and sorrow, but also the ignominy of the cross of Christ. According to Meyer, Paul only made use of the expression because Christ had died on the cross.

In order that the body of sin might be destroyed [ἵνα καταργηθῇ τὸ σῶμα τῆς ἁμαρτίας; comp. τὸ σῶμα τῆς σαρκός, Col. ii. 11, and τὸ σῶμα τοῦ θανάτου τούτου, Rom. vii. 24]. It is self-evident, from Paul and the whole Bible, that there is not the slightest reference here to a [literal] destruction of the body [i. e., of this physical organism which is only dissolved in physical death, and which, instead of being annihilated, is to be sanctified; comp. 1 Cor. vi. 20; 1 Thess. v. 23; Rom. xiii. 14.—P. S.]. As "the old man" is the pseudo-plasmatic phantom of man, so is "the body of sin" the phantom of a body in man consisting of his whole sinfulness; and so, further on, is the body of death (chap. vii. 24) the phantom of a corporeal power of death encompassing man. It is remarkable that most of the later expositors (with the exception of Philippi, p. 210 ff.) reject the constructions that are most nearly correct, to substitute for them others which are dualistic.

1. Figurative explanations. Sin under the figure of a body.

a. The totality of sin (Origen, Grotius). [Chrysostom: ἡ ὁλόκληρος ἁμαρτία. Calvin: "Corpus tischen Scheinbilde der Menschennatur und Menschengestalt geworden ist." In like manner he explains "the body of death," vii. 24, and "the law in the members," vii. 23, with reference to the physiological and medical doctrine of plasma and pseudo-plasma, as if Paul had by intuition anticipated modern science.—P. S.]

* [The παλαιὸς ἄνθρωπος is the σάρξ personified, or the τὸν σαρκίαν, chap. vii. 14, 18—i. e., the fallen, sinful nature before regeneration, in opposition to the καρπὸς, or νέος ἄνθρωπος, or the καὶνὴ κτίσις, the renewed, regenerated man; Col. iii. 9, 10; Eph. iv. 22-24; 2 Cor. v. 17. The term man is used because sin controls the whole personality, as, on the other hand, regeneration is a radical change of the whole man with all his faculties and dispositions. The phrase, the old man, the man of sin, is traced to rabbinical origin by Schöttgen, by Schöttgen, Bloomfield, Stuart; but the passage quoted by Schöttgen from the comparatively recent Sohar-chindash (first published in 1599) has a different meaning, according to Tholuck, p. 287. The Talmud, however, calls proselytes "new creatures," and says of them: "they became as little children;" see Schöttgen, Ebor. i. p. 323, 704 f.; Wetstein and Meyer on 2 Cor. v. 17. Meyer says: "The form of the expression (καὶνὴ κτίσις) is rabbinical; for the Rabbins considered a convert to Judaism as בְּרִיָּה חֲדָשָׁה." The Christian idea of the παλιγγενεσία of course, is far deeper.—P. S.]

* [Grammatically, this is not impossible, since συνήμωτος is constructed with the genitive as well as with the dative; but τῷ ἀναστάσει would have been more natural in this case; hence it is better to supply συνήμωτος τῷ ὁμοιώματι, so that τῷ ἀναστάσει depends upon τ. ὁμοιώματι.—P. S.]

peccati non carnem et ossa, sed massam designat." More accurately: Sin is personified as a living organism with many members (vices), which may be put to death. So Philippi: "Die Masse der Sünde als gegliederter Organismus." Bloomfield: "Τὸ σῶμα τῆς ἁμαρτίας is the same with ὁ παλαιὸς ἄνθρωπος, and means that sin is a body consisting of many particular members or vices, an imperium in imperio."—P. S.]

b. The nature or substance of sin (Schöttgen).

c. The figure of sin with reference to the figure of the crucifixion (Calov., Wolf, and others).

d. "The tendency of alienation from God and conformity to the pleasures of the world" (J. Müller, and others; Tholuck, p. 290).

e. More strongly: The whole man in his departure from God; the natural man (Augustin, Luther, Calvin [Hodge: "The body of sin" is only another name for "the old man," or rather for its concrete form]).

f. Reduced to a minimum: Bad habit (Pelagius).

2. Literal explanations:

a. The flesh as flesh of sin, σὰρξ ἁμαρτίας (Rosenmüller).

b. "The body belonging to the principle of sin, the body ruled by sin." The old man had such a body, and this σῶμα, as far as it is a body of sin, should be completely destroyed by crucifixion with Christ" (Meyer). An utter confusion of the figurative and literal construction. [Winer, Gramm., p. 177: the body which belongs to sin, in which sin has its existence and dominion, almost the same with σῶμα τῆς σαρκός, Col. i. 22. Similarly Alford, after De Wette: the body, which belongs to or serves sin, in which sin rules or is manifested, = τὰ μέλη, ver. 13, in which is ὁ νόμος τῆς ἁμαρτίας, vii. 23. Wordsworth: the body of sin is our body, so far as it is the seat and instrument of sin, and the slave of sin.—P. S.]

c. The body as σῶμα τῆς σαρκός, and the latter the seat of sin (Semler, Usteri, Rückert, Ritschl, Rothe, Hofmann; see Tholuck, p. 290).*

3. The anti-dualistic expositors, who interpreted this σῶμα as the real body or the natural man, were compelled to render improperly the καταργηθῆναι, as: evacuaretur, might be made inoperative and powerless. [Tertullian, Augustin; also Stuart and Barnes: might be deprived of efficiency, power, life. Alford: rendered powerless, annulled, as far as regards energy and activity.—P. S.]

That henceforth we should not be slaves to sin. [Calvin: "finem abolitionis notat." Sin is regarded as the controlling power (see ver. 16); John viii. 44. If this power is to be broken, the body of sin must be crucified. The reason for this is given in what follows. [τοῦ μηκέτι δουλεύειν ἡμᾶς τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ is a more concrete expression of the aim than the preceding clause, ἵνα καταργηθῇ, κ.τ.λ. See Winer, p. 569.—P. S.]

Ver. 7. For he that hath died is acquitted from sin. [Ὁ γὰρ ἀποθανὼν δικαιώται ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας; comp. 1 Peter iv. 1: ὅτι ἡ παθὼν ἐν σαρκί, πέπαιται ἁμαρτίας. The interpretations of this passage depend upon the meaning of ἀποθανών, whether it is to be taken in a physical, or in a moral (legal), or in a spiritual (mystic) sense.—P. S.] The chief and only question here is not ethical dying, or dying with Christ (Erasmus, Calvin, Cocceius, Bengel, Olshausen [De Wette, Philippi], and others. And the reason for this is, first, because justification must not be regarded as the consequence, but the cause of the ethical dying with Christ. Second, because not merely the being justified or freed from sin should be proved, in and of itself, but the being justified or freed from sin by death. An earlier, already present, universal, moral, and theocratical law of life is thus used to illustrate the new, religious, and ethical law of life in Christianity, in the same way that chap. vii. 1-6 has reference to such a law. The universal principle which the Apostle makes his groundwork here in the figurative expression, is the word in ver. 23: The wages of sin is death. The Grecian and Roman form of this antithesis was: by execution the offender is justified and separated from his crime (Alethæus, Wolf, and others). The theocratic form was the same decree of death for sin, according to Gen. ii. 17; ix. 6; Lev. xxiii. 1 ff. The sinner who was made a curse-offering, Chereim, was morally destroyed in a symbolical sense, but, at the same time, his guilt also, as well as his life of sin, was destroyed in a symbolical sense. According to Gen. ii. 17, the same thing held good of natural death, not so far as it, as a momentary power, put an end to the sinner's present life (Chrysostom, and others), but rather because it made a penal suffering extending into eternity (Sheol) the punishment of sin. All these modifications are grouped in the primitive law: death is the wages of sin; and this is the law which the Apostle makes the image of the Christian law of life. The Christian dies to sin by being crucified with Christ. Now, the being justified does not mean here justification by faith in itself (although dying with Christ is connected therewith), but justification as a release from sin by the death of the sinner himself. Because Meyer ignores the complete Old Testament idea of death, he attacks the statute of Jewish theology: death, as the punishment of sin, atones for the guilt of sin. He explains the Apostle's declaration thus: "He is made a δικαίος by death, not as if he were now free from the guilt of his sins committed in life, but so far as he sins no more." The explanation of ethical death with Christ (Rothe, Philippi, and others already mentioned) here makes what is to be proved the proof itself (as Meyer properly remarks). Meyer refers the passage to physical death as exit from the present life—a view in which regard is not paid to penal suffering.* Better than this is the view: As activity ceases in the dead, and sin with it, so should it also be with you who have died with Christ (Theodoret, Melancthon, Grotius). But there is the same inadequateness of the comparison. Tholuck's exposition is utterly untenable (with reference to Calvin, Bengel, Spener, and others), that sin should here be regarded as a creditor who has just claims on man, &c.; for, while a debtor is released by death from his creditor, there is by no means a δικαιώσθαι of the debtor from his debt.†

* [Meyer's view is, that he who is physically dead is free from sin, because he is free from the body, the seat of sin. But this, as Philippi remarks, is contrary to the biblical and Pauline anthropology.—P. S.]

† [We add the views of leading English and American commentators: Scott, Macknight, and Hodge: He who is dead with Christ is freed from the guilt and punishment of sin by justification. Stuart and Barnes: The Apostle applies a common Jewish proverb concerning physical death

* [Tholuck takes σῶμα in the literal sense, but viewed as the seat and organ of sin (p. 303), and enters in this connection into a full discussion of the meaning of σὰρξ, and its relation to sin, p. 298 ff.; but the proper place for a biblico-psychological excursus on σὰρξ, σῶμα, ψυχή, νόος, συνέσις, is chap. vii. See below.—P. S.]

Ver. 8. Now if we died with Christ, &c. [Εἰ δὲ ἀπεθάρμεν σὺν Χριστῷ]. δὲ announces the transition to the new thought, that believers, having died with Christ, would also live with Him. But this is not a mere conclusion from the being dead to the new life; the accent rests on the qualification with Christ, because Christ lives. As we are dead with Christ in His death, in its profoundest meaning and effect—which death comprises the separation from the entire old world, and its sin and vanity—so do we believe that we shall also live with him [πιστεύομεν ὅτι καὶ συνήσομεν αὐτῷ] in the supremely highest and most intense life—which life is eternal, and is an eternal life. Meyer emphasizes simply the inference from the ethical death with Christ to ethical participation in the new and enduring life of Christ. He is much in error in excluding here [with Philippi] the idea of the Christian's future share in the blessedness of the glorified Saviour (see chap. viii.), as Origen, Chrysostom, Grotius, Reiche, and others are in confining συνήσομεν to the future life. Rosenmüller, Tholuck, and others, have properly comprised both these elements; yet the chief emphasis rests upon the assurance of the new ethical life as implying the full freedom from all sin in the fellowship of Christ. Tholuck, with Erasmus, Calvin, and others, emphasizes once for all [ἐφάπαξ, ver. 10] as an eternal destination to new life. This destination is commensurate with the certainty of being dead with Christ. Yet, granting full force to the conclusion, it is still an object of faith (πιστεύομεν), which rests mainly on Christ as the risen One. (Different interpretations of πιστεύομεν: Confidence in Divine assistance, Fritzsche; in the Divine promise, Baumgarten-Crusius; in God as the Finisher of the commenced work of grace, Philippi [comp. 1 Thess. v. 24, 2 Thess. iii. 3; 2 Tim. ii. 11]).

Ver. 9. Knowing, &c. From faith in the risen One there arises the certain knowledge that henceforth He can never die; because He could die but once, inasmuch as, with the guilt of sin, He had assumed also the judgment of death. [Alford: Death could not hold Him, and had no power over Him further than by His own sufferance; but power over Him it had, inasmuch as He died. Meyer: The κρίσις of death over Christ was decreed by God (v. 8-10), and brought about by Christ's voluntary obedience (John x. 18; Matt. xx. 28). The conviction that Christ lives for ever furnishes the ground and support to our own life-union with Him.]

Ver. 10. For in that he died, or, the death which he died. The expression, ὁ ἀπέθανεν, may mean: as far as His death is concerned (Winer); or, as far as the death which He died is concerned (De Wette); or that which He died, so that ὁ is to one who is spiritually dead as to sin—i. e., he must become free of its influence. Bloomfield: He whose corrupt nature has been crucified with Christ is freed from its power and slavery. Alford: As a man that is dead is released from guilt and bondage among men: so a man that has died to sin is acquitted from the guilt of sin and released of its bondage, so that sin (personified) has no more claims on him, either as a creditor or as a master, cannot detain him for debt, nor sue him for service. Forbes combines the view of legal freedom from the guilt of sin (Fraser, Hallan) with the interpretation of spiritual freedom from the power and dominion of sin. "It is to sin as a whole, to its power as well as to its guilt, that the believer has virtually died in Christ as his representative and substitute." All is already objectively accomplished in Christ, yet remains to be realised subjectively in the believer's individual experience, which will not be completed till after the literal death of the body.—P. S.]

viewed as the subject [or rather as the accusative of the object; comp. Gal. ii. 20: ὁ δὲ νῦν ζῶ.—P. S.]. We prefer the last exposition, but do not refer the ὁ with Benecke (after Hilarius, and others) to the mortal part of Christ [that which died in Christ], but to Christ's great and unexampled experience of death. All his dying was abhorrence of sin, induced by sin, directed against sin.—Unto sin he died [τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ ἀπέθανεν]. Explanations: ad expianda peccata (Grotius, Olshausen); or, ad expianda et tollenda p. (Tholuck [Reiche, Fritzsche], Philippi); [or, to destroy the power of sin (Chrysostom, Beza, Calvin, Bengel, Ewald)]. Indefinite reference to death (Rückert, De Wette [Alford], and others). Meyer: His death paid the debt to sin, and now it can have no more power over Him. Hofmann: With His death, all passive relation to sin has ceased. Certainly the parallel in ver. 11 [νικῶν τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ] seems to require a similar rendering. Yet we must not merely bring out prominently the repulsiveness of sin to the life of Jesus, but rather the repulsiveness of His life to sin—which repulsiveness was consummated in His death. Both together constitute the absolute separation.

Once [ἐφάπαξ]. Once for all. [The one sacrifice on the cross, as the sacrifice of the infinite Son of God, has infinite value both as to extent and time, and hence excludes repetition; comp. Heb. vii. 27; ix. 12, 26, 28; x. 10; 1 Pet. iii. 18.—P. S.]

But in that he liveth, or, the life that he liveth [ὁ δὲ ζῇ, ζῇ τῷ Θεῷ]. All His life, His whole glorious life, is for God. As His death consisted wholly in the ethical reaction against sin, so His life consists wholly in consecration to God, His honor, and His kingdom. [Christ's life on earth was also a life for God, but in conflict with sin and death, over which He triumphed in the resurrection.—P. S.] Theophylact's view is wrong: by the power of God.

Ver. 11. Thus reckon ye also yourselves (account yourselves) dead indeed unto sin [Οὕτως καὶ ὑμεῖς λογίζεσθε ἑαυτοὺς νεκροὺς μὲν τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ]. A λογίζεσθε of Christ does not stand as a parallel to λογίζεσθε (which is imperative, and not indicative, as Bengel would have it).† It should rather be derived from the meaning of the death of Christ, according to ver. 10.

But alive unto God in Christ Jesus [ἐν Χρ. Ἰησ.]. That is, in fellowship, or living union with Him (not merely through Him).‡ It refers not simply to living to God (Rückert, De Wette [Alford]), but also to being dead to sin [Reiche, Meyer]. The λογίζεσθε requires of Christians that they should understand what they are as Christians, as members of Christ, according to the duties of common fellowship (Tholuck, Philippi); but not that they should attain to this condition by moral effort

* [The dative of reference or relation; in point of fact, in the case of ἁμαρτία it is the Dativus incommodi, or detrimenti; while in the next clause τῷ Θεῷ is the Dat. commodi.—P. S.]

† [The indicative would rather require: οὕτως καὶ ὑμεῖς λογίζεσθε, instead of the second person. Alford is quite mistaken, when he says: "Meyer only holds it to be indicative." Meyer, on the contrary, takes λογίζεσθε to be the imperative, in harmony with the hortative character of what follows.—P. S.]

‡ [Meyer: ἐν Χ. Ἰ. is not per Christum (Grotius, Fritzsche, al.), but denotes the element in which the being dead and being alive holds. Comp. Winer, Gramm., p. 364.—P. S.]

(Baur). That is, Christian life proceeds upon the believing presupposition of our completion in Christ; but this completion is not, reversely, brought to pass by a moral effort. Of course, the telic completion then meets the principal completion as the goal of effort.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1 See the Preliminary Remarks on chaps. vi.-viii., and the inscription to the present section, chap. vi. 1-11.

2. On chap. vi. 1. The false conclusion which anomia has ever derived from the fact that sin, in its complete development, occasions a still more glorious revelation of grace, rests on the erroneous supposition that the ethical and organic relation on both sides is a purely natural relation, which justifies to an altogether passive conduct in religious and moral things. This anomia appears in Indian heathendom, as well as in modern humanitarianism, chiefly in a pantheistic form. But in Christian religiousness it appears only sporadically in this form; yet mostly, on the other hand, in dualistic forms. This is as much as to say, that if the flesh be indulged in its sphere, the spirit will likewise maintain the ascendancy in its sphere; or, grace will overcome sin, and the like. But in every form this anomia is to the Apostle an object of religious and moral abhorrence, which he expresses by μη γίνετο. He opposes this false conclusion by the truth of the relation according to which the whole of Christianity is rooted in a thoroughly religious and moral act—the death of Jesus.

3. Baptism, in its full meaning, is a dying with Christ, which is potentially grounded in the dynamic meaning of His dying for all (2 Cor. v. 14), and is actually realized in the dynamical genesis of faith. It follows from this that it is not only a partial purification of the living sinner, but his fundamental purification by a spiritual death and burial; that, further, it not merely represents sensibly and seals the single parts and acts of the Christian life, but its whole justification, in all its parts; and therefore that it is available, operative, and obligatory once for all. It follows, finally, that baptism is not simply an ecclesiastical act performed on the individual, when the individual is passive, but an ethical covenant-transaction between Christ and the one who is baptized; wherefore even the baptism of children presupposes in the family, the parents, or the sponsors, a spirit of faith which represents and encompasses the child.

From all this it will be seen how very much baptism is obscured and desecrated by regarding it either as a mere ceremony which certifies the Christian life of the person baptized, or, on the other hand, as a onesided and magical act which is supposed to create the Christian life.

[In opposition to the low and almost rationalistic views now prevailing in a large part of Protestantism on the meaning and import of Christian baptism, it may be well to refer to the teaching of the symbols of the Reformation down to the Westminster standards, and of the older divines, which is far deeper. Take, for instance, the Westminster Confession of Faith (chap. xxviii.): "Baptism is a sacrament of the New Testament, ordained by Jesus Christ, not only for the solemn admission of the party baptized into the visible Church, but also to be unto him a sign and seal of the covenant of grace, of his ingrafting into Christ, of regeneration, of remission of sins, and of his giving up unto God, through Jesus Christ, to walk in newness of life." (Comp. the Larger Catechism, Qu. 168, and Shorter Catechism, Qu. 94). Calvin says: "In treating the sacraments, two things are to be considered: the sign and the thing signified. Thus, in baptism, the sign is water; but the thing signified is the cleansing of the soul by the blood of Christ, and the mortification of the flesh. Both of these things are comprised in the institution of Christ; and whereas often the sign appears to be ineffectual and fruitless, that comes through men's abuse, which does not annul the nature of the sacrament. Let us learn, therefore, not to tear apart the thing signified from the sign; though, at the same time, we must be on our guard against the opposite fault, such as prevails among Papists. For, failing to make the needful distinction between the thing and the sign, they stop short at the outward element, and there confidently rest their hope of salvation. The sight of the water, accordingly, withdraws their minds from Christ's blood and the grace of the Spirit. Not reflecting that, of all the blessings there exhibited, Christ alone is the Author, they transfer to water the glory of His death, and bind the hidden energy of the Spirit to the visible sign. What, then, must be done? Let us not separate what the Lord has joined together. We ought, in baptism, to recognize a spiritual laver; we ought in it to embrace a witness to the remission of sins and a pledge of our renewal; and yet so to leave both to Christ and the Holy Spirit the honor that is theirs, as that no part of the salvation be transferred to the sign."—Dr. John Lillie, in his excellent posthumous Lectures on the Epistles of Peter (New York, 1869, p. 252), in commenting on 1 Peter iii. 21, remarks: "But what, you will ask, is baptism, then, a saving ordinance? Certainly; that is just what Christ's Apostle here affirms. Nor is this the only place, by any means, in which the New Testament speaks of baptism in a way that would now offend many good people, were it not that the perplexing phraseology is unquestionably scriptural. Recollect, for instance, Peter's own practical application of his pentecostal sermon: 'Repent, and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins.' And so Ananias in Damascus to the humbled persecutor: 'Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins.' Paul, too, expressly calls baptism 'the laver of the water' by which Christ purifies His Church; and again, 'the laver of regeneration' by which God saves us. Frequently, also, he represents it as that by which we are united to Christ, and made partakers of His death and resurrection. Nay, Christ Himself, in sending forth His gospel among all nations, named baptism as one condition of salvation. We need not, then, hesitate to call it a saving ordinance. But how does it save? Just as any other ordinance saves—not through any inherent virtue of its outward signs and processes, but solely as it is a channel for the communication of Divine grace, and used in accordance with the Divine intention. On the one hand, while grace is ordinarily dispensed through ordinances, it is not confined to them, God being ever higher than His own appointments, and acting, when it so pleases Him, independently of them altogether. And, on the other hand, there must be on the part of man, besides the observance of formal precept, a yielding of his whole nature to the quickening and transforming influence. Take for an example that greatest ordinance, the Word of God. It 'is able,' says James (i. 21), 'to save your souls.' But how? Not simply as it is preached, or heard, or read. That it may be 'the power of God unto salvation,' it must first be accompanied with the 'demonstration of the Spirit,' and then 'received with meekness,' and so become the ingrafted word. It is not the foolishness of preaching that saves; but 'it pleases God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe.' Now, just so with baptism: equally with the gospel itself, it is a Divine institution, whereby God ordinarily dispenses His grace. But its whole efficacy is due to that grace of God, and to our fitting reception and use of the rite—not to its mere external administration, by whatsoever priestly or apostolic hand."—P. S.]

4. According to the Apostle, the burial as well as the death of Christ is represented in the meaning and effect of baptism. But as the burial of Christ not only seals His death, but also brings to pass the mysterious form of His transition to new life, so is it also with the world's renunciation of the secret inward life of the Christian, which develops from a germ in mysterious growth, and is hid with Christ in God. (For fuller information on being baptized into the death of Christ, see Tholuck, p. 280, and Philippi, p. 206.)

5. Christianity is not only a new life, but a newness of life—a life which never grows old, but has ever a more perfect and imperishable renewal. But as the resurrection of Christ rests on a deed of the glory of the Father, so is it with the new birth of the Christian. See the Exeg. Notes.

6. Although believers are so intimately connected or grown together in a living organism as to appear to be living on the same vine or the same branch, they are nevertheless not grown together in the form of natural necessity. While unchurchly and unhistorical sectarianism ignores the organic internal character and historical structure of the Christian communion, hierarchism, on the other hand, disregards its ethical and free inward character. The life of Christ is repeated and reflected, after His death and resurrection, in His image—the Church; but not in the sense that it is quantitatively a supplement or substitute for Him, but that it completely unites itself qualitatively with Him as its living head. Because the Christian suffers death in Christ, rises, and is justified, Christ, as the crucified and risen One, lives in him. (See chap. viii. 29; Eph. i. 4; Col. i. 22, 23, 24; ii. 11; iii. 1, &c.)

7. The Apostle's doctrine of the old man, the body of sin, the body of death, the law in the members, &c., shows a divinatorial anticipation of the idea of the pseudo-plasma, which has first appeared in the modern science of medicine. The old man is not the real man, nor the natural man, but sin, which has pervaded man as the plasmatic phantom of his nature, and, as an ethical cancer, threatens to consume him. (On the various theological interpretations of the old man, see Tholuck, p. 287. For a more complete interpretation of Paul's pseudo-plasmatic ideas, see Exeg. Notes on chap. vii. 24.)

8. Those who designate the real body of man as the source of sin, abolish the real idea of sin. Even the expression, that the body is not the source, but the seat of sin, is not correct in reference to the tendency of the wicked, and is only conditionally correct in reference to the life of the pious, in whom sin, as sinfulness, as a tempting propensity in the bodily part of the being has its seat, and will continue to have its seat, until the old form of the body is laid off.

9. On being free from the debt of sin by death, see the Exeg. Notes. Death removes guilt—a definition which may be further formalized thus: the kind of death corresponds as justification to the kind of guilt; the depth of death corresponds to the depth of guilt. Therefore the death of Christ is the potential justification of humanity, because it plunged the absolutely guiltless and holy life into the absolute depth of the death of mankind.

10. On the expression body of sin, in ver. 6, compare the elaborate discussion by Tholuck, p. 288 ff. Likewise the same author, on ver. 9, or the relation of Christ to death; p. 306.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

On the relation of sin and grace: 1. It is true that the more powerful sin is, the more powerful is grace also; but it cannot be inferred from this, 2. That we should continue in sin. But, 3. We should wish, rather, not to live in sin, to which we died (vers. 1, 2).—To what would continuance in sin lead? 1. Not to grace, for he who sins wilfully, trifles with grace; but, 2. To the terrible looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the rebellious (vers. 1, 2). Heb. x. 26.—Of Christian baptism. 1. What is it? a. a baptism into Christ; b. a baptism into the death of Christ. 2. Of what service is baptism to us? a. We die and are buried by it in repentance; b. we are raised by it in faith (vers. 3, 4).—By baptism we enter into a double communion with Christ: 1. Of His death; 2. Of His resurrection.—Christians are, 1. Companions in the death of Christ; but also, 2. In His resurrection (ver. 5).—The crucifixion of our old man: 1. The manner and form of the old man; 2. his crucifixion.—The glorious immortality of Christ: 1. Its foundation; 2. Its importance to us (vers. 8-10).—We should reckon ourselves dead in relation to sin, but alive in relation to God; that is, 1. We should, by faith, be ever taking our stand-point more perfectly in Christ; and, 2. First of all in His death, but also in His life (ver. 11).

STARKE: The suffering and death of a Christian are not to destruction, but a planting to life.

HEIDINGER: Under the grace of God we are not permitted to sin.—MÜLLER: Life and death cling together; the more the old dies and goes to ruin, the more gloriously does the new man arise.—Either you will slay sin, or sin will slay you.—Where faith is there is Christ, and where Christ is there is life.

GERLACH: The baptism of Christians is a baptism into Christ's death; that is, into the complete appropriation of its roots and fruits.

BESSER: Paul places the gift of baptism first and connects with it the duty of the one baptized.

HEUBNER: Recollections of our former covenant of baptism: 1. What has God done for us in baptism? 2. What have we to do in consequence of baptism?—THOMASius: The power of baptism in its permeation of the whole Christian life.—FLOREY: We are baptized into the death of Christ. Namely: 1. Upon the confession that He died for us; 2. On the pledge that we should die with Him; 3. In the hope that we shall live by Him.—HARLESS: The impediments to Christian life: 1. The pleasure of life, which is terrified at evangelical preaching on death; 2. The dulness and unbelief of spiritual death, which is terrified at evangelical preaching on life; while yet, reversely, 3. The pleasure, power, and pious conduct of the Christian rests upon the death which he has died for newness of life.

[SHERLOCK: As the death of Christ was not barely a natural death, a separation of soul and body, but a sacrifice for sin, to destroy the dominion of it, so our dying to sin is the truest conformity to the death of Christ; and as we must consider His resurrection as His living to God and advancement into His spiritual kingdom, so our walking in newness of life is our conformity to His resurrection, and makes us true subjects of His spiritual kingdom.—HENRY: As natural death brings a writ of ease to the weary, so must we be dead to all the sins of our former rebellious life. We must be as indifferent to the pleasures and delights of sin, as a man that is dying is to his former diversions. As natural death cuts off all communication with life, so must sanctification in the soul cut off all communication with sin.

—MACKNIGHT: We should daily recollect our baptism, and be stirred up by it to every religious act and thought possible, for it is this that sets before us the death and resurrection of Christ.—CLARKE: The sacrificial death of Christ is the soil in which believers are planted, and from which they derive their life, their fruitfulness, and their final glory.—HODGE: It is those who look to Christ not only for pardon, but for holiness, that are successful in subduing sin; the legalist remains its slave. To be in Christ is the source of the Christian's life; to be like Christ is the sum of his excellence; to be with Christ is the fulness of his joy.—J. F. H.]

THIRD SECTION.—The principal freedom of Christians from the service of sin to death, and their actual departure therefrom and entrance into the service of righteousness unto life by the power of the death of Jesus. (Believers should live in the consciousness that they are dead to sin, just as even the slave is freed by death.)

- 14 God. For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the [omit the] law, but under grace.
- 15 What then? shall [may] we sin, because we are not under the [omit the]
- 16 law, but under grace? God forbid. [Let it not be!] Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether [either] of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?
- 17 But God be thanked [thanks to God], that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have [omit have] obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine [teaching] which
- 18 was delivered you [whereunto ye were delivered;]. Being then [And being]
- 19 made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness. I speak after the manner of men because of the infirmity of your flesh: for as ye have yielded [rendered] your members [as] servants to uncleanness and to iniquity unto iniquity; even so now yield [render] your members [as] servants to righteousness
- 20 unto holiness [or sanctification]. For when ye were the [omit the] servants
- 21 of sin, ye were free from [as regards] righteousness. What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? [What fruit had ye then therefore? Things whereof ye are now ashamed;] for the end of those things
- 22 is death. But now being [having been] made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness [or sanctification], and the end
- 23 everlasting life. For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ [in Christ Jesus] our Lord.

TEXTUAL.

¹ Ver 12.—[The correct reading seems to be: ὑπακούετε τοῖς ἐπιθυμίαις αὐτοῦ, found in K. A. B. C¹, many variants, most versions and fathers; adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford et al. Griesbach, on insufficient authority, omits all after ὑπακούετε. D. E. insert αὐτῇ, omitting the rest. C². K. L., some further insert αὐτῇ & before τοῖς ἐπιθυμίαις. So Rec.; hence it in of the E. V. All these variations are accounted for by Meyer, who supposes that αὐτῇ was added, first as a marginal gloss, to direct attention to sin as the source of "the lusts," then incorporated in the text, and subsequent changes made to avoid confusion.

² Ver. 13.—[The idea of military service found in ὑπακούετε is better expressed by render, since yield implies a previous resistance, not found in the Apostle's thought.]

* Ver. 12.—[To is the better rendering of the simple datives here, as in ver. 19. Unto has a telic force, which makes it equivalent to eis. This distinction is preserved in ver. 19, but lost sight of by the English translators here.]

* Ver. 13.—[As being alive from the dead (Amer. Bible Union) is a good version of ὡς ἐκ νεκρῶν ζῶντας; but the paraphrase of Alford: as alive from having been dead, conveys the full meaning. Still better is the Revision by Five Anglican Clergymen: as those that were dead, and are alive.

* Ver. 14.—[The article of the E. V. is not only unnecessary, since the Greek phrase is ὡς ἐκ νεκρῶν, but perhaps incorrect; for the reference may be to "law" in general, rather than to "the (Mosaic) law." So in ver. 15.]

* Ver. 15.—[The reading ἀμαρτήσομεν (Rec.) is weakly supported. K. A. B. C. D. E. K. L., have ἀμαρτήσωμεν; adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, and others. This is the deliberative subjunctive; hence: "may we sin."

* Ver. 17.—[Teaching is preferable to doctrine. See Exeg. Notes.]

* Ver. 17.—[To which ye were delivered, εἰς ὃν παρεδόθητε, is literal, and corresponds with the figure implied in ῥῶον.—The full stop of the E. V. is unnecessary, as the next verse is closely connected with this one. The form of ver. 18 is altered, to make this connection more obvious.]

* Ver. 19.—[Ἁγιασμός may mean holiness, Heiligkeit, or sanctification, Heiligung. Bengel, however, discriminates between ἁγιότης and ἁγιασμός, the former "holiness," the latter "sanctification." See i. 4, p. 62, and Exeg. Notes, where Lange contends for the latter meaning here (against Meyer).]

* Ver. 21.—[Lange adopts the punctuation of Lachmann, Griesbach, and many others, placing the interrogation after τότε, and making what follows the answer. A great array of authorities can be cited in support of each way of pointing, but this seems to give a better sense to καρπός. Comp. Alford in loco.]

* Ver. 21.—[N^o. B. D. Fⁱ, Lachmann, Meyer, Alford, insert μὲν before γάρ. Wordsworth does not insert it in his text, but favors it in his notes. It is omitted by Kⁱ. A. C. D^s. K. L. It seems more probable that it was carelessly omitted by some transcribers than inserted for any special reason.]

* Ver. 23.—[The E. V. again loses the point of the closing phrase, by rendering ἐν, through. The life is emphatically in Christ Jesus our Lord. Hence perhaps Χριστῷ ἰησοῦ.—E.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 12. Let not sin therefore reign [Μὴ οὖν βασιλεύειν ἡ ἀμαρτία]. The Apostle conducts the following discussion in a hortatory manner, but without actually "entering the sphere of exhortation," as Tholuck thinks. [The negative part of the exhortation, vers. 12, 13, corresponds to νεκροὶ μὲν τῇ ἀμαρτίᾳ, ver. 11; the positive part, ἀλλὰ παραστήσατε, ver. 13, answers to ζῶντας δὲ τῷ Θεῷ. So Meyer, Philippi, Alford, Hodge, &c.—P. S.] In a didactic respect he teaches that believers, by their transition from a state under the law to a state under grace, are first properly qualified and pledged to the service of righteousness, but are not free for the service of sin. That is, the true emancipation from outward legalism leads to an inward and free legalism, but not to Antinomianism. The οὖν indicates that ver. 11 shall be elaborated. But as the previous section has shown what is conformable to the state of grace in itself, the present section shows what is according to freedom from the hard service of sin, which was presupposed by bondage under the law. Let not sin now reign (imp.). The true sovereign command of grace is opposed to the false sovereign command of sin, which is still present as a broken power (Luther: Observe that holy people still have evil lusts in the flesh, which they do not follow). Tholuck: "Philippi and Meyer correctly remark, that the Apostle does not expressly make any concessions to the concupiscentia [ἐπιθυμίας]; yet his admonition does not extend any farther than that lust must not become a deed. Sin is represented as ruler in the body, which ruler is served by the μὲν as organs." That is, however, as the one who has been the ruler; and the methods are at the same time given for destroying the lusts of the flesh, that they—by the life in the Spirit, which also changes the members into instruments of righteousness—should not only be continually ignored, but also annulled. [Alford, in opposition to Chrysostom, who lays stress on βασιλεύειν, says: "It is no matter of comparison between reigning and indwelling merely, but between reigning and being deposed."—P. S.]

In your mortal body [ἐν τῷ θνητῷ ἡμῶν σώματι]. The σῶμα as θνητόν must be distinguished, on the one hand, from the σῶμα τῆς ἀμαρτίας of ver. 6, and, on the other, from the σῶμα νεκρόν of chap. viii. 10. The σῶμα τῆς ἀμαρτίας is the pseudo-plastic apparent body of the old man, and, as the sensual side of all sinfulness, is devoted with it to destruction. The body is a σῶμα νεκρόν so far as it no more asserts itself as a second principle of life with, or even superior to, the principle of the Spirit, but yields itself purely to the service of the Spirit. But a σῶμα θνητόν is the body so far as it, as the sensual organism of the earthly existence, has living organs, which shall be purified from the former service of sin and transferred to the service of righteousness. The σῶμα as a false principle is destroyed; the σῶμα as a secondary principle is dead, absolutely helpless; and the σῶμα as the organ of the spiritual principle is transformed into instruments of righteousness. It is called mortal, because its earthly propensity is toward sin and death, and it must be compulsorily brought into the service of righteousness, and exercised as for a spiritual military service in antithesis to the body of the resurrection, which will be the pure power and excellence of righteousness. Meyer is therefore correct in rejecting the interpretation, that θνητόν is the same as νεκρόν (dead to sin; Turretin, Ernesti, and others).

But it may be asked, For what purpose is the adjective θνητόν?

1. Calvin: per contemptum vocat mortale [ut doceat totam hominis naturam ad mortem et exitum inclinare]. Köllner: It is dishonorable to make the spirit subject to this frail body.

2. Grotius: De vita altera cogitandum, nec formidandos labores hanc sane diuturnos. [Chrysostom, Theodoret, Reiche, likewise suppose that this word reminds us of the other life, and of the shortness of the conflict.—P. S.]

3. Flatt: Reminder of the brevity of sensual pleasure. [Comp. Theophylact].

4. Meyer, obscurely: It is absurd to make sin reign in the mortal body, if the Christian is dead to sin and alive to God.

5. Philippi: To call to mind that the wages of sin is death. [Philippi takes σῶμα in opposition to πνεῦμα.]

6. Tholuck, with Bullinger and Calixtus: Because sensual enticements are regarded as inseparable from the present sensuous organism, &c.

[7. Photius, Turretin, Ernesti: θνητόν is figuratively = dead; i. e., corrupt (in which sense νεκρός is often used).]

In all these definitions the relative dignity and estimate of the "mortal body," which are definitely declared in ver. 13, are not regarded; the same members, which until then had been instruments of unrighteousness, henceforth being instruments of righteousness. The organism of earthly existence and action, which has become mortal by sin, is naturally an organism for the service of the spirit. By the dominion of sin in it, its mortality became still more intense; but by the normal subjection of sin to the service of the Spirit, it shall be brought with it on the course toward everlasting life (ver. 22).

That ye should obey the lusts thereof [αἱς τὸ ὑπακούειν ταῖς ἐπιθυμίαις αὐτοῦ]. According to the sense, we must supply ὑμᾶς; and ὑπακούειν To the end that ye obey its lusts. Even if the body were holy, its impulses would have to be subject to the dominion of the spirit; much more must they be subject to the spirit, since they are diseased, irritable, excitable, and inclined to self-assertion and demoniacal self-distractedness.

Ver. 13. Nor render your members [Μηδὲ παριστάνετε τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν]. Without doubt παριστάνειν has reference here to enlistment or delivery for military service. The Apostle is writing to Rome, the metropolis of military affairs, and therefore derives his figure from Roman customs (comp. chap. xiii. 12); just as he admonishes the Corinthians by expressions that call up the Isthmian games (1 Cor. ix. 24), and speaks to the spiritual city of Ephesus concerning the battle with spirits (Eph. vi. 11, 12). Sin is already distinguished as the false βασιλεῖς, who causes the false summons to be promulgated that the members shall be ordered into his warfare against righteousness.—Your members. If the body has ceased to be an independent principle, only its members come into consideration (in the good sense of the principle: Divide et impera). According to Erasmus, Philippi, and others, the intellectual forces and activities (perception, will, understanding) are included in the term. According to Meyer, only the physical members are meant (the tongue, hand, foot, eye, &c.), "for which, however, intellectual action is a necessary supposition. The physical members are plainly meant as organs and symbols of ethical conduct (different from the pseudoplasmaic members; Col. iii. 5).

As weapons [or instruments] of unrighteousness [ὄπλα ἀδικίας]. Meyer says, of immorality. But, in war, people contend for the right or the wrong; therefore the expression ἀδικία must be strictly retained.—"Ὀπλα, according to the Vulgate, Theodore, Luther, Calvin, Bengel, and Meyer: weapons. Calixtus and De Wette [Stuart, Reiche, Hodge, Ewald, Alford], on the other hand: instruments. The former construction can by no means be favored by appealing to the fact that the βασιλεῖς suggests warriors in service, for the trope is already obliterated (?) in that term; but it is favored by the consideration that the Apostle also elsewhere—when he uses ὄπλα in the ethical sense—employs it in the meaning of 'weapons': Rom. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. vi. 7; x. 4" (Tholuck). [Meyer insists that ὄπλα, while so frequently used in the sense of instruments by classical authors, is never thus used in the New Testament.—R.]

To sin [τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ]. Personified as the presumptively false ruler (see chap. v. 12 ff.).

But render yourselves [ἀλλὰ παραστήσατε ἑαυτοὺς]. We must observe here a double antithesis: first, the aorist παραστήσατε in opposition to the previous present, παριστάνετε; second, ἑαυτοὺς in connection with the following καὶ τὰ μέλη, in opposition to the previous τὰ μέλη. Both are quite in harmony with the antithesis. For believers have already fundamentally placed themselves as such in the service of righteousness, and in complete unity with the centre of their life, while the man in the opposite service of sin yields his members individually to a foreign power. At all events, the Christian, as the servant of sin, would be led into the contradiction of wishing to remain free himself while he placed his members at the service of sin. On the aorist παραστήσατε, comp. Winer, p. 293; and Tholuck, p. 311. (It denotes, "according to Fritzsche, what happens in the moment; according to Meyer, that which occurs forthwith; and according to Philippi, that which appears once;" Tholuck). Tholuck does not attach importance to the difference between the aorist imperative and the present imperative, since he concurs with those who disregard the temporal reference. We hold, with Herm. Schmidt (De imperativis; Wittenberg, 1833): "The imperative present commands to occupy one's self with something; the imperative aorist, to accomplish something." We add to this: That something already under consideration, or already undertaken, must be carried through. [The greater definiteness implied in the aorist must not be lost sight of, whatever view be adopted.—R.]

As being alive from the dead [ὡς ἐκ νεκρῶν ζῶντας]. The ὡς does not introduce a figure, but means rather (comp. ver. 11): regarding yourselves as those who are alive, almost = since you are. The phrase is a condensed description of the state of ἐαυτοῖς. While the reference is undoubtedly ethical, yourselves must be taken in its widest meaning—body, soul, and spirit; and the implication is, that the whole man was once dead in sin (not to sin, as ver. 11), but now is alive; hence the pertinence of the exhortation. The reference to a field of battle is extremely doubtful, since it introduces a new figure so soon after vers. 2–11.—[R.] Meyer: Those who, from dead persons, have become living. We assume the figure of a field of battle. The Christians lay there as dead or slain persons, and from dead persons they became alive; therefore they can and should go over to the banner of righteousness.

And your members [καὶ τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν]. Hodge paraphrases and: and especially; but as seems to have an inferential force here.—[R.] Because they have become themselves the warriors of God, they must also regard their members as God's weapons, the weapons of righteousness for God.*

Ver. 14. For sin shall not have dominion over you [ἁμαρτία γὰρ ὑμῶν οὐ κυριεύσει]. The future, according to Melancthon: delicissima consolatio; erroneously regarded by Rosenmüller, Flatt, and others, as imperative. If we were to distinguish between the expression of confident supposition (Calov. and De Wette) and consoling promise (Chrysostom, Grotius, and Tholuck), we would prefer the former meaning, since the predomi-ant train of thought throughout is didactic; yet the latter is also included.

For ye are not under law [οὐ γὰρ ἔστε ὑπὸ νόμου]. Notwithstanding the preceding declaration in chap. v. 20, the expression continues to be an oxymoron, since the law is recognized as a carrier to sin. The sense is: freedom from the law gives you so little freedom to sin, that it is only by the exercise of grace upon you that your freedom from sin has begun. [Meyer: "Were they under the law, Paul could not have given this promise (i. e., in the preceding clause), for the law is the strength of sin (1 Cor. xv. 56), multiplies sin (v. 20), in which aspect he intends to explain it further in chap. vii." Law is here used in its widest significance. See Hodge.—R.]

Under the dominion of grace [ὑπὸ χάριτος], which operates as an inward and new principle of life; while the law, as such, confronted the inward life only as an outward demand—threatening, arousing, and casting down; and in this form it presupposed the dominion of sin. Bondage under the law betokened bondage under sin, without being able to remove it; but it is removed by the dominion of grace, which has become an inward law of life. [The general idea undoubtedly is: "Ye are not under a legal dispensation, but a gracious one" (Stuart); yet the whole context forbids the exclusive reference to the method of justification. "Grace" is here used in its widest sense; "the Divine grace, shown in Christ, is the power under which ye stand" (Meyer), and which assures that ye shall not be under the dominion of sin.—"Gratia non solum peccata diluit, sed ut non peccemus facit" (Augustine).—R.]

Ver. 15. What then? May we sin [Τί οὖν; ἁμαρτήσωμεν]. See Textual Note*.—R.]. According to Rückert, Meyer, and others, a new section should commence here; which Tholuck is right in opposing. The unity of the following with the foregoing is the fundamental thought: freedom from sin. Also the reference to the members continues throughout what follows (ver. 19). There is, however, a modification. Down to ver. 14 the antithesis was rather an ethical demand; but now a religious confirmation predominates. There, the new life was contrasted with the old as a voluntary entrance into the military service of righteousness over against the wicked, mercenary service of sin; here, the Apostle (speaking according to human analogy) presents the obligation of a new service in contrast with the old service. In the present verse Paul therefore brings out prominently the fearful consequence of the impure Antinomian view of the state of grace, in order to condemn it forthwith. To this earnest rejection of a horrible consequence, arising so frequently in ancient and modern times, the conjunctive ἁμαρτήσωμεν corresponds better than the future. [Dr. Hodge well remarks: "Such has been the objection to the doctrines of grace in all ages. And the fact that this objection was made to Paul's teachings, proves that his doctrine is the same with that against which the same objection is still urged." This consideration should also prevent any limitation of "grace" to justification.—On μή γένοιτο, see iii. 4, Textual Note*, p. 112; comp. Comm. Gal., p. 49, foot-note.—R.]

Ver. 16. To whom ye yield yourselves. With the know ye not,* the Apostle points to the analogy of a principle of civil law; but he gives the application in the same sentence with it. To whom you once voluntarily gave and pledged yourselves for obedience [with a view to obedience; Alford] as servants (slaves), his servants ye are, and him ye obey; be it as servants of sin unto death, &c. Thus the two services preclude each other, since the masters deny each other (Matt. vi. 24). According to De Wette, Philippi, and Tholuck, the emphasis rests on ἔστε; according to Meyer, on δοῦλος. But the actual being and availing, with its consequence, is plainly the principal idea here; the being servants is at the same time connected with it. The ὃ ἵπαν is explained by Reiche: to whom you have to obey. But this weakens the sense.

[Either, or. The disjunctive ἤτοι occurs only here in the New Testament. It lays special emphasis on the first alternative (Meyer). "Either this alone, or that; there is no third;" Hartung, ii. p. 356 f.—R.] The ἤτοι, ἤ, a strong either, or. Sin is personified here too. But the ἵπακοή is personified in opposition to it as the παρακοή (1 Peter i. 14); and this is a beautiful expression for the Christian's freedom in his obedience.* Plainly, the Apostle here makes the freedom of choice precede the servum arbitrium; according to ver. 17, the former was bound a long time ago.

Of sin unto death [ἁμαρτίας εἰς θάνατον]. According to Fritzsche and Reiche, physical death is meant; but according to Meyer and Tholuck (the early view of which latter was that it is spiritual death), after Chrysostom, eternal death is spoken of. Meyer's ground against the acceptance of physical death is, that it is not the consequence of individual sin, and cannot be averted from the δοῦλος ἵπακοῆς—an argument which Tholuck accepts. But how could this occur, if there were not in earthly life a hundred-fold gradations of physical death? The death of the suicide, for example, is not to be explained simply by the fall of Adam. And thus spiritual death has its degrees also. Therefore the Apostle speaks of death in general (so also Philippi); † as, according to 1 Cor. xv., his thorn is sin, which has eternal death in prospect. Even the forms of the misery of sin which precede death are not to be excluded.

Of obedience unto righteousness [ἵπακοῆς εἰς δικαιοσύνην]. Meyer, just as incorrectly, presents the δικαιοσύνη as the final result for the servants of obedience, in contrast with exclusively eternal death. The righteousness of faith believe." Jowett paraphrases thus: "Know ye not that what ye make yourselves, ye are!" This view he takes to avoid tautology, yet this seems to depart from the Apostle's line of thought.—R.]

* [Forbes calls attention to the deviation from the strict parallelism in this verse: "of obedience unto righteousness," instead of "of righteousness unto life." He intimates that thus Paul marks this distinction: To sin we give ourselves of our own free choice and power as bondsmen, but we cannot of our own free choice, and by any effort of will, give ourselves to the service of righteousness; hence all we can do is to yield ourselves up to God's grace, to save us, as servants of obedience, for or unto righteousness, as a "gift" to be bestowed upon us, and wrought into us by His Spirit. He also notices that the direct expression: servants to righteousness does not occur until ver. 19—the caution being attributable to anxiety lest such an expression be turned to legalistic account.—R.]

† [De Wette: "Sündensclend überhaupt." So Alford: "The state of misery induced by sin, in all its awful aspects and consequences." The wider view is necessary, since the word occurs frequently, in the remainder of the chapter and in chap. vii., in such a connection that a limitation is unfortunate. Meyer's exegesis is hampered throughout by his view of θάνατος.—R.]

* Stuart: "I take it for granted that ye know and is certainly assumed here; but the "uprightness which is adjudged to believers in the judgment" is gradually developed to its completion from obedience as the form of the new life.* (On the construction of this verse with vers. 17, 18 [Rückert and Reiche], by which ver. 18 is the propositio major, ver. 17 the minor, and ver. 18 the conclusion. Comp. Tholuck.)†

Ver. 17. But thanks to God, &c. [χαρις δὲ τῷ Θεῷ, κ.τ.λ.]. It may be asked, whether the first proposition is a mere introduction to the second as the principal proposition, so that the thanksgiving refers merely to obedience (Grotius, Estius, and others); or whether the thanksgiving refers to both propositions (Meyer, Tholuck).‡ Tholuck says, in favor of the latter view: "Since ἤτε precedes, and μέν is wanting, ἤτε must be read with all the more emphasis; as 1 Cor. vi. 11: καὶ ταῦτα τίνος ἤτε; Eph. v. 8: ἤτε γὰρ ποτε ἀνότοι; and the immediate object of thanksgiving is that this time of the bondage to sin is past." Evidently, the deliverance from the service of death is in itself already a satisfactory ground for praise and thanksgiving; yea, we naturally thank God for this with the greatest emotion (God be praised: delivered!), although this negative side of salvation cannot be regarded as separate from the positive.

But ye obeyed from the heart [ὕπηκουσατε δὲ ἐκ καρδίας]. They were only conditionally voluntary in their bondage to sin; but they have become obedient from the very bottom of their heart.

That form of teaching whereunto ye were delivered [εἰς ὃν παρεδόθητε τὴν δοξαζῆς]. The simplest solution of the attraction εἰς ὃν παρεδ. is τῷ τύπῳ τῆς διδασκ., εἰς ὃν παρεδόθητε.§ Explanations:

1. Christian doctrine in general (the most common). Meyer says properly to the contrary: By this the expression τὴν δοξ. would not be explained. Beza, indeed, explains it: A seal under which we are placed to receive its impression.]

2. The doctrinal form of the gospel according to Paul, in opposition to anti-Paulinism (De Wette, Meyer, and others).¶

3. Œcumenius, Calvin, and others, have taken the word in the sense of the ideal which the doctrine holds up. For a still more untenable explanation by Van Hengel, see Meyer.

* [Prof. Stuart here also confounds δικαιοσύνη with δικαιώσις, and unfortunately paraphrases: obedience which is unto justification. This is open to lexical as well as theological objections. Δικ. is subjective (Hodge).—R.]

† [Tholuck agrees with Meyer, who takes ver. 18 as the major, ver. 17 as the minor, but regards the conclusion as self-evident, and hence not expressed.—R.]

‡ [So Philippi, Hodge, Alford, and modern commentators generally, taking the first clause as meaning: that it is over. Wordsworth, however, finds here "a mode of speaking, where a bad thing is represented as comparatively good, so that the superiority of what is contrasted with it may appear more clear." This seems totally irrelevant.—R.]

§ [Stuart prefers to find no attraction, since δικαιοσύνη governs the accusative, but there seems to be a modification of the meaning in such cases. On the grammatical difficulty, see Meyer in loco, Winer, p. 155.—R.]

¶ [Wordsworth thus carries out the metaphor of the verse: "You readily obeyed the mould of Christian Faith and Practice, into which, at your baptism, you were poured, as it were, like soft, ductile and fluent metal, in order to be cast, and take its form. You obeyed this mould; you were not rigid and obstinate, but were plastic and pliant, and assumed it readily."—R.]

‡ [Adopting this view in the main, we prefer teaching to doctrine. The latter is more abstract, but the reference here seems to be to definite forms of instruction.—R.]

Tholuck first repudiates the presumption of anti-Paulinism. Yet it does, indeed, come into consideration, so far as it judaistically obscured the Pauline doctrine of free grace. Tholuck is then inclined to accept the explanation of Beza, and says "that it is by no means a common expression 'to be delivered to a doctrine,' even if, with Chrysostom and Orlanzen, we consider at the same time the guidance of God as the active factor." But the Apostle says, in Gal. i. 6, what he holds concerning this type of doctrine in opposition to its obscurations.

God himself has committed them to this school of faith.

Παρεδόθητε is not middle (Fritzsche), but passive. [Winer, p. 245, seems to justify the change to the active form which the E. V. adopts, but there is a good reason for the choice of the passive, viz., the activity of God in committing them to this type of teaching. This thought appropriately follows "Thanks to God." So Meyer, comp. Philippi.—R.] It follows, from what has been said, that the Church was already won over by the Apostle's friends to the Pauline form of the gospel. But here the matter treated of is the essential element; the true energy of freedom from the law is the true energy of life in obedience unto righteousness.

Ver. 18. And being made free from sin [ἐλευθερωθέντες δὲ ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας]. Aorist participle, referring to the definite act of deliverance. The clause stands in close connection with ver. 17, not as a conclusion (since οὖν would occur in that case), but rather as an expansion.—R.]. The δὲ leads us to emphasize the expression: ye are enslaved, or made servants, &c. From the nature of the case, they knew the negative past—free from sin—earlier and better than this full consequence: ye became the servants of righteousness.

Ver. 19. I speak after the manner of men. The ἀνθρωπίνον is analogous to the κατ' ἀνθρώπου πον in chap. iii. 5.* By slavery, which was in full bloom in Rome, the Apostle clearly explains to them the absolute force of the new principle of life.

Because of the infirmity of your flesh [διὰ τὴν ἀσθένειαν τῆς σαρκὸς ὑμῶν]. The flesh, or the sensuous and susceptible fullness of the body, is not only negatively weak, but also positively diseased and disturbed, both of which facts are expressed by the ἀσθένεια. It may be asked, however, whether the Apostle means here the weakness of intelligence arising from this infirmity, by which he was compelled to represent to them the highest liberty under the figure of servitude (Bengel, Meyer, and De Wette, with reference to 1 Cor. iii. 1); or whether he meant their practical infirmity. The first view—that is, the reference to intelligence—appears also in the intimation that the Apostle announces a popular explanation (Vatable, Ernesti, and Rosenmüller). The latter view is favored by Origen, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Calvin, &c.: "I require nothing which your fleshly weakness could not do," or the like. The thought here could not be unintelligible to the Roman Christians; therefore the practical reference by all means preponderates; but not in the sense already given: "I require of you nothing too difficult; I require only the degree of obedience which you formerly rendered to sin."

* [Hodge: "The former characterizes as human the thing said, and the other the manner of saying it." Comp. Meyer, however.—This apologetic form of expression concerns the description of "true freedom" as a δουλεία.—R.]

The Apostle's thought can rather be explained by what follows: "Yield your members servants," &c. That is, even if, in your spiritual life, you feel that you are as freemen, you must nevertheless restrain your members strictly in discipline and obedience on account of the infirmity of your flesh. With all freedom, the question in reference to the bodily members is an appropriate ascetic discipline, such as the Apostle exercised in reference to his own body (1 Cor. ix. 27; comp. Gal. v. 24); and therefore the figurative form of his expression does not merely correspond to the antithesis as denoting an unlimited obedience, but is established in a more special sense as the requirement of a strict discipline. This view obviates Meyer's reminder: λίγω cannot mean require. The Apostle does not express a requirement, but a principle; by which analogy the Christian, in his freedom, has to make his bodily life absolutely subject. Lachmann [apparently Olshausen] and Fritzsche unjustifiably make a parenthesis of this clause, ἀνθρώπων, κ.τ.λ.

[With Bengel, Olshausen, De Wette, Hodge, Alford, and many others, I am disposed to give a decided preference to the first view, viz., that this clause refers to what precedes. Commentators differ as to the force of the terms, but the following positions seem most tenable. Infirmity means intellectual weakness, growing out of their carnal condition (σάρκος, gen. auctoris). The ethical reference is in σάρξ, not in σθένεια. On σάρξ, see chap. vii.—R.]

For as ye have rendered your members [ὥσπερ γὰρ παραστήσατε τὰ μέλη ἑμῶν. Ἰὰρ is explicative (Tholuck, Meyer). Δούλα, used as an adjective, only here in New Testament (Hodge).—R.] To servitude. The apparently free pleasure was, in fact, a hard bondage under sin.—To uncleanness [τῇ ἀκαθαρσίᾳ.] We hold that ἀκαθαρσία has especial reference to the heathen portion (according to chap. i.), and to iniquity, ἀνομία, on the contrary, to the Jewish portion (according to chap. ii.). Meyer makes this distinction: ἀκαθ. is sin as ethically defiling man; and ἀνομ. is sin as violation of the Divine law. Spener, De Wette, and others, distinguish thus: Uncleanness as defilement of themselves and of sin toward others. Tholuck considers ἀκαθ. as species, and ἀνομία as the generalizing genus of sin. But the genus is declared in what follows. The ἀκαθ., or fleshly sin in the narrower sense, and the ἀνομία, or violations of the law in the narrower sense, converge in the ἀνομία in the wider sense in guilt and condemnation before the law—which constitute the antithesis to ἀγιασμός. Therefore the explanation of unto iniquity,* εἰς τὴν ἀνομ., as from one sin to others, is incorrect (Ecumenius, Erasmus, Luther, and Grotius). The duality of the service of sin is worthy of note: a service in part to uncleanness and in part to insubordination. This could not be the case (according to the axiom that no man can serve two masters) if both were not connected.

Even so now render your members as servants to righteousness unto sanctification [οὕτως νῦν παραστήσατε τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν δούλα τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ εἰς ἁγιασμόν] Righteousness, as the new principle of life, should bear unconditional sway over the members; holiness should be the end and result. Meyer translates ἀγιασμός, holiness. To present holiness. Even Tholuck does not understand the word to mean an effort to be holy. He refers to ver. 22; but there ἀγιασμός is still distinct from the τέλος as movement toward the τέλος. He then quotes Heb. xii. 1-4. But this passage does not decide positively for the expression holiness. For completed holiness is not the preliminary condition for beholding the Lord, but its fruit. But, according to this very passage, ἀγιασμός cannot mean a striving; otherwise we would have to translate: strive after the striving of holiness. The expressions quoted by Tholuck from Basil and Ecumenius do not both prove the same thing. Ecumenius understands by the word, absolute purity; Basil, thorough consecration to the holy God. And this is the sense. Ἀγιασμός means, first of all, the act of consecration ("According to Bleek, on Heb. xii. 14, it does not occur among the classics; but Dion. Halic., i. 21, as in the Sept., has it of acts of consecration;" Tholuck), then the condition of being consecrated, or of holiness—an idea which does not perfectly coincide with the idea of completed holiness, and in which there is at once expressed the constant ethical movement, rather than a substantial and quiescent condition.

[On the lexical grounds Lange advances, sanctification is the preferable meaning—one which accords with the context. The issue (not, the end; the use of the phrase in ver. 22 is against this) is sanctification, which indeed results in perfect holiness, but comes into view here rather as a progressive state than as an ultimate one. Undoubtedly righteousness describes the principle, and ἀγ. the actual condition (Philippi), but in the sense given by Lange above. Meyer says the word always means holiness—never sanctification—in the New Testament. Compare, on the contrary, Bengel, Rom. i. 4.—R.]

Ver. 20. For when ye were servants of sin [ὅτι γὰρ δούλοι ἦτε τῆς ἁμαρτίας]. According to Fritzsche, the γὰρ indicates the elucidation of ver. 19; but according to Meyer and Tholuck, it announces the establishing of it. It is, however, rather a continued elucidation of the preceding than an establishment of what follows.* The Apostle answers the question: wherefore should the service of righteousness be a bond-service? Answer: because ye, who were formerly the servants of sin, became free in relation to righteousness. They were not the freemen of righteousness, as though it had made them free, but in relation to it; therefore the dative. The argument lies in the necessity of the complete reversion of the earlier relation. Since sin and righteousness preclude each other, they were free in relation to righteousness, because they were the bondmen of sin. Therefore, since they have now become free from sin, they must be the bondmen of righteousness. The fearful expression, free as regards righteousness [ἐλευθεροὶ ἦτε τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ, dative of reference], does not mean that righteousness had no claims upon you (Tholuck), but that it had no part in you.* According to Koppe and Reiche, this is ironical; a position opposed by Meyer, and now also by Tholuck. There is certainly nothing ironical in the sentence, but there is in the word ἐλευθεροί. For we can no more accept it in a strict sense, than that they should be the slaves of righteousness. As this latter bondage is not only freedom, but also spontaneity, so was that freedom the deepest slavery. [That was a sorrowful freedom! Why find irony, then?—R.]

* [A question arises as to the exact meaning of the phrase εἰς τὴν ἀνομίαν. It may mean, for the purpose of iniquity—i. e., in order to work iniquity (Stuart, Hodge, Meyer), in order that this shall be actually presented, or issuing in iniquity, &c. indicating the resultant state (Tholuck, De Wette, Alford, Lange). The latter is preferable, because the word seems to refer to a state rather than an act. Besides, its antithesis is εἰς ἁγιασμόν, which indicates the result, as we infer from its use in ver. 22.—R.]

* [The difficult connection of the verse is satisfactorily explained in Webster and Wilkinson: "γὰρ restates the view given of their former condition in respect to sin and righteousness, in preparation for the final and most accurate statement of their present spiritual condition" (ver. 22)." Meyer (who has changed his views), in 4th ed., also finds in this verse a preparation for the full statement of a motive for obeying the precept of ver. 19. He groups vers. 20-22 as one in thought, calling attention, however, to the somewhat tragical force of our verse, with its emphatic words in the parallel clauses.—R.]

Ver. 21. What fruit had ye then therefore? Things whereof ye are now ashamed [τίνα οὖν καρπὸν εἶχετε τότε; ἐφ' οἷς νῦν ἐπαισχύνεσθε. See Textual Note 10.—R.]. Here are two divergent constructions:

1. The question closes with τότε. Then follows the answer. (Thus the Pesh., Theodore of Mopvestia, Theodoret, Erasmus, Luther, and many others, down to De Wette, Lachmann, Tischendorf, and Philippi.) [So Alford, Webster and Wilkison.]

2. The question continues to ἐπαισχύνεσθε. What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? Answer: None; for the final result of them (these things) is death (thus Chrysostom, (Ecumenius, Beza, Calov., Grotius, &c.; Bengel, Meyer). [So Stuart, Hodge, Wordsworth.]

3. Reiche, in conjunction with the latter construction, explains thus: What deeds, of which ye are now ashamed, proceeded from your service of sin (namely, your bringing forth fruit)? This third construction is utterly untenable; καρπός would then recur as plural in ἐφ' οἷς, and καρπ. ἔχον would mean: to bring forth fruit.

There are the following reasons against Meyer's explanation: 1. First of all, he must insert an ἐκείνων before ἐφ' οἷς, and introduce a negation into the question, in order to explain the form of the answer, τὸ γὰρ, &c. 2. The question is, What fruit had ye then? not, What will ye have finally? 3. After the antithesis, it should be made emphatic that they had formerly no fruit, but rather pernicious and horrible deceptions, but that now they bring forth their fruit. 4. By Meyer's construction, ἐφ' οἷς νῦν ἐπαισχύνεσθε would be converted into an enervating remark. Meyer says, against explanation No. 1: 1. According to ver. 22, the question, in antithesis to ver. 21, is the having the fruit, and not the quality of it. This is wrong: the καρπός is qualified, εἰς ἀγιασμόν. 2. Paul must have written τίνας καρπούς, or ἐφ' ᾧ; as if the metaphorical idea of fruit, or gain, could not be represented in a variety of things. 3. Paul never ascribes καρπὸς to immorality; he attributes ἔργα to it (Gal. v. 19); he predicates καρπός of only what is good (Gal. v. 22; Eph. v. 9; Phil. i. 11); indeed, he even designates the ἔργα τοῦ σκότους as ἄκαρπα. But the Apostle says the same thing here, when he asks, What fruit had ye then? He even denies that they had real fruit—the true gain of life. On the other hand, they reaped, instead of true fruit, base deceptions, things of which they are now ashamed, and in which their future death is announced. Comp.

Gal. vi. 8. Tholuck thinks that between the two constructions there is no demonstrative decision.

For the end of those things is death [τὸ μὲν γὰρ τέλος ἐκείνων θάνατος]. Death must be understood here in its complete and comprehensive meaning; not eternal death exclusively (Meyer).

Meyer, with Lachmann, accepts μὲν, and translates: for the end is indeed death; but without observing that this contradicts his own construction of the passage. It is only on the first construction that μὲν has any meaning. [See Textual Note 11. Having already accepted μὲν on diplomatic and critical grounds, before carefully considering the exegetical results, I am now disposed to insist upon retaining it, and using it as decisive in regard to the construction of the verse.—R.]

Ver. 22. But now having been made free from sin [νῦν δὲ ἐλευθερωθέντες ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας]. The evil relation has been completely reversed by faith.—And become servants to God [δουλωθέντες δὲ τῷ θεῷ]. Notice the definiteness of the aorist participles.—R.]. God himself here takes the place of δικαιοσύνη, for their relation is now one of personal love.—Ye have your fruit unto sanctification [ἔχετε τὸν καρπὸν ἡμῶν εἰς ἀγιασμόν]. The present indicates fruit already. The sense: have your reward, seems unjustifiable here. Εἰς is consecutive here (Meyer), as I hold it to be in ver. 19 also. Ἀγιασμός, sanctification, as above, a progressive state, the immediate issue of the fruit of their personal relation to God, the final issue follows.—R.]. They have fruit already in this new relation. Meyer: the καρπὸς τῆς ζωῆς, ver. 4.—Or the peace, chap. v. 1. But as, in the Old Testament, the firstlings served for the ἀγιασμός, so, in the New Testament, this is done by the whole fruit of the life of faith. Tholuck translates here also: holiness [without excluding the idea of sanctification, however.—R.].

And the end everlasting life [τὸ δὲ τέλος ζωῆς αἰώνιον]. That is, ye have everlasting life. Meyer says, this possession is still an ideal one. It is rather an essential one; John iii. 36; Matt. v. 8; Heb. xii. 14; 1 John iii. 2. [We must take "life" here in its most extended sense, as "death" in ver. 21. Meyer's difficulty arises from his limiting the meaning of these two words throughout. We have already eternal life in germ; in its fullness it is the τέλος of all our fruit and fruitfulness. Not, however, by natural, inherent laws of development. The next verse sets forth anew the two ends, and the inherent difference.—R.]

Ver. 23. For the wages of sin is death [τὸ γὰρ ὄψωνιον τῆς ἁμαρτίας θάνατος]. Tholuck: "Ὁψώνιον, and in the plural ὄψωνια, wages of the servant and the soldier; therefore possibly, though not necessarily, a continuation of the figure of military service; comp. ὄπλα, ver. 13. Under this supposition, Grotius, Bengel, and Weinstein made χαρίσμα to mean the donationum militare. Yet the technical word for such a gift is ἡ ἐπίδοσις (Fritzsche)." The figurative character of the antithesis lies in the fact that sin pays its soldiers and slaves miserable wages (Erasmus: ὄψωνια, vile verbum), namely, death; but God (as King) pays His children and servants, not a reward, but the honor-gift of His favor, which is eternal life. Tholuck defines the antithesis thus: as far as sin is concerned, her due is according to justice; but, on the other hand, what is received by the believing accord ance of God's saving blessings can be regarded only as a gift—namely, the imparting of salvation, the eternal completion of life. This antithesis is correct so far as it is not pushed beyond the proper measure, so that justice does not appear as mere arbitrary authority. In the present passage, however, this antithesis recedes; for the question is not concerning the righteous punishment of sin, but the way in which sin itself, regarded as false dominion, pays the reward. The gift of God also, at all events, presupposes the merit of believers, but yet remains a gift, because the whole idea of gain falls to the ground where merit is not considered, and where even the preliminary conditions of good conduct are bestowed as a gift.* For the idea of wages, see 1 Cor. ix. 7. "The plural (more usual than the singular) may be explained from the manifold elements of original natural reward, and from the numerous coins of later money-wages;" Meyer.

In Christ Jesus our Lord [ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ τῷ κυρίῳ ἡμῶν]. Stuart follows the inexact sense of the E. V.: "through the redemption or atonement of Christ." True; but not what Paul says here. In Christ Jesus is an expression which has a full, rich meaning of its own. In this case, we may ask whether the phrase limits God, or gift of God, or is used more generally. Meyer says: in Christ it rests, is causally founded, that the gift of God is eternal life. Webster and Wilkinson: "in Him, by virtue of His relation to Deity, God is the giver; in Him, we, as united with Him, having an interest in Him, are recipients.—R.J. He is not only the source, but also the central treasure of our eternal life.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. It is certainly not accidental that the word to rule, βασιλεύειν, occurs so frequently in the Epistle to the Romans (chap. v. 14, 17, 21; vi. 12); likewise the word weapons, ὅπλα, here, and in chap. xiii. 12. See the Exeg. Notes, where reference is made to the Apostle's similar allusions to local relations in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, as well as in the Epistle to the Ephesians. His epistles in general abound in these evidences of truth to life. In the Epistle to the Galatians, for example, we see very plainly the Galatian fickleness; in the Epistles to the Corinthians, we see the city of Corinth portrayed; and in the Epistle to the Colossians, the Phrygian popular spirit, &c. Such evidences of authenticity are regarded by the critics of Baur's school as mere cobwebs, while they convert cobwebs of the barest probability into important and decisive evidence.

2. In this section the Apostle passes from the figure of military service to that of servitude, in order to portray, in every relation, Christian freedom in its contrast with the bondage of man in sin.

3. On ver. 12. The despotic dominion of sin in the mortal body of the unregenerate, is an ethical copy of physical demoniacal possession. Sin, as a foreign force, has penetrated the individual life, and riots there as lord and master. Christianity now consists essentially in raising the shield of the Spirit against this usurping despotism, in the power of the triumph, dominion, and fellowship of Christ.

* [On χάρισμα, see v. 15 ff.—The antithesis is different here, yet related—there, fall, transgression; here, wages, but of sin.—R.J.]

4. Ver. 13. If the real Christian should again serve sin, his conduct would be a voluntary, cowardly, and inexcusable surrender of his arms to a hostile power already overthrown. But, according to the Apostle's view, the whole life of humanity is a moral struggle of the spirit between righteousness and unrighteousness, in which all the human members are arms that contend for either righteousness or unrighteousness. Man, physiologically regarded, is born naked, without weapons or arms; ethically considered, he is "armed to the teeth;" his members have throughout the significance of moral arms.

5. The conclusion made by non-legal impurity, that sin is made free, because we are not under law, but under grace, is reversed by Paul, who says that, for this reason, sin is to be regarded as abrogated and excluded. The law does not make sinners, but it suits sinners; bondage under the law corresponds to bondage under sin, and the law cannot annul this bondage. To him who stands under the law, his own inmost nature is still a strange form; for the inmost nature, in its living character, signifies the inwardness of the law, freedom from the letter of the law, liberty. To be estranged from one's self is, therefore, to be still in the bondage of sin, and therefore under that of the law also, as the foreign form of the inmost norms of life. But in grace, man has become at once free from sin and the law, because by grace he has come to himself (Luke xv. 15), and because it has written the law, as the word of the Spirit, on his heart.* On the power of sin, see Tholuck, p. 313; on the nova obedientia, p. 314.

6. On ver. 16. Life is throughout a consequence of an established principle, either for death or for life, whether man may have made this principle—his self-determination—more or less clear to himself. Christianity is a thoroughly synthetical view of life—a view of life in its grand, complete, and fundamental relations. Adam, Christ—the state of bondage, the state of freedom, &c.

7. On ver. 17. When the Apostle thanks God that the Romans have not merely become Christians in a general sense, but have become obedient to the doctrinal form of the freedom of the gospel from the law, the application of this to the evangelical confession lies very near. The Apostle speaks here of definite doctrinal types, not so much in the formal as in the material sense. The antithesis is Judaizing Christianity.

8. On vers. 19, 20. That the members should be servants to righteousness, is not merely a figurative expression arising from the antithesis that they were enslaved to sin. Rather, this is a demand which follows from the fact that, in consequence of serving sin, they are afflicted with weakness of the flesh; and therefore, notwithstanding the freedom of the Christian spirit—yea, by virtue of it—the morbid and blunted natural forces, the animal na-

* [Stuart: "Christians are placed in a condition of which grace is the prominent feature: grace to sanctify as well as grace to renew the heart; grace to purify the evil affections; grace to forgive offences though often repeated, and thus to save from despair, and to excite to new efforts of obedience. Viewed in this light, there is abundant reason for asserting that Christians, under a system of grace will much more effectually throw off the dominion of sin, than they would do if under a mere law dispensation." Yet, if there be one point where there is most obscurity in the minds of the majority of professing Christians, it is here. That it has largely arisen from an obscuration of the doctrine of sanctification by grace, or rather the unwise summing of justification and sanctification on in discussing this Epistle, is painfully true.—R.J.]

tures, must be subjected, watched over, and controlled. Augustine teaches that the little tree, which has grown crooked on one side, is thereby stretched so that it can be bent a little toward the other side.

9. The fruit of the service of sin is first of all represented in bitter disappointments, confusion, disgrace, and shame; finally, in death. The reward of sin is, from its very nature, the low wages for slavish or military service, and in addition to this, further contemptible pay, viz., death. How glorious does the honorable gift of eternal life appear in comparison with this wretched reward! See the Exeg. Notes. We must here reject the exaggerations of the idea of gracious retribution, as well on the side of arbitrary authority as on the side of reward. In human relations, gain is a lower form than merit; but the donation goes far beyond the merit, since it, as the gift of personal magnanimity, will more than outweigh the work of personal worth. Everywhere in the kingdom of love, to say nothing of the kingdom of grace, all idea of merit falls to the ground; but the appropriateness of the reward to the dignity of the child and the worthiness of the servant, which are bestowed by God and religiously and morally appropriated, do not fall to the ground. Grace is not thereby so glorified that it is absolved from justice.* On the ὡς αἰσώς, see Comm. on the Gospel of John, iii. 15.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The well-established apostolical admonition to a moral course of life: 1. To whom is it directed? 2. What does it require? 3. By what is it established?—Our body is mortal (ver. 12).—In whose service should our members be? 1. Not in the service of unrighteousness; but, 2. In the service of righteousness (ver. 13).—In which service do our weapons hold out better? 1. Many believe in the service of unrighteousness; but there they are destroyed; 2. Christian experience teaches, on the other hand, that it is in the service of righteousness, for there they remain untouched (ver. 13).—Under the law there is death, but under grace there is life (ver. 14).—Law and grace.

Should we sin, since we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid! Because freedom from the law is (1.) not lawlessness, but (2.) obedience to righteousness [comp. Luther's work on the Freedom of a Christian Man], (vers. 15–23).—What is it to be obedient in heart to the form of doctrine with which we are connected? 1. Not only to be orthodox, but also believing (ver. 17).—The form of apostolical doctrine. 1. What must we understand thereby? (The Apostle Paul's doctrine of justification by faith.) 2. How far is this form of importance for us? (ver. 17).—Christian preachers should never forget to so speak after the manner of men that everybody can understand, chap. iii. 5 (ver. 19).—The fruits of serving sin and serving God: 1. The fruit of the former is death; 2. The fruit of the latter is eternal life (ver. 21).—What is the fruit of sin? 1. A fruit of which one must be ashamed; 2. One whose end is death (ver. 21).—What is the fruit of righteousness? 1. One of holiness; 2. One whose end is eternal life.—The precious fruit of holiness. It is not only to be regarded as (1.) lovely, but (2.) it makes wise, and joyous, and blessed (vers. 21, 22).—Death, and eternal life. 1. The former is the wages of sin; the latter is God's gift in Jesus Christ our Lord.

LUTHER: In His death, that even we should die like Him. Observe that believers have still wicked lusts in the flesh, which they do not obey (ver. 12).—So long as grace rules, the conscience remains free and controls sin in the flesh; but without grace, sin rules, and the law condemns the conscience (ver. 14).

STARKE: Sin still arises even in the regenerate, and they can again fall under its dominion; therefore they need the warning (ver. 12).—The pious are never without law, and yet not under the law, but in it (ver. 14).—Whoever still permits sin to rule over him, cannot be under grace (ver. 14).—To be a servant of sin, is the greatest misery; but to have been a servant of sin is the greatest blessedness (ver. 17).—Justification impels, moves, and powerfully awakens toward the exercise of godliness; Pa. cxxi. 5 (ver. 18).

HEDINGER: To have piety from compulsion, fear, or politeness, in order to please others, or through one's own inclination, desire, praise, and advantage, was the delusion and bondage of Ishmael. The children of God are not under the law; 1 John iv. 18 (ver. 15).—Christians are not libertines, who can do what they please: they are servants, but servants of God! But where are such servants? How great is their number? Servants of court, fashion, passion, men, the state, self, and the devil, can be seen in abundance.

CRAMER: We shall never have a better fate than Paul, all of whose words have been perverted, misinterpreted, and made sinful.—Nothing is more becoming in a servant than obedience. Because we are now the servants of God, we must be steadfastly obedient from the heart until the end, according to God's word, and not according to our own notion (ver. 16).—QUESNEL: As the heart is, so is the use of the body. He serves the Lord who has chosen Him from the heart. A true Christian dedicates himself wholly to God, his heart by love, and his body by good works (ver. 13).—O blessed servitude with which we serve God! The service of men makes miserable people; but the service of God makes us saints in time and kings in eternity; Isa. xiv. 3 (ver. 22).—MÜLLER: God will have no compulsory service; a willing heart is the best offering; in the weak flesh a willing spirit, in the small work a great will; Pa. cx. 3 (ver. 19).—He who is free from righteousness has no part in Christ (ver. 20).—As the fruit grows from the seed, so does ignominy grow from sin, outwardly before the world and inwardly in the conscience before God (see ver. 21).

SPENER: Earnest and true Christianity consists herein: although sin is present, it does not reign (ver. 12).—We dare not think, that though the wages of sin is death, Christ has redeemed us from death, so that it will not finally injure us. For the redemption wrought by Christ will not help us any, if we do not become obedient to Him (ver. 23).

GERLACH: The body, with its impulses and members, is like a house full of arms or implements, for war or every kind of labor. In the service of sin, these members, the sinful impulses then become themselves members unto sin (ver. 13).—The servitude of obedience is also true freedom (ver. 17).—Since, by the gospel, man becomes a servant as well as a freeman, license is just as much excluded as slavish obedience to a foreign power (ver. 18).—If righteousness, so rules in us that all our members become its instruments, they will work together for the increase of our holiness (ver. 19).—A single glance at the fruit and the reward of sin must fill the Christian with shame, and therefore with abhorrence of the false freedom which abuses grace (ver. 21).—The perfect sanctification of man in body and soul is also his true, eternal life; for by the perfect communion of his whole nature with the Fountain of all life, God himself pervades him spiritually and bodily with the fulness of everlasting life (ver. 22).

LISCO: Earnest admonition to holiness of life (vers. 12-23): 1. Its import (vers. 12-14); 2. The impulse to a more zealous sanctification is the grace of redemption (vers. 15-23).

HEUBNER: Freedom from the law is not liberty to sin, or lawlessness (ver. 15).—In Christianity, the law of the letter, with its worldly power, does not rule, but the free law of love (ver. 15).—Obedience, the practice of God's will, awakens in us increasingly the spiritual power of life, and obtains spiritual health (ver. 16).—Purity and beauty of soul arise only from sinlessness (ver. 19).—The remembrance of earlier sins never becomes wholly effaced, but, 1. It keeps the converted person humble and watchful; it awakens, 2. thankfulness for the love and grace of God; 3. sympathy for others.

BE-SER: Believers are servants of righteousness (vers. 12-23).—Unrighteousness is a tyrannical master, who does not release his slaves according to their pleasure, but drives them ever farther from God's commandments (ver. 19).—Servitium Dei summa libertas (ver. 19).—The wages of sin is as manifold as the wages with which a general rewards his soldiers (bread, clothing, money); but its sum is death, empty death.

LANG: The service of sin, at first apparently a voluntary life of warfare, but afterwards plainly a mercenary condition, and finally a state of slavery.—The fearful self-deception in surrendering one's self to sin: 1. At the outset, slavery instead of freedom; 2. In continuance, always backward instead of forward; 3. Finally, death instead of life.—Voluntary return to bondage is the deepest guilt of sin.—Real death is explained by its opposite. It is not contrasted with the present, but with eternal life.—Eternal life as the fruit of the true service of God in righteousness: 1. As redemption; 2. As gift.

TILLOTSON: Sin is the blindness of our minds, the perverseness and crookedness of our wills, and the monstrous irregularity and disorder of our affections and appetites, the misplacing of our powers and faculties, and the setting of our wills and passions above our reason; all which is ugly and unnatural; and, if we were truly sensible of it, a matter of great shame and reproach to us.—BURKITT: Sin, as a raging and commanding king, has the sinner's heart for its throne, the members of the body for its service, the world, the flesh, and the devil for its grand council, lusts and temptations for its weapons and armory; and its fortifications are ignorance, sensuality, and fleshly reasonings.—Death, as the punishment of sin, is the end of the work, though not the end of the worker.—GROTIUS: It is the nature of all vices to grow upon a person by repetition.—CLARK: Let God have your hearts, and, with them, your heads, your hands, and your feet. Think and devise what is pure; speak what is true, edifying, just, and good; and walk steadily in the way that leads to everlasting felicity.—Every sinner has a daily pay, and this pay is death.—The sinner has a hell in his own bosom; all is confusion and disorder where God does not reign. If men were as much in earnest to get their souls saved as they are to prepare them for perdition, heaven would be highly peopled; and devils would have to be their own companions.—HOPKINSON: The motive to obedience is now love, and its aim the glory of God.—When a man is the slave of sin, he commonly thinks himself free; and, when most degraded, is often the most proud. When truly free, he feels himself most strongly bound to God, and when most elevated, is most humble.—J. F. H.]

FOURTH SECTION.—The transition, in principle and reality, of Christians from the service of the letter under the law into the service of the Spirit under grace, by virtue of the death of Christ. Believers should live in the consciousness that they are dead to the law.—THEOLUCK: "Your marriage with Christ, having taken the place of the dominion of the law, necessarily leads to such a dominion of God in a new life."

CHAP. VII. 1-6.

- 1 Know ye not, brethren (for I speak to them that [those who] know the law), how [omit how] that the law hath dominion over a man as long [ἐφ' ὅσον

TEXTUAL.

² Ver. 2.—[The active verb die should be substituted for be dead. The question arises, How can we best express the delicate shade of the Greek conditional proposition: ἴαν δὲ ἀποθάνῃ. Alford gives: have died; Wordsworth: shall have died; Amer. Bible Union: die. The first seems preferable; the second is strictly literal, since the aorist implies something which takes place antecedent to what is affirmed in the apodosis, but is not so elegant; the last is that bald conditional form, which should be reserved for the equivalent Greek form (εἰ with the optative or indicative). These remarks apply to the same clause, as it occurs in ver. 5.

³ Ver. 3.—[The negative belongs to the verb, and is joined to the noun, at the expense of forcefulness. Forbes remarks, that here the E. V. destroys the regularity of the parallelism. The first, second, and third lines in the original correspond exactly to the fourth, fifth, and sixth respectively.

Ἄρα οὖν ζῶντος τοῦ ἀνδρός μοιχαλὶς χρηματίζεται, ἴαν γένηται ἀντὶ τρίτης.
ἴαν δὲ ἀποθάνῃ ὁ ἀνὴρ, ἐλευθέρη ἵστιν ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου, τοῦ μὴ εἶναι αὐτῇ μοιχαλίδα, γενομένην ἀντὶ τρίτης.

So then, as long as her husband liveth,
She shall be called an adulteress,
If she be married to another man;
But if her husband be dead,
She is free from the law so as to be no adulteress,
Though she be married to another man.

⁸ Ver. 6.—[The Recepta reads ἀποθανόντος; a conjecture of Beza's, arising from a misunderstanding of the text, having no uncial support. D. E. F. G. (Vulgate, and some Latin authorities) read τοῦ θανάτου; a gloss, to get rid of the participle, which was regarded as disturbing the structure of the sentence (Meyer). N. A. B. C. K. L., many versions and fathers, warrant the correctness of ἀποθανόντος, which is now almost universally adopted. (The English text is amended to correspond.)

⁹ Ver. 6.—[The clause is ecclastic and present: σὺν δουλεύειν.

¹⁰ Ver. 6.—[If the reference be to the Holy Spirit, the above emendation is necessary. If not (as Dr. Lange holds), the clause should read: in newness of spirit and not in oldness of letter. See Exeg. Notes on both views.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Summary.—a. The figure of marriage and the law of marriage to describe the relations of believers to the law (vers. 1-3); b. The application of the figure: the marriage did not remain pure, because sin, whose motions were by the law, insinuated itself. It is dissolved by death (vers. 4-6).

Ver. 1. Know ye not. [Ἡ ἀγνοεῖτε. Comp. vi. 8. The particle ἦ implies a doubt, and connects always with some preceding categorical clause (Winer, p. 474).—On the connection. Meyer deems it a resumption of vi. 14, but immediately linked to last main thought (vi. 22), viz., that the Christian had his fruit unto holiness, and the end, eternal life (which is proved in vi. 23).—R.] Since the ἦ assumes a doubt at the beginning (chap. ii. 29; vi. 8); the Apostle intimates that not all the believers in Rome are conscious of the whole conclusion, that the gospel has made them free from the service of the Mosaic law—a conclusion that he will now make clear to them by the figure of the law of marriage. Therefore the question, Should you not fully know the consequence of the right of marriage in case one of the couples dies? has this meaning: Should you not fully know the consequence of the death of believers by and for the law? The course of treatment is this: After having shown that they are no more under sin, with more particular reference to the Gentiles, the Apostle now declares, with more particular reference to the Jews, that they too are no more under the law. The unity warranting this transition consists in the fact, that one cannot be under sin without being under the sense of the law, and that he cannot be under the law without being under the sense of sin. So far, therefore, our deduction extends back not only to chap. vi. 14, but even to chap. v. 20; iii. 9; ii. 17. That is, the law comes into consideration here so far as it is the power of the letter, which kills (2 Cor. iii. 6)—the phenomenon is completed as the experience of sin (see ver. 24).

Singular views: 1. Reiche: The κυριεύειν in ver. 1 refers to the κίριος in the concluding verse of chap. vi; 2. Meyer: The freedom of Christians from the law follows from the truth of the foregoing verse. But the Apostle's transition consists in his design to show that Christians are just as dead to the law by baptism in the death of Christ, as they are dead to sin. This arises from the fact that they have received eternal life as the gift of God in Christ. They are therefore dead, by the death of Christ, to death, as a result of sin, as they are dead to death as a result of the law, according to chap. vii. 24. [Meyer's view in 4th edition is indicated above.—R.]

Brothron. Certainly not merely the Jewish Christians (according to Grotius, and others; also Tholuck, in a qualified way) are meant in this address (Meyer). Yet Meyer, in denying this, overlooks the fact that the Jewish Christians are regarded most prominently, because the point in question is respecting the law (see chap. ix. 3). [The only limitation being "those who know the law," it must be remembered that in the apostolic age, as well as since, the knowledge of the Old Testament on the part of Christians in general is presupposed.—R.]

For I speak to those who know the law. [Parenthetical, as in the E. V. Explanatory of bröthren.—R.] Of what law does he speak? It must not be overlooked, that what the Apostle further adduces as the design of the law, already reminds of the law of nature. Therefore Koppe: every law is meant. Glöckler: the moral law. But though the Roman law might have a similar purport, the Apostle nevertheless means the Mosaic law itself; for the point of his argumentation is, that, according to the principles of the Mosaic law itself, Christians must be regarded as having been made free by this law. It is not necessary to prove that the Mosaic law in general, but not the law of marriage in particular (Beza, Carpov [Bengel], and others), is meant here. The Jew did not have a separate marriage-law; yet the Mosaic law, with reference to the marriage-law, is meant.—And who are those who know the law? Explanations: 1. The Roman Christians, the majority of whom were Jewish Christians; 2. The Jewish-Christian portion, to whom Paul addresses himself in particular (Philippi, and others); 3. In addition to these, the Gentile Christians, who, as Jewish proselytes, had been entrusted with the law (De Wette, and others); 4. Tholuck calls to mind, that the Gentile Christians became acquainted with the law. [As the customs of the synagogue remained to a large extent those of the early Christian assemblies, the Old Testament was read to all believers, as indeed was necessary to their Christian instruction. One could not be a Christian even then, and remain ignorant of the law.—R.] The question in general here is not a difficult specialty of the Mosaic law, but a principle evidenced also by natural law, which, for this very reason, does not result from one passage, but from the connection of the Mosaic law. Tholuck: "One of the legal maxims current among the Jews; Este endeavors in vain to prove it from the Old Testament." Yet the example of Ruth, Abigail, and even of the second marriage of Abraham, is more than one legal maxim current among the Jews. Moreover, the legal principle in chap. vi. 7 is of kindred nature.

That the law hath dominion. We must not connect ὁ νόμος τοῦ ἀνθρώπου: ν (Mosheim, and others), but νόμος with κυριεύειν. Man is certainly, however, the man in question placed under the law. [Wordsworth explains: "The law (of Moses) is lord over the man—the human creature—whether man or woman. Comp. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Augustine." This takes the verb in the literal sense: to be lord, and introduces the figure of the marriage at once, thus avoiding any difficulty about the special law, for the whole law is personified. Meyer seems to favor this view also.—R.]

For as long time as he liveth [ἐφ' ὅσον χρόνον ζῇ]. According to vers. 2-4, the ζῇ evidently refers to the man himself, and not to the law, so that, in a metaphorical sense, it would have the force (as Origen, Erasmus, Bengel, and others think) of making the figure itself plainer. This would have been to prove first that the law has no more force. Philippi understands the ζῇ to be the old, natural life. See Tholuck on the contrary: in this case the appeal to legal knowledge would be inappropriate, and the figure already violated. The law is personified as master, just as sin is in the foregoing section. [And the point of the figure is not affected by referring the verb to the man, for which ever party dies, the relation ceases. Comp. Hodge.—R.] Meyer gives prominence to the point, that ἐφ' ὅσον χρόνον is emphatic.*

Ver. 2. For the married woman is bound by the law to the living husband [ἡ γὰρ ὑπανδρος γυνὴ τῷ ζῶντι ἀνδρὶ δέδεται νόμῳ]. A concrete explanation of the proposition of ver. 1 (Meyer), introduced by γὰρ, which has here the force of for example (Hodge, Alford). The perfect δέδεται: here denotes the continuing character of the binding (Winer, p. 255), which agrees with the emphatic ἐφ' ὅσον χρόνον (ver. 1). "ὑπανδρος, subject to the man, married, only here in the New Testament, but current in later Greek authors.—R.] The figure in vers. 2 and 3 is quite clear, but its application is difficult. Since the law is compared with the first man, and Christ with the second, this seemed to be the application that should follow: The law, as the first man of the theocratic Church, is dead; now, the Church can be freely married to Christ. Therefore even Usteri, Rückert, and others, have remarked that the figure is not clearly carried out; and Chrysostom took the view, that Paul, through forbearance toward the Jews, reversed the relation in his application, and that, instead of saying, the law or the husband is dead, he says, You who were formerly bound by the law are dead. [See Wordsworth, who, however, joins with it several other reasons.—R.] Meyer, with Fritzsche, thus relieves the difficulty: In consequence of the unity of the matrimonial relation, death is an event common to both parties; when the husband is dead, the wife is legally dead to the husband. We may in this case ask, Why did not the Apostle conform his figure to the application, and designate the wife herself as the dead part? Clearly, because of the second marriage. This explanation of Fritzsche and Meyer (concinnity) is established by the Apostle, and also rendered emphatic by his language. As the woman is not dead, but is killed in respect to her marriage relation, or is situated as dead, by the natural death of her husband, so believers have not died a natural death, but are made dead to the law, since they are crucified to the law with Christ. The idea, dead in a marriage relation, is therefore the tertium comparationis. The θανατωσθαι in ver. 4 is therefore like the καταγγισθαι of a widow, in which also a death-like orphanage is indicated. That the law itself is also dead, as a letter, by its statutory application to the crucifixion of Christ, follows, without any thing further, from what has been said. Tholuck, not being satisfied with Meyer's removal of the difficulty, seems desirous of placing himself on the side of those who give an allegorical interpretation to the passage commencing with ver. 2. Explanations:

* [Meyer's note is excellent: "Not before he dies does the law lose its dominion over him; so long as he lives, he remains subject to it. If this is considered, and an entirely irrelevant 'only so long as he lives' be not interpolated, the thought seems neither trivial nor disproportionate to the appeal made to the legal knowledge of the readers. For a peculiarity of the νόμος consists in this, that it cannot, as human laws, have only temporary validity, or be altered, suspended, nor can one be exempt from it for a time, &c. No, so long as man lives, the dominion of the νόμος over him remains." Of course, this means previous to the death to the law (ver. 4).—R.]

1. The wife is the soul, the husband is sin; sin dies in the fellowship of believers with Christ's death (Augustine, and others; Olshausen).

2. Only the νόμος can be regarded as the husband (Origen, Chrysostom, Calvin, Philippi). Likewise, with special reference to the sense of guilt (Luther); with special reference to sin (Spener).

De Witte and Meyer have properly rejected the introduction of allegory in vers. 2, 3; it destroys all legal evidence of the figure. The Apostle did not avoid saying θανατωσθαι ὁ νόμος because he wished to give a more pregnant expression to the thought, and to include in one the other side also, but because θανατωσθαι is different from a simple ἀποθνήσκειν, and because the retroactive inference from the act which the administration of the law has committed on the body of Christ is proximate to the dying of the law (according to Heb. viii. 13; decayed and waxed old). The gospel is eternally new, because it refers to only eternal relations. The law grows old from the beginning, because, in its outward and national character, it relates to transitory and ever-changing relations. Application to Catholicism and Protestantism. (All they that take the sword, &c.) Ὑπανδρος, viro subjecta; the wife had no right to separate herself.*

But if the husband have died, she is loosed from the law of her husband [ἐὰν δὲ ἀποθάνῃ ὁ ἀνὴρ, κατήγγηται ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου τοῦ ἀνδρός]. On the conditional clause, see Textual Note†. On the verb, comp. Gal. v. 4, Lange's Comm., p. 127. The genitive is one of reference, of the object respecting which, see Winer, p. 177.—R.] That is, which relates to her husband. On the relationship of the expression κατήγγηται to the θανατωσθαι, comp. Meyer's translation: "She has become undone, and thereby free and absolved from the law which related to her husband (united her to him)." (See Gal. v. 4.)

Ver. 3. She shall be called an adulteress. She receives the name in a formal and legal way. And therewith she is subject to the severest punishment of the law—stoning. [Levit. xxi. 10; comp. John viii. 5.]

[She is free from that law, ἐλευθέρα

* [She is bound to him by the law—i. e., the Mosaic law—which made no provision for her loosing herself (in Deut. xxiv. 2 it was the power of the husband, not the wife, to repudiate the relation). Here the law is no longer spoken of figuratively.—R.]

ἐστὶν ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου. The article shows that the reference is to the law of the husband, hence the E. V.: that law, is correct.—R.]

So that she is not an adulteress. Meyer insists upon the idea of design: in order that she be no adulteress; and declares this to be the design of the Divine legal ordinance—which Tholuck there pedantically finds. Yet the expression here might certainly have been chosen with reference to this application. The Judaists assuredly charged the believing Jews with apostasy, and therefore with religious adultery. Hence Paul says ἐναν instead of χηματίζε;* and Fritzsche has strikingly made the τοῦ μη ἐναν dependent on ἐλευθέρα. [All these views are alike grammatical. That of Fritzsche is harsh, however, while Meyer's seems to be adopted more to prepare the way for the parallel he makes (ver. 4): in order that ye should be married to another. It is not necessary to press the figure to this extent, however.—R.]

Ver. 4. Accordingly, my brethren. [Ὥστε, see Winer, p. 283.—R.] The explanation follows here first; this is not allegorical, but symbolical, because marriage represents, in the external sphere of life, what religion does in the inward and higher (Eph. v. 32).—Ye also, as the widowed wife.—Were made dead to the law† [ἐθανατώθητε τῷ νόμῳ]. See Textual Note‡. The verb is aorist, referring to a definite act in the past, viz., the release from the law at justification.—R.] That is, in relation to the marriage-covenant. The expression ἐθανατώθητε is chosen, not merely because Christ's death was a violent one, but also because it describes the death of Christians to the law as a death incurred by virtue of the administration of the law.

Through the body of Christ [διὰ τοῦ σώματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ]. In, and, at the same time, with Him, as He was put to death. The atoning effect of the sacrificial death cannot, at all events, be the premise here, although it is included. [The aorist shows that the reference is definite; the proposition indicates the means of the death to the law. Two opinions prevail: (1.) That it refers to the atoning death of Christ as the ground of justification. So Hodge, and others. It may be urged in favor of this, that this is the means or ground of justification, and that thus the antithesis to "was raised" is preserved. But the Apostle generally speaks of the death of Christ in plain terms, when he refers to it. Col. i. 22, which Hodge quotes as an instance of "His body," meaning His death, adds the qualifying phrases, "of His flesh," "through death." (2.) With Tholuck, Meyer, Lange, and others, it may be referred to the fellowship with Christ in His death. This view accords better with the point which the Apostle has reached in his argument, as well as the idea of union with Christ underlying this passage. This does not deny, but implies the atoning efficacy of His death, which is always latent, if not patent, in the Apostle's argument. It has been the fault of some commentators, to insist

* [That is, they might be and were so called, but yet were not guilty of religious adultery.—R.]

† [Dr. Hodge at some length combats the view, that the Mosaic law (or rather the Jewish economy) is alone referred to throughout this passage. He rightly says: "Paul here means by the law, the will of God, as a rule of duty, however revealed." See on iii. 20, p. 122 (also Galatians, ii. 16, pp. 49, 52). The most untenable of all views is that which limits νόμος to the ritualistic Jewish observances.—R.]

an finding an expression of it, where it is only implied.—R.]

Christians are dead, buried (chap. vi.), and risen (Col. iii. 1) with Christ; indeed, they are even, in principle, transported to heaven (Phil. iii. 20). But since they are dead with Him, they are, like Him, dead "to the law through the law" (Gal. ii. 19). [Comp. Commentary in loco, pp. 50, 51.—R.] Calvin, Grotius, Koppe, and others, have explained, that the θανάτωσθαι τῷ νόμῳ is a milder expression for ὁ νόμος θανάτωσθαι, ἀντίδανεν ὑμῖν. This explanation does not regard the difference between natural and violent death, nor self-destruction. The law could not be dead; this would have been revolution. As a Divine form of revelation, it had to grow old and vanish away (Heb. viii. 13); but as a human ordinance it has itself inflicted death. Therefore the law still retained its former historical and ethical (not religious and essential) force toward those who were not dead to it by the fellowship of Christ.

Through the body of Christ, διὰ τοῦ σώματος θανατωθέντος. It may be asked, in what relation this being dead with the body of Christ stands to the being reconciled by the body of Christ. Tholuck: "Fellowship with the death of Christ includes freedom from the κατά of the law (Gal. iii. 10), and this latter, which is brought to pass by thankful love in return, includes the death of the old man to sin (chap. vi. 6) and strengthening to a new life." The becoming free from τῷ νόμῳ is consummated with the development of repentance and faith—that is, with justification; the having become free from the old law is decided when the new law, the law of the Spirit, the righteousness of faith, appears (Eph. ii. 16).

In order that ye should be married to another [εἰς τὸ γινέσθαι ὑμᾶς ἑτέρῳ]. The clause seems to be final. In order that; the purpose of the death to the law was union to Christ.—R.] Γινέσθαι τίνος, to become the possession of a husband. The figure of conjugal communion of the believing Church with the Lord (2 Cor. xi. 2; Eph. v. 2, 5; Rev. xxi. 8). To another. The stronger ἑτέρῳ is here used. [And it is more closely defined, even to him who was raised from the dead, τῷ ἐκ νεκρῶν ἐγερθέντι.—With good reason is this added.—R.] Not only do Christians belong to the risen Christ because He has acquired them by His death (1 Peter i.), but also because they themselves, having been dead with Him, have become a heavenly race, a super-terrestrial people, who, as risen ones, can be united only with the Risen One; therefore their continuous connection with the law of this life would be a misalliance. The common element of this new communion is the new life.

That we should bring forth fruit to God [εἶνα καρποφορήσωμεν τῷ θεῷ]. Final clause (so Tholuck, Meyer, De Wette, Alford). The dative is dat. commodi apparently.—R.] The figure of marriage leads to that of the fruit of marriage (Theodoret, Erasmus, Meyer, and others). Tholuck, on the contrary: "Since a reference to καρπός (chap. vi. 22) occurs, and since καρπὸν ποιεῖν, εἶναι, and even καρποφορεῖν (Mark iv. 20; Luke viii. 15; Col. i. 10), frequently occur in a metonymy derived from the fruits of the field, as a technical Christian phrase for the practical effects of the life of faith, and the allusion recurs in ver. 6, where the figure is not that of marriage, it seems very unsafe to accept the figure of the fruit of children." Reiche and Fritzsche have even rejected this interpretation, because an undignified allegory arises; they have therefore construed the figure as referring to the field, or fruits of the field. Philippi likewise; De Wette, on the contrary, accepts the former view. But the allegory of an unfruitful marriage cannot be more dignified than that of a fruitful one. Yet the spiritual fruit of righteousness, in accordance with its supersensuous nature, is produced for God, for glorifying God. [The figure must not be so pressed as to make the fruit of the marriage to God, as Father; to His glory, is the meaning.—R.]

Ver. 5. For when we were in the flesh [ὅτε γὰρ ἤμεν ἐν τῇ σαρκί. Meyer: "The positive and characterizing expression for the negative: when we were not yet made dead to the law." Alford: "Virtually = 'under the law.'" Hodge: "When in your unrenewed and legal state." For a more thorough discussion, see the Excursus in the next section.—R.] The antithesis of ver. 5 should serve to explain the last conclusion in ver. 4. The γὰρ tells us: According as we were situated in our fleshly tendency, we must now also be situated in the Divine tendency. The εἶναι denotes the standpoint of personality; the outward tendency of life from a definite principle. Here, therefore, the tendency of life is from the principle of the flesh. Explanations: 1. Meyer: The σὰρξ, the humanity in us (what, then, would not be human in us?)* in its opposition to the Divine will; the element of life in which we exist. The opposite to the ἀποθανόντες of ver. 6. 2. Theodoret, Œcumenius: In the κατὰ νόμον πολιτεία. The flesh is the material and external part of the body and the life. Therefore, since we stood in this external tendency, which, as an external and analytical form of life (dependent on the individual ἐπιθυμία), also in its better form, took the law as a combination of external and analytical precepts. [Of these, (1.) is much to be preferred. Dr. Lange does not make it clear whether he adopts the view of flesh, given immediately above. There are very strong objections to it in any case.—R.]

The passions of sins [τὰ παθήματα τῶν ἀμαρτιῶν]. According to Meyer and Tholuck, the genitive of object. "From which the sins arose." Tholuck cites James i. 15 as proof. We hold, however, that sins are here denominated producers of the passions. For the passions, παθ., are not, as Tholuck holds, the same as the ἐπιθυμία (according to which Luther translates lusts), but they are the ἐπιθυμία enhanced by the impulse of the law. Then, in the case of sins arising as consequences of the παθήμ., the idea would follow that abortions to death have been produced from the marriage-bond of the law itself with man. The connection with the law assumes, therefore, at the same time, a connection with the ἀμαρτία (see chap. vi. 13), and this, in the isolation of individual ἀμαρτίας, was operative as producer by the sinful passions excited by the law in the members. The law itself did not bring forth the fruit of death; but it stirred up sin, so that the latter made the ἐπιθυμία into παθήματα, and thus into productive forces [Either view is preferable to the Hendiadys: σίνης feelings (Olshausen, Hodge), which is forbidden by the plural ἀμαρτιῶν. Παθηματα is passive (comp. Gal. v. 24), and hence it is perhaps better to take the genitive, as that of the object (which led to sins), so as to accord with what is predicated in ἐννοήσας.—R.]

* [To this interpolation it may be rejoined: What, then, would not be σὰρξ in us? What is not carnal, sinful, in us?—R.]

Which were by means of the law. Τὰ διὰ τοῦ νόμου. Grotius supplies φαινόμενα, which is too little; Meyer, sc., ὅσα, which is far too much. According to ver. 9, ἀναλύντα. Tholuck: "Many of the older commentators, in order not to let the law appear in too unfavorable a light, explained thus: of the knowledge of sin communicated by the law (thus Chrysostom, Ambrose, Bullinger, and others). Yet, thus construed, διὰ νόμου would stand beyond the pragmatism of the passage." Tholuck, like Meyer, would also supply the verb, subat. [The proximity of ver. 7 supports the obvious meaning: occasioned by the law (Meyer: vermittelt), not caused, however.—R.]

Wrought [ἐννοήσας]. Middle. Were efficient in a fruitful manner.

In our members [ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν ἡμῶν]. Hodge weakens the force, by making this almost = in us.—R.] Single productions between individual passions and individual members, in which the central consciousness was enslaved for the production of individual miscarriages.

To bring forth fruit to death [εἰς τὸ καρποφορῆσαι τῷ θανάτῳ]. This clause expresses not merely the result (Hodge), but the final object of the energizing (Meyer, Alford), being parallel to the last clause of ver. 4.—R.] Meyer: To lead a life terminating in death. Expressing but little, almost nothing, here. That false fruit, abortions, or miscarriages, might arise (wherefore the subst. καρπός itself must be avoided). Erasmus: ex infelici matrimonio infelices fastus sustulimus, quidquid nasceretur morti exiisq; gignentes. Luther: Where the law rules over people, they are indeed not idle; they bring forth and train up many children, but they are mere bastards, who do not belong to a free mother. Meyer would also here limit death to the idea of eternal death; see above. [He also carries out the figure of progeny, which Lange retains here, so far as to make "death" here a personification. This is less justifiable than the reference to eternal death, which conveys a truth, and forms a fitting antithesis to τῷ θεῷ (ver. 4).—R.]

Ver. 6. But now we have been delivered from the law [νυνὶ δὲ (antithesis to ὅτι, ver. 5) κατηργήθημεν ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου]. Notice the aorist, which Paul uses so constantly in reference to the accomplished fact of justification.—R.] We are annulled in relation to the law, and therewith the law is annulled to us. (On the reading ἀποθανόντος, see the Critical Note on the Text; also Tholuck, p. 330.)

Having died to that wherein we were held [ἀποθανόντες ἐν ᾧ κατεχόμεθα]. We must understand τοῦτω before ἐν ᾧ. Meyer explains: in which we were confined as in a prison. More in harmony with the former view is this, whereby we were chained as by a legal and even matrimonial obligation. Wherefore we certainly do not need to refer ἐν ᾧ merely to νόμος (with Origen, Koppe, De Wette, Philippi [Hodge], and others). Tholuck: "The law, therefore, is regarded as πατήρ, as a chain, analogously to the ἐφοροποιήματα συγκαταλεγμένοι, Gal. iii. 23, so far as it holds its subjects in δουλεία (Rom. viii. 15; 2 Tim. I. 7). The direct reference of the ἐν ᾧ to sin (according to Chrysostom, (Ecumenius, and others) is too strong on the opposite side.—The cause of the chaining of man by sin on one side, as well as by the law on the other, was the totality of the εἶσα ἐν τῇ σαρκί, as it expressed itself in mere divisions of just and legality. This is clear from what follows: in the oldness of the letter.

So that we serve [ὥστε δουλεύειν ἡμᾶς]. The clause is not final, as the E. V. indicates; the service is a present state, already resulting from the accomplished fact of deliverance from and death to the law. Serve God, is the meaning, the omission of θεῷ being due to the self-evident difference of reference in the two phrases which follow. The consciousness of the readers would tell them that the old service was one to sin, the new one to God (so Meyer).—R.] The δουλεύειν can be spoken ironically in only a conditional manner. We have really our external life to enslave, but not after the old way, in single portions and acts, according to individual precepts, motives, and affections, but in the newness of the Spirit; therefore by virtue of the perfect principle of the Spirit, which is ever new, and always assuming a new form. The ἐν denotes not merely the sphere of activity (Meyer), but the power, the principle of activity itself.

In newness of the Spirit [ἐν καινότητι πνεύματος]. Untenable views: That ἐν is redundant, and the dative the object of the verb δουλεύειν; that there is a Hendiadys (new spirit, Hodge). The E. V. is fond of Hendiads, and very often misconstrues ἐν, but has avoided these mistakes in the present instance. Alford correctly remarks, that the datives "are not" as in vi. 4, attri uten of the genitives which follow them, but staten in which those genitives are the ruling elements.—What is the precise force of πνεύματος?—R.] Meyer: "It is the Holy Spirit, as the operative principle of the Christian life." Clearly, it is the spirit as itself the inward Christian principle of life, which is certainly not to be thought of without the communion of the Holy Spirit. For the Holy Spirit as πνεῦμα simply, operating objectively, was also the producer of the γράμμα, which here constitutes the antithesis. This principle is itself an eternal newness, and has, as a result, an eternal newness as the principle of the absolute renewal. Tholuck: "The spirit of grace produced by God's gracious deed." [With Meyer, Alford, and others, it seems best to refer this to the Holy Spirit. The absence of the article is not against this view; as the opinion of Harless, that πνεῦμα without the article is subjective, is not well established. (Comp. Meyer on Rom. viii. 4; Harless, Eph. ii. 22; Lange's Comm., Gal. v. 16, p. 137.) This passage seems to point to chap. viii., where πνεῦμα occurs so frequently, in the sense of the Holy Spirit; the more so as σάρξ occurs just before (ver. 5). The objection, that the Holy Spirit, working objectively, was the author of the letter, and hence that the antithesis requires another meaning, has not much weight. See notes on Rom. viii. 4 ff.—R.]

And not in the oldness of the letter [καὶ οὐ παλαιότητι. (only here) γράμματος]. Not = old letter (Hodge), nor yet = under the law, in the flesh, though these latter thoughts are implied. The genitive seems to be gen. auctoris, as πνεύματος in the previous clause.—R.] On the γράμμα, see chap. ii. 29; 2 Cor. iii. 6. The law viewed externally, and, by its historical and subjective externalization, become an old and dying object, παλαιότης. Meyer writes somewhat unintelligibly: The παλαιότης, according to the nature of the relation in which the γράμμα stands to the principle of sin in man, was necessarily sinful (see ver. 7 ff.), as, on the other hand, the καινότης must be necessarily moral in consequence of the vitally influencing πνεῦμα. [The service which resulted from the rule of the letter, was not merely their old service, but a service having in it an element of decay. The service under the law, precisely the written law (when viewed as the γράμμα), was a killing yoke, is still, when the service is in the oldness of the letter. Meyer evidently means, that a law with external precepts, of the letter, necessarily so acts upon man's sinfulness, that the very service he attempts to render is sinful. The letter killeth (2 Cor. iii. 6).—Such a characterization of the service under the law forms a fitting warning against a return to legalism—an appropriate conclusion to this section, and a point of connection with ver. 7.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The connection with sin, according to chap. vi. 12-23, was a slavish state; the connection with the law, on the other hand, according to the present section, was comparable to an earthly marriage-state. The connection of believers with Christ now appears, in comparison with this, as a super-terrestrial marriage-covenant (see Eph. v. 32).

2. It is only by keeping the figure of the law of marriage free from an allegorical interpretation, and by distinguishing between the figure itself and its historical application, that the evidence clearly appears which the argumentation of the Apostle contemplated, and particularly for the Jewish Christians. But this evidence still continues in force. The standpoint of external legality, and that of living faith, cannot be confused as religious principles. Both standpoints are sundered by the death of Christ. Where they seem to be united, the confession of the law, or the legal confession of faith, is the dominant religious principle; while the opposite principle has the meaning only of a historical and ethical custom, which, from its nature as a legal custom, as much limits the Catholic man of faith, as it, in the character of an evangelical custom, burdens the legal, Romanising Protestant.

3. Tholuck: "The law is annulled in relation to believers, not in its moral import, but, as Calovius remarks, quoad rigorem exactionis, quoad maledictionem, et quoad servilem coactionem." According to the sermon on the Mount, as well as according to Paul, it is done away so far as it is fulfilled; it is annulled in a negative sense so far as it is annulled in Christian principle, the law of the Spirit. An inward principle has come from the external precept; an inward rule from the external form; an inward tendency from the external law; a unity from multiplicity; a synthesis from the analysis; and from the ordinance, "Do this and live," the order, "Live and do this." It must be borne in mind, that Paul here speaks of the finite, formal character of the law, and not of the law as a type of the New Testament, as it has become transformed into the law of the Spirit. [Comp. Doctrinal Notes on Galatians, iii. 9-28 p. 88, 89.—R.]

4. The figure of marriage, which extends through the Old Testament in typical forms, is here employed in reference to the relation between Christ and the whole body of believers. The individual believer participates freely in the marriage-bond of this body, yet not in a mystical, separatistic isolation of his relation to Christ.

5. In ver. 5 Paul speaks especially concerning the passions of sins, which are excited and occasioned by the law; and there is no reason for understanding among them the abnormal forms of passionate excitement. The history of Pharisaism, and of fanaticism in general, from the crucifixion of Christ down to the present day, teaches us how very much additional weight is also added by the normal forms. In this direction there has arisen the odium generis humani, as well as the increasingly strong warfare of hierarchical or ecclesiastical party-law against the eternal moral laws of humanity, in which the nature of God himself is represented, while in the statute only the distorted apparent image of the Church, and not its eternal pith, is reflected.

6. The abortions of ordinances at enmity with the gospel and humanity reached the centre of their manifestation in the crucifixion of Christ; but they everywhere reappear, where Christ is again crucified, in a grosser or more refined sense. And this not only occurs where the written revealed law is perverted into fanatical ordinances, but also where the ideals of the natural law (Rom. ii. 14) are distorted to fanatical caricatures, as is shown in the history of the Revolution of 1848.

7. On ver. 6. Tholuck: "γράμμα, πνεῦμα (chap. ii. 29). The former is chiefly a designation of the external principle; the latter, of the inwardly operative principle. And this inwardly operative principle is the gracious spirit produced by God's gracious act. Calvin: Spiritus litteras opponit, quia antequam ad dei voluntatem voluntas nostra per spiritum sanctum formata sit, non habemus in lege nisi externam litteram, quæ frænum quidem externis nostris actionibus injicit, concupiscentias autem nostras furorem minime cohibet. And Melancthon: Ideo dicitur littera, quia non est verus et vivus motus animi, sed est otiosa imitatio interior vel exterior, nec ibi potest esse vera invocatio, ubi cor non apprehendit remissionem peccatorum."

8. How the law, in its letter or finite relation, began to grow old immediately after the beginning of legislation, is shown to us clearly by the history of the Israelites; and Deuteronomy even gives the canonical type of this truth. The history of the Christian Church teaches, on the other hand, how the newness of the spiritual life becomes constantly newer in its power of renewal. But the same antithesis is again manifested in the continual obsolescence of the Church in the Middle Ages, and in the continued rejuvenating of the evangelical Church.

ON CHAP. VII. 1-6.

As Christians, we belong no more to the law, but to Christ. 1. Because we are dead to the law by Jesus, who abolished the power of the law; 2. Because we are united to Him by the same fact, in order to bring forth fruit to God (vers. 1-6).—Marriage as a type of spiritual relations: 1. As a type of our relation to the law; 2. As a type of our relation to Christ (vers. 1-6).—As the relation of man to Christ is altogether different from that to the law, so is Christian marriage, on the other hand, altogether different from that of the Old Testament (vers. 1-6).—How death divides, but also unites (ver. 4).—Union of heart with Christ the Risen One is the condition of the happy union of human hearts with each other so as to bring forth fruit unto God (ver. 4).—How miserable it was to live under the law in the flesh; how happying it is to live under grace in the Spirit! Proof: 1. Description of the state under the law: a. we were in bondage; b. sinful lusts worked in our members to bring forth fruit unto death; c. we served the letter. 2. Description of the condition under grace: a. we are free; b. the newness of the Spirit incites us to bring forth fruit unto God; c. we serve the Spirit, and not the letter any more (vers. 5, 6).

STARKE: As a thistle-bush is full of thistles, so are unconverted and carnal men full of the fruits of the flesh (ver. 5).—Christ frees us from the burden of the law, that we may take His yoke upon us (ver. 6).—HEDINGER: We are free from the law, not as a precept of duty—which remains perpetually—but in its condemnation, compulsion, and sharpness (ver. 1).—Where there is not a heart and ready will, there is only external labor and weariness; where conversion of the life and spiritual increase are not exhibited in the inner man, it is lost work and the service of the letter, even if one should wear out the temple-floor with his knees, give his body to be burned, and become a beggar and a hermit!

SPENER: Our perverted nature is such, that, when any thing is forbidden, we have all the greater desire to have it. We have often seen children think less of, and have no desire for, a certain thing, for which they have all the more desire when forbidden. So, when the law forbids this and that, we are prompted toward it by our wicked nature (ver. 5).—We are not so free that we do not have to serve any more; only the kind of service is different. Formerly it was compulsory, now it is rendered with a joyful will; then it was the letter, now it is the spirit (ver. 6).—ROOS: The truth which Paul here portrays (vers. 1-4) is this: that nothing but death annuls the dominion of the law.

LISCO: The complete freedom of man from the law promotes his true sanctification (vers. 1-6).—The relation of man to the law.—Application of this relation to believers (ver. 4).—Advantages of the new state above the old one under the law (vers. 5, 6).

HEUBNER: The Christian is free from the coercion of the law (vers. 1-6).—The death of Christ became freedom from the compulsory power and curse of the law: 1. As abrogation of the Levitical sacrificial system; 2. As inducement toward free and thankful love toward God (ver. 4).—Irreligious politicians express only their ignoble and servile manner of thinking, when they deem all religion to be only of service as a bridle for the people (ver. 4).—The nature of the Christian is spirit: 1. In reference to faith; 2. In reference to action. The latter stands in contrast with this spirit in these same respects (ver. 6).

BASSER: Here, for the first time since chap. i.

18, Paul addresses the saints at Rome as brethren-brethren "in Christ Jesus our Lord" (ver. 1).—"But now"—his now is an evangelical key-note of the Epistle to the Romans; comp. chap. iii. 21, and other places (ver. 6).

LANGK: The death of Christ a serious boundary between the legal and the evangelical, believing, standpoints: 1. The meaning of this boundary itself; 2. The application: no religious confusions of the two standpoints. By a customary connection of them, one is made to mean only a moral limitation, which, after all, is not in conformity with the internal relations.—The sensuous power and spiritual weakness of legalism consists in its being an earthly relation, confined to this life, though in the fear of God (in this life the head, the city of God, the apparent image of the kingdom, &c.).—The marriage-bond of the free Church of God is a superterrestrial relation, and therefore the power of the renewal of the earthly life: a. Christ in the next life and in this one; b. Faith also; c. The Church as well.—The reciprocal action between the law and sin unto death, a counterpart to the reciprocity between the Spirit of Christ and faith unto new life.—The contrast between the Old and New Testament in its full meaning: 1. The Old Testament growing old and making old from the beginning; 2. The New Testament renewing itself and the world from the beginning.—But a New Testament is in the essence of the Old, as well as an Old is in the manifestation of the New.

[BURKITT: All the wisdom of the heathen, and of the wisest persons in the world, was never able to discover the first sinful motions arising from our rebellious natures; only the holy law of God makes them known, and discovers them to be sin. Such is the holiness of the law of God, that it requires not only the purity of our actions, but also the integrity of all our faculties.—SCOTT: Self-righteous pride and antinomian licentiousness are two fatal rocks on which immense multitudes are continually wrecked, and between which none but the Holy Spirit can pilot us; and the greatest objections of open enemies to the doctrines of grace derive their greatest plausibility from the unholy lives of many professed friends.—CLARKE: The law is only the means of disclosing our sinful propensity, not of producing it: as a bright beam of the sun introduced into a room shows millions of moths in all directions—but these were not introduced by the light, but were there before, only there was not light enough to make them manifest—so the evil propensity was in the heart before, but there was not light sufficient to discover it.

FIFTH SECTION.—Synopsis: The law, in its holy design, by the feeling of death, to lead to the new life in grace. The development of the law from externality to inwardness. The experience of Paul a sketch from life of the conflict under the law, as well as of the transition from the old life in the law to the new life in the Spirit.

CHAP. VII. 7-25.

- 7 What shall we say then? Is the law sin? God forbid. [Let it not be!] Nay, [but] I had not known [i. e., recognised] sin, but by [except through] the law: for I had not known lust [evil desire],¹ except the law had [if the law
8 had not] said, Thou shalt not covet. But sin, taking occasion [,] by the commandment, [omit comma] wrought in me all manner of concupiscence [evil desire].
9 For without the law sin was [is] dead. For [Now] I was alive without the law once: but when the commandment came, sin revived [sprang into life], and 10 I died. And the commandment, which was ordained to [was unto]² life, I 11 found [the same, or, this, was found by me] to be unto death. For sin, taking occasion [,] by the commandment, [omit comma] deceived me, and by it slew me.
12 Wherefore [So that] the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good.
13 Was [Did] then that which is good made [become]³ death unto me? God forbid. But sin, that it might appear sin, working death in [to] me by [through] that which is good; [,] that sin by [through] the commandment might become exceeding [exceedingly] sinful.
14 For we know that the law is spiritual: but I am carnal,⁴ sold under sin.
15 For that which I do [perform],⁵ I allow [know] not: for what I would, that do I not [not what I wish,⁶ that I practise]; but what I hate, that do I.
16 If then I do that which I would not [But if what I wish not, that I do], I
17 consent unto [I agree with] the law that it is good. Now then it is no more
18 [longer] I that do [perform] it, but sin that dwelleth [dwelling] in me. For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh), dwelleth no good thing [good doth not dwell]: for to will [wish] is present with me; but how [omit how] to perform
19 that which is good I find not [or, is not].⁷ For the good that I would [wish],
20 I do not: but the evil which I would [wish] not, that I do [practise]. Now [But] if I do that I⁸ would [wish] not, it is no more [longer] I that do
21 [perform] it, but sin that dwelleth [dwelling] in me. I find then a [the] law, 22 that, when I would [wish to] do good, evil is present with me. For I delight
23 in the law of God after the inward man: But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to⁹ the law of sin which is in my members.
24 O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this 25 death [or, this body of death]?¹⁰ I thank God [or, Thanks to God]¹¹ through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then with the mind I myself [I myself with the mind]¹² serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin.

TEXTUAL.

² Ver. 10.—[The italics of the E. V. are virtually a gloss. Was only need be supplied. For is a favorite amendment, but unto brings out the telic force of εἰς quite as well.—The passive form of the Greek is restored in the second clause.

* Ver. 15.—[Would (E. V.) is an inexact rendering of θέλω. The choice lies between will and wish. The former is to be preferred, if the idea of simple, spontaneous volition is deemed the prominent one; the latter is favored by the presence of μετάνοια, indicating an emotional feature in the volition. See Exeg. Notes.

† Ver. 18.—[N. A. B. C., many versions and fathers, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford, Tregelles, omit ἐπιπείσω. It is inserted in D. F. K. L., Rec., by many fathers, Meyer, Wordsworth, Lange, and others. Meyer deems the omission due to the transcriber's hastily passing over from οὐχ to οὐ at the beginning of ver. 19. Lange holds that ἐπιπείσω would disappear, as soon as the sententious antithesis (To will is immediately present, but the carrying out of that which is good I can never find) was no longer understood.

* Ver. 20.—[N. A. K. L., insert ἐγώ after θέλω. Meyer, Alford, Tregelles, and others, follow B. C. D. F. in omitting it. The analogy of vers. 15, 18 is against it, but Lange deems it important to mark a progress in the thought.

* Ver. 23.—[N. B. D. F. K., and some cursives, insert ἐν before τῷ νόμῳ. Omitted in Rec., A. C. L., fathers. Most modern editors reject it. Tregelles retains it. If retained, it cannot mean by means of. See Alford.

† Ver. 24.—[On these two renderings, see Exeg. Notes.

‡ Ver. 25.—[There is considerable variation here. The Rec., N. A. K. L., read ἐν χάριτι τοῦ Θεοῦ, which is adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford, Tregelles, Lange. We find also: ἡ χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ and τὸ ἐλεος. Meyer contends for the reading of the Recepta, which certainly has the best MSS. support.

§ Ver. 25.—[Forbes:]

Ἄρα οὐν αὐτὸς ἐγὼ
τῷ μὲν νοί δουλεύει νόμῳ Θεοῦ, τῷ δὲ σαρκί, νόμῳ ἁμαρτίας.

So then I myself
With my mind serve the law of God,
But with my flesh the law of sin.

Lange, however, seems to take μὲν . . . ἢ as = either . . . or. See Exeg. Notes.—[R.]

A.—The development of life under the law as development of the knowledge of sin.

Summary.—1. The law in relation to sin; vers. 12, 13. a. The holiness of the law in its relation to the sinfulness of man; vers. 7–12. b. The effect of the law in harmony with its design: Disclosure of the deadly effect of sin, in causing it to complete itself as well in facts as in the consciousness; ver. 13.—2. The sinner in relation to the law; vers. 14–23. a. The revelation of man's carnal nature or tendency in general under the spirituality of the law; ver. 14. b. The disclosure of the sinful obscuration of the understanding; or the dispute of knowledge; vers. 15, 16. c. The disclosure of the sinful obscuration of the will; or the dispute of the will; vers. 17, 18. d. Disclosure of the sinful obscuration of feeling; or of the unconscious ground of life; vers. 19, 20. e. Disclosure of the darkening of the whole human consciousness by the opposition of God's law and a mere seeming law; or the deadly rent in the whole man; vers. 21–23.—3. The unhappy premonition of death, in the sense of the entanglement by the (seeming) body of death, and the release from it; ver. 24. 4. The transition from death to life; ver. 25. a. The redemption, in the former half of the verse. b. Conclusion in relation to the starting-point of the new life; second half of ver. 25.

B.—The same development as transition from the law to the Gospel, from ruin to salvation.

(Eph. v. 13: "But all things that are reprov'd are made manifest by the light: for whatsoever doth make manifest is light.") a. The holy design of the law to discover the root of sin, and with the sense of guilt to awaken the sense of death; vers. 7–12.—b. The wholeness of this complete unmasking of sin in its absolute sinfulness; ver. 13.—c. View of the conflict between the spiritual and divine character of the law, and the carnal character of the sinner; ver. 14.—d. Consciousness of the want of clearness and supremacy of understanding; vers. 15, 16.—e. Consciousness of the want of firmness and energy of will; vers. 17, 18.—f. Consciousness of the weakness of the nobler sentiments, and the superior power of the lower; vers. 19, 20.—g. The consciousness of the chasm between the inner man and the outward life; of the rent between the two reciprocally contradictory laws; vers. 21–23.—h. The fruit of this development: the consummated consciousness of the necessity of deliverance; ver. 24.—i. Deliverance and the new law of life: clear distinction between knowledge and flesh; ver. 25. The I is distinguished, first from sin in knowledge, then in the will, then in the feeling, then in the whole consciousness of the inward nature, but finally in the inquiring cry for the Redeemer.

GENERAL PRELIMINARY REMARKS.—We come first of all to the question, In what sense does the Apostle speak in the first person singular? what does the ἐγώ mean? Different views: The expression is a μετασχηματισμός, see 1 Cor. iv. 6—that is, the representation of one figure in another. Thus the Greek fathers applied the passage to the fall of Adam, or of the human race (Tholuck: "By way of example, the introduction of man into the paradisaical condition").—Others believed the Jewish people before and under the law denoted (Chrysostom, Turretin, Wetstein, Reiche). The view of the Socinians and Arminians (Grotius, and others) was a modification of this one, that the homines plerique are meant, who, under the legal economy, have surrendered themselves to a gross life of sin. But the Apostle evidently speaks of a human condition of soul, in which the inward conflict of life is very earnest and great; and the language of his own experience is unmistakable. Even if he spoke of the human race in general, or of the Israelitish people in particular, he could not speak of a mere μετασχηματισμός, which would be excluded from the organic connection by the Apostle's theological view. But since the Apostle uses the most forcible language of his own experience, his expression is ιδιωμας (καυτοτροπία); that is, he expresses in his experience a universal human experience of the relation of man to the law (Meyer, and others).* For it is self-evident that the Apostle could have no occasion to describe a special experience concerning himself alone.

But now the second question arises: What state of the soul has the Apostle portrayed? Does this passage refer to the condition of the unregenerate, or of the regenerate?

* [Wordsworth, less correctly, says: "By the pronoun I, the holy Apostle personifies Human Nature, and identifies it with himself, and says, in his own name and person, what he means to be applied to Mankind generally, in their unregenerate state." This author follows his usual patristic bent, in implying that this is a description, not of what was, but might have been Paul's experience. This seal for the honor of "the holy Apostle" is undoubtedly at the expense of his sincerity.—R.]

View.—1. The unregenerate: The Greek fathers, Augustine before his controversy with the Pelagians (prop. 44 in Ep. ad R-m.); also Jerome, Abelard (to a certain extent), and Thomas Aquinas; then Erasmus, Bucer, Musculus, Ochino, Faustus Socinus, Arminius (on Affelman, see Tholuck, p. 328); the Spener school (according to the suggestions of Spener); and later exegetical writers. [Among these, Julius Müller, Neander, Nitzsch, Hahn, Tholuck, Krehl, Hengstenberg, Rückert, De Wette, Ewald, Stier, Stuart, Ernesti, Meassner, Schmid, Lechler, Kahnis, and Meyer (most decidedly). Some of these, however, really support the modified view upheld below (4).—R.]

2. The regenerate: Methodius in the Origenianis (see Tholuck, p. 336); Augustine in the controversy with the Pelagians (on account of vers. 17, 18, 22, 25: Retract. i. 23, &c.); * Jerome, Luther, Calvin, Beza, the orthodox school; recently Kohlbrügge, Das 1te Kapitel des Briefes an die Römer (1839).

3. The first section, from vers. 7-13, treats of the unregenerate; vers. 14-25, of the regenerate: Philippi [whose careful and thorough discussion (Comm., pp. 249-258) is one of the ablest in favor of this reference.—R.]. The identity of the subject is against this view. Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, i. p. 469: "The Apostle does, indeed, speak of his present condition, but apart from the moral ability to which he had grown in Christ." According to Meyer, this is the earlier Augustinian view (of the unregenerate); but it seems to be scarcely an intelligible one. [This view (referring only vers. 14-25 to the regenerate) is that of most Scotch expositors (latterly Brown, Haldane, Forbes); of Delitzsch (Bibl. Pynchol., pp. 368 ff., 2d ed.), and is ably defended by Dr. Hodge. As the current Calvinistic interpretation, it requires further consideration. Mention must be made also of the modified form of it held by Alford.† The arguments in favor of making the sharp transition at ver. 14, are as follows, as urged by Hodge: (1.) The onus probandi is on the other side (on account of the first person and present tense). (2.) There is not an expression, from the beginning to the end of the section, ver. 14-25, which the holiest man may not and must not adopt* (3.) There is much which cannot be asserted by any unregenerate man. (4.) The context is in favor of this interpretation. The positions (2) and (8) must be discussed in the exegesis of the verses as they occur (especially vers. 14, 15, 22). It will be found that there is very great difficulty in applying all the terms in their literal sense exclusively to either class. Philippi is most earnest in upholding the 3d position of Hodge. In regard to (1), it may be observed, that the first person is used in vers. 7-13, so that the change from the past to the present tense alone enters into the discussion. Is this change of tense sufficient to justify so marked a change in the subject? A consistent attempt to define the subject throughout on this theory, leads to the "confusion," which Alford admits in the view he supports.—The context, it may readily be granted, admits of this view; for in chaps. v. and vi. the result of justification, the actual deliverance from sin, has been brought into view, and ver. 6 says: we serve, &c. But, on the other hand, it must be admitted that vers. 7-13 recur to the ante-Christian, legal position. Not until ver. 25* is there a distinct Christian utterance, while chap. viii. sounds like a new song of triumph. If the Apostle is holding the distinctively Christian aspect of the conflict in abeyance, though describing the experience of a Christian, in order that he may give it more force in chap. viii., he is doing what is not usual with him as a writer, still less with a struggling believer in his daily experience. The context, we hold, points most plainly to the view given next, and adopted by Dr. Lange.—R.]

4. The Apostle is not describing a quiescent state, but the process in which man is driven from the law to Christ, and an unregenerate person becomes a regenerate one. So Olshausen: "The state under the law cannot coëxist with regeneration, and without question, therefore—as chap. vii. 24 is to express the awakened need of redemption, and ver. 25 the experience of redemption itself—vers. 14-24 are to be referred to a position before regeneration, and to be understood as a description of the conflict within an awakened person. Since, however, the Apostle makes use of the present for this section, while before and afterwards he applies the aorist, we are led to the idea that he does not intend to have this state of conflict regarded as concluded with the experience of redemption. In the description (vers. 14-24) itself, also, as will afterwards be more particularly shown, an advance in the conflict with sin is clearly observable; the better I stand out in the man, more and more the pleasure in God's law gradually increases. This is the case in a still higher degree, as ver. 25 expresses, after the experience of the redeeming power of Christ, where the conflict with sin is described as for the most part victorious on the side of the better part in man. But a battle still continues, even after the experience of regeneration," &c.—In all this, the antithesis, under the law and being free from the law, does not bear being confounded. It only admits of the condition, that the Christian must again feel that he is weak, so far as he falls momentarily under the law of the flesh, and thereby under the law of death. Even Bengel finds in this section a progress, but he does not correctly describe it: Sensim suspirat, conmittitur, entitur ad lib.ritatem. Inde paulatim senior fit oratio. But after the combatant experiences deep conviction, he declines, rather, into despair; but then this is the way to complete deliverance.

* [Tholuck, Stuart (Meyer, Lange, apparently), attribute the change in Augustine's views to the Pelagian controversy; Dr. Hodge, on the other hand: "to a deeper insight into his own heart, and a more thorough investigation of the Scriptures." In the Expositio Quarundam Prop. Ep. Rom. Prop. 43 (not the incomplete commentary) the earlier view is stated (394). It is repeated in Ad Simp. (397), Conf. vii. 21 (400). The Pelagian controversy began about 412. It is not until 420 that the other view is presented (Contra duas Epistolas Pel. ad Bonifac., i. 12). It is repeated in Retradationes, i. 23, l. 1 (427), and in Contra Jul., vi. 18 (about the same time). The language of Augustine is as follows (in Retrac.): que postea lectis quibusdam divinarum tractatibus eloquiorum, quorum me moveret uoluntas, consideravi diligentius et vidi etiam de ipso apostolo posse intelligi quod ait (ver. 14): "quod in his libris contra Pelagianos nuper scripti, quantum potui diligenter ostendi." The tone of the whole section is polemic. This fact, in connection with the dates above given, shows that the probabilities are strongly in favor of the view of Stuart. A general change may have been going on, but, as regards this passage, the change seems due to the exigencies of the controversy. Comp. Migne's edition Augustini Opera, i. 620, iii. 2071, &c.; also Schaef, History of the Christian Church, iii. pp. 968 ff.—R.]

† [This view is as follows: From vers. 7-13 is historical, carnal self under the convictions of sin in the transition state. Ver. 14 is still of the carnal self, but Paul, in passing forward, transfers himself into his present position by the change of tense. Speaking in this tense, he begins to tell of the motions of the will toward God (ver. 15, which is true only of the regenerate). Then an apparent verbal confusion arises, the ego having a wider meaning in ver. 17 than in ver. 13, &c. After ver. 20, the subject is the actual then existing complex self of Paul in his state of conflict. This view is more easily justified by the exegesis of separate verses than that of Dr. Hodge, yet the "confusion" is great.—R.]

Tholuck properly remarks: "As the question is usually raised, whether the regenerate or the unregenerate person is spoken of, it produces misunderstanding so far as the status irrogenitorum comprehends in itself the very different states of soul of the status exlex carnalis and of the status legalis; then, how far the relation of Old Testament believers to law and regeneration is regarded differently; and finally, how far the idea of regeneration has been a self-consciously variable one."

[This view is, on the whole, the most satisfactory. It admits the conflict after regeneration, but guards against the thought that this is a description of distinctively Christian experience. It is rather that of one under the pedagogy of the law "unto Christ," whether for the first time or the hundredth time. It is the most hopeful state of the unregenerate man; the least desirable state of the regenerate man. Of course, it cannot be admitted that there is a third class, a tertium quid, the awakened. This view seems to be the one which will harmonize the polemics of the past. Jowett adopts it, Schaff also, while Delitzsch, after advocating (3), says: "He speaks of himself the regenerate—i. e., of experiences still continuing, and not absolutely passed away—but he does not speak of himself quod regenerate—i. e., not of experiences which he has received by the specifically New Testament grace of regeneration." He further admits that such experiences might occur in the heathen world, according to Rom. ii. 15. The advantages of this view are very numerous. It relieves the exegesis of a constant constraint, viz., the attempt to press the words into harmony with certain preconceived anthropological positions. It agrees best with the context. Its practical value is beyond that of any other. See Doctr. Notes.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

FIRST PARAGRAPH, VERS. 7-12.

Ver. 7. What shall we say then? [Τί οὖν ἀποδύμεν; see the note on this expression, iii. 5, p. 118. Comp. also ix. 30, where the use is different.—R.] Intimation that another false conclusion must be prevented. Though the Christian be dead to the law, it does not follow that the law is not holy. But it belongs to a preceding stage of development.

Is the law sin [ὁ νόμος ἁμαρτία]? Origen [Jerome]: the lex naturalis. Tholuck: the Mosaic law. Certainly the question is respecting the justification of the latter. [Jowett paraphrases: Is conscience sin?—which seems almost an exegetical caprice. His reason for it, that the consciousness of sin, rather than a question of new moons and habbaths, is under consideration, betrays an entire misapprehension of the ethical purpose of the law of Moses. It may be admitted that an inferential reference to all law can be found here, but the passage is an account of an historical experience, which took place under the Mosaic law.—R.]

Sin. The usual interpretation: cause of sin Metonymically, the operation named, instead of the cause, as 2 Kings iv. 40; Micah v. 1: Samaria is sin for Jacob. On the other hand, De Wette and Meyer say: Is the law sinful, immoral? After what precedes, it may well mean: Is it the real cause of sin, and, as such, itself sinful? [Bengel: "causa peccati peccaminosa," "ὁ νόμος itself being abstract, that which is predicated of it is abstract also" (Alford).—R.] Even this conclusion is repelled by the Apostle with abhorrence, μη γένοιτο.

Nay, but. The ἀλλὰ is taken by some in the sense of ἀλλὰγε; but certainly. He repels the thought that the law is sin, but yet he firmly holds that it brought injury (Stuart, Köllner, and others; Meyer, Hofmann). Tholuck, on the other hand (with Theodore of Mopsvestia, Abelard, and others), sees, in what is here said, the expression of the opposite, viz., that the law first brought sin to consciousness. It may be asked whether this alternative is a real one. If the law be really holy, because it has driven sin from its concealment and brought it fully to manifestation, then there is no alternative here. [This seems decisive against Stuart's view. Meyer (4th ed.) renders ἀλλὰ, sondern. The law is not sin, but its actual relation to sin is that of discoverer of sin. This is much simpler than Alford's view: I say not that, but what I mean is that. The objection that this implies a praise of the law (De Wette) is without force. He might well praise it as leading toward ver. 25; viii. 1.—R.]

But it may be asked, in connection with this view, How are the words, I had not known sin [τὴν ἁμαρτίαν οὐκ ἔγνων], to be explained? According to Cyril, Winzer, De Wette, Philippi, and Tholuck, this refers to the knowledge of sin alone; but, according to Meyer, and others, it refers to the becoming acquainted with sin by experience. Meyer: "The principle of sin in man, with which we first become experimentally acquainted by the law, and which would have remained unknown to us without the law, because then it would not have become active by the excitement of desires for what is forbidden, in opposition to the law." This explanation lays too much stress upon the second point of view. According to chap. v. 20, vi. 15, and ver. 8 of this chapter, it is, however, not doubtful that the Apostle has here in mind not only the knowledge of sin, but also the excitement of sin. But he does not have it in mind as the increase of sin in itself, but as the promotion of its manifestation and form for the judgment.

Except through the law [εἰ μὴ διὰ νόμου]. Olshausen: "The law in all the forms of its revelation." Meyer properly rejects this. Although the law further appears as immanent in man, yet, ever since the Mosaic law, by which it was awakened, it has the character of the second, threatening, and deadly law. The moral law of nature, ideally conceived, is one with human nature. [The citation from the Decalogue, immediately following, shows what the reference is.—R.]

For I had not known evil desire [τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν οὐκ ᾔδειν]. See Textual Note 1. Γὰρ confirmatory, not = for example. On τι, see Tholuck, Stuart, Winer, p. 404. τὴν untranslatable in English; here a sign of close logical connection. On the distinction between the verbs, Bengel says: ἔγνων majus est, οἶδα minus. Hinc posterius, cum etiam minor gradus negatur, est in incremento. The verb is strengthened also, in this conditional clause, by the absence of ἄν, which would usually be inserted.—R.] We cannot translate this, with Meyer: "For I would not have known desire," &c. This would make the law the producer of lust, which is not the Apostle's meaning. That lust was present without the law, he had sufficiently asserted in chaps. i. and v. But now he has become acquainted with the corrupting and condemnatory character of wicked lust, under the prohibition:

Thou shalt not covet (Exod. xx. 17), [οὐκ ἐπιθυμήσεις]. On the prohibitory future of the law, as quoted in the New Testament, see Winer, p. 296; Buttmann, N. T. Gramm., p. 221.—R.] As this was to him the principal thing in the law, he thus first understood the inner character of the law and the inward nature of sin; but thus also was the propensity to evil first excited, in the most manifold way, by the contradiction in him. The desire was now to him universally and decisively the principal and decisive thing. The first view of the inner life, or of the interior of life, had now occurred. Tholuck remarks, that Augustine and Thomas Aquinas regarded the concupiscentia as the generale peccatum from which all the others proceeded; but he observes, on the contrary, that the τί in the sentence suggests rather a subordinate relation. But is the ἡ δέ subordinated or separated in relation to the whole sentence? For I never once understood the meaning of wicked lust without the law.

To what period of Paul's life does this belong? To the time of his childhood (Origen); or of his Pharisaical blindness ("the elder Lutheran and Reformed exegesis down to Carpov")? Tholuck gives reasons for the latter. According to Matt. v., Pharisaism was narrowed to the act. He cites pertinent expressions of Kimchi, and other Jewish writers (see also the note, p. 352). In Jarchi, the explanation of the Tenth Commandment is wanting; in Aben Ezra there is a dwarfish construction. But then he raises the objection, that a person like Paul must have earlier come to a knowledge of the sinfulness of the ἐπιθυμία. But the knowledge of the sinfulness of the ἐπιθυμία has its first awakening significance, when wicked lust is recognized as the root of supposed good works, and thereby leads to a revolution of the old views on good works themselves. Even the fanatic rejects not only wicked works in themselves, but also their root—wicked desires. But he defines wicked desires and good affections according to evil and good works, while the awakened one begins to proceed from the judgment on inward affections, and afterwards to define the works. Therefore we cannot say, that οὐκ ἔγνων and οὐκ ἤδεον stand here merely hypothetically; the question as to the subject of this declaration must be raised first in ver. 9 (Tholuck). Vers. 7 and 9 denote the same experience through which Paul, as the representative of all true contestants, passed under the law: ver. 7 on the side of the perception of sin, ver. 9 on the side of the excitement of sin.

Ver. 8. But sin. The δέ is, indeed, "conjunctive" (Meyer), [not adversative (Webster and Wilkinson).—R.], yet not in reference to the history of the development of the sinful experience, but so far as its second stage is given.—Sin, ἡ ἀμαρτία; that is, sin inwardly present as peccability; the ἐπιθυμία, as it was just shown to be sin [The principle of sin in man, as in ver. 7. To admit a personification, as held by Fritzsche and Stuart,* is unnecessary; to refer it to actual sin (Reiche), is contrary to the context. Comp. Olshausen, Koppe, Philippi, Hodge.—R.]

Taking occasion [ἀφορμὴν δὲ λαβοῦσα]. The ἀφορμὴ denotes the external impulse or occasion, in opposition to the inner. [Not merely opportunity; "it indicates the furnishing the material and ground of attack, the wherewith and whence to attack" (Alford). Its position is emphatic, though the whole phrase is probably thus rendered prominent.—R.] The λαμβάνειν in λαβοῦσα, as free, moral activity, must be made emphatic here. Therefore Reiche says, incorrectly: it received occasion.

By the commandment wrought in me [διὰ τῆς ἐντολῆς κατηργάσατο ἐν ἐμοί]. The διὰ τῆς ἐντολ. must be connected with κατηργ. (Rückert, Tholuck, Meyer), and not with ἀφορμ. λαβ. (Luther, Olshausen, Tholuck).† The sentence contains the declaration how sin took an occasion for itself. It operated just by the commandment [the single precept referred to ver. 7], since it regarded the categorical commandment as a hostile power, and struggled and rebelled against it.

The immediate design of the commandment in itself was the subjection of the sinner; but the prospective result was the rising of sin, and this result should bring sin clearly to the light in order to capacitate the sinner for deliverance. Meyer says ambiguously: "Concupiscence is also without law in man, but yet it is not concupiscence for what is forbidden." Certainly the positive prohibition first appears with the law; but the variance of the sinner with the inner law of life is already perfectly present. But now refractoriness toward the positive command makes its appearance, and enhances and consummates sin.

All manner of evil desire [πάνσαν ἐπιθυμίαν]. The ἐπιθυμία was already present; but it now first unfolded and extended itself to the contrast. Zwingli, and others, interpret this as the knowledge of lust; Luther, Calovius, Philippi, and others, interpret it properly as the excitement of lust. Tholuck: "According to ver. 11, sin deceives, as is exhibited in the history of the fall of man; to man every thing forbidden appears as a desirable blessing; but yet, as it is forbidden, he feels that his freedom is limited, and now his lust rages more violently, like the waves against the dyke;" see 1 Cor. xv. 46. [Philippi well says of this: "An immovably certain psychological fact, which man can more easily reason away and dispute away, than do away." ‡—R.]

* [Stuart makes ἀμαρτία here almost = ἐννοια σαρκίως (ver. 14 ff.). If an equivalent is necessary, σάρξ is a preferable one. For full, almost fanciful, notes on the presumed personification, see Wordsworth in loco.—R.]

† [The proof of this connection is, that διὰ is never joined with ἀφ. λαβ. (ἀφ. is usual); that vers. 11, 13 seem to require it.—R.]

‡ [The following citations from the classics support the universality of the principle set forth in this verse (comp. Prov. ix. 17):

Onto (Livy xxxiv. 4): Nolite eodem loco existimare, Quirites, futuram rem, quo fuit, antequam leas de hoc ferretur. Et hominem improbum non occurrere leas est, quam absolvi, et luxuriam non multa tolerabilior easse, quam erit nunc ipsis vinculis, sicut fera bestia irritata, drink emissas. Seneca (de Clementia, i. 23): Porricida cum legi caperunt, a illis facinus paena monstravit. Horace (Carm., i. 3):

For without the law sin is dead [χωρίς νόμον ἁμαρτία νεκρά]. A general proposition, hence, with the verb omitted. Beza and Reiche incorrectly supply ἦν; so E. V., was. It will readily be understood that νεκρά is not used in an absolute, but relative sense, = nonoperative (or unobserved, if the reference be limited to the knowledge of sin). Against this the antithesis of the following verse may be urged.—R.] Meyer, incorrectly: “not actively, because that is wanting whereby it can take occasion to be active.” Rather, sin cannot mature in its root; it cannot come to παράβασις. Man has, to a certain extent, laid himself to rest with it upon a lower bestial stage, which is apparently nature; the commandment first manifests the demoniacal contradiction of this stage, the actual as well as the formal contradiction to God and what is divine (see chap. viii. 3). It is incorrect to limit the statement, with Chrysostom, Calvin, and others, to knowledge—it was not known; or, with Calovius, to the conscience (terrores conscientia); or, finally, to limit the idea to the sphere of desire (Tholuck). It has not yet acquired its most real, false life, in the παράβασις. Reference must here be made to the antithesis: Sin was dead, and I was alive. [The clauses, however, are not strictly antithetical.—R.]

Ver. 9. Now I was alive without the law once [ἐγὼ δὲ ἕως χωρίς νόμον ποτέ]. For (E. V.) is incorrect; δὲ must then be rendered but or now (i. e., moreover), as it is taken to be adversative or continuative. The latter is to be preferred, on the ground that this clause continues a description of the state without the law, while the real antithesis occurs in the following clause, for which the particle but should be reserved.—R.] In order to define the sense, we must apply the twofold antithesis. Paul could only have lived first in the sense in which sin was dead in him, and also be dead in the sense in which sin was alive in him.

I was alive. The I must be emphasized: “the whole expression is pregnant (Reiche, on the contrary, merely ἦν)”.

Explanations: 1. Videbar mihi vivere (Augustine, Erasmus [Barnes], and others).

2. Securus eram (Melancthon, Calvin, Bengel [Hodge], and others), I lived securely as a Pharisee.

3. Meyer says, to the contrary: “Paul means the life of childlike innocence which is free from death (ver. 10), (comp. Winzer, p. 11; Umbreit in the Studien und Kritiken, 1851, p. 637 f.), where (as this condition of life, analogous to the paradisaical state of our first parents, was the cheerful ray of his earliest recollection) the law had not yet come to knowledge, the moral spontaneity had not yet occurred, and therefore the principle of sin was still in the slumber of death. This is certainly a status securitatis, but not an immoral one.” * Tholuck reminds us of the fact, that the Jewish child was not subject to the law until his thirteenth year; but he accedes (and properly so) to the views of the elder expositors. Paul first perceived the deadly sting of the law when he was forbidden to lust. The child, as a child, has childish devices; 1 Cor. xiii.; but it can here come into consideration only so far as its religious and moral consciousness began to develop. But the status securitatis of which the Apostle here speaks, first begins where the innocent child's status securitatis ceases. It consists in the sinful life being taken, after the course of the world, as naturalness instead of unnaturalness. And this can also continue under the law, so long as the law is regarded as something external, and is referred to mere action. The Apostle first dates the true existence of the law for man from the understanding of the Thou shalt not covet. As, therefore, Meyer has above given too Augustinian a view of original sinfulness, so he here construes it too much on the opposite side.

In a historical reference, this text, according to Rom. v. 13, has especially in view the period from Adam to Moses. It has, therefore, even been said that Paul here speaks, in the name of his people, of the more innocent and pure life of the patriarchs and Israelites before the gift of the law (Grotius, Lachmann, Fritzsche, and others). Undoubtedly, that historical stage is included; yet here the psychological point of view predominates: the life of the individual up to the understanding of the Mosaic expression, Thou shalt not covet. The law also points, by the οὐκ ἐπιβόη, beyond itself; as the sacrificial offering, &c.

Now I was alive. This means, according to Meyer, “Man, during the state of death (Todtsein) of the principle of sin, was not yet subject to eternal death. Certainly he became subject to physical death by the sin of Adam.” We have already refuted this distinction. The condemned are first actually subject to death at the final judgment; in principle, the children of Adam are subject to it; but the living man, of whom Paul here speaks, had not yet fallen into it, in the personal consciousness of guilt and the personal entanglement in the παράβασις.

But when the commandment came [ἐλθόντος δὲ τῆς ἐντολῆς]. The specific command, not the whole law. Came—i. e., was brought home to me.—At this point the older Lutheran and Calvinistic expositors found a reference to the conviction of sin immediately preceding conversion. But the use of ἐντολή is against this, as well as the drift of the whole passage. A writer, so loving in his repetition of the name of Christ, and in direct reference to the work of Christ, would not have left such a meaning obscure. Comp. Philippi on the psychological objections.—R.] When its inward character became known. This certainly has an his-

*Audax omnia perpeti

Ovid (Amor., 2, 19, 3): Quod licet ingratum est, quod non deest acris urit; (3, 4) Nititur in vetitum semper cupimus negata.

To this may well be added the remark of Goethe (in a letter to Lavater): Ich möchte das Element woraus der Menschenseele gebildet ist und worin sie lebt, ein Pfegfeuer nennen, worin alle höllischen und himmlischen Kräfte durcheinander wirken (I might call the element, out of which the soul of man is formed and in which it lives, a purgatory, in which all hellish and heavenly powers confusedly walk and work).—R.]

* [The legitimate result of this interpretation is Jowett's position: “The state which the Apostle describes is in some degree ideal and imaginary.” There is no such time of innocence, but rather a time of security, “before the deeper energies of the moral nature are aroused.” All that period, in the individual consciousness, as well as secondarily in the historical development of redemption, is referred to by verē. Granting, as a fair exegesis of the whole context compels us to do, that the termination of this period was not at the entrance of Christian knowledge of the law, we may well include the thought urged so strongly by Prof. Stuart: “Before an individual has a distinct and vivid perception of the nature and spirituality and extent of the Divine law, he is less active and desperate in his sin and guilt than after he comes to such a knowledge.” The view of vers. 7, 8, as including excitement of sin, or status securitatis in this position.—R.]

torical application to the gift of the Mosaic law (Reiche, Fritzsche), but a psychological application to the designated moments of introspection.

Sin sprang into life [ἡ ἁμαρτία ἀνέστη]. The explanation of the ἀνέστη, revised (Rückert, De Wette, and others. Tholuck: "The ἀνά stands, as elsewhere in compound words, in the strengthened meaning of sursum; comp. ἀναβλέπω in John ix. 11," &c.), is opposed by Meyer, in accordance with the elder expositors, and by Bengel and Philippi. Bengel makes this explanation: sicut vixerat, cum per Adamum intrasset in mundum. Certainly the ἁμαρτία became perfectly alive first in Adam as παράβασις, and then as such νικρά, until the gift of the Mosaic law again brought it to life. But this is also repeated psychologically in the individual so far as the Adamic παράβασις is psychologically reflected more or less strongly in his first offences; thus an individual λαμβ. of the fall takes place, but then, until the awakening light of the law penetrates the conscience, a false state of nature enters, connected with an active sense of life. [Here, too, must be included both the knowledge of and excitement to sin.—R.]—Some Codd. read ἔζησεν, because the expression ἀνέστη did not occur in the classical Greek and in the Septuagint. Origen thought there was here a reminder of a pre-terrestrial fall. Cocceius: evidentius apparuit.

And I died [ἐγὼ δὲ ἀπέθανον]. In the same sense as sin became alive, did the sinner die. That is, with the sense of conscious [and increasing] guilt, the sense of the penalty of death has made its appearance. Meyer makes an inadequate distinction here: "We must understand neither physical nor spiritual death (Semler, Böhme, Rückert, and others), but eternal death, as the antithesis, εἰς ζωὴν, requires." The sense of the penalty of death makes no distinction of this kind. [The aorist points to a definite occurrence. He entered into a certain spiritual state, which he calls death. Calvin: Mors peccati vita est hominis; sursum vita peccati mors hominis.—R.]

Ver. 10. And the commandment, which was unto life, the same was found by me to be unto death [καὶ ἐνέβηθι μοι ἡ ἐντολὴ ἡ εἰς ζωὴν, αὐτὴ εἰς θάνατον]. Kai introduces the verse as an epexegetis of died, with the addition of a new circumstance (Stuart).—R.] Supply οὖσα before unto life. In what sense was the commandment thus found? The commandment was certainly promised life to the one observing the law; Lev. xviii. 5; Deut. v. 33; Matt. xix. 17. It is, however, easily misunderstood when there is such a general explanation as this: "the promise of life was connected with the observance of the Mosaic commandments" (Meyer). The sense is rather from the beginning, that the kind of promise is conditional on the kind of observance. External obedience has also only an external promise, or a promise of what is external (Exod. xx. 12). But this is, for the pious, only the figure of a higher obedience and promise. The self-righteous man, on the other hand, made a snare for himself out of that promise. Now, in the highest sense, life according to the law of the Spirit—that is, in faith (which is the end of the law)—results in the ζωὴ αἰώνιος. Only the transition from death to life lies between the two. It is just the most intense effort to fulfil the law that results in death. This is a circumstance which seems to contradict the εἰς ζωὴν, and yet it does not contradict it, but is quite in harmony with it.

The same. We hold that, according to the sense, we must read αὐτὴ (with Lachmann, De Wette, Philippi), and not αὐτῇ, with Meyer and Tischendorf [Alford, Tregelles]. For the law has only temporarily become transformed, as the same law of life, into a law of death; it has not permanently become a law of death.*

Ver. 11. For sin, &c. [ἐ γὰρ ἁμαρτία, κ.τ.λ.]. The γὰρ introduces an explanation of ver. 10. The first words are similar to ver. 8, but ἁμαρτία here stands emphatically first. The position of διὰ τῆς ἐντολῆς is also slightly emphatic.—R.] Not the commandment in itself has become a commandment unto death; sin has rather made it thus. How far? Sin took occasion, or made itself an occasion. That it took it of the commandment, is assumed, and is explained by what follows. The following καὶ δι' αὐτῆς, &c., favors the connection of the διὰ τῆς ἐντολῆς with ἐξηπάτησέν με, deceived me. It first made the commandment a provocation, and then a means of condemnation. Thus what applies to Satan, that he was first man's tempter, and then his accuser, applies likewise to sin. This passage calls to mind the serpent in Paradise, as 2 Cor. xi. 3. But in what did the deception of sin consist? Philippi: "Since sin made me pervert the law, in which I thought that I had a guide to righteousness, into a means for the promotion of unrighteousness."† Not clear. It deceived me, in that it represented the law to me as a limit which seemed to separate me from my happiness. Behind that limit it charmed me to transgression by a phantom of happiness. Accordingly, it is not satisfactory to explain the following clause: And by it slew me [καὶ δι' αὐτῆς ἀπέκτενέν με], thus: sin gave me over to the law, so that it slew me. In this respect sin rather falsified the law, since it represented to me my well-merited death as irremediable, or my judge as my enemy (see Gen. iii.; Heb. ii. 15; 1 John iii. 20). ["Brought me into the state of sin and misery," already referred to in ver. 10. The allusion to the temptation is to be admitted here also.—R.] Tholuck: "Decision of Simon Ben Lachish: The wicked nature of man rises every day against him, and seeks to slay him (Vitringa, Observ. Sacr., ii. 599); also by the מַלְאָךְ הַמָּוֶת is denoted the angel of death."

Ver. 12. So that the law is holy, &c. [ὥστε ὁ νόμος ἅγιος, κ.τ.λ.]. The ὥστε introduces the result of the whole discussion, vers

* [It is more difficult than important to decide this point. Αὐτῇ, her, this; αὐτῇ, ipsa, the same. The former, though not in itself so emphatic, here takes the pre-empting subject, this very commandment, giving it a tragical force (so Meyer and Philippi, whom Lange cites in favor of the other view). The analogy of vers. 15, 16, 19, 20 (τοῦτο) is against Lange's preference.—R.]

† [So Hodge: "The reference is not to the promised joys of sin, which always mock the expectation and disappoint the hopes, but rather to the utter failure of the law to do what he expected from it." This view coincides with the assumption, that the point in experience here reached is one necessarily and immediately preceding conversion. Dr. Hodge does not thus assume, y. c. he appeals to Christian experience in confirmation. If the excitement to sin be allowed throughout these verses, the other interpretation, adopted by Dr. Lange, is preferable. Comp., however, a beautiful setting forth of the first view by Neander, Pfanzung, ii. 681 (quoted in Tholuck).—R.]

7-11. It is not = ergo, yet of a more general conclusive character. Το μέν, the corresponding δὲ is wanting. The antithesis we should expect, according to Meyer, is: but sin brought me to death through the law, which was good in itself. This is the thought of ver. 13; but as the form is changed, δὲ does not appear.—R.] Not only innocent (Tholuck), but also absolutely separated from, and opposed to, sin. And this applies not only to the law in general, but also to its explanation in the single commandment.

[And the commandment holy and just and good, καὶ ἡ ἐντολὴ ἁγία καὶ δίκαια καὶ ἀγαθὴ.] The commandment is first holy in its origin as God's commandment; secondly, just, as the individual determination of the law of the system of righteousness (Meyer: "rightly constituted, just as it should be"); and good—that is, not in the vague sense of excellent (Meyer, Philippi, and others), but according to the idea of what is good: beneficial promotion of life in itself, in spite of its working of death in me; indeed, even by its working of death. The term good refers to the blessed result of divine sorrow, and to the gospel.† The elaborate apology for the commandment is certainly (according to Meyer) occasioned by the fact that the ἐντολὴ has been described as precisely the object of sin, in ver. 7.

SECOND PARAGRAPH (VER. 13).

The Law in relation to the Sinner.

Ver. 13. Did then that which was good become death unto me? [Τὸ οὖν ἀγαθὸν ἐμοὶ ἐγένετο θάνατος; See Textual Note².] Tholuck: "The μέν in ver. 12 prepared for the antithesis ἡ δὲ ἁμαρτία, κ.τ.λ. Yet the Apostle again presents his thoughts in the form of a refutation of an antagonistic consequence. The ἀγαθὸν should lead us to expect only wholesome fruits." Undoubtedly, the expression ἀγαθὴ (ver. 12) is the new problem now to be solved. It was not so much to be wondered at that the commandment, as holy and just, brought death; but it was an enigma that it, as ἀγαθὴ, should bring forth death. The explanation of this enigma will also show how the law has brought about the great change: Through Death to Life! Was that which is good, of itself and immediately, made death unto me? This conclusion, again, is to be repelled by Let it not be! μὴ γένοιτο.

But sin [ἀλλὰ ἡ ἁμαρτία (supply ἐμοὶ ἐγένετο θάνατος). So all modern commentators.—R.] Namely, that was made death unto me. "The construction of Luther, Heumann, Carpzov, &c., is totally wrong: ἀλλὰ ἡ ἁμαρτία διὰ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ μοι κατηγγαζομένη (ἦν) θάνατον, ἡ φανὴ ἁμαρτία" (Meyer); so also the Vulgate.

That it might appear sin [ἡ φανὴ ἁμαρτία. The ἡ is telic; φανὴ, be shown to be (Alford). This second ἁμαρτία is a predicate; anarthrous, therefore, and also as denoting character.—R.] This was therefore the most immediate design of the law: Sin should appear as sin (Eph. v. 13; Gen. iii.: Adam, where art thou?).

[Working death to me, by that which is good, διὰ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ μοι κατηγγαζομένη θάνατον.] The idea of perfectly disclosed sin is just this: that it works death by the misconstruction and abuse of what is good. Thus the law is first made to serve as a provocation to sin unto death; second, the gospel is made a savor of death; and third, the truth is made a mighty anti-christian lie (2 Thess. ii. 11). Tholuck: "The nature of sin should thereby become manifest, that it should appear as something which makes use of what is even good as a means of ruin, and in this manner the commandment should become a means of exhibiting sin in all the more hideous light." Scholium of Matthæus: "ἡ αὐτῇ, ἐαυτῇ ἐλέγχῃ, ἡ αὐτῇ τῇ ἐαυτῇ πικρίαν ἐκκαλύπτῃ." In addition to this, these pertinent words: "In fact, as it is the sovereign right of good to overturn evil results for good, so is it the curse of sin to pervert the effects of what is good to evil." Thus an emphasis rests on the διὰ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, for which reason it comes first.

Meyer correctly urges, against Reiche, that this ἡ is telic, in opposition to the ecabatic view. Death was already present before the law, but sin completed it by the law; κατηγγαζομένη. The law is not sin; sin disclosed itself completely as sin in making what is good a means of evil.

That sin through the commandment might become exceedingly sinful [ἡ γίνεταί καθ' ὑπερβολὴν ἁμαρτωλὸς ἡ ἁμαρτία διὰ τῆς ἐντολῆς. Parallel clause to the last, of increased force: "Observe the pithy, sharp, vividly compressed sketch of the dark figure" (Meyer).—R.] Καθ' ὑπερβολὴν. Frequently used by Paul; 2 Cor. i. 8; iv. 17; Gal. i. 13. The ἁμαρτωλὸς appears to be an intimation that sin, as an imaginary man, should be driven from real human nature to destruction. [The telic force of these clauses is thus expanded by Dr. Hodge: "Such is the design of the law, so far as the salvation of sinners is concerned. It does not prescribe the conditions of salvation. Neither is the law the means of sanctification. It cannot make us holy. On the contrary, its operation is to excite and exasperate sin—to render its power more dreadful and destructive."—R.]

[EXCURSUS ON BIBLICO-PSYCHOLOGICAL TERMS.—

The exact significance of the terms σὰρξ and πνεῦμα, as used so frequently by the Apostle in this and the eighth chapters, requires careful consideration at this point. But such a discussion must necessarily be preceded by some remarks on the words, σῶμα, ψυχὴ, πνεῦμα, body, soul, and spirit, as used by Paul in a strictly anthropological sense.

I. Σῶμα, BODY. This term is readily understood as generally used in the New Testament. Still it refers, strictly speaking, to the bodily organism, and has a psychological meaning almost = sense the sensational part of man's nature. As distinguished from σὰρξ (in its physiological sense), it means the organism, of which σὰρξ is the material substance. (Κρέας differs from σὰρξ, in not including the idea of an organism.) That σῶμα must not be restricted to the material body, irrespective of its organism and vital union with the immaterial part of man's nature, is evident from the numerous passages (Rom. xii. 5; 1 Cor. vii. 27; Eph. i. 23; Col. i. 18, &c.), where the Church is called the body of Christ. This expression would convey little meaning, if σῶμα had not this psychological sense. No difficulty arises in regard to this term, except in the interpretation of a few passages which seem to imply an ethical sense; e. g., Rom. vi. 6 (q. v.); vii. 24; viii. 10, 13; Col. ii. 11. It must be remarked, that in most of these the ethical force really belongs to some attributive word, σῶμα being in itself indifferent. We may explain most of these cases by giving the word a figurative sense, the organism of sin (Rom. vi. 6; vii. 24; Col. ii. 11), analogous to the old man; or by admitting a reference to the body as the chief organ of the manifestation of sin. The term μέλη, members (which is usually associated with σῶμα, rather than with σάρξ, because the idea of an organism is more prominent in the former term), must be interpreted accordingly (see Col. iii. 5; Bibelwerk, p. 64, Amer. ed.). In any case, the thought that the body is the chief source and seat of sin, must be rejected as unscriptural, unapostolic, and untrue. We must also avoid a dualistic understanding of the material and immaterial in man's nature.

II. Ψυχή, SOUL. This term is from ψύχω, to breathe, to blow, and, like נֶפֶשׁ, its Hebrew equivalent, originally means animal life (see the New Testament usage, especially in the Gospels), but, like the Hebrew word, it also is frequently referred to the whole immaterial part of man's nature, in distinction from σῶμα. By synecdoche, it is put for the whole man, in enumeration (Acts ii. 41: about three thousand souls), and in the phrase, πάσα ψυχή, every soul. As the word occurs but four times in the Epistle to the Romans—twice in the sense of life, and twice in the phrase, every soul—it would not be necessary to discuss it further, did not the precise meaning of πνεῦμα depend upon a further discrimination. Twice in the New Testament (1 Thess. v. 23; Heb. iv. 12) the word is distinguished from πνεῦμα. As both passages may be regarded as Pauline, the one occurring in his earliest written Epistle, and the other in an Epistle of much later date, which is Pauline, even if not written by Paul, the question of a Pauline trichotomy cannot be avoided. The fuller discussion will be found under πνεῦμα, below, but here we must define ψυχή more closely. Although it is true that the term does mean the animal soul, it is very doubtful whether it means simply this in the two passages above referred to. If "animal soul" be restricted to the principle of life, then σῶμα, in such a connection, should include this; and a wish that the principle of life be "preserved blameless," is singular, to say the least. If, however, "animal soul" be taken to include more than this—viz., what we share with the brutes—then it is highly probable that this largely includes the intellectual part of our nature, and ψυχή must then be = the seat of the Understanding, in distinction from the Reason. That some wide sense is involved, is evident both from 1 Cor. xv. 45, "the first Adam was made a living soul," and from 1 Cor. ii. 14, where the adjective ψυχικός undoubtedly includes the intellectual part of man's nature. In both these cases the antithesis is πνεῦμα in the ethical sense; hence the greater necessity for enlarging the idea of ψυχή.* Passing over many distinctions which have been made, we consider the view of Olshausen, who makes ψυχή the centre of our personality, the battlefield of the flesh and human spirit. In this view, also, σάρξ and σῶμα are almost identical, though he admits that, in the unrenewed man, the ψυχή is under the dominion of the σάρξ. It excludes the νοῦς from the ψυχή, making it the organ of activity for the human spirit. This view still restricts ψυχή too much, even admitting the trichotomy.* It confuses psychological and ethical terms. It leans toward the error which makes the body the source of sin, while, on the other hand, it excludes the human spirit from the dominion of sin (and its organ, the νοῦς). It cannot be justified by Paul's language, for the very passages which indicate a trichotomy imply the sinfulness of the human spirit, while it is altogether unapostolic, as already remarked, to refer sin to the body as its source. The use of the word ψυχικός, as quoted above, is equally opposed to this view, which probably grows out of the attempt to find in ψυχή and πνεῦμα, terms analogous to the Understanding and Reason. We therefore object to this view, and claim a still wider sense for ψυχή. How much can be claimed for it, will appear from what follows.

III. Πνεῦμα, SPIRIT. This term, from πνέω, to blow, to breathe, means (like the Hebrew רוּחַ) breath, then wind, then anima, lastly animus, spirit, in all the various meanings we give that word. It must first be discussed in its strictly psychological meaning.

A. Besides the secondary meaning, temper, disposition, it is used by most of the New Testament writers to denote man's immaterial nature, including, together with σῶμα (Rom. viii. 10; 1 Cor. vi. 20; vii. 34), and also with σάρξ (2 Cor. vii. 1; Col. ii. 5), the whole man. In the phrase, "gave up the ghost," it is doubtful whether it means the whole immaterial nature, or simply life; in Luke xxiii. 46; Acts vii. 59, the former seems to be the meaning. But there are a number of passages where the exact signification turns on the previous question: Do the Scriptures assume or teach a trichotomy in human nature?—that man is a unity made up of body, soul, and spirit? It is essential to the proper understanding of chaps. vii. and viii. that this question be discussed.†

1. First of all, it must be admitted as a fact that the Scriptures recognize the dualism of spirit and matter, and that man is both material and immaterial, without any tertium quid, which is neither material nor immaterial. The presumption, then, is against the trichotomy, so far as it would ignore this fact. The presumption is also against any view which classes soul under the material part of the complex nature, since both soul and spirit are used to include the whole immaterial part of man.

On the other hand, Plato and Aristotle undoubt

immateriality of the soul, and make a living body antecedent thereto. Hegelianism regards the soul as only the band that connects body and spirit.—R.]

B. Heard, Tripartite Nature of Man, 2d ed., Edinb., 1868; Lange, Dogmatik, pp. 307, 1243.—R.]

* [Akin to the view under discussion is that of Göschel: "that the soul proceeds at once from body and spirit to unite the two." This contradicts, or, at least, confuses the edly held that there was a trichotomy (for their views, see Delitzsch, p. 93; Eng. ed. p. 213). This fact may be used to explain 1 Thess. v. 23 as popular language, but "we must needs turn to the Holy Scriptures, and accept without prejudice what it answers to us, be it Platonic or anti-Platonic." Some such view was held by Origen, by the Apollinarians and semi-Pelagians. All these, like the modern rationalistic notions on the subject, were extenuations of human corruption. Vain speculations on the subject are abundant, but this should not be to the prejudice of truth.*

Turning to 1 Thess. v. 23, we find a distinct assumption of a tripartite nature in man, all the more weighty because it is not in didactic form. To say that this is merely popular language, does not meet the case. For, while it may be said that Paul does not profess to teach metaphysics, the question then recurs: Was the popular language of that day correct, or that of another age? Besides, it is a hazardous method of dealing with a writer so uncommonly exact, and with a book which concerns itself with human salvation. Experience has proven how largely the diffusion and acceptance of biblical truth are dependent on correct anthropological views. If we believe that Paul chose his words wittingly, much more, if we hold them to be inspired, this text, taken by itself, assumes "that in the original structure of man there is something—yet remaining, needing and capable of sanctification—corresponding to the three terms, body, soul, and spirit."† The same is implied in Heb. iv. 12.

Leaving these passages, we find little else in the New Testament to support this view. Of course, when accepted, it must modify to some extent the signification given to these terms in other places; but there is no other passage in the New Testament which could be relied on to prove the trichotomy were these absent. Hence we infer that the distinction, if real, is not of such importance as has been thought, and cannot be made the basis of the startling propositions which human speculation has deduced from it. This does not deny that, from other sources, the trichotomy may receive important support; it refers simply to the place it should take in biblical psychology. Judging from the rare allusions to it, the prevailing dichotomic tone of the Scriptures, we infer that, while it may be necessary, in order to explain these passages, to accept a trichotomy, the advantages of so doing are incidental, rather than of the first moment.‡

2. Admitting that there is a tripartite nature in man, the main difficulty is a precise definition of these three parts. Here the German authors are in a very Babel of confusion. For the sake of clearness, we first of all reject

(a.) All views of the human spirit which make it the real soul over against a brute soul, termed ψυχή, for the reasons given above under II.

(b.) All views of the human spirit which make it a higher unfallen part of man's nature, over against a soul under the power of the σαρκί. This which is the view of Olshausen, and, with modifications, of many others, is not borne out by the anthropology of Scripture; is contradicted by the very passages which alone can establish a trichotomy, and is in the very face of 2 Cor. vii. 1, where "filthiness," μολυσμός, defilement, stain, is attributed to the human spirit. Did such an unfallen spirit, in any sense, exist in man, we might expect that term to be used in this chapter instead of σαρκί and ὁ ἕως ἀνθρώπου, whatever the reference may be. Jul. Müller (l. p. 450) well remarks: "Πνεῦμα in this anthropological sense is itself exposed to pollution (2 Cor. vii. 1), and needs sanctification and cleansing just as ψυχὴ and σῶμα (1 Thess. v. 23; 1 Cor. vii. 34); this spiritual sphere of life is the one which, in the work of regeneration, most needs to be renewed (Eph. iv. 23, compared with Rom. xii. 2). The notion that man's spirit cannot be depraved—that it is only limited in its activity from without—and that sin is the consequence of this limitation, cannot be attributed to the Apostle." This excludes, also, the view of Schöberlein and Hofmann (since given up by him), that the third term of the trichotomy is "the Spirit of God immanent in the soul."

(c.) But this would also exclude the view of Philippi, Schmid (apparently of Tholuck, Romans, p. 801), that the third term is the pneumatic nature imparted to the believer at regeneration. If it be this, how can it need sanctification? Besides, this involves the theory of regeneration, which makes it the impartation of an entirely new nature, not in soul and body, but in addition to soul and body, as the third term in one complex being. This view cannot satisfactorily explain the trichotomy in 1 Thess. v. 23; Heb. iv. 12.

(d.) There remains, then, this view, which meets all the requirements of exegesis: that man has a body in vital connection with his soul, which latter term includes all the powers of mind and heart, having as their object the body and self (hence including σαρκί and ὁ ἕως ἀνθρώπου; in this chapter). That, besides, he has, in his unity of nature, a spirit which is of the same nature as the soul, of a higher capacity, yet not separated or separable from it. This spirit is the capacity for God, God-consciousness (Heard); but in man's present condition it is dormant, virtually dead in its depravity, needing the power of the Holy Spirit to renew it. After such renewal it becomes spirit in the sense intended in the proposition: "that which is born of the Spirit is spirit" (John iii. 6). This seems to be, in substance, the view of Müller, Delitzsch, and Heard.* It admits a dichotomy, and also a trichotomy; claims that the soul is spiritual rather than material; that there is no gulf between soul and spirit; that the human spirit is powerless for good, yet that here, where depravity is really most terrible, redemption begins. "In consequence of sin, the human spirit is absorbed into soul and

* [The anthropology of Swedenborg assumes a trinity rather than a trichotomy, and by his doctrine of correspondences, spirit seems to lose its real significance.—R.]

† It must be noted how this passage assumes (1.), that the spirit needs sanctification; (2.) that body and soul are also to be preserved for God; thus guarding against Pelagianism and rationalism on the one hand, and asceticism and mysticism on the other.—R.]

‡ Any argument from the analogy of the Trinity must be left out of view, since it can prove nothing, though it may be pleasing to some minds to trace such an analogy.—R.]

* [Of course, the term will be given a more or less extended meaning by different authors; but if the two positions be held fast: (1.) That this spirit is the point of contact with Divine influences; (2.) That it, too, has been depraved, all erroneous conclusions will be avoided. Dr. Lange (Genesis, p. 213) seems to coincide with the view here presented: "It must be held fast, that man could not receive the Spirit of God, if he were not himself a spiritual being; yet it is a supposition of the Scripture that, since the fall, the spiritual nature is bound in the natural man, and does not come to its actuality."—R.]

flesh, and man, who ought to pass over from the position of the ψυχὴ ζωσα into the position of the πνεῦμα ζωοποιον, has become, instead of πνευματικός, a being ψυχικός and σαρκικός; and further, just for that reason, because the spirit stands in immediate causal relation to God, all the Divine operations having redemption in view, address themselves first of all to the πνεῦμα, and thence first attain to the ψυχὴ; for when God manifests himself, He appeals to the spirit of man" (Bibl. Psych., p. 96, Eng. ed., p. 117). It may be urged that this presents no real distinction; I reply, that it is not claimed that the distinction is of essential importance. But as Paul uses the word πνεῦμα in preference to ψυχὴ, when he speaks of man's immaterial nature, especially as regenerated by the Spirit of God, there seems to be no other way of accounting for it except on this view. (The objections to that of Philippi have been considered above.) Delitzsch very properly remarks: "Should any prefer to say, that the Apostle, by πνεῦμα and ψυχὴ, is distinguishing the internal condition of man's life, and especially of the Christian's life, in respect of two several relations, even this would not be false." It is, indeed, the nearest expression of the truth; for the human spirit is not brought into any special prominence by Paul, save as in a given relation in the Christian's life. Hence we have a second meaning of πνεῦμα.

B. The human spirit as acted upon by the Holy Spirit, and thus becoming the seat of those Divine impulses, which are the means of redeeming the whole man. Of course, as opinions differ respecting the first meaning, they will vary from our definition. Philippi makes this identical with A, while others would claim that we should distinguish here rather a new principle of life (Lange), than a part of our renewed nature. Dr. Lange seems to prefer this meaning throughout chap. viii. There, however, the reference seems to be mainly to the Holy Spirit, the objective agent. In ver. 10, 16, the subjective meaning is undoubtedly the correct one, as in John iii. 6; iv. 23, 24 (so Rom. ii. 29, see p. 115, where Dr. Lange gives a different view), 1 Cor. vi. 17; Phil. iii. 3. In many other passages this meaning is implied, as indeed it is even in 1 Thess. v. 23, though this cannot be explained satisfactorily, without presupposing a human spirit antecedent to regeneration.

C. The most common use of the term is obviously the strictly theological one: the Holy Spirit. Opinions vary as to the propriety of this meaning in certain passages. No definite rule can be laid down. The absence of the article is by no means a certain indication that the reference is subjective (against Harless). The reason for preferring this meaning, rather than "spiritual life-principle" (Lange), in chap. viii., is that, in ver. 2, the Holy Spirit is undoubtedly referred to, over against sin and death. When, then, σὰρξ afterwards occurs as the antithesis to πνεῦμα, there is still more reason for taking the latter term as the Holy Spirit, since the σὰρξ is, as it were, personified and externalized, and the correct antithetical term must be an objective agent. We can thus far more definitely fix the meaning of σὰρξ, since to admit any subjective antithesis, compels us to admit also some remnant of unfallen nature in the subject, for which the use of the word πνεῦμα in the New Testament gives no ground whatever.

IV. Σὰρξ, FLESH. This term is used by the LXX. to translate the Hebrew word בָּשָׂר. This Hebrew word, in its simplest meaning, is applied to the material substance of the body, then occasionally to the human body itself. Out of this grows the application to all terrestrial beings who possess sensational life. But a more frequent use is in the sense of human nature, with the personal life attached to it (Gen. vi. 12; Deut. v. 26; Ps. lxxviii. 39; cxliv. 21; Isa. xlix. 26; lvi. 16, 23, 24, and in numerous other passages). In Deut. v. 26; Isa. xxxi. 8; Jer. xvii. 5; Ps. lvi. 5, human nature is contrasted with God, His Spirit, eternity, and omnipotence, and the more prominent thought is therefore "that of the weakness, the frailty, the transitoriness of all earthly existence" (J. Müller). We reach, then, this sense: "Man with the adjunct notion of frailty" (Tholuck). There does not appear, however, any distinct ethical sense, still less any implication that man's sensuous nature is the seat of sin, or of opposition to his spirit.

1. Passing to the New Testament, we find also the narrower physiological meaning (1 Cor. xv. 39; Eph. v. 29; in the phrase, "flesh and blood," Matt. xvi. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 50; Gal. i. 16; Eph. vi. 12). It is also used as = body, the sensational part of man's nature, in Rom. ii. 18; 1 Cor. v. 6; vii. 28; 2 Cor. iv. 11; vii. 1, 5; xii. 7, &c., the antithesis being spirit, or the immaterial part of man's nature, never, however, with a distinctly ethical import. The prevailing use of the word in the New Testament undoubtedly is, that which corresponds with the wider meaning of בָּשָׂר, human nature, sometimes, as Müller holds, with a reference to the earthly life and relations (Gal. ii. 20; 2 Cor. x. 3; Phil. i. 22, 24; Col. i. 22; Eph. ii. 15, and a number of other passages, where the whole earthly side of man's life are contrasted with his relation to God in Christ); but also in the sense of man, with the idea of frailty more or less apparent (Rom. iii. 20; 1 Cor. i. 29; Gal. ii. 16; Acts ii. 17, which is a citation of בָּשָׂר in this sense; John xvii. 2; Luke iii. 6). Here we must class those passages which refer to the human nature of Christ: John i. 14; Rom. i. 3; ix. 5; * 1 Tim. iii. 16; 1 John iv. 2 (comp. p. 61). This list might be enlarged, but it is only necessary to establish the New Testament use of σὰρξ in the wide sense of the Hebrew equivalent. Up to this point we find no distinct ethical meaning—only a basis for it.

2. The ethical sense. Our inquiry here is of a twofold nature. A. How much is included under the term? B. What is its precise significance?

A. How much is included under this term? (1.) If we choose a few passages where the ethical sense is admitted by all commentators, such as Rom. viii. 4, or vii. 14 (σάρκινος); viii. 8, and attempt to substitute "body," or "sensational nature," for σὰρξ, it will be evident that such a meaning does not at all meet the case. It is not only contrary to the scriptural anthropology throughout, but in the passages themselves the antitheses are not of a character to justify it, especially in view of the wide meaning of σὰρξ, already established. (2.) Nor can we limit it to the body and soul, and exclude the human spirit. It has already been shown how little prominence is given to this distinction in the New Testament, how

* [In Rom. viii. 3, where the term occurs three times, it is highly probable that in the last two cases this sense is the more correct one.—E.]

there is no evidence whatever that the spirit is not under the dominion of the sarcastic tendency, but that, on the contrary, an immoral tendency is implied.* Nor will this view find support in the use of the adjective ψυχικός in an ethical sense as = σαρκικός; for in the only case where such an ethical sense is undoubted (1 Cor. ii. 14), the antithesis is not simply πνευματικός (applied to spiritual things and persons as proceeding from, or influenced by, the Holy Ghost), but also "the things of the Spirit of God." (3.) Whatever ethical sense is to be attributed to the word σάρξ, must include the whole man, body and soul, or body, soul, and spirit. This agrees with the scriptural delineations of human nature, the use of the word above referred to, and its usual antithesis, when the ethical meaning is intended, viz., the Spirit of God; never the human spirit irrespective of the influence of the Spirit of God. This antithesis is not always expressed, but it is invariably implied. (Comp. Rom. vii. 5; viii. 3, 4 ff.; Gal. iii. 3; v. 16, 17, 19, 24; vi. 8; Col. ii. 18, 23.) If it be claimed that, in Rom. vii. 18, 25, the expressed antithesis is, in the former case, the inward man (ver. 22), then we reply, that the real antithesis is stated in ver. 14: "spiritual," "carnal," and that, under the influence of this spiritual law, any antagonism to the word σάρξ has been awakened. Of course, if the reference to the regenerate be admitted, this objection disappears. So in ver. 25, although νοῦς is the expressed antithesis, it is the νοῦς under the influence either of the Holy Spirit, or the spiritual law. Σάρξ, in its ethical sense, therefore, means, not merely an earthly or fleshly tendency, or direction of life, but the whole human nature; not, as Olshausen thinks, so far as it is separated from God, but as it is separated from God, body, soul, and spirit, as sinful. Being in the flesh, is being in an ungodly state, a state of sin. (This view has obtained from the times of Augustine until now, among the mass of theologians.)

B. What, then, is the precise significance of this ethical sense of σάρξ?

1. Its usual antithesis indicates what the Scripture doctrine of sin so strongly asserts, that human nature, thus described, has become alienated from God. As love to God is the only true moral impulse, apostasy from God is sin, and the natural, carnal condition, is thus to be regarded. The Decalogue, Rom. i. 5, are sufficient to support this position. In the law, holy, just, and good, love to God is the chief requirement; in Rom. i. 21, wilful rejection of God is described as the seed of all the vices, subsequently catalogued, ending in the most fearful sensual excesses; in Rom. v. 12-21, sin is described as entering through one man, through his act of disobedience, and this is the immediate cause of the carnal condition of humanity. Yet this does not exhaust the meaning; it is rather its negative expression.

2. The positive principle of sin and the ruling principle of the flesh is undoubtedly selfishness, for, God being rejected, some personal object is required by the human personality. It is found in self; its interests become paramount. This is not, however, very prominent in the ethical term under consideration, but must be assumed in order to reach the further idea which it involves.

3. The human nature, thus alienated from God with selfishness as its ruling principle, must, however, seek gratification. There is but one resource, the creature. As σάρξ means man in his entire earthly relations, which are relations to the creature, its moral significance must include devotion to the creature, if the use of the term is to be fully justified. This, then, implies slavery to the creature in the search for self-gratification. Carnality, then, is as truly the moral state of one absorbed in intellectual and æsthetic pursuits, as of one sunk in sensuality. But as sensuous and sensual are cognate terms, so we find, not only in the teachings of the Scripture, but in the history of humanity, that the development of selfish devotion to the creature is in the direction of sensuality (fleshly sins, in a narrower sense). "Without God," has, as its positive expression, "in the world" (Eph. ii. 12). And the very want of satisfaction in worldly things leads to ever fiercer longing after the creature, to sin in its lowest forms. Sinking God in the material, or natural world, over which He rules, is, in effect, sinking man into the deepest slavery to the creature. To be "in the flesh," is therefore to be under "the law of sin and death." Sin is not, in its essence, devotion to the sensuous, nor is carnality essentially sensuality, but toward these as their manifestations they inevitably tend. We thus guard against both asceticism and materialism.

Flesh is, then, the whole nature of man, turned away from God, in the supreme interest of self, devoted to the creature. It is obvious that this is biblical, in linking together godliness and morality, ungodliness and sin, in implying both the inability of the law, and the necessity of the renewing influence of the Holy Spirit, in order to human holiness. Hence the propriety of the choice of this term to express man's sinful nature in this part of the Epistle, where sanctification and glorification are the themes.

Psychologie*, pp. 373 ff.; Tholuck, Römerbrief, pp. 288 ff.; Wieseler, Galaterbrief, pp. 443 ff. (a very clear discussion); Lange's commentary on Galatians, p. 142, Amer. ed. This list might be increased by referring to works on Doctrinal Theology and Ethics, but it is limited to discussions of an exegetical character.—R.]

THIRD PARAGRAPH, VERB. 14-23.

The Sinner in relation to the Law.

Ver. 14. FOR WE KNOW. Οἶδαμεν, not οἶδα μὲν (Jerome, &c.). [The former reading is almost universally adopted. Dr. Hodge, who inclined to the latter in earlier editions, now rejects it, on the ground that there is no δέ to correspond with μὲν. The singular would imply that the subject was aware of the spiritual nature of the law at the time of the conflict; hence it would favor the reference to the regenerate. The plural, οἶδαμεν, simply means that Christians recognize this.—R.]

That the law is spiritual [ὅτι ὁ νόμος πνευματικός ἐστιν]. It is the specific knowledge peculiar to Christians that religion is inwardness; that the law is incorrectly understood, when it is changed by the σάρξ of external feeling into a σάρξ of external precepts—a complication of finite objects, while its nature is of a spiritual character;

* [Comp. Delitzsch, Bibl. Psych., pp. 374 f., Eng. ed., pp. 440 ff., against the view of Günther, that there is a fleshly soul in distinction from the spiritual soul.—R.]

that is, revealing in every tittle the infinity of God's Spirit, and relating to the Spirit. The γὰρ declares the stiff-necked and malignant nature of sin. The law is γράμμα only in form; its nature is divine and spiritual (Meyer). Explanations:

1. Inspired by the Holy Spirit (Theodoret).
2. Requiring a heavenly and angelic righteousness (Calvin).

3. Relating to the higher spiritual nature of man in different applications, by Beza, Reiche, De Wette, and Rückert).

4. In suo genere præclarum et egregium (Koppe, and others).

5. The spiritual, and not the literal sense of the law, is meant (Origen).

6. Operating spiritually, διδάσκαλος ἀρετῆς, &c. (Chrysostom).

7. Presupposing the presence of the Spirit as the condition of its fulfilment (Tholuck).

8. Identical in its spirit with that of the Holy Spirit (Meyer). Πνευματικός describes its whole spirituality (James ii. 10), the absolute unity of its origin, its elements, and its purpose in the Divine Spirit (which reveals itself in the human spirit), in contrast with the presupposition of its finite force, its finite and sundered parts of membership, and its finite design. [The view of Meyer is the simplest and best: in its nature it is divine. (So Hodge.) This undoubtedly accords best with the antithesis, σὰρξινος, made of flesh.—R.]

But I am carnal [ἐγὼ δὲ σὰρξινος εἰμι. See Textual Note⁴, and below.] The ἐγὼ, in accordance with the ἰδιώτης mentioned above, is Paul himself, in the exhibition of his standpoint under the law, for the exhibition of the historical development of man standing under the law. Meyer: "The still undelivered ἐγὼ, which, in the great need that presses upon it in opposition to the law, groans for deliverance;" ver. 24. The same writer properly maintains, against Philippi, that the subject is identical through the entire section. On the other hand, Meyer incorrectly distinguishes the past tenses of vers. 7-13, and the present tenses of vers. 14 ff., by saying that, in the former case, Paul has described his psychological history before and under the law, and in the latter, that he portrays his nature standing in opposition to the spiritual character of the law. But down to ver. 13 he has rather portrayed the genesis of the really internal and legal standpoint. But after ver. 14, he describes the whole development of this standpoint; that is, the inward conflict of the sinner who has perceived the inward character of the law.

Carnal (fleschlich). Σὰρξινος, made of flesh, like flesh (2 Cor. iii. 3; 1 Cor. iii. 1). The word could also be translated fleshly, if this were not a conventional term for carnally minded, σαρξινός. Meyer thinks that σὰρξινος "gives a deeper shade" than σαρκικός, with reference to John iii. 6; but the case is about the reverse, since we must understand by σαρκικός, carnally minded, and by σὰρξινος, carnally formed, inclined, and disposed; a being whose natural spontaneity and view of things are external, according to the σὰρξ. (On the opposition of the readings, comp. Tholuck, p. 363.)*

* [The Greek adjectives ending in -ωσ (with the accent on the antepenult) describe the material out of which any thing is made (comp. the English -en, wooden, earthen). Σὰρξινος is therefore carneus, made of flesh; σαρκικός, carnalis, fleshly, of this character. Adopting the former reading, three modes of view present themselves: (1.)

The σὰρξινος is immediately afterwards explained as:

Sold under sin [παραμύνομος ἐπὶ τῇ ἀμαρτίαν]. On the one hand, this state of slavery declares the complete subjection of the sinner to sin; but, on the other, we must not overlook his unwillingness and opposition to his being sold. This will probably be the case, if, with Tholuck and Meyer, we regard the σὰρξινος merely as a higher degree of σαρκικός. Therefore Tholuck regards Bengel's expression as too refining: Servus venditus miserior est quam verna, et venditus dicitur homo, quia ab initio non fuerat servus. Meyer correctly observes, that this opinion is in conflict with Augustine's explanation of the passage, as referring to the regenerate. Similar passages, 2 Kings xvii. 17; 1 Mac. i. 15.

Revelation of the obscurity of perception (vers 15, 16).

Ver. 15. For that which I perform I know not [ὃ γὰρ κατεργάζομαι οὐ γινώσκω]. There is wanting in this condition the authority of the conscious spirit; but the consciousness of this want has made its appearance. Meyer calls up the analogy of the slave, who acts as the instrument of his master, without knowing the real nature and design of what he does. But this slave here is not altogether in such a condition, for he knows at least that he cannot effect (πράσσω) what he will, or would like, and that he rather does (ποιῶ) what he hates. Thus one thing dawns upon him—that he acts in gloomy self-distraction, and in contradiction of a better but helpless desire and repugnance. The sense of the passage is removed, if, with Augustine, Beza, Grotius, and others, we explain γινώσκω to be I approve of.* (Appeal to Matt. vii. 23; John x. 14; 2 Tim. ii. 19, and elsewhere.) Here, moreover, the emphasis does not yet rest on the θέλω (which Tholuck applies to a mere vellitas, and Meyer to a real and decided wish, but which, after all, remains only theory!) and μισῶ, but on the οὐ γινώσκω.

[For not what I wish, that I practise; but what I hate, that do I. Οὐ γὰρ ὃ θέλω, τοῦτο πράσσω, ἀλλ' ὃ μισῶ, τοῦτο ποιῶ. Although γὰρ is explanatory of the preceding clause, there seems to be an advance here, a step toward the light of self-knowledge.—The meaning of θέλω is open to discussion. It means, I will (within the sphere of spontaneity, Dr. Hitchcock claims). The two questions to be decided are:

That the Apostle has here purposely chosen the stronger word (so Meyer), and thus a reference to the regenerate, spiritual man is necessarily excluded. (2.) That here, σὰρξινος is = σαρκικός. (So Lange.) This is also adopted in the interest of the reference to the believer. (3.) Delitatosch even finds the former the weaker word: "σὰρξινος is one who has in himself the bodily nature and the sinful tendency inherited with it; but σαρκικός is one whose personal fundamental tendency is this sinful impulse of the flesh." I prefer (1.); but (3.) should be adopted by those who insist on the Augustinian view. Otherwise, the first time the present tense, upon which so much stress is laid as indicating a change in the state of the subject, occurs, the predicate must be tampered with, and made to mean, not simply, I am carnal, but, I was, I am so to a certain extent, I am still carnal, though not as formerly. Dr. Hodge deems the extreme (i. e., simple) sense of the words, "inconsistent with the context," but the immediate context has to be limited in the same way to make this applicable, especially exclusively applicable, to a regenerate person.—R.]

* [This interpretation is altogether untenable on philological grounds. Dr. Hodge justifies it, by saying: "With regard to moral objects, knowledge is not mere cognition. It is the apprehension of the moral quality, and involves, of necessity, approbation or disapprobation." But a correct inference is not always a correct interpretation.—R.]

(1.) Has it here a reference to the will in the strict sense (either = velleitas, Tholuck, and others, or = a full determination of the will, Philippi); or does it mean, I desire, wish? The former is, perhaps, favored by the psychological character of the whole passage; but the latter is preferable, since μῶ is so opposed, that both words must be referred to the same faculty; and it is easier to class θίλω within the region of the emotions, than to transfer μῶ to that of the will. (2.) How intense is its meaning? Here μῶ is undoubtedly in itself a stronger word. Perhaps the use of two different verbs (πράττω, νομῶ) in the main clauses would justify a difference of intensity in the antithetical verbs θίλω, μῶ (i. e., the desire for good is less strong than the hatred of evil); or μῶ may be taken as = οὐ θίλω (I do not wish). Ver. 16 strongly favors the latter. Either of these views is preferable to that which strengthens the antithesis into I love, I hate (Hodge). For this forces a meaning upon θίλω which the Apostle could have expressed far more plainly by another term.—R.]

The wish here is the better desire and effort of the man awakened to his inward state. First of all, the sinner becomes a gloomy enigma to himself in the contradictions of his doing and leaving undone. (See Meyer on the odd explanation of Reiche, that the sinful Jew does the wickedness which the sinless Jew does not approve of. Also on statements kindred to the foregoing, in Epictetus: ὁ μὲν θίλει (ἡ ἀμαρτάνει) οὐ νομῶ, καὶ ὁ μὴ θίλει, νομῶ; and in Ovid: Viduo meliora probaque, deteriora sequor. Still other examples in Tholuck, p. 366.) On Philippi's interpretation of this passage as applicable to the regenerate, see Tholuck, p. 355.* The choice of the expressions is very delicate; from the real θίλει in spirit he does not come to the consistent and vigorous πράττειν; but even the μῶ cannot prevent a weaker νομῶ of the rebellious one.

Ver. 16. But if what I wish not, that I do [εἰ δὲ ὁ οὐ θίλω, τοῦτο ποῶ. Δὲ is perhaps logical, and marks a step in self-discovery with respect to the law.—R.] The mental consent to the law now appears above the perceived dissension between willing and doing. As the sinner places himself, with his judgment, on the side of his awakened will, he places himself, with his judgment, on the side of the law.

[I agree with the law that it is good, σὺμψημὶ τῷ νόμῳ ὅτι καλός. The verb may not here imply more than an intellectual acquiescence in the high moral character of the law, yet that acquiescence extends as far as the θίλει. That this must be actual in the case of an awakened man, is evident. How, else, could the sense of sin arise?—R.] This is the first step on the way of self-knowledge: Acquiescence in the law in opposition to his own actions. But at the same time, the law is acknowledged to be good in an eminent sense, as noble, standing ideally above the life—καλός. Meyer: "The usual construction, I grant that the law is good, neglects the συμ." Against the reference of the τῷ νόμῳ to συμ, see Tholuck; see him also for quotations from Chrysostom and Hugo St. Victor on the innate nobility of the soul.

The illumination of the darkness of the will (vers. 17, 18).

Ver. 17. Now then it is no longer I that perform it [νυνὶ δὲ οὐκέτι ἐγὼ κατεργάζομαι αὐτό. Νυνὶ is logical, not temporal (so all modern commentators). If temporal, then it might mark the transition into a state of grace. The same is true of οὐκέτι. See Winer, p. 574. "Since I consent to the law, that it is good, it can no longer be affirmed that I," &c. (Meyer).—R. Tholuck: "Nun Aug. nunc in statu gratie—rather a designation of the inference." But it denotes not merely a continued movement in the treatment, but also in the subject discussed. The understanding has first entered upon the side of the law; now this is done also by the real will of the ego. The sinner distinguishes between his ego—which now emerges from the darkness of the personality—and the sin [the principle of sin personified] dwelling in him—now like a foreign and wicked co-habitant. He places himself, with his ego and his will, on the side of the law, and abjures the bad part of his condition. The ἐγὼ, as well as the κατεργάζομαι, must be emphasized. The αὐτό is that which he, according to ver. 16, now no more wills with his real will. [As yet, however, there is no indication that this state of things does or can lead to "what is good," save in powerless desire, even if, with Meyer, we take the ego here as = the moral self-consciousness. Ver. 18 acknowledges this.—R.]

But sin dwelling in me [ἀλλὰ ἡ οἰκοῦσα ἐν ἐμοὶ ἀμαρτία]. The Apostle distinguishes between the ἐγὼ and an individuality in a wider sense, described by in me, in which sin dwells. [Stuart takes in me as referring, not to the wider individuality, but to the carnal self, which here begins to appear over against the better self. It may be doubted whether there is such a better self as is referred to in the first clause of this verse, in the unregenerate man. But all men under the law feel such a discord as this.—As the attributing of the doing to indwelling sin by the Christian is not a denial of responsibility, so, in the case of one not yet a Christian, it is not the assumption of a power to do right. There is no sign of release as yet. Even if we limit in me to the narrower sense it has in ver. 18, the whole personality seems to be under the power of sin.—Wordsworth finds here, and in the succeeding verses, a vindication of God from the charge of being the author of sin!—R.]

Ver. 18. For I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, good doth not dwell [οἶδα γὰρ ὅτι οὐκ οἰκεῖ ἐν ἐμοί, τοῦ καλοῦ ἐν τῇ σαρκί μου, ἀγαθόν. For I know, is regarded by Philippi as an expression of Christian consciousness; yet some such consciousness is the very result which the law is designed to produce.—R.] More special definition of the dwelling of sin in him. This arises from the fact that good does not dwell in him—that is, in his flesh. The negative expression is noteworthy: If in a moral being no good dwells, the opposite (sin) does dwell in him. The σὰρξ is here established as the other side of the ego, which, with this, constitutes the whole man. But we cannot identify the σὰρξ, either with the body, or with the lusts of the body alone (the Greek fathers). Tholuck cites, in favor of this view, the different expressions, "in my members," "body of death," ver. 24. But these terms must not be understood materially. The σάρξ is the external, finite nature and mode of relation and view; it is the finite tendency in both its immaterial and sensuous character, which certainly has its substantial basis in the external σάρξ. Calvin interprets σάρξ here as human nature. It would be better to say: in my naturalness.

[See, on σάρξ, the Excursus above. The word may be here used in the physiological sense (Wieseler). But this seems strangely out of place. It is assumed to escape the difficulty that arises, if the reference to the unregenerate be held. In the case of a Christian, the limitation is made, because he has a spiritual nature, over against his carnal nature, in which good does dwell. But since σάρξ, in the ethical sense, includes the whole natural man, why should any limitation be made, if the reference be to the unregenerate? The grave objection must be admitted; but if the verse be referred to the regenerate man, why this studious avoidance of mentioning the πνεῦμα? and why such a powerlessness as is expressed in the next clause? The only satisfactory explanation is, that the distinction between unregenerate and regenerate is not in question, but the man of the law is here represented as conscious of being σάρκινος, made so more fully by the conflict which the law has awakened. The immediate antithesis (which is not strongly marked here) is simply the better desire, the ego longing to be better, powerless, however, in every case, until escaping from the law to Christ; yet this implies, as the real ethical antithesis, the spiritual law here acting on the man.—R.] The Apostle's declaration is far removed from the Flavian, Gnostic, and Manichean definitions. He could not have sought a real "moral willing and doing" (Meyer) as "good" in his "flesh," but only religious morality and excellence. But he does not even find this in it; and hence there arises the contrary propensity, a pseudo-plastic will of the flesh.

For to will is present with me [τὸ γὰρ θέλω παρόνταί μοι]. Not, "is present in me," as Meyer says, but who corrects himself when he also says: Paul represents the matter as if he were looking about after it in his personality—as if seeking himself in a spacious sphere. "The θέλω is present with him—before his gaze." To will is immediately before his eyes, but he can nowhere find the treasure of performing that which is good.

[To perform that which is good I find not, τὸ δὲ κατεργάσθαι τὸ καλὸν οὐκ εὐρίσκω. See Textual Note. If the briefer reading be accepted, παράνται must be supplied. The meaning is then obvious.—R.] Explanations: I do not gain it; I can not, &c. (Estius, Flatt, &c.). We must first emphasize the κατεργάσθαι, and secondly, the καλὸν. The question is not concerning the justitia civilis, but the carrying out of the ideal. The ἐγὼ is not yet the new man of the spirit (Philippi); it is the better self as an awakened moral will, from which the aim is removed and the way stopped up by the accustomed propensity of the flesh.

The revelation of the obscuration and dispersion in the unconscious ground of life—that is, in the life of feeling (vers. 19, 20). According to Tholuck and

Meyer, we have in these verses only proofs of the preceding. Meyer: Ver. 19 is a proof of ver. 18, and ver. 20 of ver. 17. [Stuart: "If what I have said in vers. 18 and 19 be true, then what I have affirmed in ver. 17 must be true."—R.]

Ver. 19. [For the good, &c. ἰ ἐγὼ is confirmatory. "I find not," is proved by acts which are not according to the better desire. Dr. Hodge presses the meaning of θέλω. That Paul, as a Christian, would mean more by these words than Seneca or Epictetus, is undoubtedly true; but whether he does mean more than is true in every case, to a certain extent, of a man awakened under the law, is very doubtful.—R.]—But the evil which I wish not, that I practise, δὲ οὐ θέλω κακόν, τοῦτο πράσσω. This strong expression is new. It points to a fountain of wicked action which proceeds immediately from the unconscious life in opposition. And this is the darkness of the sensuous [the carnal] life.

Ver. 20. [Now if I do that I would not, εἰ δὲ δὲ οὐ θέλω ἐγὼ, τοῦτο ποῶ. Εἰ δὲ = since, then, hypothetical only in form. On ἐγὼ, see Textual Note. There is undoubtedly a progress in thought. Alford thinks the ego is here perceived to be the better ego of the inward man; but this progress is perceptible in the case of the awakened, only, however, to produce the cry of ver. 24.—R.] This verse, then, specifies also the real author of these actions of the man against his will: it is sin dwelling in me [ἡ οἰκίσσα ἐν ἐμοὶ ἀμαρτία], the habitual life of sense [i. e., of the flesh]. This, in its obscurity, he now renounces in his consciousness; in his I. But now, to a certain degree or apparently, a foreign personality with a foreign law arises in him, against the awakening personality of his inner man. [The condition is not in itself, as yet, more hopeful. The progress is still toward wretchedness, despite or even because of the better desire.—R.]

Disclosure of the inward rent in man in general; the dissension between the true personality and the false personality with its false law (vers. 21, 22).

Ver. 21. I find then the law [εὐρίσκω ἄρα τὸν νόμον]. The difficulty of the passage has led Chrysostom to call it ἀσαφὲς ἐξηγητόν, and Rückert to give up its explanation.

Explanations: a. The Mosaic law is meant; ὅτι for because. "I find, then, the law for me, so far as I am willing to do good, because evil is present with me." That is, the law is designed for me, because I have the will to do good, but evil, &c. (Origen, Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopavestia, Theophylact, Bengel, &c.; Meyer,* and even Ufilas. See Tholuck's Note, p. 372: Invenio nunc legem, volenti mihi bonum facere, nam mihi adest malum). We may say, in favor of this, that it certainly describes also the origin of the law; that contradiction has made the law necessary.

Still, this exposition is thoroughly untenable.

1. Since the beginning—that is, from ver. 7—

* (Meyer (4th ed.) holds that the article requires us to understand the Mosaic law, but his view of the construction is as follows: the law is joined with the participle, the infinitive is the infinitive of design, and the last clause introduced by ὅτι is the object of I find: "I find, then, while my will is directed to the law in order to do good, that evil is present with me." As he well adds: "What deep misery!" But this seems forced, and is only an attempt to preserve consistently his dictum, that the law must mean the Mosaic law. See, however, his full grammatical justification.—R.]

the speaker has known that the law is appointed for him.

2. Here the question is no more concerning the law for the sinner, but the relation of the sinner to the law; the explanation is thus totally against the connection.

3. The explanation, now I have discovered the law to be a law for me, would be strange.

4. The law is previously for him also, whose willingness to do what is good has not yet developed, while the legal stage for the condition here described soon terminates. Hofmann's modification does not help the matter: That to do evil is ever present with me, shows me that the law is good to me, who am willing to do it. He has already said this more plainly in ver. 12. But, strictly, it is not yet decided here that the law is also good to him. Another view of the Mosaic law: I find, then, for me, who am willing to do the law, the good (namely, the law), tna: evil is present before me (Homberg, Knapp, Klee, Olshausen,* Fritzsche, &c.). Unimportant repetition of the foregoing. Likewise the ποσὶν τὸ καλὸν must not be separated.

b. "The law denotes here a general rule, a necessity." I find, then, for me, who am willing to do good—the law—that evil is present with me (Luther, Beza, Calvin, and many others; De Wette and Philippi [Stuart, Hodge]). Thus the sense would be the same as in the expression, ἕτερος νόμος ἐν τοῖς μέλεσι. Meyer remarks, on the other hand, that, according to the whole context, νόμος can be nothing else than the Mosaic law. Another law appears first in ver. 23. Also, the ὅτι ἐμοὶ τὸ κακὸν παράκειται could not be described as νόμος; it is something empirical—a phenomenon. But why, then, can the Apostle call even the motions in the members a law? Why can he call the old man, who is nevertheless not a man, a man?

Accepting this view in general, we may ask whether the sense is: I find in me, or, for me, willing to do good—the law, &c.—as formerly; or, I find the law, that, when I would do good, &c. (Grotius, Limborch, Winer).† This construction is decidedly preferable, because it suits the expression as well as the sense. For here the one law resolves itself even into a group of laws. The law of God now becomes to the Apostle the law of his mind; the foreign law in his members becomes in its effect the law of sin. But this antagonism of law to law is so fearfully strong, that it appears to the Apostle himself as in itself a law of moral contradiction; and this a terribly strong contradiction, for, just when he would do what is good, and high, and great (for example, protect the Old Testament theocracy), evil is present to him (persecution of the Christians). Therefore the one law is resolved into two.

[This view involves a slight trajectory of ὅτι, and then the dative is not governed by εὑρίσκω, but an anacoluthon is accepted, which causes the repetition of ἐμοὶ. Though, in general, the view is the same as that of Luther and Calvin, yet this law is thus distinguished as neither the law of the mind nor the law in the members, but the contradiction of the two. Vers. 22, 23, taking up, as they do, the two sides of this contrariety, favor our view also. It may be added: (1.) The presence of the article does not decide that the Mosaic law is meant; for the article occurs in ver. 23, where it is certainly not meant. (2.) The article has a sufficiently deictic force (this law) without τοῦτον being inserted. (3.) The phrase, law of God (ver. 22), seems, by its definiteness, to point to another sense here. Our English version, therefore, presents the best sense.—R.]

Ver. 22. For I delight in the law of God [συνήδομαι γὰρ τῷ νόμῳ τοῦ θεοῦ]. The γὰρ introduces the two verses as an antithetical explanation of ver. 20. The συν in συνήδομαι is as in σὺλλυπούμενος, Mark iii. 5, after the analogy of σύννοιά μοι = apud animum (Tholuck). No thought of delighting with, as Meyer holds. It is undoubtedly stronger than σήμεμι, ver. 16 (against Stuart). It belongs to the sphere of feeling. See further below.—R.] Tholuck: "The two contending forces in the one personality (ver. 17) are locally divided, one being in the inward man, the other in the outward members; the will is taken captive in the way from the inward to the outward man—that is, to the executing organs." But the powers named here assume a concrete form. The moral judgment, in vers. 15 and 16, the moral will, or the I, in vers. 17 and 18, and the moral inwardness, in vers. 19 and 20, have now become the inner man, who delights in the law of God. But just now sin in the members comes in, with the power of a strange law, so that a chasm pervades his whole being, in which even he, who at the beginning of the process was a slave, is now, in consequence of his helpless resistance, become a military captive of sin.

[After the inward man, κατὰ τὸν ἔσω ἄνθρωπον.] The ἔσω ἄνθρωπος is not so much the νοῦς or τὸ νοεῖον (Theod. and Gaunad.) itself, as the man choosing in the νοῦς his standpoint, his principle (which is not really gained until the conclusion of ver. 25). It is also so far the inner man as that he withdraws almost desperately from the outwork of his external life. Lyra explains similarly to the Greek writers: In homine duplex pars, ratio et sensualitas, quæ aliter nominantur caro et spiritus, homo interior et exterior. This reminds us of the Platonic use of language: In Plato and Plotinus we find the termini, ὁ ἔσω ἄνθρωπος, ὁ ἐν τῷ ἄ., ὁ ἀληθὺς ἄ. Tholuck, on the other hand, understands by the ὁ ἔσω ἄνθρ., after the analogy of ὁ καιρὸς ἄνθρ., ὁ κριτικὸς τῆς καρδ. ἄ. (1 Peter iii. 4), rather the inward I of the man than a single attribute—the inward man, who permits himself to be controlled by his conscience, the man of conscience. But this does not remove the difficulty. For the question is not, that the real and true man is created for God; for this holds good of flesh and blood, ontologically considered. But it may be asked, What actual standpoint does the Apostle here denote? According to his antithesis, it is this: he distinguishes his inward nature, as the true man, from the antagonism and conflict of the law in his members. It is in this self-comprehension that he now has his delight in the law, which is more than the σήμεμι of ver. 16. Meyer also sees in the συνήδομαι, the law designated as also rejoicing with him; on which, see Tholuck, p. 367. Luther, Calvin, and others, have thought the new-born man here described. The standpoint here denoted is true as a point of transition, yet the dualists have erro seemingly attempted to establish it as theory and fundamental law.

* (Olshausen (2d ed., p. 296) rejects this view as harsh; but what his precise opinion is, is not very obvious.—R.)

[The strong expression, συνήδομαι, seems to indicate that the inward man is the new man, under the influence of the Spirit (see Philippi, Hodge, Alford in loco), but this view is beset with difficulties also. Why is this influence purposely kept in the background? Alford answers: To set the conflict in the strongest light. But that is not like Paul, who can hardly refrain from his references to grace in Christ. As a matter of fact, the conflict under the law produces a divided state, where something in the man does not only consent to the law, but, in aroused feeling, delights in the law. Such a state may be the result of gratia praeveniens, or may always result in deliverance; but its present effect, as here described, is only "captivity," helplessness. An abnormal condition in the case of the Christian, though his delight, even in this introspective quasi-legal condition, is more pronounced. This inward man, independently of gracious influences, leads only to misery. Notice, too, that when, as here, an apparent reference to the Christian occurs, it is immediately followed by language that seems totally inapplicable to him. This confirms the view that this distinction is not prominent.—R.]

Ver. 23. But I see another law [βλέπω δὲ ἕτερον νόμον]. Paul here represents himself as a looker-on upon his own personality (Meyer). Ἄδ adversative or disjunctive.—R.] His seeing indicates his surprise. Gal. i. 6 and 7 serves to explain how the ἕτερον is here distinguished from the ἄλλον. As there the ἕτερον εὐαγ. is not a true gospel, so this ἕτερος νόμος is not a true νόμος. How could the one real law of God be in perpetual conflict with the other? [As indicated above (ver. 21), this is not the law there found, but that law is the rule of contradiction between the two here referred to.—R.]

In my members [ἐν τοῖς μέλεσι μου]. This is to be joined with νόμος, rather than with the participle ἀντιστρατεύομαι.—R.] Namely, operative in my members. Fritzsche construes thus: Which opposes in my members. Incorrectly: For the conflict is not decided in the members. The σάρξ, which, being spiritually disordered, has become the basis of the desires, has its essence in its dismemberment, in the division of its members; therefore the false law is operative in the members.*

[Warring against the law of my mind, ἀντιστρατευόμενον τῷ νόμῳ τοῦ νοός μου. The form νοός belongs to later Greek (Meyer). See Winer, p. 61.—R.] Earlier, this law was master, and the ἐγὼ servant; now, after the ἐγὼ has become distinct from the sinful σάρξ as the inner man of himself, sin carries on a formal war by the members, but with the force of a law which it describes as the law of nature, or one similar to it. Simultaneously with the fact that the combatant has recognized the Mosaic law again as the expression of his inward steadiness, and has made it the νόμος of his νοός, of his personal consciousness, sin has assumed the semblance of a law of nature dominant in the members.

[And bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. See Textual

Note*. The participle αἰχμαλωτίζοντα (later Greek: to take by the spear in war, to take prisoner) is very strong.—R.] Sin, in this semblance, opposes the inward man, and conquers him; the I finds itself the captive of another law, which now audaciously appears as the law of sin; that is, sin will now assert itself as an insurmountable fatality.—Meyer will not accept the genitive νόμος τοῦ νοός as subjective, but local. He would distinguish it further from the νόμος τοῦ θεοῦ (against Usteri, Köllner, &c.), without observing that "the law of God" has reproduced itself in "the law of the mind." [The difference is thus expressed by Bengel: dic-tamen mentis mea lege divina delectula. There seems to be two pairs of laws here, each pair closely related: The law of God, with its answering law in the mind (taken locally); the law in the members, subervient and causing subserviency to the law of sin. The parallelism is not strict, for the conflict is evoked by the law of God, and ends in the law of sin. It is unlikely that this is a peculiarly Christian state.—R.]

The νοός denotes the thinking and moral consciousness, which constitutes the essence of personality. [Meyer: "the reason in its practical activity." Olshausen, and others, find here the organ of the unfallen spirit; the Augustinian interpreters, the organ of the renewed man, the spiritual nature; all agree that it answers to the inward man (ver. 22). If that means renewed nature, we would expect here some expression of the Spirit's influence. The choice of another word, as well as of another phrase than "the law of God" here, where it would seem so appropriate were the reference to a Christian, confirms the view held throughout in our exegesis.—R.]

Meyer says further: The inward man is not brought into captivity, for he, considered in and of himself, always remains in the service of God's law (ver. 25); but the apparent man is. Then the warfare would be carried on by the apparent man! It is indeed correct, that in τῷ νόμῳ τῆς ἀμαρτίας the dative is not instrumental (according to Chrysostom, and others), but is dat. commodi.*

On the different distinctions between the law in the members and the law of sin, see Meyer, p. 288 (Köllner: Demands of the desires, and the desires themselves). We distinguish between the first appearance and the final manifestation: The law in the members passes itself off for, or appears to the sinner first as, the law of nature; therefore it brings him into captivity, and appears to him finally as the law of sin—the law of anomy, of unnaturalness. Pareus' understanding of the μέλη as the pars nondum regnata, coincides with the reference to the new-born man. When Calovius and Socinius held that the facultates interiores are included, they intimated that not the μέλη of itself, but only in connection with spiritual dispositions, could form the semblance of another and wicked law.

FOURTH PARAGRAPH (VERS. 24, 25).

The Transition from the Law to the Gospel.

It is a characteristic of the interpretation of this passage, that some have made vers. 24 and 25 paren-

* [Philippi holds that "members" here has a meaning between the physiological and ethical. Hodge makes it = in my flesh; but the phrase seems purposely chosen to indicate the locality where the opposing law is most evident, rather than its precise seat.—R.]

thetical down to ἡμῶν; Grotius and Flatt, ver. 25 to ἡμῶν. Tholuck: "As, in the case of the morally sickle, such an experience, daily renewed, calls forth the renunciatory exclamation to virtue, 'Thou art too hard for me; take away my crown, and let me sin,' so, from the morally earnest warrior, is there called forth the cry of distress for deliverance and the power of victory." He adds to this: "Knight Michaelis gives this cry of distress a very moderate sound: 'It is the lamentation of a distressed Jew which Paul answers thus: I thank God that I do not have to lament so.'—But the deeply moral warrior, who has once arrived at this degree, does not readily turn back. De Wette says, very pertinently: "From what has occurred, there now follows the need of deliverance, which has been satisfied by the grace of God."

Ver 24. O wretched man [Ταλαίπωρος ἐγὼ ἄνθρωπος]. Ταλαίπωρος, strictly, exhausted by hard labor (τῆμαι πῶρος, callum pati). Similar to the expressions in Matt. xi. 28. [The nominative is the nominative of exclamation (Philippi, Meyer). The word occurs only here and Rev. iii. 17 (of the Laodicean church); there joined with ἡμιός, to which it is almost equivalent in popular usage. The corresponding verb occurs in James iv. 9, and the noun, Rom. iii. 16; James v. 1. From these passages it would seem that here the prominent idea is of helplessness and misery; the cry for help from without follows. Bengel is certainly incorrect: "me miserum, qui homo sin!"—R.] It is the desperate cry for personal righteousness, and also of the completed repentance now about to be transformed into faith—but a faith which the law cannot give. Repentance asks, faith responds. (Reiche's explanation: The cry of Jewish humanity for help, to which a delivered one responds in chap. viii. 1. With this view, the passage from εὐχαριστῶ to ἡμῶν is said to be a gloss.)

Who shall deliver me [τίς με ῥύσεται]. Simple future. Not = would that I were delivered. Calvin thinks it expresses no doubt, but only the absence of the deliverance at the time. Yet Olshausen seems nearer right in making it imply: who can, with a reference to a personal deliverer.—R.] ῥίπται, Septuagint for ῥῆται, ῥῆται, &c. It refers both to the fundamental deliverance (as in the present passage), and to the continued and final deliverance; Matt. vi. 13. [Comp. Col. i. 13, where the reference is to a definite act of deliverance.—R.]

From this body of death? [Ἐκ τοῦ σώματος τοῦ θανάτου τούτου]. Explanations: Connection of the τούτου with σώματος.

1. The universitas vitiorum (Ambrose, Calvin); mors velut corpus quasi res per se subsistens (Piscator, Crell). As the Rabbinical חֲטָאֵי מוֹרְתִים pro ipsa morte (Socinius, Schöttgen). Wolf: mortifera peccata massa. Flatt: The system of sensuous affections, which is the cause of death. Tholuck observes, against these explanations: But the reader will suppose that σώμα is meant in no other sense than as σώμα ἁμαρτίας, τὸ θνητὸν σώμα; chap. vi. 12. We have already remarked, however, that these two ideas are radically different. The explanation before us needs, however, a more exact proof.

2. The same connection of the τούτου with σώματος. The sense: Mortal body. a. Longing for death (Chrysostom, Theodoret, Erasmus, Koppe, and others), according to Meyer. Tholuck, on the other hand, thus sets him right: They have not intended, on the negative side, the wish for deliverance from the body of death, but, on the positive side, the wish for the glorification and clothing-upon of the body. b. Olshausen: the spirit would like to make the mortal body living, &c.

3. Death as a monster personified with a body, which threatens to swallow up the ἑαυ (Reiche).

Connection of the τοῦτου with θανάτου.

From the body of this death. (Vulgate, Ulfilas, Luther, Fritzsche, De Wette, Tholuck, Meyer.) [So E. V., Hodge, Alford, Jowett.] a. θάνατος is the same as vitiositas (Calvin, and others), b. "He means here that death is the misery and labor endured in conflict with sin" (Luther); c. De Wette: Who will deliver me from the body of this death? that is, from the body which, in consequence of sin dwelling or reigning in it, is subject to death and misery. Reference to 2 Cor. v. Fritzsche similarly. d. Meyer gives as much as two explanations: Who will deliver me, so that then I shall be no more dependent upon the body, "which serves as the seat for so ignominious a death?" Or, in other words: "Who will deliver me from dependence upon the law of sin to moral freedom, so that then my body will no more serve as the seat of so ignominious a death?" If we understand the body to be a real body, with all these contortions, we do not find our way out of the external desire of death.

Of the expositors under 1, Krehl approaches nearest to our view. The "body" is the organism of sin. [The most natural construction is: the body of this death. The stress, then, lies on the word "death." The context forbids a reference to physical death and future glorification, which would be far-fetched. Death seems to mean: the whole condition of helplessness, guilt, and misery just described, which is, in effect, spiritual death. How, then, shall "body" be understood? Rejecting the allusion to the custom of chaining a living man to a corpse, but two views remain:

(a.) The literal sense, the body as the seat of this death; against this is the fact that this gives the word an ethical sense, which is unpauline. In its favor is the preceding phrase: "the law of sin in my members." If it be adopted, we must limit the meaning thus: "the body whose subjection to the law of sin brings about this state of misery" (Alford); but this is really a desire for death.

(b.) We prefer the figurative sense (with Calvin, Hodge, and others); "this death" has an organism, which is not only like a body in its organism, but in its close clinging to me; "from this death (thus represented) who shall deliver me?" The genitive is then possessive; the unity of the thought is preserved, and many difficulties avoided. This figurative sense of σώμα is certainly more Pauline than the ethical one (comp. Excursus above, and vi. 6; viii. 10).—R.]

We here group the single elements of the idea of a pseudo-plasmatic human image, which sin has set up as a power that has become inherent in human nature:

1. The old man, who is not a real man; chap. vi. 6, and elsewhere.

2. The νοῖς τῆς σαρκός, which is not a real νοῖς; Col. ii. 18.

3. The φρόνημα τῆς σαρκός, which is not a real φρόνημα; chap. viii. 6.

4. The σώμα τῆς ἁμαρτίας, which is not a real σώμα; chap. vi. 6.

5. The σῶμα τοῦ θανάτου, which is not a real σῶμα; the present passage.

6. The νόμος ἐν τοῖς μέλεσι, which is not a real νόμος; chap. vii. 23.

7. The μὴν, which are not real μὴν; Col. iii. 5.

8. The σάρξ, which is something else than the external σάρξ; Rom. viii. 8.

9. The θνήσκος, which is something else than physical death; Rom. viii. 6.*

Tholuck: On the exclamation of ver. 24: "The exclamation does not appear to us explicable merely from transition to earlier occurrences, but only because the continuously felt reaction of the old man has, so to speak, set off the preceding description." [Alford thinks, with De Wette, that the cry is uttered in full consciousness of the deliverance which Christ has effected, and as leading to the expression of thanks which follows.] A turning-point is reached, whatever be the reference, and no view is correct which does not admit that Paul here expresses what he feels, as well as what he has felt. —R.]

Ver. 25. Thanks to God [χαρις τῷ θεῷ, or, I thank God, εὐχαριστῶ τῷ θεῷ. See Textual Note 11]. This reading corresponds to the previous exclamation much better than εὐχαριστῶ does. Those who continue the reference to the unregenerate to the conclusion, get into difficulty with this second exclamation. Hence the adoption of a parenthesis (Rückert, Fritzsche), or of a conditional construction (Erasmus, Semler). If that had not taken place, I would have been snatched asunder, with the spirit to serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin. Meyer observes: "For what he thanks God, is not mentioned." But the for what is plainly enough indicated by the context, as Meyer himself subsequently brings out. It is also indicated by his thanking God through Jesus Christ.

So then I myself with the mind [ἄρα οὖν αὐτὸς ἐγὼ τῷ μὲν νοί]. In the consideration of this difficult passage there are two questions: 1. Is what is here said connected with the previous thanksgiving, or with ver. 24? 2. What, accordingly, is the meaning of αὐτὸς ἐγὼ?

1. Some think that the thanksgiving does not come at all into consideration; the words are connected with ver. 24 (Rückert, Fritzsche). This makes the passage only a final opinion on the miserable condition under the law, a declaration of the consummated dissension in which man is situated under the law. Others (De Wette, Meyer, and others), on the contrary, very properly take the thanksgiving also into consideration, although both De Wette and Meyer find in the passage only a recapitulation of what has been said from vers. 14-24, which, according to Meyer, should follow from the immediately preceding εὐχαριστῶ. But the Apostle's language does not declare the dissension previously described, but the alternative now finally established. By accepting the probable breviloquence, and supplying the words which are at hand, we are relieved even here of the apparent obscurity. We read ἐγὼ μὲν νοί (δουλεύων) δουλεύω; the Apostle has even omitted the δουλεύω from the ἐγὼ δὲ σαρκί—a proof that both can be mentally supplied. Thus: If I serve in the νόμος, then I serve in the law of God; but if I serve (or, I would serve) in the flesh, then I serve the law of sin. Either, or! This is favored, first of all, by the αὐτὸς ἐγὼ. A recapitulation of the foregoing cannot be united with this view. For in ver. 20 we read: νυνὶ δὲ οὐκέτι ἐγὼ, &c. (comp. ver. 20). The following is the inference from the previous verses: that now there is a definite distinction between standing in the νόμος (that is, in the principle of the νόμος) and standing in the flesh (that is, in the principle of the flesh); but that, through Christ, he has gained the power to stand in the principle of the νόμος. From this there arises the following thesis: I, the same man, can have a double standpoint. If I live with the νόμος, I serve the law of God in truth; but if I live in the flesh, even in the form of the service of the law, I serve the (false) law of sin. In other words, the life in the νόμος is the life in Christ, the life in the Spirit, and, like love, the fulfilment of the law (see chap. xiii. 8). It follows, therefore, on the one hand, that there is nothing condemnatory in the man of this standpoint. But there also follows the conclusion that they must live decidedly in harmony with their principle. But if they live purely in the νόμος, the body, as a principle, must be dead—that is, rendered merely indifferent as a principle, and have nothing to say, on account of the sinfulness inherent in it (see chap. viii. 10). But this applies only to the present body, which is burdened with the propensity to sin. It is not to be trusted; it is devoid of pure harmony with the law of the Spirit, and therefore the Christian must keep it, as a bond-servant, under discipline and oversight. But this order is also temporary, so far as mortal bodies shall again be made alive by the Spirit of the risen Christ. As now the resurrection itself belongs to the future and the one period, so also does the completion of the purity of the body, its removal to the glorious liberty of the children of God, belong to the same future. But as the germ of the resurrection-body has already been made alive and increased in the believer in this life, so it is also the case with religious and moral purity in his body. In every conflict of the body with the law of the Spirit this alone should be decided; yet not carnally, in legal mortifications, but spiritually, in a dynamical reckoning of ourselves to be dead (see chap. vi. 1 ff.). That is, in a powerful departure beyond the παράστασις of the body with the works of the Spirit (see chap. viii. 13).

2. Different explanations of the αὐτὸς ἐγὼ. (1.) I myself, Paul. The Apostle's description of himself as an example for others (Cassian, Pareus, Umbreit); (2.) Ego idem. The dissension in one and the same man made prominent (Erasmus, Calvin, and others); (3.) Ille ego. Reference to what he had earlier said of himself (Fritzsche, De Wette); (4.) I alone; that is, so far as I am without the mediation of Christ (Meyer, Baur, Hofmann); (5.) What he had heretofore described as the experience of mankind, he now describes as his own (Köllner).^{*} Olshausen's explanation is the nearest approach to correctness: "He thanks the Author of the work of redemption, God the Father, through Christ, whom he can now call his Lord from the heart. With this experience there now appears a totally changed condition in the inward life of the man, whose nature the Apostle describes in what follows, until its perfect completion, even the completion of the mortal body" (chap. viii. 11). He further holds, that the Divine law was reflected in the vois; and in the inward man there arose the wish, yea, even the joy, to be able to observe it; but the principal thing was wanting—the κατεργάσθαι. "But by experiencing the redeeming power of Christ, by which the vois is strengthened, man finds himself able, at least by the highest and noblest power of his nature, to serve the Divine law." Yet the σάρξ still remains subject to the law of sin. Therefore the conflict in the regenerate still continues, but yet it is generally victorious in the strength of Christ. Here Olshausen is led, to a certain extent, away from the Apostle's train of thought. As the Christian should die on the supposition of his being dead with Christ, so should he live on the supposition of his resurrection with Christ, and therefore he should fight on the supposition of victory (see 1 John v. 4). "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." If the watchword for the sanctification of the Christian gains its point, to fight for victory, it is nevertheless in conformity with the gospel standpoint that this takes place on the supposition of fighting from victory, or in conformity with the principle, ἐνταῦθα ἐν Χριστῷ. But Olshausen, not without reason, regards ver. 25 as the beginning of the section commencing with the first of chap. viii.; it constitutes, at least, the transition to it.

* [Many will feel that Dr. Lange here gives an explanation which is not a real explanation. Sin, and flesh, and the old man, are real enough; but if he means that over against them is something, which is the ideal man, to be made real through the grace of Christ, then his remarks are significant. That the true explanation of this passage is to be sought in a discovery of modern science, anticipated by Paul as improbable. Comp. Doctr. Note 13—R.]

* [The explanation of Jowett is altogether untenable: "I is my true self serve the law of God; the remainder of the sentence may be regarded as an afterthought." The presence of μὲν totally overthrows this. Jowett accepts it in his text, too, without even taking advantage of its omission in K. F., to give a seeming propriety to his interpretation I—K.]

Serve the law of God [δουλεῖν νόμῳ θεοῦ]. It is when man has become free from the law in its external form, that he truly serves the law of God in its real import (see chap. iii. 81; xiii. 8). (Reiche: the vois is the ideal Jew; the flesh, as it were, is the empirical Jew.) Yet we may remark, that the αὐτὸς ἐγώ expresses the fact, that the time for decision is now come. A vacillation between the better and the false ἐγώ could take place under the law; but, after acquaintance with Christ, the real and complete ἐγώ will live either in the vois, or in the flesh; will either serve God, or sin. But external legality, placed over against Christ, is now also a life in the flesh (see chap. vi. 14; Gal. v. 3 ff.; Col. ii. 18).

[Note on the final sentence of ver. 25. The interpretation is beset with difficulties.

1. Taking ἅπα οὖν as summing up the whole preceding section, and referring it to the regenerate, the service with the mind is of course the result of the new spiritual life, and, with the flesh, the result of indwelling sin. But why such a statement as this between the thanksgiving and the triumphant utterances of chap. viii.? It looks like taking this discord as the normal condition of the Christian life. If I myself be taken, with Meyer, and others, as opposed to "in Christ Jesus," then Forbes' explanation is satisfactory: "I in myself, notwithstanding whatever progress in righteousness the Spirit of Christ may have wrought in me, or will work in this life, am still most imperfect; with my mind indeed I serve the law of God, but with my flesh the law of sin; and, tried by the law, could not be justified, but would come under condemnation, if viewed in myself, and not in Christ Jesus." But this view of I myself is somewhat forced, as De

Wette, who formerly adopted it, confesses. On doctrinal grounds, this interpretation is open to the same objections as those which refer the section to the unregenerate.

2. We may, with Lange, accept a future reference, in consequence of the turning-point being reached in the thanksgiving. But this requires us to supply a great deal, and to force the alternative meaning on μέν, δέ. It also confuses; for vois and σάρξ, already used in contrast, on this view present a new distinction; and yet that new distinction is immediately afterwards repeatedly set forth by the terms, spirit, flesh. The only escape from this confusion is the assumption that, all along, the vois was really in the interest of spiritual life, and now, being delivered, it acts out its impulses. This, for obvious reasons, we reject.

3. We may take So then, as summing up the preceding (as is done by the Augustinian expositors), I myself as the same man—i. e., I, the man there described, under the law, with my mind, &c. It is not necessary to suppose a parenthesis; but, having depicted the experience up to, and inclusive of, the deliverance, he gathers up in meaning words the whole conflict, to contrast with it the normal state of the Christian; chap. viii. To this it will, of course, be objected, that "with my mind I serve the law of God" is too strong an expression to be referred to the man of the law; but it is precisely this service to the law that is the aim of the awakened conscience, the better desire, and it is precisely this he finds he cannot do, because the flesh is the ruling power by which he is brought into captivity, in every case where the mere service of law, even of the law of God, is all that is sought for. Should he seem to reach this aim, and be "touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless" (Phil. iii. 6), yet the service of the mind is not, by any means, the service of the Spirit. And, moreover, we must expect to find here, even after the thanksgiving, a quasi-confession of defeat as the point of connection with, "There is now, therefore, no condemnation," &c. Were the reference previously solely to the Christian, this would seem unnecessary. There are difficulties attending this view, it must be granted, but they are not so numerous as those I find in the others. The whole passage seems, by its alternations, its choice of words, as well as its position in the Epistle, to point to an experience which is produced by the holy, just, and good law of God, rather than the gospel of Jesus Christ; so that even the outburst of Christian gratitude is followed by a final recurrence to the conflict, which is, indeed, ever-recurring, so long as we seek holiness through the law rather than through Christ. See Doctr. Note 1.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. See the above Summary; also the Preliminary Remarks.

[Paul here enters into a very remarkable psychological analysis of the working of the law, in order to show that it, although holy and good in itself, cannot effect the sanctification of man, on account of the power of indwelling sin, which can be overcome only through redeeming grace. He gives a chapter out of his own experience, especially out of the transition period from the law to the gospel. In this experience, however, is reflected, to a certain extent, the history of the religious development of humanity as a whole. What is here so vividly individualised, repeats itself also in the experience of every earnest Christian. The law, instead of slaying sin, first brings it to a full manifestation (vers. 7-13); in the internal contest it is proven powerless; it but leads to the painful confession of helplessness (vers. 14-24); no other hope remains, save the grace of Jesus Christ (ver. 25).

Those expositors who follow the later Augustinian view, refer vers. 14-25 to the regenerate, because they are unwilling to ascribe to the natural man ever this powerless longing after higher and better things.* On the other hand, those who refer them to the unregenerate, urge this reason, that the regenerate man is not so powerless, so captive to sin, as the person here described, but has overcome the dominion of sin, as the Apostle clearly indicates both in chaps. vi. and vii. The correct interpretation lies between these two. Paul describes his state, not when sunk in sin, but when awakened to earnest struggles against sin under the scourge of the law, under preparation for a state of grace—i. e., in the period of transition from the law to the gospel, in the Judaico-legalistic state of awakening.

Thus much, however, must be conceded to the Augustinian view, that this contest is repeated in modified form in the regenerate. So long as they are in the flesh, the old life of Adam rules beside the new life in Christ. Temptations from the world, assaults of Satan, disturb; not unfrequently sin overcomes, and the believer, feeling deeply and painfully his own helplessness, turns in penitence to Christ's grace, to be the victor at last. It must be remembered, too, that there are many legal, despondent, melancholy Christians, who never pass out of the contest here described into the triumph of grace, the full freedom, the peace with God and assurance of salvation. The temperament and physical condition have a great influence in many such cases, but the main reason is, that such Christians depend too much upon themselves, and do not look sufficiently to the cross of Christ.—P. S.]

2. According to the above, the passage treats throughout neither of the unregenerate nor the regenerate state, nor partially of the former and of the latter; but it describes the process, the living transition, of a man from the unregenerate to the regenerate state, who inwardly, and therefore properly, understands the law, and regards the commandment, Thou shalt not covet, as the root of all commandments. The question is not concerning a permanent condition, but a movement and a crisis; therefore first in the preterite, then in the present tense. The coöperation of the promise as well as the hope in this process of death which leads to life, is indeed assumed, but not described with it, because, to the combatant of the law, every thing, even the promise, the gospel-element itself, is transformed first of all into law; while, reversely, the finally triumphant faith, and then even the law (according to Origen), are transformed into pure gospel.

3. We must not overlook the fact that the Apostle here describes a gradation, whose stages are brought out prominently in the explanations—a gradation which apparently leads backward to despair and the sense of death, but, at the same time, truly upward to the true life. It is the way of godly sorrow to salvation; according to Luther, the descent of self-knowledge into hell, which is the preliminary condition to ascension to heaven with Christ. "Alas, what am I, my Redeemer? I find my state of soul daily worse." The full appearance of the leprosy on the surface of the body is the symptom of its healing.

["Paul means to show how utterly unavailing are all efforts to get rid of sin by mere nature, how ever much intensified by views of law and the actings of conscience, until the power of sin is broken by faith in the Source of spiritual life. No convictions of the excellence of the law, no acknowledgment of its purity and rightful obligation, no assent or consent to it as good, no approbation of it in the real ego, no preference for it nor temporary delight in it as commending itself to the judgment, and no strivings after obedience to its precept nor fear of its penalty admitted to be just, will avail against the law of sin and death, till it is superseded by another law of spiritual life derived from Christ by faith."—R.]

4. The law effects not only the knowledge, but also the revelation of sin—its full development and manifestation, but not its genesis. It accelerates its process to judgment, in order to make the sinner susceptible of, and fully in need of, deliverance. Thus it corresponds with the trials and appointments of God's government, which also impel man more and more to the development of his inward standpoint. The only difference is, that the law, as a spiritual effect, impels to the ideal saving judgment ("for if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged"), while the guidance of man by trials and temptations results principally in real condemnatory judgments. But here, too, God's law and ordination agree. To the elect, the ray of the law becomes a flash of lightning which prostrates them before the throne of grace; to harder natures, the flash of lightning which destroys their earthly glory must first become, in many forms, an illuminating beam. It is a fundamental thought of the Apostle, that the ἀναγρία, which has unmasked itself in the nature of man, is compelled by the law to reveal itself in human life as παράφασιν—as deadly unnaturalness. Thus the law drives the serpent from its concealment.

5. On the different definitions of the idea of the unregenerate and the regenerate, see Tholuck, p. 344. From Rom. viii. it is plain that the νόσθια is the result of the original new birth, which is thus decided by justification. This new birth must be distinguished prospectively from the broader and final new birth in the resurrection (Matt. xix. 28), and retrospectively from the spiritual production of man by the word of God as the seed of the new birth, which begins with the strong and penetrating call of man by law and gospel (1 Peter i. 23). It must be distinguished laterally from its sacramental symbolization and sealing, which is, at the same time, its normal foundation, as the ideal and social new birth, as in the apostolical sphere it coincided identically with it, and it accords with it in normal ecclesiastical relations, but, amid ecclesiastical corruptions, can also go to ruin with it.

6. A description of three stages of the vita sanctorum, in Bucer, see Tholuck, p. 337. See also the views on the practical effects of the twofold exposition of this passage, as applying to the regenerate and the unregenerate, in the note, p. 338. Also, a further treatment of this question, Tholuck, p. 341 ff

* [Hence the Arminian controversy really began upon the exegesis of this passage. It cannot be doubted that this controversy has led to extreme views in both directions respecting the meaning of this chapter.—R.]

{Dr. Hodge rightly reprobates the saying of Dr. A. Clarke (quoted approvingly by Tholuck in the note referred to by Lange): "This opinion has most pitifully and shamefully not only lowered the standard of Christianity, but destroyed its influence and disgraced its character." The danger from an exclusive reference to the unregenerate, is discouragement to weak believers; but that from the other reference is not false security in sin, so much as a tendency to keep the Christian under the scourge of the law. It does encourage a morbid, unrelieved state of conscience, and legal efforts after sanctification. (Comp. the latter part of Doctr. Note 1.) To refer it to a movement possible both before and after conversion, a state with reference to the law, encourages unbelievers to go to Christ, and rouses believers to go to Him, since the existence of the conflict shows that the schoolmaster is nearer than the delivering Master. Here Delitzsch is excellent: "Every Christian is compelled to confirm what the Apostle here says, from his own personal experience. And well for him if he can also confirm the fact that God's law, and therefore God's will, is his delight—that he desires the good, and hates the evil; and, indeed, in such a way that the sin to which, against his will, he is hurried away, is foreign to his inmost nature. But woe to him, if, from his own personal experience, he could confirm only this, and not also the fact that the spirit of the new life, having its source in Christ Jesus, has freed him from the urgency of sin and the condition of death, which were not abrogated through the law, but only brought to light; so that his will, which, although powerless, was by the law inclined toward what is good, is now actually capable of good, and opposed to the death still working in him, as a predominating, overmastering power of life, to be finally triumphant in glory."—R.]

7. The prohibition, "Thou shalt not covet" (ver. 7), is known to be of very great weight in dividing the Ten Commandments. If it be divided into two commandments, the objects of the lust (coveting) are the principal thing. But the Apostle views it as a prohibition of wicked lust itself, and thereby it becomes a complete commandment, which extends, in sense, even through all the commandments. (Comp. Tholuck, p. 350.) On the shallow constructions of the doctrine of the sinfulness of wicked lust, by the Rabbins, see the same, p. 351. In a similar way, a regard for a life of feeling recedes to an ever-increasing distance in the dogmatics of the Middle Ages, in consequence of the stress laid on the merit of good works.

8. On ver. 8. Different variations of the niti-mur in vetitum among the classical writers (see Tholuck, p. 353, note; Prov. ix. 17). The law produces reflection on the forbidden object, curiosity, doubt, distrust of the lawgiver, imaginations, lusts, susceptibility of the seed of temptation, and of seduction, and, finally, the production of rebellion—the παράστασις. The history of childhood, of Israel, and the Antinomianism of the early Christian period (Nitzsch, Die Gesammelterechnung des Antinomismus); the history of Antinomianism in the time of the Reformation (the Münster Anabaptists, the Genevan Libertines, &c.); and the whole history of Divine and human legislation furnishes proof of the Apostle's proposition (Balaamites, Nicolaitans). Nevertheless, the law is holy, just, and good (see the Exeg. Notes); its design and operation are saving. Because Christ was the law of God personified, He has experienced in Himself the full Divine revelation of the opposition of sinful humanity to the law; He was proscribed as if He had been sin personified. But with this complete revelation of the power of sin, grace attained its still more powerful revelation.

9. On the reference of ver. 9 to the age of childhood, see Tholuck, p. 356, and the above Exeg. Notes.

10. On ver. 13. On the different meanings of the commandment, "This do, and thou shalt live," see the Exeg. Notes. This do, and thou shalt live, means: 1. Living in the outward blessing of eternal obedience; 2. Dying in order to live; 3. First really living after this death.

11. The law is holy in its principle (the will of God); just in its method (establishing and administering justice); good in its design (promoting life itself by the ideal death in self-knowledge). The sinner had to be delivered from death by death—objectively by the death of Christ, subjectively by the reception of the death of Christ in his own life—by his spiritual dying. Calovius: Sancta dicitur lex ratione causae efficientis et materialis: quia a deo sanctissimo est et circa objecta sancta occupatur; justa est formaliter: quia iustitia divina aeternae nostrae regula est; bona est ratione finis, quia bona temporalia et aeterna promittit. The last definition is the weakest. Of justa, Tholuck uses these words: "more correctly, since it produces 'righteousness.'"

12. On the manner in which sin misconstrues the law, in order to make it minister to its own ends, and also on the gradual development of self-knowledge, see the Exeg. Notes.

13. Unless we have a definite idea of the false forms in organic life, we cannot gain the Apostle's complete view, which we have sketched in the Exeg. Notes. Either the individual figures in question are volatilized into hyperbolic metaphors, or people have fallen into dualistic and Manichean notions, which have been made to underlie the Apostle's thoughts, now in order to appeal to him, now to govern him. See "Sydenham," by Jahn, Eisenach, 1840, p. 56: As diseases in the vegetable world are known to show themselves in inferior and parasitical organisms (fungi, mosses, mistletoes, &c.), so does disease in man show a lower, half-independent vital process and inferior organism, secreted like a germ and parasite in the original life. Similar expressions by Paracelsus, on the inferior organisms undermining the healthy life.—Comp. Schuh's Pathologie und Therapie der Pseudoplasmien, Vienna, 1854.—False organic forms pervert the functions and material substance of natural life into noxious shapes and poisons. The false spiritual form—sin—perverts the true life of man into a luxuriant growth of false spiritual images of this life.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Acquaintance with sin is effected by the law, so far, 1. as the law, as a prohibition, provokes sin; 2. but also that the consciousness of sin be complete (vers. 7-12).—What does sin take from and give to man? 1. It takes life from him; 2. It gives him death (vers. 7-12).—The abuse of what is holy, 1. is indeed horrible, but yet, 2. what is holy is not itself destructive (vers. 7-12).—The destruction of the state of innocence: 1. Apparently produced by the Divine prohibition; 2. Actually produced by human sin (vera. 7-12).—How the best teacher can become a tempter against his will, when he, 1. exempts from a well-meant prohibition; 2. but when this very prohibition awakens the desire for transgression (vera. 7-12).—We should not prohibit children from too much.—The best thing we have is corrupted by sin (ver. 10).—The fearful deception of sin (ver. 11).—The holiness of the Divine law. It is shown to us when we, 1. look at the lawgiver; 2. carefully prove the principal statements of the commandments; 3. have in mind the design for which it was given (ver. 12).—Whence does it come that what is good is made death unto me? 1. The fault does not lie in the law, which is spiritual; but, 2. in me, who am carnal (properly, "flesh-like"), sold under sin (vera. 13, 14).—Proof of how sin, aiming at the ruin of man, prepares its own overthrow (ver. 13).—What is, "to be sold under sin?" 1. Not to know what we do—blindness of self-knowledge; 2. Not to do what we will, but to do what we hate—perversion of our own spontaneity (vera. 14, 15).—Even in his sin, man must testify to the goodness of the law (ver. 16).—In the flesh there dwelleth no good thing (ver. 16).—To will and to perform! 1. How near the willing of what is good is to us; 2. But how far from us is the performance of it (vera. 18, 19)!—The deep sorrow expressed in the confession, "for to will is present with me, but how to perform," &c.; because we then say as much as: 1. I wish the good very much; but, 2. I am just as much devoid of the power to do it (ver. 18).—The surprising discovery of man on the way to his conversion (ver. 21).—The double law in man: 1. The true law in the mind; 2. The false law in the members (vera. 22-25).—The divided state of the human heart: 1. Caused by sin (vera. 18-20); 2. Manifesting itself in the conflict of the two laws (vera. 22, 23, 25); 3. Calling forth the longing for deliverance (ver. 24).—The thanksgiving of the Apostle for the peace of deliverance (ver. 25; comp. chap. i. 25).

LUTHER: To do does not mean here to perform the work, but to feel the excitement of the lusts. But to perform, is to live without lust, totally pure; this does not take place in this life (vera. 18, 19).—He here calls death the misery and pains endured in the conflict with sin (as Exod. x. 17). Pharaoh says: "That he may take away from me this death only" (this was the locusts).

STARKE: The natural man is like the earth since the curse has been pronounced upon it. The earth has the seeds of all kinds of weeds in it; and although they seem, in Winter, to lie perfectly dead in the earth, yet, by the warm rain in the Spring, they will again germinate and grow (ver. 8).—Sin is a real highway robber; it associates in a friendly way with us, and strives to lead us off from the right road, but afterwards kills us (ver. 11).—When sin has become suddenly powerful, do not despond; God does not wish the death of the sinner. Flee in penitence to Christ, and you shall be holy (ver. 13).—Believers do many good works, but not all that they should; and what they do, is far from being as perfect as it should be (ver. 18).—Believing Christians lament more over the weaknesses still cleaving to them, than over temporal torments, chains, and bonds (ver. 20).

OSIANDER: The law is a beautiful mirror, which shows us our sins, in order that, when we perceive such great evil, we may get counsel and help from Christ (ver. 7).—If believers sin, and it occurs against their will, they do not lose the favor of God (ver. 17).—CRAMER: Innate wicked lust a fountain of all sins, and it is also against God's law; we should not allow ourselves to lust at all (ver. 7).—There are two characteristics of true Christians, so long as they are in the world: they give themselves trouble about their wretchedness, but they rejoice and take comfort because of the deliverance (redemption) that has taken place through Jesus Christ (ver. 25).—Nova Bibl. Tüb.: There is nothing so good that it cannot become evil by abuse. In this way the blessed gospel becomes to many a savor of death unto death (ver. 10).—SPENER: Our nature is so sinful that we do not take as much pleasure in any thing as in what is forbidden (ver. 8).—It is a most eminent attainment, and one necessary for a right understanding of the law and sin, that we properly understand the spiritual character of the law (ver. 14).—Those can profit by this Pauline example (ver. 25) who strive with all earnestness to do what is good; but those who do not strive with all earnestness to do what is good, but still sin frequently with the will, cannot employ the language of Paul, for they are not in harmony with his example.—In short, if one will have a pattern, let him take this: No one must lay claim to any comfort in this chapter whose counterpart is found in chap. vi. or viii.; but these three chapters must harmonize.

BENGEL: We have here a figure from military life: The soul is the king, the members are the subjects, and sin is the enemy whom the king has admitted. The king is now punished by the insurrection of his subjects, who rise in rebellion with the enemy.—GERLACH: The law is spiritual, means: it is an emanation from God, who is a Spirit (John iv. 24); that is, omnipotent, personal, and holy love. It is, further, spiritual in its import—that is, divine and holy. It pertains to the inmost being of man, which it would fully conform to God.—There stands in opposition to it the carnal sense of man; that is, his desire, which is directed, by virtue of sin, to the world, finiteness, and sensuousness, and makes him who is sundered from his Creator a servant of the creature (ver. 14).—An Apostle glowing with love, like Paul, humbles himself, and trembles and groans under the law of sin; and shall we, who are like ice in comparison with him, foolishly expose ourselves, and boast of whatever can awaken lust in us? (ver. 14).—The incapacity of man to do good, is an incapacity of the will; this, and not an incapacity of spiritual disposition, has necessitated it; it is therefore a weakness, which is continually attended by the sense of guilt (ver. 18).—The exclamation of the Apostle is the cry for help of all humanity, which, in despair of all help through and of itself, looks for aid from without. The law leads to this desire, but it cannot deliver from the wretchedness (ver. 24).—He who sighs most deeply over the bondage in the body of this death, stands nearest to deliverance (ver. 24).

LUSCO: What Paul here makes clear in itself, is a truth of universal human experience—namely, that there are two successive states (the third is described in chap. viii.): one (ver. 9), where sin slumbers in us, because we are not fully conscious of the moral law; the other (vera. 14-24), where, having a clear knowledge of the law, but yet without the grace of redemption, we become acquainted with the profound corruption of our heart, which is opposed to the law of God, and feel wretched in this condition —The conflict described in vers. 14–25 occurs, before the new birth, in the heart of a man awakened by the law; yet, in the life of the regenerate person, similar conflicts and phenomena arise, in which, however, he is ever triumphant.—The Apostle was far from holding the erroneous view, that sin dwells only in man's body, and not also in his soul (ver. 24).—I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord! Through Him, He has delivered me in and from all this wretchedness (ver. 25).—HEUBNER: The best thing can be made an injury to the wicked will (ver. 12).—Every thing becomes impure in the impure heart. Corruptio optimi est generatio pessimi (ver. 13).—Description of the evil propensity (vers. 14–25).—It is the best people who confess, that strong sensuous impulses in them are sinful (ver. 14).—The inward contradiction of man with himself. The conflict between knowing, willing, and doing (ver. 15).—Even the immoral man feels that it would have been better if he had kept the law (ver. 16).

BESSER: The twofold way in which sin becomes exceeding sinful by the commandment: 1. Its wicked, ungodly nature, plays a prominent part in the transgression of the plain commandment; 2. The sentence of death which transgression effects, drives sin into the conscience of man, so that he feels and perceives it to be a horror and abomination before God (ver. 13).—The conflict between spirit and flesh in believers (vers. 14–25).—"Believers know and feel," says Luther (Works, viii., 2747), "that no good thing dwells in their flesh, so that they may become more humble, and let their peacock-tail fall; that is, do not depend on their own righteousness and good works," &c. (ver. 18).

LANGE: The way of the law from sin to grace: 1. Apparently, ever darker and deeper toward death; 2. Really, always nearer to light and life.—The sad revelation of sin a preliminary condition of the joy—bringing revelation of salvation.—The development of self-knowledge under the law: 1. Clear view which reason has of the authority of the law; 2. Earnest wrestling of the will; 3. Outburst of deeply-affected feeling (oh, wretched man that I am).—How the proverb, "Man's extremity is God's opportunity," is most gloriously verified in the conversion of man.—The struggle between sin and the law: 1. The deception which sin practises with the law; 2. The unmasking effected by the law through the apparent charm of sin.—How the law becomes always more inward to the candid person, until he has perceived it as his spiritual I, his consciousness, his reason.—The fearful, false power of evil: 1. It assumes all the features of personal life; 2. In order to exhaust and destroy personal life in all its features.—The cry for deliverance occurs in close proximity with thanksgiving and praise to God.—On ver. 25: Either, or!

19): The evil natures, principles, and manners of the world are the causes of our imperfect willings and weaker actings in the things of God. Let no man please himself with perpetual pious conversation or ineffective desires of serving God; he that does not practise, as well as talk, and do what he desires and ought to do, confesses himself to sin greatly against his conscience; and it is a prodigious folly to think that he is a good man, because, though he does sin, it was yet against his mind to do so. Every good man can watch always; running from temptation is a part of our watchfulness; every good employment is a second and great part of it, and laying in provisions of reason and religion beforehand is a third part of it; and the conversation of Christians is a fourth part of it.—MATT. HENRY, on vers. 24, 25: When, under the sense of the remaining power of sin and corruption, we shall see reason to bless God through Christ and for Christ. Through Christ's death, an end will be put to all our complaints, and we shall be wafted to an eternity without sin or sigh.—It is a special remedy against fears and sorrows, to be much in praise.—SCOTT: A proper knowledge of the holy law of God is the two-edged sword which gives the death-wound to self-righteousness and to Antinomianism; for it is perfectly fit to be the rule of our duty, written in our hearts, and obeyed in our lives.—CLARKE: We never find that true repentance takes place where the moral law is not preached and enforced. The law is the grand instrument, in the hands of a faithful minister, to alarm and awaken sinners; and he may safely show that every sinner is under the law, and consequently under the curse, who has not fled for refuge to the hope held out by the gospel.—HODGE: It is an evidence of an unrenewed heart to express or feel opposition to the law of God, as though it were too strict; or to be disposed to throw the blame of our want of conformity to the Divine will from ourselves upon the law, as unreasonable.—The Christian's victory over sin cannot be achieved by the strength of his resolutions, nor by the plainness and force of moral motives, nor by any resources within himself. He looks to Jesus Christ, and conquers in His strength. The victory is not obtained by nature, but by grace.—BARNES: We have here: 1. A view of the sad and painful conflict between sin and God. They are opposed in all things; 2. We see the raging, withering effect of sin on the soul. In all circumstances it tends to death and wo; 3. We see the feebleness of the law and of conscience to overcome this. The tendency of both is to produce conflict and wo; 4. We see that the gospel only can overcome sin. To us it should be a subject of ever-increasing thankfulness, that what could not be accomplished by the law, can be thus effected by the gospel; and that God has devised a plan that thus effects complete deliverance, and gives to the captive in sin an ever lasting triumph.—J. F. H.]

NEXT SECTION.—Christian life, or life in the Spirit of Christ as the new life according to the law of the Spirit, is a blessed life in the adoption of God; is free from condemnation and death; and leads to perfect blessedness in the glory of God. The principle of the new life as the principle of the freedom and glorification of the Christian, of believing humanity, and even of the creature; chap. viii.

Divisions: I. Life in the Spirit a life of opposition to the flesh; and the Spirit as witness of adoption; vers. 1-17. II. The removal of the body by the life in the Spirit, and the Spirit as the security for glorification; vers. 18-29.

I. Life in the Spirit in opposition to the flesh, and the Spirit as the witness of adoption.

CHAPTER VIII. 1-17.

- 1 There is therefore now no condemnation to them which [those who] are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit [omit all after Christ]
 2 Jesus].¹ For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free
 3 [freed me]² from the law of sin and death. For what the law could not do, in that [because] it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh [literally, the flesh of sin], and for [or, on account of] sin,
 4 condemned sin in the flesh: That the righteousness [or, requirement]³ of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after [according to]⁴ the flesh, but after [according to] the Spirit.
 5 For they that [those who] are after [according to] the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that [those who] are after [according to] the Spirit,
 6 the things of the Spirit. For to be carnally minded [the mind of the flesh]⁵ is death; but to be spiritually minded [the mind of the Spirit] is life and peace.
 7 Because the carnal mind [the mind of the flesh] is enmity against God: for it is not subject [doth not submit itself]⁶ to the law of God, neither indeed can
 8 be [it]. So then [And]⁷ they that [those who] are in the flesh cannot please God.
 9 But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have [hath]⁸ not the Spirit of Christ, he is 10 none of his. And [But] if Christ be [is] in you, the body is dead because of 11 sin; but the Spirit [spirit] is life because of righteousness. But [And] if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus⁹ from the dead dwell [dwelleth] in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall [will]¹⁰ also quicken [quicken even] your mortal bodies by [on account of]¹¹ his Spirit that dwelleth in you.
 12 Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh.
 13 For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through [by]¹² the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body,¹³ ye shall live. For as many as are led by 14 the Spirit of God, they are the [omit the]¹⁴ sons of God. For ye have not received [did not receive]¹⁵ the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have [omit have] received the Spirit of adoption, whereby [ἐν ᾧ, wherein] we cry, 16 Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with [or, to]¹⁶ our spirit, that 17 we are the [omit the] children of God: And if children, then [also] heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together [glorified with him].¹⁷

TEXTUAL.

¹ Ver. 1.—[The clause, added in Rec.: μη κατὰ σάρκα περιπαροῦσιν, ἀλλὰ κατὰ πνεῦμα, is now rejected by the best critics as a gloss from ver. 4. It is not found in κ., B., C., D., F., most older versions and Sathera. The first half only is added in A., D., some versions. *κ.*² adds the whole. The MS. authority is sufficiently against it to warrant a decided rejection. Forbes: "The results of Parallelism coincide with the decisions of criticism, and with the authority of the best MSs., in rejecting the words."

1. Οὐδὲν ἄρα νῦν κατέκριμα τοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ.
2. Ὁ γὰρ νόμος τοῦ πνεύματος τῆς ζωῆς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ ἠλευθέρωσέν με ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου τῆς ἁμαρτίας καὶ τοῦ θανάτου.
3. Τὸ γὰρ ἰδόναι τοῦ νόμου. ἐν ᾧ ᾤσθηναι διὰ τῆς σαρκός, ὁ Θεὸς τὸν αὐτοῦ νῦν πέμψας ἐν ἀπολύματι σαρκὸς ἁμαρτίας καὶ περὶ ἁμαρτίας καταδικάσας τὴν ἁμαρτίαν ἐν τῇ σαρτί.

The first and tenth lines correspond; the parallelisms of second and fourth, third and fifth, sixth and eighth, seventh and ninth, are obvious, and the gain in interpretation is considerable. Fritzsche avails himself of it also.

² Ver. 2.—[The weighty MSS., K. B. F. G., and some fathers, read εἰ; but this might readily be repeated from the preceding syllable, -εἰ. A. C. D. K. L., most versions, give καὶ, now generally adopted. There is slight authority for καὶ. Free me, is literal, and to be preferred to hath made me free, set me free. It refers to a definite past act (aorist).

⁶ Ver. 6.—[Is not subject (E. V.), is correct, but the above emendation brings out the middle force of ἡ ἑξουσία.

⁹ Ver. 11.—[The better supported reading is ἵνα; the article is inserted in some MSS., as also before Χριστόν. There is also the usual number of variations, so common when these words occur in the text.

¹¹ Ver. 11.—[Here two readings present themselves, supported by authorities of equal weight. The genitive: ἐκ τοῦ ἰσχυροῦς αὐτοῦ πνεύματος is found in Rec., K. A. C., many versions and fathers, as is adopted by Lachmann, De Wette, Krehl. The accusative: ἐκ τοῦ ἰσχυροῦ αὐτοῦ πνεύματος, is supported by B. D. E. F. K. L., many cursives and fathers, by Griesbach, Scholz, Fritzsche, Mill, Bengel, Tischendorf (in later editions), Meyer (who cites Lachmann also in its favor), Tholuck, Rückert, Alford, Wordsworth, Tregelles, Lange. It will be seen that a majority of critical editors adopt the latter reading. The reason which have determined this decision seem to be, that two such readings could not have existed without one being a premeditated corruption. The question then arises, Which reading would best serve a polemic purpose, and hence be most likely to have been the corrupted one? That question is answered by the controversy between the Macedonians and Orthodox (latter part of the fourth century) respecting the Divinity of the Holy Spirit. The Macedonians charged the Orthodox with an alteration of the text into the genitive. The genitive can only mean, by means of His Spirit, &c.; while the accusative may include that idea of agency in connection with the thought, on account of His Spirit, &c. It is plain that the Macedonians had less motive to alter the text than the Orthodox. Alford thinks the variation dates back of this controversy, and is not due to either of the then disputant parties; but the same reason would hold good at a previous point of theological discussion. Lange well remarks, that, in any case, "the raising act of God is distinguished in this verse from the working of the Spirit." Hodge sums up the internal evidence in favor of the common reading; but all his remarks only prove that the other is a more unusual reading, and hence likely to have been altered. It is better to follow the current of criticism, and adopt the accusative.

¹² Ver. 13.—[The simple dative πνεύματι is best rendered, by the Spirit. Through should be reserved as a translation of ἐκ.

¹⁴ Ver. 14.—[Rec., K. L., have εἰς τὸν θεόν; K. A. O. D., τὸν θεόν εἰς; B. F. G., τὸν θεόν εἰς τὸν θεόν. The last reading is supported by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Wordsworth, Tregelles. It is supported by the majority of the fathers, and the variations are more readily accounted for on the supposition that it is the original reading; εἰς, if once passed over, would be inserted at the beginning or end (Meyer).

¹⁵ Ver. 15.—[The aorist ἵνα δοξάσῃ refers to a definite past time; hence, did not receive, received.

¹⁶ Ver. 16.—[See Exeg. Notes.

¹⁷ Ver. 17.—[With him, is as proper here as in the preceding clause. See Exeg. Notes.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

FIRST SECTION.—The life in the Spirit as the new life, in opposition to the life in the flesh* (vers. 1-17).

Summary.—a. The vital principle of Christians, or the law of the Spirit as freedom from the antagonistic law of sin (vers. 1-4). b. The principle of carnal life in contradiction to the Spirit and to God (vers. 5-8). c. Application of what has been said to the fundamental standpoint of believers (vers. 9-11). Their life in the Spirit excludes life in the carnal principle. Their Christianity amounts to nothing, if the Spirit is wanting. If Christ is in the spirit, the body is nothing. But the body shall be renewed at the resurrection by the Spirit. d. Transition from the ideal and fundamental standpoint to the practical application. The conflict resulting from the victory, and the maxims of this conflict (vers. 12-16). No obligation to the flesh.—Spiritual life the means of destroying the surprises of involuntary carnal motions.—Following the guidance of the Spirit.—No fear of the power of the flesh. Childlike recourse to the Father.—The sense of adoption strengthened by the Spirit of God. Ver. 17: transition to the following section.*

Meyer: chap. viii. Happy condition of man in Christ.—De Wette: Blessed results of newly-animated morality. Tholuck: For thus the Christian, who has become freed from the law, has also become free from condemnation, and is subject to the guidance of the Spirit of adoption, by virtue of which he will become a joint-heir with Christ (vers. 1-17). The same: "We are here at the climax of the Epistle, 'at the heart and kernel of the whole Epistle;' as Spener says: Si scripturam sacram annulo comparemus, epistolam Pauli ad Romanos gemmam credo, cujus summum fastigium in capite octavo exurgit (Spener, Consilia Theol. Lat., iii. 596)." [Bengel: Nunc venit ad liberationem et libertatem.—R.]

Ver. 1. There is therefore now no [ὁ νόμος]

* [It seems doubtful whether Dr. Lange means the Holy Spirit here; but as he certainly insists that the Holy Spirit is the agent producing this life, it is better to indicate it by printing this word with a capital letter.—R.]

* [Alford thus heads the section: "Although the flesh is still subject to the law of sin, the Christian, serving not the flesh, but walking according to the Spirit, shall not come into condemnation, but to glory with Christ." Hodge, making the theme of the Apostle "the security of believers," gives the first verse a wide reference, both present and future, and considers the whole chapter a series of proofs of this proposition.—R.]

ἄρα οὐκ. The force of οὐκ must not be overlooked—an absolute negation, with an undoubted reference to the completeness of the freedom from condemnation (Forbes).—R.] The ἄρα is quite plain, if we have perceived the alternative in the preceding verse: If I am in the οὐκ, I serve God. If we ignore this alternative, the meaning of the present passage must be doubtful. Tholuck: The older expositors do not generally furnish any proof of the connection of this ἄρα with the preceding chapter. Yet the following connection of it with chap. vii. 25, by Augustine, is, in the main, correct: "To him, now, who, as a Christian, non amplius consentit pravis desideriis, and is planted in Christ by baptism, the prava desideria can no more be condemnation." The Catholic expositors follow him. Bucer, Beza [Alford], and others, connect ver. 25 with the thanksgiving; but this assumes that the second half of ver. 25 is an interruption. Calixtus, Bengel [Stuart], and others, go back even to chap. vii. 6; others [Hodge, Haldane], to the whole argument for justification by faith. Meyer: If I am left to myself to serve the law of God with my reason, but the law of sin with my flesh, then it follows that, since Christ has interposed, there is no condemnation, &c.—[The question of connection is mainly decided by the view of the preceding section. Those who refer it to the regenerate, connect this either with the whole preceding argument, or, with Philippi, with the preceding verse, in the sense: Although I am thus divided in service, still, being in Christ Jesus, there is now, therefore, &c.; or with the thanksgiving. If Lange's view of the alternative be admitted, we must also accept his view of the connection. It seems to be an unwarranted breaking up of the current of thought, to go back as far as chap. vii. 6; and to refer to the whole train of argument, seems out of keeping with the continuous experimental character of the whole passage. It is best to connect, therefore, with the thanksgiving.—R.]—Νῦν, the intervening state of faith, expressed last in ver. 25. [Νῦν is temporal, in distinction from οὐκ (ver. 25), which is inferential. Hence the continuance of this state is implied.—R.]

No condemnation [κατάκριμα, Verdammungsurtheil, sentence of condemnation (Lange). See p. 184 (v. 16), where it is used in antithesis to δικαίωμα. It may be limited to the justifying act of God at the beginning of the Christian life, but, joined with οὐκ, seems to have a wider reference here.—R.] Origen, Erasmus, Luther, and others, explain: nothing worthy of condemnation; but this is opposed by the οὐκ. See also ver. 34. Comp. chap. v. 16. Koppe generalizes nulla pena [Alford: no penal consequence of sin, original and actual], which so far at least belongs to the affair that even the temporal punishment, as punishment, and as prelude to the final condemnation, is abolished in the case of Christians. And this is so, not only because their sins are forgiven (Pareus), but because they are in Christ in consequence thereof.

[The question of the reference to justification or sanctification must affect the interpretation of condemnation, since ver. 2, beginning with γὰρ, seems to introduce a proof. The position of the chapter in the Epistle, as well as a fair exegesis of the verses, sustain the reference to sanctification. (Not to the entire exclusion of the other, any more than they are sundried in Christian experience.) We must, then, take no condemnation in a wide sense, either as deliverance both from sin and death

(Forbes), or as having indeed a reference to the justifying act already past, but meaning, rather, the continuance in a state of justification, culminating in final acquittal and glory. The point of connection with ver. 24 ("death"), is the former reference; with the succeeding proof, the latter. This avoids sundering salvation into two distinct parts. The significant phrase which follows favors this view. Still, the position of the verse warrants us in finding a very distinct reference to the act of pardon, as preceding (and involving as a gracious consequence) the work of sanctification.—R.]

[To those who are in Christ Jesus, τοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ]. This does not mean precisely, to have the Spirit of Christ, or Christ in you (Meyer), but it denotes the permanent continuance in justification—a life whose effect is the life of Christ in us. [This deeply significant Pauline phrase must never be weakened or limited. As to its beginnings, Augustine is excellent: Christus in homine, ubi fides in corde. As to its continuance, Bucer: A Christo pendere atque ejus spiritus in omnibus agi. But the best explanation is John xv. 1-7, and Eph. i. 23, &c. Hodge says: in Him federally, vitally, by faith; but the vital union seems always prominent; especially is it so here.—R.]

On the addition, see Textual Note. [Besides what is there remarked, the question of connection suggests, that the interpolation may have been occasioned by a desire to relieve the apparent difficulty in making ver. 2 prove the justification of the believer. To do this, the clause which makes prominent the Christian walk, so easily borrowed from ver. 4, was inserted.—R.]

Ver. 2. For the law of the Spirit of life, &c. [ὁ γὰρ νόμος τοῦ πνεύματος τῆς ζωῆς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ]. Ver. 2 specifies the ground why Christians are free from condemnation. The principal question here is, whether ἐν Χριστῷ is to be referred to the following ἡλιθιότησιν, or to the foregoing, and how far to the foregoing? Meyer, in accordance with Theodoret, Erasmus, Rückert (not "Tholuck"), Olshausen, Philippi, and De Wette, has also connected the ἐν Χριστῷ with ἡλιθ. But this distorts the thought, as if that Spirit of life could possibly deliver without Christ. Certainly ἐν Χριστῷ refers not alone to the foregoing ζωῆς (Luther, Beza, and others); and ζωῆ here is not the believer's subjective life in Christ, but Christ's original divine-human life itself. We must also not go back to τοῦ πνεύμ. τῆς ζωῆς alone (Flatt), but to the whole ὁ νόμος τοῦ πνεύμ. τ. ζ. (Calvin, Köllner, Tholuck).† The fulness of life in Christ is the Spirit (see John vi. 63); it is complete in itself, conscious, actual, and communicates itself as a unity with the Holy Spirit. It is just for this reason, also, the glorification of the νόμος, the personal righteousness; and as it has proved itself to be the completed νόμος, the ideal and dynamical principle of the Divine law in the obedience of Christ, so does it now prove itself to those who are in Christ; that is, justification becomes in them the principle of sanctification. But because this life-giving law takes the place of the Mosaic law—which could not deliver, but was completed by sin and death—there lies in the appropriation of this glorified law freedom from the law of sin and death.*

* [Dr. John Brown renders γὰρ, moreover, or would connect it with the thanksgiving in ver. 25. He refers this verse to sanctification, and ver. 1 to justification; hence would avoid making the former the ground of the latter.—R.]

† [The absence of the article is not decisive against this connection, though it favors more the connection with ζωῆ. Still, the parallelism strongly supports that view which joins it with the verb.—R.]

The law of the Spirit is not identical with the νόμος τοῦ νοῦς (Köllner, Schröder), but still the latter is connected with the former. The νόμος of the νοῦς is the ontological disposition which has attained its complete historical and concrete realization in the νόμος of the Spirit. Meyer observes, that the Christian institution of salvation is not meant, as νόμος πίστεως in chap. iii. 27. Yet it is surely identical, to a certain degree, with the νόμος πίστεως, but not with the Christian institution of salvation.†

Of the Spirit. Meyer explains: of the Holy Spirit. And this is, indeed, substantially the fact; but the Holy Spirit is spoken of so far as He reveals himself concretely in the vital plenitude of Christ. Tholuck's exposition is in the same direction: "The Spirit of life is that by which the spiritual life is effected in believers." The law of the Spirit is the impulse and guidance of the Spirit, under the reciprocal action between the principle of faith and the administration of God's government in the occurrences of life.

Freed me (ἡλευθέρωσέν με). The verb is aorist, referring to a past act, viz., the deliverance both from sin and from death, which took place at regeneration. Not completed, but begun when in Christ Jesus, and to be completed in Him.—R.] This expression constitutes an antithesis to the bringing me into captivity, just as the law of the Spirit of life is an antithesis to the law of sin and death (τοῦ νόμου τῆς ἀμαρτίας καὶ τοῦ θανάτου).‡ Because the false law of sinful propensity in the members is, according to chap. vii. 23, a law of sin, so is it also a law which tends to death, according to ver. 24. Although the Apostle designs to say that this freedom is followed by freedom from the Mosaic law (chap. vi. 14), it is nevertheless utterly wrong to understand, by the expression before us, the moral law (Wolf), or the Mosaic law (Pareus, and others). How far has the believer been made free from this law? Evidently, freedom from the dominion of sin (Greek and Roman Catholic expositors), effected by freedom from the penalty of sin (Protestant expositors), is meant. Yet the νόμος πνεύματος is not altogether identical with the νόμος πίστεως (Calovius). In the law of faith, the emphasis rests on the faith, but here on the νόμος; there, the question is the principle of justification, but here, the principle of holiness. The individualizing με ceases here.

Ver. 8. For what the law could not do (τὸ γὰρ ἀδύνατον τοῦ νόμου). The Mosaic law was incapable of effecting this liberation; therefore redemption took its place. On account of the connection of thought with the foregoing, the explanatory and appositional conclusion, what to the law was impossible, is made antecedent as apposition by Winer, it is defined as an accusative, governed by ἐποίησε (Winer, p. 217, § 32. 7); by Olshausen, as accusative absolute ("as far as the possibility of the law was concerned"); [Hodge: in view of the impotency of the law.—R.]; and by Rückert, Meyer, Fritzsche, and De Wette, as an antecedent nominative. For analogous forms, see Meyer* and Tholuck; particularly κεφάλαιον δέ, Heb. viii. 1. As nominative, the word acquires the character of a superscription, to be introduced with a colon; yet not as "rhetorical emphasis," but as making prominent the difference between law and gospel. Erasmus and Luther supply an ἐποίησε before θιός, not agreeably to the forms, yet certainly in harmony with the thought. The genitive νόμου denotes the incapacity of the law to deliver from sin (Vater has referred the νόμου to the law of the Spirit; Schulthess, to the law of Divine and human love).

In that it was weak. The ἐν ᾧ cannot mean while here; Meyer translates, in so far as, which appears too limited. [Luther, Calvin, Tholuck, De Wette, Philippi, Stuart, Hodge, render because, which is demanded by the context.—R.] The ἡσθίετε again takes up the idea of incapacity.

Through the flesh (διὰ τῆς σαρκός). Meyer: Through the guilt of the flesh. Besser: Through effect of the flesh. We must not forget the fact, that the division of the σαρκὸς has also made out of the law a division of the carnal letter. [The preposition διὰ with the genitive here marks the medium through which the law proved its weakness and inability, viz., the flesh (in its strict ethical sense). The law acted not on spiritual, but carnal men, and, through this medium, its inability to do what God did in sending His Son was proven.—R.]

God sending his own Son. The Apostle describes the redeeming act of God both in its pertinent meaning and in its medium. The medium was: God sent His own Son (in antithesis to the sending of the law by angels; Gal. iii. 19; Heb. ii. 2); and He sent him in the likeness of sinful flesh, or, of the flesh of sin, and on account of sin.—He sent him. Declaration of preexistence. [Philippi rightly finds in this verse not only a declaration of the preexistence of Christ, but of His existence as Son; the description which follows having a soteriological, rather than a christological reference.—R.]

In the likeness of sinful flesh (ἐν ὁμοιωμάτι σαρκὸς ἀμαρτίας). Sinful flesh is not altogether exact. Σάρξ must mean the whole ἡ

* [Law is here to be taken in the wide sense as = norm, principle, ruling power (comp. iii. 27; vii. 21-23).—P. S.]

† [Dr. Hodge, following Witsius, takes the law of the spirit of life as = the gospel. His objections to the other views arise mainly from a too exclusive reference of ver. 1 to the forensic idea of justification. It certainly confuses anew the meaning of the word law, to adopt this interpretation. Even should it mean gospel, it must mean the gospel in its life-giving aspect, as wrought by the Spirit; or Paul would not have chosen such terms. If in Christ Jesus be joined with freed, then the reference to the objective ground of justification is implied in the statement of our subjective possession of it in Christ Jesus. (See Lange, above.) Agreeing with Calvin, in the main, we interpret: "The power of the life-giving Spirit delivered me in Christ Jesus (in virtue of union to Him the fulfiller of the law and the deliverer from the law) from the law of sin and death."—R.]

‡ [Alford paraphrases: all claim of sin on him is at an end—he is acquitted; but, as he admits, "we are on higher ground now."—R.]

* [The simplest explanation is that of Meyer and Philippi: "God condemned sin in the flesh—a thing which was impossible on the side of the law." This takes it as nominative absolute, passing judgment in advance on what God did, so as to give prominence to the inability of the law, as well as a reason why God did it. On the grammatical objections to taking it as accusative absolute, see Meyer. Ἀδύνατον may be either active, = ἡ ἀδυναμία, or passive, = what was impossible. Tholuck urges the genitive in favor of the former, while Meyer contends that usage supports the latter.—R.]

man nature; the ethical force, however, lies in the genitive, which defines it: whose attribute and character was sin (Alford). The Orthodox fathers (comp. Theodoret, Theophylact, Tertullian) rightly use this text. "Christ did not appear in the flesh of sin, which was the Ebionite view, nor in the likeness of flesh, which was Docetic, but in the likeness of the flesh of sin, which is the Biblico-Pauline view" (Philippi).—R.] As He became truly man, He appeared in the full likeness of sinful flesh (Phil. ii. 7), and yet not in equality with it. Meyer: "So that He appeared in an external form, which was similar to human nature, contaminated with sin. Christ did not appear ἐν σαρκὶ ἁμαρ., but also not Docetically (contrary to Krehl)." See Tholuck's citation of the views of the Docetæ, and of the Mystics (for example, Valentine Weigel, who held that the external body of Christ came from the Virgin,* but His inward body from heaven), as well as the opposite views of Dippel, Hasenkamp, Menken, and Irving. "According to them, ὁμοίωμα does not denote likeness, but equality. But although ὁμοιος combines both meanings, yet that of likeness alone belongs to the substantives ὁμοίωμα and ὁμοίωμας; besides, the other meaning is contradicted by the analogy of Scripture in Heb. iv. 15."

And on account of sin [καὶ περὶ ἁμαρτίας]. The καὶ connects with the preceding. If this be forgotten, the interpretation may be too largely affected by the clause which follows.—R.] This was the motive of His mission. But the connection by καὶ expresses a second condescension of God and His Son. The first was, that Christ appeared in the form of a sinner, of the servant of sin (see chap. vii.), of the σαρὶς ἁμαρτίας, of the false σαρὶς; the second, that a mission on account of sin was undertaken by the Son of God himself (see Matt. xxi. 37). "Καὶ περὶ ἁμαρτίας has been connected with κατέκρινε by the Itala (per carnem), Tertullian (de res carn., c. 66), the Vulgate (de peccato), Chrysostom, Theodoret, Luther, Baldwin, and Bengel. But the καὶ is against this;" Tholuck. The ἁμαρτία in περὶ ἁμαρτίας itself has been variously interpreted. Thomas Aquinas, of the passion of Christ on account of its likeness to sin; Heræus, of death; Origen, Pelagius, Melancthon, Calvin, Bucer, Baumgarten-Crusius, of the sin-offering † ΓΑΡΥ; Theophylact, Maier, and others, the destruction and removal of sin. Meyer: "It is rather the whole relation in which the mission of Christ stood to human sin;" but this is already indicated by the foregoing explanation (see 1 John iii. 5). The mission of Christ was related to sin; its aim on every side was its abolition. But the immediate effect of His mission was, that God, by the innocence of Christ's life in the flesh, distinguished and separated sin, as a foreign and damnable object, from the flesh.

Condemned sin in the flesh [κατέκρινεν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν ἐν τῇ σαρκί]. The article is

* (Wordsworth finds in our phrase an argument against the dogma of the Immaculate Conception.—R.)

† [This interpretation, adopted by Hodge and Stuart, is rejected by every German commentator of note, even by Philippi and Alford. The passages in the New Testament (Heb. x. 6, 8, 10; xiii. 11; Gal. i. 4) which seem to favor it, all contain a distinct reference to sacrifices, independently of περὶ ἁμαρ. In Gal. i. 4 (see in loco p. 13), the "gave himself" introduces the same thought. The wider meaning, of course, implies such an expiation; but it is not brought prominently forward in this expression. (Philippi: um die Sünde sühnend zu tündend; to which Meyer unnecessarily objects, since his own view includes this.)—R.]

used here with ἁμαρτίας, the sin already referred to. This is a final argument against interpreting "sin" as = sin-offering, in the clause above. Whether "in the flesh" is to be joined with "condemned," or with "sin," is a matter open to discussion (see below).—R.] To the general idea of the mission of Christ: on account of sin, this declaration is now added, as a specific idea, to describe what His mission effected in relation to sin in the flesh. And we must criticise the different interpretations accordingly. Since the Redeemer, or God through Him, performs a condemnatory deed, we must especially avoid an incorrect generalization of the idea. Erasmus, De Dieu, and Eckermann, have very appropriately pointed out the thought, that He represented sin as damnable; yet we must emphasize sin in the flesh, and add: He separated it from the flesh fundamentally in Christ, in order thereby to cast it out from the flesh in the life of believers. This is, therefore, the sense: Christ, by becoming man in the flesh (which appeared to be the source of sin), and yet having a sinless fleshly nature, so maintained this sinlessness, and even holiness of His flesh, through His whole life, that He could give His flesh to His followers as a seal of His favor and as the organ of His Spirit. By this means He made it manifest: 1. That sin does not belong to the flesh in itself, but is inherent in it as a foreign, unnatural, condemnable, separable, alienable, and abstractly spiritual element; 2. That sin in the flesh is condemned and rejected in its carnal appearance; 3. That sin in the flesh should be separated from the entire human nature by means of the Spirit proceeding from Christ.

Other explanations: 1. Allusions to the eradication of the guilt of sin. This "is the prevailing ecclesiastical view in Origen, Chrysostom, &c. So, too, the Catholic expositors, with the exception of Justin; the Protestant, with the exception of Beza; even the Arminian and Socinian writers, and, indeed, the most of the later ones—Usteri, Rückert, Baumgarten-Crusius, Philippi,* and Schmid (Bibl. Theol.);" Tholuck. For what has been and can be said in favor of this explanation, see, at length, in Tholuck, p. 292 ff. "Yet the absence of the αἰτίου from ἐν τῇ σαρκί (comp., on the contrary, Eph. ii. 5) is an obstacle." We may add, that the context is also an obstacle. The question has been, chap. iii., concerning Christ as the propitiator. Here He is represented as a "fountain of holiness."

2. Allusions to the removal of sinfulness. "The procession of the delivering Spirit of life from Christ is only clearly proved by ver. 8, in case there is in this verse the thought that Christ has gained the victory over sin by His pure and holy personality in His own humanity, and that this sinless Spirit now passes over by faith to believers;" Tholuck. The same writer adduces a number of the defenders of the obedientia activa; especially Beza, of the Reformation period; the following later expositors seem also to belong here: Winzer, Stier, Neander, Meyer, De Wette, and Hofmann.†—Yet Tholuck finally turns to the allusion of this passage to the guilt of sin, and thus we must understand by σάρξ (p. 394) not the σάρξ of Christ, but "the sinful human nature, which, although only καθ' ὁμοίωμα, was also possessed by Christ (Philippi, De Wette)." The latter does not belong here. But then there would also follow from this an atonement καθ' ὁμοίωμα. The interpretation of the κατέργησε by interfecit (Grotius, Reiche, &c.), does not suit the nature of Christ. Meyer properly observes, that the κατέργησε has been chosen in reference to the κατάσκημα in ver. 1. If we thus condemn ourselves, we shall not be condemned; and if that condemnatory process against sin in the flesh has passed from Christ upon us, the object of the future condemnation is removed.

* [See Philippi's view below. Hodge is decided in his preference for this interpretation, regarding all others as arbitrary, and contrary to the context.—R.]

† [So Alford, Schaff. Stuart makes this antithesis with ver. 1: "There is now no κατέκρινε for Christians; but there is a κατέκρινε of their carnal appetites and desires." This he justifies by finding here "a paronomasia use of words;" but this mode of interpretation is of doubtful propriety.—R.]

[Besides these views, Philippi advocates a primary reference to the death of Christ, but includes the fact that thus sin is eo ipso done away and extirpated, so that those who are in Christ Jesus have both the pardon and the removal of sin, because of the indissoluble unity of both in Him.* This suits the wider meaning of no condemnation (ver. 1). All interpretations deviate from the strict meaning of the verb; the reference to punishment involves an added thought, not less than that to the extirpation of sin. Besides, the law could condemn sin, and, to a certain extent, punish it; but its great weakness was its inability to remove sin. It is perfectly gratuitous to infer that the modern interpretation implies that we are justified on the ground of inherent goodness, since this assumes that ver. 1 refers only to declarative righteousness, and overlooks the fact that the controlling thought is union to Christ. Still, should any prefer to find here an allusion to Christ's passion as a penal condemnation of sin, it must be allowed as involved, though this must not then be used to force the same meaning on the next verse.—R.]

[In the flesh. This is referred by many to the human nature of Christ. Were this the exclusive reference, we would probably find αἰσίου. The ethical sense must be adopted by those who join it with sin; but against this is the meaning of sin as a principle (Alford), and also the indifferent sense of σάρξ in the earlier part of the verse. It is better, then, to join it with the verb, and include in it human nature, our human nature, which Christ shared.† This seems to be Dr. Lange's view, though he adds to it some remarks which seem to echo his pseudo-plasmatic interpretation of chap. vii. We paraphrase the whole verse: "What could not be done by the law (was thus done), God sending His own Son in the likeness of that flesh, which was characterized by sin, and, on account of sin, condemned entirely (both as to punitive and polluting effects) in that flesh (which He shared with us) that sin." Yet this is not an accomplished fact as respects our release from the power of sin; that is to be fulfilled, and this end (ἵνα) is set forth in the next verse.—R.]

is important for the interpretation of this passage. condemnavi peccatum et jam quasi condemnatum eiecit extra carnem. The beautiful words of Augustine denote the objective medium by which the sinlessness of Christ becomes our liberation: Quomodo liberavit? Nisi quia reatum peccatorum omnium remissione dissolvit, ita ut, quamvis adhuc maneat, in peccatum non imputetur. Yet Beza properly observes: Neque nunc Apostolus agit de Christi morte, et nostrorum peccatorum expiatione, sed de Christi incarnatione, et naturæ nostræ corruptione per eam sublata. Only, as far as the transmission of sinlessness from Christ to us is concerned, we must bear in mind chap. vi. 1 ff. By virtue of the connection of Christ with us, He has redeemed us; by virtue of His connection with us in our guilty misery, He has atoned for us; and by virtue of the connection of His nature with our flesh, He has given His flesh to die, in order that, in His spiritual position toward us, He might make us free from the flesh by the communion of His Spirit as spiritual man, and, with the flesh of His risen life, implant in us a sanctified nature for the future resurrection.

Ver. 4. That the righteousness [or requirement] of the law [ἵνα τὸ δίκαιωμα τοῦ νόμου]. ἵνα, telic, introducing the purpose of the condemnation of sin in the flesh. Lange renders δικαιωμα: Gerechtheit. On the word, see p. 184. Stuart: the precept of the law; Hodge: the demands of the law (and also, the sentence of justification); Alford (following Meyer): all the requirements of the law combined here as one. Perhaps it is more exact to paraphrase: that righteous act (viewing all the acts as a unit) which meets the requirements of the law. This is Lange's view.—R.] Meyer explains the δικαιωμα ("quite simply, as chap. i. 32; ii. 26; comp. also chap. v. 16") as the requirement of the law; that which the law stipulates. Yet we have seen above, that δικαιωμα is that which satisfies and fulfils the law. The righteousness of life shall proceed from the righteousness of faith. Or, as the former proceeds originally from the latter as freedom in Christ, so shall it also proceed actually from it in more gradual fulfilment—in the holiness of our life. The surprise of the expositors at the explanation of Chrysostom and Theodoret, ὁ σκοπὸς τοῦ νόμου (see Tholuck, p. 396), is therefore without ground. Certainly that cannot mean, that the purpose of the law is to justify, but that it is its limit and end; see Rom. xiii. 10. Explanations:

1. The imputatio of Christ's righteousness. Calvin: The transference to us of the destruction of guilt which Christ effected (Bullinger, Beza, Calixtus [Hodge], and others). Also the transference of Christ's obedience to us (Brenz, Aretius [Haldane, apparently]: therefore also the obedientia activa). Köllner, Fritzsche, and Philippi: The sententia absolutoria is meant. Tholuck properly suggests, that the πληροῦν and the ἐν are against these interpretations.

2. The principle of the righteousness of life imparted to believers. This view seems to indicate a slight fear of the thought that Christians shall be holy in the form of believing spontaneity. Tholuck cites Meyer's view: "in order that this fulfilment of the law become apparent in the whole conduct," and adds (in accordance with Olshausen), "then Christians would be regarded as though they were only the possessors of a principle fulfilling the law."

* [So Wordsworth, Webster and Wilkinson, Forbes. This view is, indeed, open to the charge of indefiniteness; out as the clause sets forth both what the law could not do, and what God did do in sending Jesus Christ, there can be little objection to a wide meaning here, provided ver. 4 be applied definitely to the work of sanctification. Dr. Lange himself in the next paragraph reaches the same point.—R.]

† [Wordsworth: "Sin had tyrannised over us in our flesh, as the seat of its empire; and by our flesh, as its instrument and weapon. But God used our flesh as an instrument for our deliverance, and for the condemnation of sin, and for the establishment of his own empire in us."—R.]

3. The real holiness of believers proceeding from the principle of the righteousness of faith. [So Tholuck, Olshausen, Meyer, Alford, John Brown, and many others; among them some who refer the previous verse to the vicarious sacrifice of Christ.—R.] The passive form (instead of πληρώσωμεν) is a safeguard against a semi-Pelagian misconception. De Wette: in our inward activity of life. Reiche and Klee give special prominence therewith to the real inwardness of the fulfilment of the law.

[Might be fulfilled in us, πληρώθη ἐν ἡμῖν. The verb is passive. The fulfilment is wrought by God. In us; not by us, not on us (some shade of this meaning is involved in all those interpretations which refer the verse to imputed righteousness or holiness), and certainly not among us. The only objection to be considered is that of Calvin, and others; that, in this sense, the fulfilment does not take place. Granted—not at once, nor in this life, perhaps; but surely this must be the end (comp. Eph. ii. 10; Col. i. 22), and that it is in the Apostle's mind here, is evident from the latter part of the chapter.—R.]

Who walk not according to the flesh, &c. [τοῖς μὴ κατὰ σὰρκα περιπατοῦσιν, ἀλλὰ κατὰ πνεῦμα. Κατὰ may be expanded into: according to the impulsiveness of (so Meyer). These phrases express the actual life of those in the flesh and in the Spirit.—R.] This addition states not only the characteristic, but also the necessary condition* of believers. Tholuck holds that the participial clause does not contain the condition, as many of the earlier expositors maintain, but only the specification of the method. Meyer holds, that κατὰ πνεῦμα designates only the sanctifying Divine principle itself, as objective, and different from the human πνεῦμα! But it must not be viewed subjectively as the pneumatic nature of the regenerate, restored by the Holy Spirit, as (in accordance with Chrysostom) held by Bengel, Rückert, Philippi, and others. We would then have to ask at once, whether there is not another expression for the human spiritual life in the fellowship of the Holy Spirit? Further, whence the antagonism of the Holy Spirit and the human σὰρξ, since the most direct antithesis would be man's unholiness spiritual life? Universally, wherever the question is the antithesis of spirit and flesh in man himself, man is nevertheless considered as man, and not merely as flesh. [To this position of Dr. Lange there are decided objections. On the whole subject, the reader is referred to the Excursus, p. 285. It is better to hold (with Meyer, Alford, Hodge, and many others, against Stuart, Philippi, Lange, &c.), that πνεῦμα here refers to the Holy Spirit, and not to the spiritual nature imparted by the Holy Spirit, or the subjective spiritual life-principle (Lange). This seems to be required by ver. 2 ("the law of the Spirit of life") and ver. 5 ("the things of the Spirit"), where πνεῦμα evidently means the Holy Spirit.—The E. V. has very properly expressed this by the use of the capital letter.—R.]

* [This seems doubtful. It is true that this is a condition of the final fulfilment, a condition which implies the Divine Spiritual power as its cause; but this is not the idea which is prominent here. The method is now introduced, so as to point out, in what follows, the difference between the workings of the law of the Spirit of life, and the law of sin and death, which find their corresponding expressions in the phrases: according to the Spirit, according to the flesh.—R.]

SECOND PARAGRAPH, VERSE 5-6.

Ver. 5. For those who are according to the flesh [οἱ γὰρ κατὰ σὰρκα ὄντες]. The ἐν σαρκί κατὰ σὰρκα is identical with the ἐν σαρκί, and the latter means, to be in the carnal principle, under the supposition that the σὰρξ is the absolute principle of life. This ἐν σαρκί, as the controlling tendency of life, is the source of the ἐκ σαρκὸς, and the ἐκ σαρκὸς is the causa efficiens of the περιπατεῖν.—Meyer says that this expression is a wider notion than that conveyed by "who walk after the flesh," which is not the case.* Tholuck explains ἐν σαρκί κατὰ τὴν: "To bear in one's self the qualities of something; therefore = οἱ σαρκικοί." But it is these, first of all, in their principle of life, which then certainly results in the walk in the flesh. [It may be admitted that the principle of life is more prominent than the ethical state in this verse. Yet the phrases, "in the flesh" and "according to the flesh" (especially the former) include the characteristic state as well. Hence the view of Tholuck is preferable.—R.]

Do mind the things of the flesh [τὰ τῆς σαρκὸς ἐκφοροῦσιν]. The verb means, think of, care for, strive after (Alford). Meyer notices the presence of the article, making σὰρξ objective, as though it were something independent. This accords with the view, that Spirit here is the objective and operative Holy Spirit.—R.] The false objects of the desires of the false independence of the flesh. The antithesis, those who are according to the Spirit, οἱ δὲ κατὰ πνεῦμα, completes the thought that the two tendencies totally exclude each other.—[It also follows that τὰ τοῦ πνεύματος, the things of the Spirit, which belong to the Holy Spirit, and hence to the spiritual life, exclude the things of the flesh. Dr. Hodge well remarks, therefore, that the latter phrase means "not merely sensual things, but all things which do not belong to the category of the things of the Spirit."—R.]

Ver. 6. For the mind of the flesh is death [τὸ γὰρ φρόνημα τῆς σαρκὸς θάνατός]. The connection here formed by γὰρ is singular. Tholuck: "It could serve to prove only the second half of ver. 5, while the correspondence of the members of the sentence leads us to expect a proof of both halves of ver. 5. Thus the view gains probability, that, according to the Greek and Hebrew (רַב) use of language, the proof in ver. 6 performs for that in ver. 5 the parallel service of assigning reasons for the τοῖς μὴ, &c., in ver. 4." Meyer makes the γὰρ the proof of the second half of ver. 5, οἱ δὲ κατὰ πνεῦμα. "Motive why they make the interests of the πνεῦμα the end of their efforts."† We regard, however, the γὰρ as proof that the ἐν σαρκί κατὰ has a corresponding ἐκ σαρκὸς φρόνημα‡ as a result. For the σὰρξ has a φρόνημα, yet all its φρόνημα is nothing but death;

* [It were better to say that it is the same idea under a different aspect. In ver. 4, with reference to the outward life; here, with reference to the actual state.—R.]

† [In 4th ed., Meyer agrees with Tholuck, taking this second γὰρ as explicative, according to classical usage. So Rückert, Stuart, Hodge. (De Wette, Alford, follow the view attributed to Meyer above.) The contrast, already indicated in ver. 4, is continued here.—R.]

‡ [φρόνημα (Lange: Gesinnung; Bengel: sentiment, in the French) means the disposition, which manifests itself in the ἐκφορῶν (ver. 5). The E. V. is therefore correct in thought, though not in form.—R.]

not only aiming at death against its will, but also proceeding from death, moving in the element of death; that is, in constant dissolution of the unity between life and its source of life, between spiritual and physical life, and even between the opposition of the desires of the individual members. [The copula, to be supplied here, is not, has as its result, but, is, amounts to. Philippi: "Death is here conceived as present (comp. 1 Tim. v. 6; Eph. ii. 1, 5), not merely as a result, but as a characteristic mark, an immanent definition of the carnal mind."—R.]

[But the mind of the Spirit, τὸ δὲ πνεῦμα τοῦ πνεύματος.] The opposite is the πνεῦμα τοῦ πνεύματος (for the εἶναι κατὰ πν. is itself πν.); it is life and peace.* It is therefore from true life, moving in life, directed to life. Peace means the soul of life. Opposition is the separation and dissolution of life; peace with God is connection with the source of life; peace with one's self, a blessed sense of life; peace with the government of God and His world, an infinitely richer life. The third characteristic must be specially emphasized in both clauses: directed to the end: life and peace.

Ver. 7. Because the mind of the flesh. [Διότι introduces a proof, here confined to the former half of ver. 6. This proof hints at an antithesis to both life and peace, the latter being more evident, as it is in human consciousness also.—R.] The reason why πνεῦμα, &c., = θαν., lies in its opposition to the source of life, its enmity against God [ἐχθρὰ εἰς θεόν], with which the displeasure of God necessarily corresponds.† Since the Apostle does not prove the second half, it follows that here the effort of the flesh constitutes the principal point of view. Enmity against God is, in the first degree, the actual opposition to God in almost unknown (but not unconscious) form; but afterwards the opposition established also in the consciousness. Melancthon appropriately says: "Loquitur Paulus principaliter de cogitationibus deo, quales sunt in mente non renata, in qua simul magna confusio est dubitationum, deinde et de affectibus erga deum. In securis est contentus iudicii lei, in perperis factis indignatio et fremitus adversus leum."

For it does not submit itself to the law of God [τῷ γὰρ νόμῳ τοῦ θεοῦ οὐχ ὑποάσσεται]. The verb is middle. The law of God is in emphatic position. The clause proves what precedes, by adducing a fact. This mode of proof concurs with the statements already made respecting man's character and that of the law.—R.] Paul's positive declaration of the manifestation of this enmity. This enmity, which is very deep-seated, becomes manifest in disobedience to, and rebellion against, God's law.

Neither indeed can it [οὐδὲ γὰρ δύναται]. Subjection to the law of God is not possible on the carnal standpoint. Or rather, it cannot be effected by carnal effort. A divided life, according to the blind course of the lusts, is in outright contradiction to the central procession of life from within, according to the principle of the Spirit.

* [Meyer, who, as usual, limits "death" to eternal death, must define "life" in the same way. Life is the direct antithesis to death; but a subjective characteristic is added, as Benzel suggests, to prepare the way for the following description of enmity.—R.]

† It is easy to construct this inference: The mind of the flesh = death; because the mind of the flesh = enmity against God: therefore, enmity against God = death.—R.]

Tholuck justly opposes Zeller, by bringing out the fact, that the antithesis is not man's sensuous and spiritual nature in itself, but that σὰρξ denotes human nature with the accessory idea of its sinful character. But to this it may be said, that the question is not the σὰρξ in itself, but a πρῶτον καὶ σαρξ; that is, a σὰρξ morbidly excited and demonized by a selfish spirituality. [Comp. the Excurses in chap. vii. That chapter is a proof of this declaration. The fact is undoubted. Paul is but declaring the cause of the manifestation of enmity to God in the form of opposition to His law, the inability of the carnal man to be subject to it. The question of ability to believe is not under discussion, yet Pelagianism and legalism are obviously precluded by this statement.—R.]

Ver. 8. And those who are in the flesh cannot please God [οἱ δὲ ἐν σαρκὶ ὄντες θεῷ ἀρέσκει οὐ δύναται]. The E. V strengthens δὲ into so then, following Beza, Calvin, and others, who made it = οὐ. (So Hodge.) It is much better, with De Wette, Philippi, Meyer, to consider it metabatic. It continues the thought of the first clause of ver. 7. There seems to be no necessity for assuming a suppressed μέν, as Alford does. On this account we render and instead of but.—R.] ὄντες ἐν σαρκὶ = ὄντες κατὰ σάρκα, but the expression here is stronger; see above. The incapacity in ver. 8, then, follows from the incapacity of ver. 7. It is said, in a mild way, that they are objects of the Divine displeasure, children of wrath. But the expression is significant, in that it destroys the notion of those who are legalists, and rely on the righteousness of their works, and who, although ὄντες ἐν σαρκὶ, fancy that they can merit the pleasure of God by their works and endeavors. For we must by no means lose sight of the fact, that the Apostle does not speak merely of the gross service of sin, but also of an observance of the law, which accepts the law as merely external, as γράμμα and σὰρξ. [The connection renders obvious what is distinctly stated elsewhere, that this is no negative position, involving only negative results. The mind of the flesh is death.—R.]

THIRD PARAGRAPH, VERS. 9-11.

Ver. 9. But ye are not in the flesh, &c. [ὕμεις δέ, κτλ. Δέ is distinctive (Stuart).—If so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you, εἴπερ πνεῦμα θεοῦ οἰκεῖ ἐν ὑμῖν]. The antithesis. The more specific exhortation does not appear here, but in ver. 12. The εἴπερ may be thus distinguished from εἴ: it (= "provided that") generally expresses slight doubt, while εἴ expresses rather an assurance in the sense of if indeed. Yet the εἴπερ here must be understood as only purely conditional, in conformity with the antithesis by which the Apostle represents the standpoint of the spiritual life of believers as purely fundamental and ideal. With such a representation, the application to individuals can only take place with an εἴπερ; likewise without positive doubt. Chrysostom and Olshausen take it as ἐπειδήπερ, quando quidem; Tholuck and Meyer prefer the hortatory construction, on account of the antithesis. [It seems most natural to account for the conditional form, by admitting "an indirect incitement to self-examination" (Meyer). Πνεῦμα is without the article, yet it must mean the Holy Spirit; hence we claim this as its usual meaning throughout the passage. The use of πνεύματι, seemingly in distinction from πνεῦμα, is not against this, since, in the first clause, the Spirit is represented as the element in which they live; in the second, as the indwelling power causing them to live in this element.—On οὐκ ἐστὶ, comp. 1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 17, 19; 2 Tim. i. 14; John xiv. 28.—In you must not be weakened to among you.—R.]

Now if any man hath not, &c. [εἰ δὲ τις πνεῦμα Χριστοῦ οὐκ ἔχει. The antithesis is not very strong; δὲ may well be rendered now (E. V.). The unconditional negative belongs to the verb (Alford). See Textual Note *.—R.] This antithetical declaration certainly expresses the possibility, that what has been said has no reference to particular individuals, and that here no half measures are of any avail.

The Spirit of Christ. The question here is, belonging to Christ; hence, the Spirit of Christ. It is the Spirit of God as the Spirit of Christ, the Spirit of His righteousness of life as brought home to the inward life of believers. [There can be no reasonable doubt that it is identical with Spirit of God, above; though the connection with "none of His" has occasioned the use of this particular phrase. The genitive is possessive, Spirit belonging to, or proceeding from, Christ. Comp. Phil. i. 19; Gal. iv. 6; 1 Peter i. 11. Notice the terms, "Spirit of God," "Spirit of Christ," "Christ," all applied to the Divine spiritual indwelling. Hence Bengel well says: Testimonium illustre de sancta Trinitate ejusque aconomia in corde fidelium. It must be admitted that such statements generally have reference to the economy of grace, but they form the basis for the doctrinal statements of the Church. This text is therefore a dictum probans for the Western doctrine of the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son (filioque, Synod of Toledo, A. D. 589). This was the final contribution to the doctrinal statement of the Trinity. On its importance, &c., see Schaff, History of the Christian Church, iii., pp. 688 f.; comp. Kahnis, Lehre vom Heiligen Geiste, Halle, 1847. Philippi has an excellent note in loco. On the relation of the Holy Spirit to Christ, comp. John xiv. 26; xv. 26; xvi. 7, 13, 14.—R.]

[He is none of his, οὗτος οὐκ ἔστιν αὐτοῦ.] The Apostle does not regard a merely external belonging to Christ as of any value. Where the Christianity of the inward life is extinct, there the Christianity of the whole man is extinct. Meyer: "Not those who are not Christians, but nominal Christians."

Ver. 10. But if Christ is in you [εἰ δὲ Χριστὸς ἐν ὑμῖν]. That is, as a principle of life. [Ἄ contrasts with the last verse. (Is is substituted for be, to indicate the strong probability that this is the case.) Comp. John vi. 56; xv. 4; 2 Cor. xiii. 5; Gal. ii. 20; Eph. iii. 17; Col. i. 27; also John xiv. 23, as justifying the remark of Bengel: Qui Spiritum habet, Christum habet; qui Christum habet, Deum habet. The mystical union of Christ and the believer has, as its underlying basis, the yet more mysterious unity of the Persons of the Godhead.—R.]

The body is dead [τὸ μὲν σῶμα νεκρόν]. Explanations of vers. 10, 11: *

1. Death and life in their strict sense. Therefore the body lapsed to death (Augustine, Beza, Bengel [mortuum pro moriturum], Usteri, Rückert, and Fritzsche). [So Hodge, Alford, Wordsworth.] According to Meyer, the νεκρός is proleptic: "Ye have the following blessed results to enjoy: although the body is a prey to death because of sin, yet the spirit is life because of righteousness. But He who raised Christ will also raise your mortal bodies, because the Spirit of Christ dwelleth in you." [In favor of this view are: the natural sense of dead, the connection with ver. 11, and the subsequent course of thought; its not attaching an ethical meaning to body. Against it: the comprehensive meaning of death throughout this part of the Epistle, the necessity for a wide meaning in its antithesis ζωή, as well as in ζωοποιῆσαι (ver. 11, not ἐκτίσσει); also the use of σῶμα in an implied ethical sense in ver. 13.—R.]

2. The body is dead, slain by sin (Chrysostom, Theodoret, Erasmus, Grotius, Baumgarten-Crusius [Stuart], and others. [These, for the most part, take ver. 10 in a moral or spiritual sense. This view is most objectionable, since it disturbs the harmony of the two verses, takes σῶμα in a strict ethical sense, and gives to νεκρόν (which seems to be chosen rather to avoid a direct antithesis to ζωή) the widest possible meaning.—R.]

3. The misery of sin as bearing in itself the germ of death (De Wette, and others). [De Wette claims that the physical and ethical senses must be combined here, as in John v. 21 ff. This view is sufficiently correct if properly restricted. The physical death of the body is to be viewed as a moral result of the indwelling sin, but only because the body has not yet shared in the full results of redemption.—R.]

But all this does not furnish us with the definition, that, on account of sin—that is, because of sinfulness—we have to lead a divinely partial life from the principle of the Spirit, in which the body is declared to be dead in an ideal and dynamical respect (see chap. vi. 4). But thereby the spirit as life, and the principle of life, is concentrated still more in itself. [The objection to this view is, its confusion of human spirit and Divine Spirit, on which the whole interpretation rests.—R.]

But the spirit is life [τὸ δὲ πνεῦμα ζωή]. Meyer also holds, that here the spirit is not the Holy Spirit (as Chrysostom, Calvin, and others suppose), but the human spirit. Although the human spirit is here regarded as filled by the Holy Spirit, we must not include (with Philippi, following Theodoret and De Wette) the pneumatic nature of the regenerate. For, says Meyer, that must remain there. [The meaning is evidently that under III. B. in the Excursus above, p. 235.—R.] Ζωή, life, not merely living, but life which is thoroughly actual, life-giving, and life-supporting. [Whatever view be taken of dead, the change in the form here, from the adjective to the noun, warrants an extension of meaning; as indeed the word ζωή itself, and its reference to the human spirit permeated by the Divine Spirit, demand.—R.]

Because of sin [διὰ ἁμαρτίαν, on account of sin, as an indwelling principle. Not the special sins of the body, nor that the body is the special seat of sin; but, having shared in the results of sin, it has not yet shared in the results of redemption. How and when it will, is afterwards stated.—R.] As this can only mean, to constitute a pure opposition to the sinful propensity cleaving to the members, so can because of righteousness [$\delta\iota\alpha\ \delta\iota\kappaαιοσύνης$] only mean, to maintain and develop the righteousness of faith in the righteousness of life. According to Meyer, the justitia imputata is meant, as the foundation of the $\zetaωή$. (The most of the elder expositors, together with Rückert, &c., favor the same view.) But then the $\delta\iota\alpha$ would have to be construed with the genitive. The reference to the righteousness of life (Erasmus, Grotius, De Wette, Philippi [Hodge, Alford], and others) is opposed by Meyer in the words: "Because the righteousness of life can never be perfect, it can never be the ground of the $\zetaωή$. But the question is not the ground of the $\zetaωή$, but the greater promotion of life, so that it may prove itself to be purer life. The concern is, to preserve spotless the white robe of bestowed righteousness, and, being clad in it, to strive for the crown of righteousness." (Meyer holds, according to this, that the $\acute{\alpha}\muαρτ\alpha$ does not imply our own individual sin, and thus, too, that the $\delta\iota\kappa\alpha$ does not imply our own "righteousness.") In harmony with the sense, many expositors, particularly Calixtus, connect the justitia imputata with the inchoata.*

Ver. 11. But if the Spirit [$\epsilon\iota\ \delta\epsilon\ \tau\omicron\ \piνύμα$]. The Apostle here prepares his transition from his description of adoption, regarded as a partial spiritual life, to his description of the glory in which body and spirit shall be in perfect harmony, when the body shall be glorified into the perfect organ of the Spirit. Meyer thus construes the connection: "After ver. 10, death still retains some power—that over the body; Paul now removes this."

Of him that raised up Jesus from the dead, &c. [$\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \epsilonγείραντος\ \text{Ἰησοῦν}\ \epsilonκ\ νεκρῶν$, &c.]. The spiritual resurrection must be followed by the physical; it is a prophecy of the physical resurrection. For the author of the spiritual resurrection is the Spirit of the wonder-working God, which has raised Christ, and elevated Him to the majesty of the glorified life. What the Spirit [now dwelling in you] has done to Him, in conformity with the connection of body and spirit, He will also do to His members (see Eph. i. 19 ff.). He has raised Jesus from the dead—that is, as the first-fruits of the resurrection. Therefore He

Will quicken even your mortal bodies, &c. [$\zetaωοποιήσει\ καὶ\ τὰ\ θνητὰ\ σώματα\ ὑμῶν$, &c.]. The use of the word $\thetaνητὰ$, mortal, immediately after $νεκρῶν$ (ver. 10) seems to justify the reference of the latter to physical death; as, indeed, $\sigmaώματα$ here opposes any ethical sense of that word in ver. 10. Since, however, the verb $\zetaωοποιεῖν$ is one of wide meaning, a large number of commentators (Calvin, Stuart, De Wette, Philippi, and others) refer this verse also to something which takes place even here, to be completed, indeed, at the time of actual resurrection. Against this is the $\kappaαὶ$, also, even, which is unnecessary, unless the reference be to something which has not yet taken place, and which seemed most unlikely to take place. The quickening of the body, as a tool of unrighteousness, has already begun. The objection of Stuart, that then this would only mean to declare the bodily resurrection, a truth already well known, betrays a want of appreciation of the importance attached to that truth by the Apostle. Furthermore, even admitting a secondary reference to a present moral quickening of the body, the primary reference to the actual physical resurrection seems to be demanded by the experience of Christians, which certainly shows them that the last seat, both of the strength and the effects of sin, is in the body. It does not revive; no spiritual power here renews it. It is mortal, yet even it shall share in the life-giving influence. The verb means more than raising from the dead indeed, but, as used here, the emphasis rests on this.—R.]

* [Accepting $\delta\iota\kappa\alpha$ as implanted righteousness, we paraphrase as follows: But if Christ be in you, (though) your body indeed is dead (having in it the seeds of death, and about to die) on account of sin (whose effects are not yet totally removed), but your spirit (permeated by the Holy Spirit) is life (already and to be yet more truly so) on account of righteousness (implanted in you by the Holy Spirit, in virtue of your an on to Christ).—R.]

[On account of his Spirit that dwelleth in you, $\delta\iota\alpha\ \tau\omicron\ \text{ἐνοικοῦν}\ \alphaὐτοῦ\ πνύμα\ ἐν\ ὑμῖν$. See Textual Note 11]. We have decided above for the accusative, $\delta\iota\alpha\ \tau\omicron\ \text{ἐνοικοῦν}$, in opposition to the genitive. We do this for important reasons. The Spirit which dwells in believers prepares the resurrection-body; but the resurrection is thereby only provided for. The resurrection itself is still to be the final deed of God. And this is the question here (see ver. 18). But it is a miraculous deed of God, which is not only occasioned, but also brought to pass, by the presence of the Spirit of life in believers.

The change of terms is remarkable: Jesus and Christ. [Bengel: Appellatio JESU spectat ad ipsum; CHRISTI, refertur ad nos; true even to its eschatological reference (Meyer).—R.]

If, now, the $\zetaωοποιήσει$ also refers to the resurrection, the choice of the expression yet indicates, at the same time, the holiness of the corporeality by the operation of the resurrection-power of the Spirit, as this holiness constitutes the transition and interposition for the final miracle of the resurrection (see 2 Cor. v. 5). From the very nature of the case, the question here can be neither an ethical vivification alone, nor a physical one alone; but the idea of vivification comprises both these (according to Calvin, De Wette, Philippi, and others). Calvin: "Non de ultima resurrectione, quæ momento fiat, habetur sermo, sed de continua spiritus operatione, quæ relinquit carnem paulatim mortificans caelestem vitam in nobis instaurat." But De Wette properly observes, against the notion that the spiritual power of resurrection alone can consummate the process of renewal (in conformity with the reading $\delta\iota\alpha\ \tau\omicron\upsilon$, &c.), that the Jewish opinion that the Holy Ghost quickens the dead (Shamoth Rabba, &c.) cannot prove any thing here.

FOURTH PARAGRAPH, VERS. 12-17.

Ver. 12. Therefore, brethren [$\ἀρα\ οὖν\ ἀδελφοί$]. An inferential exhortation. In chap. vi. 12 a similar exhortation is found, but without $\ἀδελφοί$. The first person naturally follows.—R.] The $\ἀρα$ draws an inference from the necessity of leading the life in the Spirit in opposition to the life in the flesh, in hope of the reanimation of the body. Tholuck says, though not in the sense of the textual construction: "The Apostle allows himself to be led off from the train of thought commencing with vers 10 and 11, by the necessity of an exhortation, and afterwards returns from another point to the eschatological expression."

* [As Alford suggests: non solum de ultima resurrectione, would be more correct. For a very full discussion, both of the textual variations and the exegetical opinions see Meyer in loco. He defends the exclusive reference to the resurrection of the body.—R.]

We are debtors, not to the flesh [ὀφειλέται ἡμῖν οὐ τῇ σαρκί]. The negative applies to the succeeding clause as well. The antithesis is obvious. Σάρξ has the article here, where it is personified, but not in the next clause, where it corresponds with the use made of it in vers. 4 and 5.—R.] According to Meyer, the Apostle has suppressed his antithesis in consequence of the vivacious movement of his language. But he was prevented by something else—namely, a desire to guard against misunderstanding, as if Christians had no duties in reference to their flesh or their physical life (comp. Eph. v. 29). [So Chrysostom; see Alford in loco.—R.] Therefore he defines his proposition more specifically: not to live after the flesh [τοῦ κατὰ σάρκα ζῆν]; that is, not to live according to the principle of carnal desires, or of external motives at all. The genitive τοῦ is sufficiently explained as designation of the infinitive of result. (Fritzsche takes another view; see Meyer.)* The antithesis, after the Spirit, follows indirectly in ver. 13.

Ver. 13. Ye shall die [μύλλετε ἀποθνήσκειν]. Strictly, then ye shall go continually to death, or, toward death (μύλλετε). Meyer understands this to mean here only eternal death. This is contrary to Philippi, who properly retains the general idea of death.† According to Rückert, this declaration would exclude the resurrection. But the Apostle takes cognizance not only of the difference between the first and second resurrection (1 Cor. xv. 23), but also of a resurrection which begins immediately after death (2 Cor. v. 1); and pure life is in antithesis to a final resurrection to judgment. The explanation of Eusebius, τὸν ἀθάνατον θάνατον ἐν τῇ γήινῃ, precludes neither the resurrection on the one hand, nor, on the other, a constant connection of physical and psychical corruption with ethical corruption.

But if ye through the Spirit [εἰ δὲ πνεύματι]. Πνεύματι here is undoubtedly not subjective, but the Holy Spirit (comp. ver. 14). An instrumental dative.—R.] By means of the life of the Spirit (by virtue of the Holy Spirit, says Meyer). Therefore the Apostle says, the deeds of the body should be mortified, not by bodily exercise, restraint, and penance, but by the power of the life of the Spirit.

The deeds [τὰς πράξεις]. The stratagema. Machinations (Luke xxiii. 51; Col. iii. 9). These consist in the predominance of illegal impulses as irresistible necessities, as proofs of liberty, as the poetry of life, &c. The word occurs in the later Greek writers in the meaning of cunning designs, especially in relation to sins of lust (see Tholuck).‡ Yet the general treatment in the present section requires a general interpretation of the word.

[Of the body, τοῦ σώματος. See Textual Note 10.] The expression σώματος has been very strange to many; therefore Codd. D. E. F. G., and the Vulgate, read σάρκος. Τὸ σῶμα τῆς ἀμαρτίας, chap. vi. 6, cannot be cited in favor of the expression, since the question here is a real body, but not there. Yet Meyer correctly asserts, contrary to Stirn, that Paul remained true to his customary use of language. The body has its autonomous desires, which express themselves faithfully in the normal life of man, and willingly subordinate themselves to the dominion of the Spirit. In the sinful man, who is not converted, these express themselves as imperious commands. In the believer, on the contrary, from whom the law in the members is removed, they can morbidly express themselves still, though in only deceptive forms, and so far as the body, which should be the organ of the spirit, is autonomous in unguarded moments. But its πράξεις are then motions of the σὰρξ, which appear as πράξεις of the body, because the body has its physiological rights. [Thus we avoid giving an ethical sense to body. If the bad sense of deeds be emphasized, then the ethical force is found there. We must avoid, on the other hand, taking the phrase, "deeds of the body," as metonymy for sinful, carnal deeds (Stuart, Hodge); for there must be a reason for the choice of this word. Alford, following De Wette, explains it: " = τῆς σαρκός, but here concrete, to give more vivid reality."—R.]

Θαυματοῦτε [comp. chap. vii. 4, and the stronger expression, νεκροῦσατε, Col. iii. 5; Lange's Comm., pp. 63, 64.—R.] Mortify can only mean: exhaust and abnegate to the very root. Wicked practises, as roots of sin, are included.

Ye shall live [ζήσεσθε]. Alford: "not μύλλετε ζῆν; this life being no natural consequence of a course of mortifying the deeds of the body, but the gift of God through Christ; and coming, therefore, in the form of an assurance, 'ye shall live,' from Christ's Apostle."—R.] In the higher, and even highest sense.

Ver. 14. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God [ὅσοι γὰρ πνεύματι θεοῦ ἄγονται. Comp. Gal. v. 18. Lange's Comm., p. 137. Γὰρ introduces the reason why they shall live, implying, at the same time, that such mortification was the result of the Spirit's influence, as is expressed in ver. 13. Hence πνεῦμα, in the former case, must refer to the Spirit of God. That this leading means a continued and special influence of the Divine Spirit, is obvious.—R.] The Spirit of God is not identical with the Spirit in ver. 13 (Meyer); but it is Christian spiritual life, to be led by the Spirit of God. The passive form expresses its complete dominion, without at the same time denying the voluntary being led on the part of the human will.

They are sons of God [οὗτοι υἱοὶ θεοῦ εἰσιν θεοῦ. See Textual Note 14. The reading adopted here places the emphasis on οὗτοι, these, and none other, but gives a secondary emphasis to υἱοὶ; comp. Gal. iii. 7. Philippi finds no essential difference between υἱοὶ and τέκνα θεοῦ, except that, in the former, the idea of maturity is more prominent. Hence Christ is called υἱός, never τέκνον θεοῦ. (So Alford.) On the significance of the phrase, see Doctr. Note 10, and the Erag. Notes on vers. 15, 16.—R.] Sons, in the real sense, in contrast with the

* [Stuart follows Winer, p. 306, in governing the genitive by ὀφειλέται (so Fritzsche). This is harsh, and most commentators take the genitive as that of design or result, according to a very common usage.—R.]

† [The most comprehensive idea of death seems to be demanded by the context. Granting that the antithesis is ζῆν (ver. 10), the present and spiritual reference is still required. Ver. 6 forms the best guide to the meaning of the terms here (so Tholuck).—R.]

‡ [The New Testament uses the word generally in malum patrem; and so here, whether in a more or less restricted sense. It does not refer to the definite acts so strictly as peya, but includes the general conduct, &c. (Philippi).—R.]

symbolical children of God of the old theocracy. It is those, and those alone, who bear in themselves the mark that the Spirit of God leads them. On the other hand, the merely symbolical adoption by God under the law is strictly a bondage, according to ver. 15. Comp. Gal. v. 18.

Ver. 15. For ye did not receive the spirit of bondage [οὐ γὰρ ἐλάβετε πνεῦμα δουλείας. An appeal to Christian consciousness, to confirm (γὰρ) his statement. The verb is aorist, referring to a definite time (when they became Christians).—R.] Meyer translates: "A spirit of bondage, adoption." We hold that the definitions are sufficiently united by the exclusive antithesis. What must we understand by the expression, spirit of bondage? Tholuck: "The negative form of this clause caused the earlier expositors great difficulty, since the question is not a communication of the spirit in the Old Testament, and since the spirit there imparted, so far as it was a spirit of bondage, could not be derived from God; and finally, as the πνεῦμα, which, in consequence of the antithesis of πνεῦμα νοθεσίας, must be viewed as the Holy Spirit, could produce the spirit of bondage." Explanations:

1. Augustine incidentally: The devil is the author of the slavish spirit (Heb. ii. 14, 15). Luther: The spirit of Cain in opposition to Abel's spirit of grace (Fritzsche: malus demon, &c.).

2. Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Ecumenius: The gift of the law itself, as πνευματική, according to chap. vii. 14. Likewise Augustine, elsewhere: The spirit of the external gift of the law: idem spiritus in tabulis lapideis in timore, in tabulis cordis in dilectione.

3. Most of the later expositors: The same Holy Spirit is described in His twofold operation; here, as far as He exercises His penal office (John xvi. 8). In that case, the operation of the mere attritio not designed by the Spirit is made prominent.

4. Grotius, Philippi, and others: πν. is in both cases a subjective spiritual disposition. [Philippi defends this view very ably. Stuart: a servile spirit; a filial spirit. Alford admits also the subjective sense. De Wette remarks, that the objective source is indicated in the verb "received."—R.]

5. Fritzsche, Meyer, and Tholuck: πν. δουλ. denotes what the received filial spirit is not. Likewise Monachus, in the seventh century. Therefore the spirit of bondage is regarded as a hypothetical antithesis. This is undoubtedly correct, in a measure, so far as the Spirit which they have received can be regarded only as a Spirit of adoption; but a spirit of bondage would be really a perverse spirit. [It should be remarked, that all views which give πνεῦμα a subjective meaning, must either take it in the first case as = disposition, and, in the second, = the human spirit as influenced by the Holy Spirit, thus having no exact correspondence; or, assume a hypothetical antithesis in the first case. It may be added, that it is difficult to account for the use of the word "receive" (especially the definite aorist), if these views be accepted, since the servile spirit was the natural spirit. We are thus driven to the interpretation, that πνεῦμα means the same spirit in both cases, defined first negatively, then positively. The probability of a reference to the Holy Spirit is very great in that case.—R.]

But yet the Apostle intimates that Judaism has made of the Old Testament a spirit (a spirit-like, complete system) of bondage, and that it might attempt to make such a perverse spirit of the New Testament. This intimation is brought out prominently by the πάλιν εἰς φόβον, which denotes a fact. At Sinai the Jews made of the law a law εἰς φόβον in the bad sense (Exod. xx. 19, &c.). On the other hand, the repetition of the ἐλάβετε favors the view given above: ye have not received a spirit of bondage, because that would be a contradiction.

Again to fear. This denotes the bound: wicked fear of slavish legalism. [De Wette, Meyer, Philippi, join πάλιν with εἰς φόβον as = in order again to fear. The πάλιν may imply that the condition under Judaism was one of fear, but it does not follow that the Roman Christians were mainly Jewish (Philippi), for this fear is a result of all unchristian religiousness. The πάλιν points to their previous condition in all cases.—R.]

But ye received the Spirit of adoption [ἀλλὰ ἐλάβετε πνεῦμα υιοθεσίας. Meyer finds in the repetition of ἐλάβετε πνεῦμα something solemn. The force of the genitive must be determined largely by the meaning of πνεῦμα. Meyer: A spirit which is the ruling principle in the condition of adoption. Philippi, arguing, from Gal. iv. 5, 6, that adoption precedes the impartation of the Holy Spirit, finds another reason for the subjective sense of spirit; but the adoption may be taken, not as the act, but the state, which is more accordant with the context, since ἐν ᾧ, wherein, refers to a state or element of life. Out of this comes the subjective feeling, the cry, Abba, Father. The genitive then points to an effect as in bondage, which also has a descriptive clause appended.—R.]

De Wette: "υιοθεσία, strictly, adoption instead of a child;" which meaning can be so urged, that they who were by nature the children of wrath (Eph. ii. 3), have been adopted, or appointed (Eph. i. 15), the children of God (Fritzsche, Meyer, and Olshausen). The same commentator says: "But it is a question whether—as even in the Old Testament (Deut. xxxii. 6), and in the New Testament (John i. 12; 1 John iii. 9; 2 Peter i. 4), and also in Paul, agreeably to the new creation (Gal. vi. 15), the idea of transformation into children of God occurs—there is not, consequently, in υιοθ. rather the idea of sonship, of the real relation of children to the father (Luther, Usteri, &c.), than of adoption (Fritzsche, Meyer, and Tholuck). The expression, πνεῦμα υιοθ., and the use made of the word in ver. 28, harmonizes better with this view." Tholuck, on the contrary, appeals to Eph. v. 1; Rom. ix. 4; to the designation of the adopted child by υιός θετός (υιός ἐλποίητος); and to the adoptio filiorum of the Vulgate. But Chrysostom, Theodoret, and other Greek expositors, on the other hand, have taken the word also in the sense of υιότης. It is easy to see that the Apostle chose the expression in order to distinguish the children of faith, as adopted through grace, from the υιός ἰδιός. But he had the further reason of not wishing to press the idea: for then he could not have said, with reference to the Hebrew law of inheritance, "And if children, then heirs." Likewise, the new birth by Christ and His Spirit denotes real υιοθ. [The actual sonship has already been mentioned in ver. 14. It seems more natural, then, to take this expression in the confirmatory verse in its literal sense, adoption, as implying the method of their becoming sons; the more so, as an appeal is made to the experience of the readers, which experience would revert to the time when they passed out of one state into the other.—R.]

Wherein we cry (1 Cor. ii. 3) [ἐν ᾧ κράζομεν]. The E. V., whereby, is not exact. Hodge: "which enables us to address God as our Father." Such an instrumental sense of the preposition is very doubtful. The first person is here used, probably from the deep feeling of fellowship which the thought awakens.—R.] The ἐν here designates the Spirit as the principle [element] of life, which has the full παύσησιν as its result (Heb. x. 19-23). Κράζω, loud praying; the voluntary, childlike exclamation. "Chrysostom raises the doubt, that, even in the Old Testament, God is called the Father of Israel; and he replies to it, by saying that the Jews did not use this term in their prayers; or, if they did, it was only ἐξ οὐκίας διανοίας, and not ἀπο πνευματικῆς ἐνέργειας κοινοῦ. Yet God certainly has the name of Father in the Old Testament, only in the same incomplete sense as the people the name of son—namely, as founder and protector of the people (Jer. iii. 4, 19, and elsewhere), and always in reference to the community, and not to the relation of the individual;" Tholuck. In the Apocrypha, He is first addressed thus by individuals (Book of Wisdom xiv. 8; Sirach xxiii. 1; li. 14). But we must not overlook the fact that, even in the Old Testament, the centre of the filial relation is the Messiah (2 Sam. vii.; Ps. ii.; Isa. ix.); and that, consequently, from the perfect New Testament centre of the relation of the Father to Christ, all παιδοποιία extends.

Abba, Father. Ἀββὰ [אבא], the Syriac name for father (Gal. iv. 6; Mark xiv. 36). Why is the πατήρ added? Explanations:

1. The usual view (Rückert, Reiche, Köllner, &c.) is, the πατήρ helps to explain the Syriac Abba. So Hodge: "Paul chose to call God his Father, in his own familiar tongue. Having used the one word, however, the Greek, of course, became necessary for those to whom he was writing." But Paul does not always deem it necessary thus to translate (comp. 1 Cor. xvi. 22); and in the three cases where this phrase occurs, the usual mark of interpretation τοῦτ' ἔστι is wanting.—R.]

2. The repetition of the name is an expression of childlike fondness (Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Grotius [Alford]).

3. An expression of God's fatherhood for Jews and Gentiles (Augustine, Anselm, Calvin, Estius, and others).

4. The name "Abba" has passed from Jewish into Christian prayer, and has received, through Christ himself, the consecration of a special sanctity. Therefore the Greek-speaking Christians retained the word as a proper noun, and added thereto the πατήρ as an appellative, so that the Abba, Father, remained in force; Meyer. [So De Wette, Philippi, Lightfoot; comp. Lange's Comm. Galatians, p. 98.—R.] This would be, in reality, a duplication arising from a misconception. Tholuck unites with Luther, in favor of Chrysostom's view. Luther: "It is the calling to, just as a young child licks to its father in simple, childlike confidence." If it be necessary to refer to the passage in Mark, the πατήρ there undoubtedly serves as an explanation. It is without any admixture of misconception that a liturgical use (as Hallelujah, Hosanna, Amen) has been made of this passage, because, in the most significant manner, there is in one salutation an invocation of the Father of Christ and the Father of Christians, the Father of the believers of the Old Testament and the New, the Father of Jews and Gentiles, and thus of the Father of all believers in all nations.

Ver. 16. The Spirit itself (αὐτὸ τὸ πνεῦμα). The parallel passage, Gal. iv. 6, is conclusive in favor of a reference to the Holy Spirit, even if the context did not demand it.—R.] Αὐτό. Not the same (Erasmus, Luther), but the Spirit itself (Vulgate: ipse spiritus; Beza: ipse ille spiritus). We cry in the spirit, and the Spirit itself beareth us witness.

Beareth witness with [or to] our spirit [συνμαρτυρεῖ τῷ πνεύματι ἡμῶν]. It may be asked whether συνμαρτυρεῖ is to be taken in the sense of the strengthened, uncompounded word: He bears witness to our spirit, as the Vulgate, Luther, Grotius, Koppe, De Wette [Alford], and many other expositors hold; or, whether it should read: He bears witness with our self-consciousness: I am God's child. Meyer holds this opinion, insisting upon the συν here, as everywhere (chap. ii. 15; ix. 1). But the latter view would give rise to the question, To whom do both bear witness? And thus there would follow the conclusion: even self-consciousness bears witness to self-consciousness.* This view is hardly tenable. Chrysostom distinguishes as the two witnesses, the Holy Spirit and the grace given to us; and Hervæus, Calvin, Tholuck, and others, take the same position. Pareus even applies the legal maxim, "out of the mouth of two witnesses." "According to this old Protestant interpretation, the witness of our own spirit consists in the communication of the declaration of Divine pardon to the believing subject; but the witness of the Holy Spirit is regarded as a twofold one. On the one hand, it consists in the general witness by the Scriptures and the sacraments, and then in the applicatio and obsignatio produced by the Holy Spirit, while the declarations of the obsignatio fidelium are applied here."

Yet it seems clear from the antithesis, the Holy Spirit and our spirit, that the Holy Spirit should be regarded as the testifying part, but that our spirit, on the other hand, should be regarded as the part which is testified to. For the witness of our spirit has, as a special witness, no value beside that of the Holy Spirit (see Tholuck, p. 416, 417). And yet the question ever arises, To whom is the witness made? We hold that the expression συναντιλαμβάνεται (ver. 26) is an illustrative parallel, and must give importance to the consideration that there the explanatory word ὑπερενταύχαι is added. But we thereby approach nearer the explanation, that the συν in both cases has the meaning of a strengthened simple word. But it yet remains for us to conclude concerning a twofold function of the same Holy Spirit in the life of the soul. He operates in the filial life of the soul of believers as an impulse to prayer, but He also operates as the sealing witness of adoption. And thus He hastens in advance of our consciousness of faith with groanings which cannot be uttered (ver. 26). The σιν, though it be not a mere simple prefix, does not always signify the equality of two different parts in one function. Sometimes it denotes the effect (συναγω, συναθροίσω), and sometimes the conjoint conclusion of the act specified in the verb with a kindred fact (συνίημι). This is the case here.

* [Dr. Lange does not seem to determine definitely in favor of either view. But his objection here is based on the assumption that our spirit is = self-consciousness. Is there not in Christians, during this time of witness-bearing, such a division still remaining, as to justify the interpretation which accepts a twofold witness? The witness is to the man as self-conscious, needing such testimony and borne both by the Holy Spirit, and the renewed nature, over against the remaining sinful nature. With our view of ver. 15, it is necessary that a new witness of this kind be introduced here. Philippi accepts the twofold witnessing here, claiming, however, that the other sense is possible only in case the reference in ver. 15 be to a filial spirit only.—R.]

It is important that the earlier theologians regarded this passage as a proof of the certitudo gratiæ, in opposition to the Catholic doctrine. Meyer very properly refers to the fact, that it is a witness against all pantheistic confusion of the Divine Spirit with that of man. It testifies to the living unity of both.* Melancthon correctly observes against fanatics, that "the efficacy of the Spirit enters into the believer præluente voce evangelii."

[That we are children of God, ὅτι ἱσμεν τέκνα θεοῦ. The purport of the testimony. Alford: "not vidi, because the testimony respects the very ground and central point of sonship, like-ness to and desire for God."—R.] The word τέκνα emphasizes the heartiness of the filial feeling.

Ver. 17. And if children, also heirs [εἰ δὲ τέκνα, καὶ κληρονόμοι]. We must supply ἱσμεν both times. The being heirs arises from the very idea and right of a child (Gal. iv. 7).†

Heirs of God [κληρονόμοι μὲν θεοῦ]. The inheritance is the kingdom of glory. God, as the eternally living One, is like the earthly testator, in that He gives His children every thing for an inheritance; but He gives them himself as the treasure of all treasures. He will be their inheritance, as they are to be His inheritance—a relation prefigured already in the Old Testament (Exod. xix. 5: Israel the peculiar treasure of God. Num. xviii. 20: Jehovah is the inheritance of the Levites, as they are His inheritance, clerus). As He himself will be all in all, so shall His children receive with Him, in His Son, every thing for an inheritance (1 Cor. iii. 21 ff.). In Luke xv. 12 the inheritance, in another sense, is spoken of. [Including in this the highest idea of eternal life, the declaration of the Apostle (ver. 18): ye shall live, is abundantly proven.—R.]

And joint-heirs with Christ [συνκληρονόμοι δὲ Χριστοῦ]. Conformably to the νόθια, the νόιοι are in the most intimate fellowship with the νόοι, to which the common inheritance corresponds; Gal. iv. 7. The second designation characterizes the Divine inheritance of believers in its majesty, its infinite extent, and its nature, as the kingdom of perfect love in the glorified world. The view urged by Fritzsche, Meyer, and Tholuck, that here Paul does not have in mind the Hebrew, but the Roman right of inheritance (with reference to adopted children), Philippi correctly terms "an untheocratic reference to the Roman right of inheritance."‡

If so be that we suffer with him [εἰπερ συμπάσχομεν. On the particle, see ver. 2. Here, as there, it implies a slight admonition, since it introduces a condition sine quâ non. The order, not the reason, of obtaining full salvation, is set forth (Calvin).—R.] Suffer with Christ—for Him, His gospel, His witness (1 Peter iv. 13; 2 Cor. v. 5; Phil. iii. 10; Col. i. 24; * 2 Tim. ii. 11). Suffering with Christ has the promise of being glorified with Him. Meyer says, strangely, that "Olshausen (comp. also Philippi) intermixes something totally wrong: 'Share in the conflict with sin in ourselves and in the world.'" Just this is the very nerve of the suffering with Christ.

[That we may be also glorified with him, ἵνα καὶ σὺνδοξασθῶμεν.] As Meyer properly says, against Tholuck, the ἵνα is not dependent on "joint-heirs," but on "suffer with Him." [This view is now given up by Tholuck, who correctly adds, however: "That does not describe the subjective, but the objective, divine design. (So Alford).—R.] On the relations of the right of inheritance in Rome, and other nations, see Tholuck, p. 419 [and the note on "joint-heirs"]. We must here hold to this much, at least, of the idea of adoption: that the joint-heirs with Christ become heirs of God through Christ, in and with Him as the truly Universal Heir.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The correct understanding of this eighth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans depends essentially on the following conditions: (1.) It must be regarded in connection with the whole section beginning with chap. v. 12; (2.) The antithesis in this chapter must be perceived. The fundamental thought is indicated in the superscriptions: Sin and the life of Christ, as opposite principles of life in the world. The foundation is given in chap. v. 12–21. The abrogation of the old principle in its two fundamental forms: Service of sin, service of the law; chap. vi. 1 to vii. 6. The transition from the old to the new nature; the inwardness of the law; chap. vii. 7–25. With chap. viii. there appears the new life of believers in Christ, and of Christ in believers. This new life itself constitutes again an antithesis. It is: a. An exclusively spiritual standpoint, in opposition to the flesh, and contemplates the extirpation of the old, sinful motions; b. A standpoint of renewal—whose object is the resurrection and the glorification of the world—proceeding from the Spirit, and embracing the flesh, and the whole created world.

2. The Spirit of Christ's life being communicated to believers, it becomes to them a law of the Spirit for the new life. The law of the Spirit is a potency which extends further than the spirit of the law; much less is it a nova lex in the sense of the Catho-

* [On the witness of the Spirit, see Doctr. Note 12, and the works referred to in the list of Homiletical Literature on this section.—R.]

† [In Galatians, polemic necessity occasions a fuller and somewhat modified statement of this idea; see Lange's Comm. in loco.—R.]

‡ [The Jewish law gave a double portion to the eldest son; the Roman law made all children (adopted ones also) equal. (So the Attic law.) The point of this controversy about the reference to Jewish or Roman law of inheritance, is, that the former presents believers as heirs, sharing through the grace of Christ, the chief Heir, the latter, in virtue of their sonship. Philippi calls the latter "profane, far-fetched, incongruous." Meyer and Tholuck think it appropriate in an Epistle to the Romans, and say that the only legal basis for the illustration is the Roman law. On the other hand, the genitive Χριστοῦ, where the dative might properly be used, may be urged in favor of the other view. In any case, the right of the adopted children is through the mediation of Christ. The context points to fellowship with him, so that heirship in him is an appropriate thought. Schmoller (Galatians, p. 98) deems the whole controversy pedantic.—R.]

lie dogmatics. Life in the entire spiritual view and experience of Christ's life constitutes a universal principle of life, which becomes the rule for every more general relation of life, and an ἐντολή of the living Divine will for every individual situation.

8. On ver. 3, see the Exeg. Notes. It is totally foreign to the context to give this passage a special application to the propitiation for the guilt of sin (for the discussions on the subject, see Tholuck). [Those who thus do, are careful to defend their position against antinomianism; but, practically, the danger from a too exclusive application of all possible passages to justification, lies in another direction, viz., that of legal efforts after holiness. The connection between pardon and holiness is thus obscured; the believer fails to see Christ as his life-giving Saviour; the law is again sought; "the spirit of bondage" returns, and the conflict of chap. vii. 14-25 is all too common. Whatever may be the logical and theological antithesis, the Christian pastor finds this to be the practical effect.—R.]—It is likewise a disregard of the definite expression to overlook the real meaning of the ὁμοίωμα. Because Christ appeared in the truth and reality of the σάρξ, He also appeared, according to the universal human view, in the likeness of sinful flesh. The Apostle expresses exactly the same thought in the words, ἐν ὁμοιωματι ἀνθρώπων γενόμενος; Phil. ii. 7. The reality of His human nature resulted in the likeness of His appearance and suffering life to the picture presented by the life of men. Baur's spiritualistically gross misconception of this declaration (Phil. ii.) makes a sort of Gnosticism out of it; the realistic obscuration of the term, on the other hand, allows Christ himself to have assumed sinful flesh. The simple thought is too grand for both these stunting and mutilating tendencies. God has unmasked and judged sin in the flesh, and condemned it to be cast out as a foreign element, a ruinous pseudo-plasma in the flesh, by Christ's assuming a pure and consecrated σάρξ, and by His keeping His white robe spotless on the whole filthy road of His pilgrimage, and maintaining its holiness until it was illuminated in glorified splendor. Thus the question, whether Christ assumed human nature in its paradisiacal state before the fall, or the fallen nature of Adam, is a thoroughly incorrect one, for it rests on a misconception of biblical facts. Christ assumed neither the unfallen nor the fallen human nature, but the nature raised from the fall and made holy. See the Bible-Work on John i. 14.

4. On the connection of the doctrine of the obediencia activa to ver. 3, see Tholuck, p. 395.

5. On ver. 4. The righteousness of Christ should be realized also in believers, from the principle of the righteousness of faith to the righteousness of life. See the Exeg. Notes.

6. The antithesis, walking in the flesh and walking in the Spirit, separates into these elements: a. Being or living in the flesh; being or living in the Spirit; b. The seeking of the flesh as enmity against God; the seeking of the Spirit as enlivened and impelled by the Spirit of God; c. The end—on one side, death; on the other, life and peace.

7. Those who live in the flesh cannot please God. Those imagine that they please God who, following the letter of the law, lead an analytically divided, out, and fragmentary life, or a false life in outward observances. But God is one; His Spirit is one; His law, as the principle of life, is one; and salvation lies in the dynamical synthesis of life from a shedding abroad of the Spirit. See Mark xii 32 ff.

8. The real, fundamental thought of this section appears in ver. 10. See the Exeg. Notes. The body is dead by the necessarily positive standpoint of Christian life in the Spirit, and it is dead in its propensity to sin and death, in order that it may be raised from its state to a new life, and inherit the resurrection (1 Cor. ix. 27; 2 Cor. iv. 14; Eph. ii 5; Col. ii. 12; Phil. iii. 11). Also John vi., and the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, belong here. The effecting of the future resurrection by the renewal of the inner life, is questioned by Meyer, against De Wette and Philippi, for he does not place a correct estimate on the real relations of the kingdom of God (p. 246). On pneumatic corporeity, see Tholuck, pp. 485, 486.

9. On ver. 18. By the Spirit, and not by the scourge [mit dem Geist, nicht mit der Geißel], should the deeds of the body be mortified. See the Exeg. Notes.

10. On the difference between the symbolical and real children of God, see the Exeg. Notes on ver. 14. On υἱοὶ θεοῦ, see Tholuck, p. 409.—That the υἱοθεσία, in the Apostle's sense, can be adoption only in form and mode, and not in its essence and substance, arises from the fact that believers, as the children of God, have the Spirit of God and of Christ; that they pray in filial confidence; and that they are destined to be heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ. [In interpreting the phrase, "sons of God," two errors must be guarded against: (a.) limiting it to something like this: the objects of God's favor; (b.) extending it so as to obliterate any real distinction between the Son and the adopted children. The latter may occur, either through a denial of the specific and eternal Sonship of Christ, or through some too spiritualistic view of the work of Redemption, which makes the children of God in essence and substance children. Pantheistic fancies follow the same tendency. Between these two lies the true definition. A Christian, as a son of God, is new-born of the Spirit of God; hence, has a likeness to God in character, is the object of God's special love, and entitled to special privilege and dignity. Yet even this is not all. The term is not merely figurative, as this passage shows, save as all language about our relations to God is figurative. The relation is real—grounded on, yet differing from, the relation of the Eternal Son. Only those in Him are "sons." They are "sons" in such a sense as to become partakers of the Divine nature (1 Peter i. 28). A further definition is now impossible. "Now are we sons of God; but it doth not yet appear what we shall be" (1 John iii. 8). The fact remains established; the manifestation of its full significance is to come; ver. 19.—R.]

11. The dogmatic spirit of the Middle Ages made of Christianity a religion πάντα ἐκ φόβου. Rome in particular did this, in spite of these words to the Romans, in ver. 15. Even the Old Testament and its law aimed at a higher fear of God, as the beginning of wisdom. See Ps. i. and Ps. xix. on communion with the law of God.

12. On the υἱοθεσία, and its origin in the Old Testament, see the Exeg. Notes.

13. In relation to adoption, the Spirit is our witness; in relation to future glory, it is our pledge. [On the witness of the Spirit. This consists in the gracious fruits and effects wrought in us by the Holy Spirit. His whole inward and outward efficacy must be taken together; for instance, His comfort, His incitement to prayer, His censure of sin, His impulse to works of love, to witness before the world," &c. (Olshausen). Yet filial feelings of those happy moments when we are conscious that we live by the Spirit, love God and goodness, desire and delight in pleasing God, must not be excluded; since, whether the witness be to or with our spirits, such results may be expected. Because enthusiasm has pushed this matter to an extreme at times, the assurance of salvation is not to be deemed unattainable, nor filial emotions toward God checked by the sneer about fanaticism. "That the world deny any such testimony in the hearts of believers, and that they look on it with scorn and treat it with derision, proves only that they are unacquainted with it; not that it is an illusion. It was a sensible and true remark of the French philosopher Hemsterhuys, in regard to certain sensations which he was discussing: 'Those who are so unhappy as never to have had such sensations, either through weakness of the natural organ, or because they have never cultivated them, will not comprehend me.'" (Stuart).—R.] The conclusion, "and if children, then heirs," connects this section with the following.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Why do we, as those who are in Christ Jesus, have no more fear of condemnation? 1. Because the law of the Spirit of Christ has made us free from the law (that is, the power) of sin and death; 2. This has been effected by the act of God in condemning sin in the flesh.—Contrast between the law of the Spirit of Christ and the law of sin: 1. The former brings life; 2. The latter, death (ver. 2).—The appearance of the Son of God in the form (likeness) of sinful flesh: 1. In its meaning; 2. In its effects (vers. 3, 4).—The sending of God's Son an act of God (ver. 3).—He who becomes united with Christ ever more fully performs the righteousness required by the law (ver. 4).—Why is carnal-mindedness death? Because: 1. It is enmity against God; and, 2. As such, it is disobedience to God's law (vers. 5-7).—All who have Christ's Spirit are not carnal, but spiritual. This is shown thus: 1. Christ's Spirit reigns in their spirit; and therefore, 2. Their spirit reigns in their body (vers. 9-11).—"If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His." This declaration is: 1. Perfectly true; but, 2. Fearful in its truth (ver. 9).—A question of conscience in two forms: 1. Have we Christ's Spirit? 2. Are we His? (ver. 9).—The Spirit of God as pledge of our resurrection from the dead (ver. 11).—The preparation of our bodies for the day of resurrection by the Spirit of God (ver. 11).—The glorification of physical life by God's Spirit (ver. 11).—The opposition between carnal and spiritual-mindedness one of death and life: 1. Demonstration (vers. 5-8); 2. Reference to the members of the Christian communion (vers. 9-11); 3. Inference for their moral life (vers. 11-13).—If we allow ourselves to be led by the Spirit of God, we are God's children, heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ. Reasons: 1. Because this spirit is not slavish, but filial; 2. Because He bears witness with us that we are children of God; 3. Because we are assured by Him of eternal glory (vers. 14-17).—The leading power of the Spirit of God (ver. 14).—The difference between Divine adoption in the Old Testament and the New

(ver. 15).—The Spirit of God a spirit of prayer (ver. 16).—The Abba-Father cry of believing Christian souls: 1. So filially humble; 2. So filially joyous (ver. 15).—The inward witness of the Spirit: 1. Who bears this witness? 2. To whom is it borne? 3. What is its import? (ver. 16).—How rich the children of God are! They are: 1. Heirs of God; 2. Joint-heirs with Christ (ver. 17).—Let us suffer with Christ, in order that we may be raised to glory with Him.

LUTHER: Although sin still rages in the flesh, we are not condemned, if the spirit is righteous, and fights against it. But where there is not this spirit, the law is weakened and overpowered by the flesh; so that it is impossible for the law to help man, except to sin and death. Therefore God sent His own Son, and placed upon Him our sins, and thus helped us to fulfil the law by His Spirit (vers. 1-4).

STARKE: Sin and death are connected together; who will separate them? Therefore, if you would escape death, you must flee from sin; James i. 15; Sirach xxi. 2, 3 (ver. 2).—Is sin sweet to thee, O man? Then remember that its fruit will be bitter (ver. 2).—HEDINGER: It is a false trust, to wish to be righteous in Christ, and, at the same time, to desire to walk after the flesh. Where sin reigns, there is condemnation, though Christ had died a thousand times. The flesh must die on the cross with Him, and His Spirit must live in the sinner; otherwise the salvation purchased by Christ will be of no use; 1 Peter ii. 24 (ver. 1).—STARKE: Adam (merely) out of us does not injure us; and Christ (merely) out of us does not help us (ver. 10).—People of the world seek immortality in wrong ways. Seek the right way, which is, to let God's Spirit dwell in you; Isa. lv. 2 (ver. 11).—It is better that we kill sin, than that sin kill us (ver. 13).—Nihil vilius, quam a carne vinci, nihil gloriosius, quam carnem vincere; JEROME.—Qui sequuntur carnem, flagellentur in carne: in ipsa est censura supplicii, in qua fuit causa peccati; BERNARD (ver. 12).—STARKE: One may speak of God without the Holy Spirit; but he cannot speak to Him in a way that the prayer will be granted (ver. 16).—If little children can move their parents' hearts by "papa" and "mamma," so can believers move God by the word "Abba" (ver. 15).—HEDINGER: To suffer, and to inherit, stand together. Very well! Heaven is worth a toilsome pathway. Si vis regnare tecum, porta crucem meam tecum; GERSON.

SPENER: God sent His Son to assume flesh; for the Word became flesh, not merely outwardly, but truly and in very deed. But such flesh in Him was not sinful; but it was only in the form of, or uniformity with, sinful flesh, so that he who saw it only outwardly might regard it just as sinful flesh as ours (vers. 3, 4).—Christianity enjoins not only that we do good, and thus perform spiritual works, but that we should also be spiritually, and not carnally, minded (ver. 5).—The witness of the Holy Spirit is as glorious as it is necessary. . . This witness is the foundation of the highest consolation of the child of God. Yet but little can be told of it, for no man can understand it except him who feels it. It is "a new name," which nobody knows except him who receives it; Rev. ii. 17 (ver. 16). It is a great dignity, indeed, to be heirs of God, and to stand with Christ as though in the possession of equal rights. For it is the inheritance of the Almighty God, and therefore consists of eternal possessions. Yet such an inheritance has the certain condition of having previously suffered with Christ (ver. 17).

Roos: Being in Christ Jesus presupposes longing for Christ Jesus; fleeing to Him; submission to Him; being planted in Him as the Vine; union with Him; and, consequently, faith in Him; just as even the continued being, or remaining, in Christ Jesus, rests upon a continuous faith in Him (vers. 1-4).—The man who is in Christ Jesus does not walk any more after the flesh; and thus the righteousness, or righteous requirement, of the law, which is spiritual, is fulfilled in him; it is so far fulfilled as his spiritual life and walk in the Spirit extend (ver. 4).—In short, just as the Spirit comprises spiritual-mindedness, and walking after the Spirit comprises every thing which is good, praiseworthy, holy, and well-pleasing to God; so do the words flesh, carnal-mindedness, and walking after the flesh, comprise every thing wicked and sinful (vers. 6-8).—Suffering does not precede glory by mere accident; it does so by God's design, and makes fit for great glory. It is only a nature crushed by suffering that can be glorified. But the suffering must be: 1. A suffering with Christ; 2. In fellowship with Christ; 3. In the likeness of the suffering and mind of Christ. Then will we be also raised to glory with Christ, in whom we are by faith (ver. 17).—Bengel: The carnal mind cannot, and may not. Hence comes the pretext of impossibility with which those seek to excuse themselves who are even here convicted as carnal (ver. 7).

Gerlach: What seems remote and difficult to man under the law, is made easy by grace; indeed, is even accomplished by grace (vers. 2, 3).—Both flesh and spirit are mighty and active forces in man (ver. 5).—"The Spirit should be as much the Lord of our life, as the helmsman is guide of the ship, and the driver is guide of his team;" Chrysostom (ver. 14).—The Spirit of adoption is the Spirit of the Son of God. In Him we cry, Abba, dear Father! He encourages us to call, with childlike joy and confidence, upon God, whom Christ thus called on (Mark xiv. 26); and whom Christ, after the atonement was completed (John xx. 17), calls His God and ours, His Father and ours (ver. 15).—The witness of the Spirit of God consists in the consciousness of peace with God, and of access to Him in childlike, believing prayer; which witness we have received through faith in Christ (ver. 16).—The believer enters upon the inheritance of God as "joint-heir with Christ;" but it is not a dividing joint-heirship, by which one receives what another is deprived of. It is a possession like that of the sunlight, which every one enjoys to the full, without any robbery of another (ver. 17).—The life of the Christian is really a life of suffering, both inwardly and outwardly, except that the consciousness of Divine adoption rises high above suffering and oppression (ver. 17).

Lisco: The certainty of the attainment of perfect salvation by believers, rests upon their fellowship with Christ, and upon their being and living in Him; and it is from this true fountain that their ever-progressive sanctification flows (ver. 1).—What prospects, what hopes! Yet the order is, that we, like Christ, shall attain future glory through suffering.—Luther: "He who would be Christ's brother and joint-heir, must bear in mind to be also a joint-martyr and joint-sufferer; not feeling Christ's sufferings and shame after Him, but with Him, as vers. 10, 32, 33, declare" (ver. 17).

Heubner: The guiltlessness of true Christians

(ver. 2).—We must preach duties so conformably to the gospel, that they will be a pleasure (ver. 3).—Faith in Christ gives no aid to indolence. The design of the atonement is our sanctification (ver. 4).—The carnal mind and religion do not agree together (ver. 7).—Christ's Spirit is the true Spirit: men out of Him are spiritless, however full of the Spirit such unchristian people may fancy themselves (ver. 9).—Life after the flesh destroys all Christian prosperity, spiritual enjoyment, vital force, and eternal salvation (ver. 18).—The Spirit can overpower the flesh; therefore no Christian can say, that the power of the flesh is too great, too insurmountable (ver. 18).—The guidance of the Spirit of God is: 1. Not irregular, but regular, and its traces are to be found rather within than without; 2. Nor a sudden impulse, an emotion; but a continuous guidance, extending through the whole life, and operating in all acts; 3. And finally, this guidance is effected by means of the Word; it is free, and without compulsion (ver. 14).—The Abba-cry is an uninterrupted thinking upon God, and longing after Him.—No cross, no crown.—Besser: The impulsive power of the Holy Spirit is twofold: He leads us to receive in faith, and give in love.—The glorification of Christians begins with Christ under the cross.

The Pericope (vers. 12-17) for the 8th Sunday after Trinity.—Heubner: The adoption of Christians with God: 1. It is holy; 2. It is saving.—The difference between the children of the world and the children of God.—Genzler: Those whom the Spirit of God leads, are God's children. The Apostle praises: 1. The filial mind; 2. The filial joyfulness; and, 3. The filial hope of those who allow themselves to be led by the Spirit of God.—Petri: The children of God: 1. Their nature; 2. condition; 3. and inheritance.—Harless: The poverty and wealth of the legacy of Jesus Christ.—Tholuck: The witness of Divine adoption is the surest pledge of eternal life. 1. In what is the witness of Divine adoption manifested? 2. Why is it a pledge of eternal life?—Kapff: The healing of sinful corruption by Jesus and His Spirit. Through Him we become: 1. Children of God; 2. Praying men of the Spirit; and, 3. Joint-heirs with Christ.

[Burkitt (condensed): All men show the true temper of their minds, and the complexion and disposition of their souls, by willingly, cheerfully, and constantly minding either the things of the Spirit or the things of the flesh.—Three things are implied in our being glorified with Christ: 1. Conformity—we shall be like Him in glory; 2. Concomitancy—we shall accompany Him, and be present with Him in glory; 3. Conveyance or derivation—His glory shall be reflected upon us, and we shall shine in His beams.—Henry: It was great condescension, that He who was God should be made in the likeness of flesh; but much greater, that He who was holy, should be made in the likeness of sinful flesh.—The Spirit witnesses the privileges of children to none who have not the nature and privileges of children.—Doddridge: The Spirit of God will not dwell with those whom He does not effectually govern.—MacKnight: The minding of the things of the flesh, to the neglecting of the things of the Spirit, disqualifying men for heaven, stands in direct opposition to God's friendly intentions; consequently, is enmity against God, and is deservedly punished with death.—Wesley (sermons on the Witness of the Spirit): The witness of the Spirit is a consciousness of our having received, in and by the Spirit of adoption the tempers mentioned in the Word of God as belonging to His adopted children—a loving heart toward God, and toward all mankind; hanging with childlike confidence on God our Father; desiring nothing but Him; casting all our care upon Him; and embracing every child of man with earnest, tender affection, so as to be ready to lay down our life for our brother, as Christ laid down His life for us. It is a consciousness that we are inwardly conformed, by the Spirit of God, to the image of His Son, and that we walk before Him in justice, mercy, and truth, doing the things which are pleasing in His sight.—CLARKE: Ver. 15. The witness of the Spirit is the grand and most observable case in which intercourse is kept up between heaven and earth; and the genuine believer in Christ Jesus is not left to the quibbles or casuistry of polemic divines or critics, but receives the thing and the testimony of it from God himself. Remove the testimony of adoption from Christianity, and it is a dead letter.—HODGE: There can be no rational or scriptural hope without holiness; and every tendency to separate the evidence of the Divine favor from the evidence of true piety, is antichristian and destructive.—BARNES: If a man is not influenced by the meek, pure, and holy spirit of the Lord Jesus; if he is not conformed to His image; if his life does not resemble that of the Saviour, he is a stranger to religion. No test could be more easily applied, and none is more decisive.

II. Life in the Spirit in connection with nature as the Resurrection-life, and the Spirit as security of glory.

CHAPTER VIII. 18-39.

A. The present and subjective certainty of future glory, or the glorification of the body and of nature by the Spirit (vers. 18-27).

18 For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared [insignificant in comparison] with the glory which shall be revealed in us [eis hmas].¹ For the earnest [patient] expectation of the creature [creation]² waiteth [is waiting] for the manifestation [revelation] of the sons of God. 20 For the creature [creation] was made subject³ to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same [who subjected it.]⁴ in hope; [.]⁵ 21 Because [That] the creature [creation] itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty [freedom of the glory] of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth [together] 22 and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they [so],⁶ but [but even we] ourselves also [omni also], which [though we] have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves⁷ groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption,⁸ 24 to wit, [omni to wit,] the redemption of our body. For we are [were] saved by [in]⁹ hope: but [now] hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, 25 why doth he yet [still]¹⁰ hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then 26 do we with patience wait for it [with patience we wait for it]. Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities [weakness]:¹¹ for we know not what we should pray for¹² as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession [intercedeth] for us [omni for us]¹³ with groanings which cannot be uttered. And [But] he that [who] searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he maketh intercession [pleadeth] for the saints according to the will of God.

B. The future and objective certainty of glory (vers. 28-37).

28 And we know that all things¹⁴ work together for good to them that [those who] love God, to them [those] who are the called according to his purpose. 29 For whom he did foreknow [foreknew], he also did predestinate [predestinated] to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among 30 many brethren. Moreover, whom he did predestinate [predestinated], them he also called: and whom he called, them he also justified: and whom he justified 31 them he also glorified. What shall we then [What then shall we] say to these 32 things? If God be [is] for us, who can be [is] against us? He that [Who] spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with

TEXTUAL.

Ver. 18.—(It is difficult to render εἰς ἡμᾶς literally. In us (E. V.) implies that we are the subjects of the revelation, and this is the main thought. Alford renders: with regard to us; Lange: auf und an uns.

² Ver. 20.—(Lange renders ὑποτάσσας, underwarf sich, adopting the middle sense; but as this sense is doubtful, the English text has not been altered.

³ Ver. 20.—(In hope is not to be joined with what immediately precedes, hence a comma must be inserted. Griesbach and Knapp make οὐκ . . . ὑποτάσσας parenthetical, but without sufficient reason. Amer. Bible Union also makes a parenthetical clause: but by reason of him who made it subject; yet this only seems to add confusion. See the next note.

⁴ Ver. 20.—(Lange puts a full stop after hope. Meyer, and many others, a comma, connecting the next verse: that the creation, &c. (the purport of the hope). Forbes gives the parallelism thus:

19. a. Ἡ γὰρ ἀποκατάστασις τῆς κτίσεως
 b. τῆς ἀποκατάστασις τῶν υἱῶν τοῦ θεοῦ ἀπεδέχεται.

20. τῇ γὰρ παρατάξει ἡ κτίσις ὑποτάσσεται, οὐκ ἰκονοῦσα ἀλλὰ διὰ τὸν ὑποτάσσοντα.

21. a. ἐν ἰσχύϊ ἐστὶ καὶ αὐτὴ ἡ κτίσις ἀλυτρωτέστατος ἀπὸ τῆς δουλείας τῆς φθορᾶς
 b. εἰς τὴν ἀλυτρωσίαν τῆς δόξης τῶν τέκνων τοῦ θεοῦ.

19. a. For the earnest expectation of the creation
 b. is waiting for the revelation of the sons of God,

20. For the creation was made subject to vanity,
 Not willingly, but by reason of Him who subjected it,

21. a. In hope, that the creature itself shall also be delivered from the bondage of corruption,
 b. Into the liberty of the glory of the children of God.

This makes the whole of ver. 20, except in hope, parenthetical, and connects ver. 21 with that phrase, as giving the purport of the hope. On this last view, Forbes does not insist, however. In hope is thus made to refer to both lines of the parenthesis, yet with a main reference to ἀπεδέχεται, is waiting. The two lines of ver. 19 find their parallels in ver. 21, while a. a. refer to the expectation or hope that animates creation; b. b. to the final consummation to which it points. At the beginning of ver. 21, Lange reads denn, Alford, because, but Tholuck, Philippi, Meyer, Amer. Bible Union, Noyes, five Anglican clergymen, &c., favor that, introducing the purport of the hope.

⁶ Ver. 23.—(There is considerable variation in the text here, not affecting the sense, however. B. reads καὶ αὐτοὶ τῶν ἀπαρχῶν τοῦ πνεύματος ἔχοντες καὶ αὐτοὶ; adopted by Tischendorf, Meyer, Lange, Tregelles. The Rec. inserts ante after the second καὶ; K. A. C., Lachmann, Alford before it, so Tregelles, in brackets; while D. F. G., Fritzsche insert the same after the first καὶ. The original reading was probably that of B.; αὐτοὶ being inserted as an explanatory gloss, hence the variation in position (Meyer). As καὶ αὐτοὶ is repeated, it is better to render even we ourselves in both cases.

⁸ Ver. 24.—(The dative τῇ ἰσχύϊ, is not instrumental. Now is the better rendering of the logical ἐν, which follows.

⁹ Ver. 24.—(K. A. C. K. L., read τί καὶ (Rec., Meyer, Wordsworth, Lange); B. D. F. omit καὶ (Lachmann, Alford, Tregelles). The latter reading gives the sense: Why doth he hope (at all)? the former, which is preferable Why doth he still hope for? καὶ = etiam.

¹⁰ Ver. 28.—(Instead of ταῖς ἀσθενείαις (Rec., K. L.), which was probably a marginal gloss, K. A. B. C. D. want curiales, versiones, and fathers, read τῇ ἀσθενείᾳ; adopted by most editors.

¹³ Ver. 28.—[Ἰσὺν ἡμῶν (Rec. N. C. K. L.) is omitted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Wordsworth, Lange, Tregelles, on the authority of N. A. B. D. F. G. Probably added for closer definition.]

¹⁶ Ver. 34.—[After Χριστός, κ. α. c. f. l. insert Ἰησοῦς (adopted by Lange). It is omitted in B. D. K., by Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Tregelles, and most editors. Hence the rendering of Lange (bracketed in the text) is doubly doubtful: first, on account of the dubious reading; second, as a somewhat forced exegesis. See Exeg. Notes.]

²⁰ Ver. 39.—[Τις κτίσις cannot, of course, mean creation here.—E.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Summary.—The witness of Divine adoption, imparted by the Holy Spirit to believers, comprises at the same time, according to ver. 17, the security that they will be heirs of future glory. Then, too, the physical body—which, in their spiritual life in this world, they mistrust, because of its enervation through sin, which they must strictly control by walking in the Spirit, but in which, even here, according to ver. 11, a germ of its glorification into the psychico-physical existence is formed—shall be transformed into the glory of the Spirit; and all nature, at present made partaker of corruption, yet groaning and travailing to be spiritualized, shall share in the glory also, as the transformed, illuminated, and appropriated organ of the kingdom of spirits. Ver. 17 serves as a foundation for the section which now follows, as it terminates the previous section as a final inference.

A. The present and subjective certainty of future glory.

Believers, from their present and subjective sense of life, are certain of future glory; accordingly, all the sufferings of the present time are to them as birth-pangs for future glory. This holds good, first, in respect to the pressure toward development, and the longing and patient waiting of nature in its present state; and this pressure toward development corresponds with that of God's kingdom. It holds good, secondly, in regard to the birth-pangs of God's kingdom, as manifested, first, in the groanings, longings, and hopes of believers, and in the unutterable groanings of the Spirit, who intercedes for them. Although believers have the Spirit of adoption, it is because they have it that they still groan for its consummation (2 Cor. v. 1). Their principal salvation is not their finished salvation; but the latter is testified by their hope and confirmed by their patience. But the Spirit proves himself in their hearts by unutterable groanings, as a vital pressure, which harmonizes in this life with the sense of the future exercise of God's authority, and points to the future objective certainty of glory as founded in the will of God; vers. 18 (17)-27.

B. The future and objective certainty of glory.

The love for God by believers is the experience of God's love for them. But therein lies the security of an omnipotent power for its completion—a power which nothing can oppose, but to which every thing must serve. The certainty of the decisive κλήσις is the centre and climax of the life, from which the groundwork, as well as the future of life, is glorified. It points backward to God's purpose, and forward to its consummation. The periods between the pre-temporal, eternal purpose of God, and its future, eternal consummation, are the periods of the order of salvation (ver. 29). That this way of salvation leads through suffering to glory, according to the image of Christ's life, is secured by the omnipotent decision with which "God is for" (ver. 31) His children—a decision which is secured by the gift of Christ for them, by their justification, their reconciliation, redemption, and exaltation in Christ; in a word, by the love of Christ. This love leads them in triumph through all the temptations of the world, because it is the expression of Christ's own conquest of the world (vers. 28-37).

C. The unity of the subjective and objective certainty of future glory in the glorious life of love already attained.

Life in the love of Christ is exalted above all the powers of the world (vers. 38, 39).—Kindred sections: John xvii.; 1 Cor. xv., and others.

Tholuck: "This inheritance will far outweigh all suffering, and must be awaited with steadfast hope (vers. 18-27). But as far as we are concerned, we can suffer no more injury; the consciousness of God's love in Christ rests upon so impregnable a foundation, that nothing in the whole universe can separate 'him' from it" (vers. 28-39).—Meyer finds, in ver. 18-31, "grounds of encouragement for the συνπαράσχειν, ἵνα κ. σπύδοις. To wit: 1. The future glory will far outweigh the present suffering (vers. 18-25). 2. The Holy Spirit supports us (vers. 26, 27). 3. Everything must work together for good to them that love God" (vers. 28-31). Undoubtedly these things are grounds of encouragement; yet the Apostle evidently designs to encourage by a copious and conclusive didactic exposition of the certainty of the Christian's hope of future glory, in face of the great apparent contradictions of this hope—an exposition which, in itself, has great value.

[Alford (vers. 18-30): "The Apostle treats of the complete and glorious triumph of God's elect, through sufferings and by hope, and the blessed renovation of all things in and by their glorification." (Vers. 31-39): "The Christian has no rea son to fear, but all reason to hope; for nothing can separate him from God's love in Christ"—Hodge, making the theme of the chapter "the security of the believer," finds, in vers. 18-28, a proof of this "from the fact that they are sustained by hope, and aided by the Spirit, under all their trials; so that every thing eventually works together for their good." In vers. 29, 30, another proof "founded on the decree or purpose of God." In vers. 31-39, yet another, founded "on His infinite and unchanging love."—R.]

FIRST PARAGRAPH, VERS. 18-27.

Ver. 18. For I reckon, &c. [λογίζομαι γάρ, κ.τ.λ. Γάρ connects this verse with ver. 17, introducing a reason why the present sufferings should not discourage (De Wette, Philippi). Calvin: Negus vero molestum nobis debet, si ad celestem gloriam per varias afflictiones procederem est, quodquidem, &c. Stuart prefers to join it to "glorified with Him;" "we shall be glorified with Christ, for all the sufferings and sorrows of the present state are only temporary." The connection seems to be with the whole thought which precedes. The verb is thus expanded by Alford: "I myself am one who have embraced this course, being convinced that." It is used as in chap. iii. 28; see p. 136.—R.] Now by his view of the magnitude of future glory, as well as by his conviction of its certainty, he estimates the proportionate insignificance of the sufferings (certainly great when considered in themselves alone) of the present time, since they, as birth-throes, are the preliminary conditions of future glory.

Insignificant, οὐκ ἄξια, not of weight; a stronger expression for ἀνάξια. They are not synonymous.* The νῦν καιρός is the final, decisive time of development, with which the αἰών οὗτος will terminate.

In comparison with the glory which shall be revealed [πρὸς τὴν μέλλουσαν δόξαν ἀποκαλυφθῆναι. On πρὸς after οὐκ ἄξια, in the sense of in relation to, in comparison with, see Tholuck, Philippi in loc.—R.] Τὴν μέλλουσαν is antecedent, with emphasis. [To this Alford objects]. That glory is ever approaching, and therefore ever near at hand, though Paul does not regard its presence near in the sense of Meyer, and others. —In us [see Textual Note 1]. The εἰς ἡμᾶς does not mean, as the Vulgate and Beza have it, in nobis [so E. V.]; it is connected with the ἀποκαλυφθῆναι. If it is imparted through the inward life of believers and through nature, it nevertheless comes from the future and from above, as much as from within outwardly, and it is a Divine secret from eternity in time—therefore ἀποκαλύπτει.

Ver. 19. For the patient expectation [ἣ γὰρ ἀποκαραδοξία. On ἀποκαραδοξία, comp. Phil. i. 20. The verb καραδοξῶ means, literally, to expect with uplifted head; then, to expect. The noun, strengthened by ἀπό, refers to an expectation, which is constant and persistent until the time arrives. The idea of anxiety (Luther) is not prominent. (So Tholuck, Philippi, De Wette, Meyer.)

* On the controversy between the Protestant and Catholic theologians in regard to the meritum condigni, as connected with this passage, see Tholuck, p. 431. [Comp. Philippi on both meritum condigni and meritum congrui. Also Calvin. As Dr. Hodge remarks, the idea of merit "is altogether foreign to the context."—R.]

See below also. Tholuck remarks, that the strengthening of the attributive notion into a substantive makes a double prosopopeia, "not only the creature, but the expectation of the creature waits."—R.] The γάρ introduces the first proof of his statement from the course of the whole κρίσις. It may be asked, Shall the future glory be shown in its grandeur (Chrysostom [Hodge, Alford], and most expositors), its certainty (Fritzsche, Meyer), its nearness (Reiche), or its futurity (Philippi)? Tholuck, in its grandeur and certainty.* If both must combine in one idea, then it is the truth or the reality of the glory, as such. The elements of its grandeur, as of its certainty, are united in the fact that the developing pain of the external κρίσις, as of the inward life of believers—indeed, the groaning of the Divine spiritual life itself—labors for it and points toward it; that it will consist in the removal of all vanity and corruption in the whole natural sphere of mankind.

Of the creation, τῆς κτίσεως. The great question is, What is the κρίσις? Lexically, the word may mean the act of creation, as well as what is created, the creation; † but actually, the question here can only be the creation in the broader or more limited sense. Tholuck: "κρίσις in the passive sense can mean the same as κτίσμα, the single creature; ver. 39; Heb. iv. 13. Ἡ κτίσις, Book of Wisdom ii. 6; xvi. 24; Heb. ix. 11; or even ὅλη ἡ κτίσις, Book of Wisdom xix. 6; πάντα ἡ κτίσις, Judith xvi. 17, the created world. But in that case, as also with ὅλος ὁ κόσμος (John xii. 19), it is metonymically confined to the human world (Col. i. 23; Mark xvi. 15; and also with the Rabbis, כל בריאת, &c.), or to irrational nature, exempting man."

The explanations are divided into different groups:

1. The natural and spiritual world. The universe. Origen: Man as subject to corruption; souls of the stars. Theodoret: also the angels. Theodore of Mopsestia, Olshausen: The whole of the universe. Köllner, Koppe, Rosenmüller (tota rerum universitas).

2. Inanimate creation. (Chrysostom, Theophylact, Calvin, Beza, Fritzsche: mundi machina.)

3. Animale creation. a. Humanity (Augustine, Turretine, ‡ &c.; Baumgarten-Crusius: still unbelieving men); b. unconverted heathen (Locke, Lightfoot, and others). Rabbinical usage of language: the heathen: בְּרִיית; c. the Jewish people, because the Jews were called God's creation (Cramer, and others); d. the Gentile Christians, because the proselytes were called new creatures (Clericus, Nölselt); e. Jewish Christians (Gockel; for the same reason as under c.); f. Christians in general (καὶ ἡ κτίσις, Socinians and Arminians).—Evidently there is no reference, on one hand, to the mathematical or astronomical character of the heavenly bodies, nor, on the other, to the real rational or spiritual world, but to a creature-life, which can groan and earnestly expect.

* [The primary reference seems to be to its greatness; but a secondary reference to its certainty and futurity would necessarily be implied in "the patient expectation."—R.]

† [The English word creation has precisely the same twofold sense; but it always has a general reference when used in the passive sense. κρίσις undoubtedly has a more special reference in many cases, but it would seem that the more general signification preceded the more special one, and hence that the limitation of meaning must always be derived from the context.—R.]

‡ [This is the view adopted and defended at some length by Professor Stuart in an Excursus on this verse. Notwithstanding his able argument, the interpretation is entirely too restricted to meet with general acceptance. An instinct of immortality is assumed, and pressed as the main thought. Comp. Hodge, in opposition to Stuart's view.—R.]

4. Inanimate and animate nature, in contradistinction from humanity* (Irenaeus, Grotius, Calovius, Neander, Meyer, De Wette) [Hodge, Alford].—[Schubert: "Even in the things of the bodily world about us there is a life-element which, like that statue of Memnon, unconsciously sounds in accord when touched by the ray from on high."—P. S.] But the distinction from mankind must be confined to the distinction from the spiritual life of renewed mankind; for sinful mankind is utterly dependent upon nature, and even believers have their natural side (2 Cor. v. 1 ff.). Nor can the universe, in its merely natural side, be altogether meant, since the Holy Scriptures distinguish a region of glory from the region of humanity in this life.

5. Tholuck: "The material world surrounding man." The Scriptures very plainly distinguish between an earthly natural world related to mankind, and a region of glory. (See the ascension; 1 Cor. xv.; Heb. ix. 11, &c.) The former alone is subject to vanity, and hence it alone can be intended. But there is no ground for making divisions in reference to this human natural world. The Apostle assumes, rather, that this creature-sphere is in a state of collective, painful striving for development, which expresses itself as sensation only proportionately to the sensational power of life, and hence is more definitely expressed, appears more frequently, and reaches its climax in living creatures and in the natural longing which mankind feels (2 Cor. v. 1). The real personification of nature in man is the final ground for the poetical personification of nature.

[6. The whole creation, rational as well as irrational, not yet redeemed, but needing and capable of redemption, here opposed to the new creation in Christ and in the regenerate. The children of God appear, on the one side, as the first-fruits of the new creation, and the remaining creatures, on the other, as consciously or unconsciously longing after the same redemption and renewal. This explanation seems to be the most correct one. It most satisfactorily accounts for the expressions: expectation, waiting, groaning, not willingly (ver. 20), and the whole creation (ver. 22). The whole creation, then, looks forward to redemption; all natural birth, to the new birth. As all that is created proceeded from God, so it all, consciously or unconsciously, strives after Him as its final end. What shows itself in nature as a dim impulse, in the natural man, among the heathen, and yet more among the Jews, under the influence of the law, comes to distinct consciousness and manifests itself in that loud cry after deliverance (chap. vii. 24), which Christ alone can satisfy; and then voices itself in happy gratitude for the actual redemption. Olshausen aptly says: "Paul contrasts Christ, and the new creation called forth by Him, to all the old creation, together with the unregenerate men, as the flower of this creation.

The whole of this old creation has one life in itself, and this is yearning for redemption from the bonds which hold it, and hinder its glorification; this one yearning has forms different only according to the different degrees of life, and is naturally purer and stronger in unregenerate men than in plants and animals; in them, the creation has, as it were, its mouth, by which it can give vent to its collective feeling. Yet the most of these men know not what the yearning and seeking in them properly mean; they understand not the language of the Spirit in them; nay, they suppress it often, though it is, meanwhile, audible in their heart; and what they do not understand themselves, God understands, who listens even to prayers not understood. But how ever decided the contrast between the old and new creation, yet they may not be considered as separated thoroughly. Rather, as the new man, in all distinctness from the old, still is in the old, so is the new creation (Christ, and the new life proceeding from Him) in the old world. The old creation, therefore, is like an impregnate mother (comp. ver. 28), that bears a new world in her womb—a life which is not herself, neither springs from her, but which, by the overmastering power that dwells in it, draws her life, with which it is connected, on and on into itself, and changes it into its nature, so that the birth (the completion of the new world) is the mother's death (the sinking of the old)."—P. S.]

[This last view seems to be that of Dr. Lange himself. It is ably defended by Forbea, pp. 310–330. The limitation to creation, as capable of redemption, implies that only so much of creation as is linked with the fall of man, and subject to the curse, should be included. Thus it differs from 1. Col. i. 20, however, gives a hint as to the extent of this connection with man. The context renders such a limitation necessary. On the other hand, it differs from 4, in including man in his fallen condition. The reasons for excluding humanity have been given above. It will appear that, against this view, they are of comparatively little weight. Certainly the burden of proof rests with those who adopt 4; for man is the head of the creation, to which they apply κρίσις; not merely as the final and crowning work of the repeated creative agency which brought it into being, but as the occasion of its present groaning condition. Besides, man, viewed on one side of his nature, is a part of this material and animal creation. It seems arbitrary to sunder him from it in this case. At all events, we may admit that his material body involuntarily shares in this expectation, to which his unregenerate soul responds with an indefinite longing. In this view the degradation of sin is fearfully manifest. Nature waits, but the natural man is indifferent or hostile. The very body which, in his blindness, he deems the source of sin, waits for glorification, while his soul uses its power over it to stifle the inarticulate desire. On the whole subject, see Usteri, Stud. und Krit., 1832, pp. 835 ff., Tholuck, Meyer in loco, Delitzsch, Bibl. Psych., pp. 57 ff. and pp. 476 ff. (a most profound and eloquent sermon on vers. 18–28). Comp. Doctr. Notes, and Dr. Lange, Das Land der Herrlichkeit.—R.]

For the earnest expectation of the creature. As the καρὰδοξία means, strictly, to expect with raised head, it is very proper to regard the καρὰδοξία (intense expectation), and the ἀνοκαρὰδοξία (Phil. i. 20) (intense longing, waiting for satisfaction), as an allusion to the conduct of irrational creatures is

* [The reasons for excluding man are: 1. Believers are distinguished here from the κρίσις (ver. 23). 2. Such an expectation does not exist in mankind as a whole. 3. Ver. 20 represents the subjection to vanity as unwilling, which is not true of man. 4. Ver. 21 implies that deliverance shall take place, and we have no evidence that this is true of humanity as a whole. If ver. 21 gives the purport of the "hope" (ver. 20), then this reason is of little weight.—R.] reference to the future transformation of the sphere of nature.

Is waiting [ἀπεκδέχεται. Here, also, the preposition implies the continuance of the waiting until the time arrives.—R.] Even the poor creatures, whose heads are bowed toward the ground, now seized by a higher impulse, by a supernatural anticipation and longing, seem to stretch out their heads and look forth spiritually for a spiritual object of their existence, which is now burdened by the law of corruption.* Certainly this representation has the form of a poetical personification; but it cannot, on this account, be made equivalent, as Meyer holds (p. 255), to the usual prosopopœias in the Old Testament, although these declare, in a measure, the sympathy between the natural and human world. Meyer would exclude from the idea not only the angelic and demoniac kingdom, but also Christian and unchristian mankind. But how, then, would Paul have understood the groaning of the creature, without human sympathy?

The revelation of the sons (children) of God [τῶν ἀποκάλυψιν τῶν υἱῶν τοῦ θεοῦ]. The children of God in the pregnant sense of His sons. The creature waits for its manifestation; that is, for the coming of its δόξα to full appearance (1 John iii. 2) with the coming of Christ (Matt. xxv. 31), which will be the appearing of the δόξα of the great God (Titus ii. 13); therefore the absolute ἀποκάλυψις itself,† the fulfilment of all the typical prophecies of nature—and not only as complete restoration, but also as perfect development.

Ver. 20. For the creation was made subject [ἡ κτίσις ὑποτάγη. Dr. Lange takes the verb as middle. It is the historical aorist, at the fall of man. See below. Comp. Gen. iii. 17, 18.—R.]. God was the one who subjected (so say most expositors)—[This is evident from the curse, if the reference be to the time of the fall.—R.];—not Adam (Knachtb., Capellus); nor man (Chrysostom, Schneckenburger); nor the devil (Hammond).

To vanity. Ματαιότης. The Septuagint, instead of מְצָחָה, שְׁוָא, רִיק. The word does not occur in the profane Greek; it means the superficial, intangible, and therefore deceptive appearance; the perishable and doomed to destruction having the show of reality. Earlier expositors (Tertullian, Bucer, and others) have referred the word to the μάταια = idols, understanding it as the deification of the creature. Yet the question here is a condition of the creature to which God has subjected it. Further on it is designated as δουλεία τῆς ᾠθροῆς. Therefore Fritzsche's definition, pervertitas (Adam's sin), is totally untenable. But what do we understand by "subject to ματαιότης"? Explanations:

1 An original disposition of creation; the arrangement of the corruption of the creature. (Grotius, Krebl, De Wette. Theodoret holds that the original arrangement was made with a view to the fall.)

* [Comp. the analogous Old Testament expressions: Deut. xxxii. 1; Job xii. 7, 9; Ps. xix. 2; lxxviii. 17; xcvi. 8; Isa. i. 3; xiv. 8; lv. 12; lxx. 17; Ezek. xxxi. 15; Hab. ii. 11. Also Rev. xxi. 2; Peter iii. 13; Acts iii. 21.—R.]

† [The reference to this event is undoubted. It is a new expression of the deep-seated consciousness of fellowship with Christ, which leads the Apostle to call this "the revelation of the sons of God," not of the Son of God. It should be remarked, that our Lord calls it the coming of the Son of Man. The event is throughout regarded in a strictly soteriological aspect.—R.]

2. A result of the fall of man. (The Hebrew theology, Berêsch Rabbâ, many Christian theologians. Œcumenius, Calvin, Meyer, and others). No 1 is opposed by the ὑποτάγη, &c. [by οὐκ ἐκούσα, ἀλλὰ, which presupposes a different previous condition, and by the historical fact (Gen. i. 31) Meyer—R.]; and No. 2 by the originality of the arrangement between a first created and a second spiritual stage of the cosmos (1 Cor. xv. 47, 48).

3. We must therefore hold, that Paul refers to the obscurity and disturbance of the first natural stage in the development of our cosmos produced by the fall.* As, in redemption, the restoration occurred simultaneously with the furtherance of the normal development, so death entered, at the fall, as a deterioration of the original metamorphoses, into the corruption of transitoriness. Tholuck approaches this explanation by this remark: "As the Rabbinical theology expresses the thought that man, born sinless, would have passed into a better condition 'by a kiss of the Highest,' so, in all probability, has Paul regarded that ἀλλοτρίων of which he speaks in 1 Cor. xv. 52 as the destination of the first man." Yet Tholuck seems, in reality, to adhere to De Wette's view.

Not willingly. The οὐκ ἐκούσα cannot mean merely the natural necessity peculiar to the creature-world; it applies rather to an opposition of ideal nature, in its ideal pressure toward development, to the decrees of death and of the curse of their real developing progress (Gen. iii.; 2 Cor. v. 1 ff.). Bucer: Contra quam fert ingenium eorum, a natura enim omnes res a corruptione abhorrent.

[But by reason of him who hath subjected it, ἀλλὰ διὰ τὸν ὑποτάξαντα. Dr. Lange renders: the creature-world subjected itself to vanity, not willingly, but on account of Him who subjected it, in hope. The force of διὰ with the accusative is on account of; but the E. V. is correct, indicating a moving cause—i. e., the will of God.—R.] This unwillingness is expressed, according to what follows, in the groaning of the whole creation. The translation: "it was made subject (ὑποτάγη, passive), by reason of Him who hath subjected the same," is opposed to the logical conception. [The simplest grammatical as well as logical interpretation accepts the verb as passive, with a reference to God as "Him who subjected the same." (So Meyer, Tholuck, Hodge, De Wette, Alford, and most commentators.)—R.] Moreover, the reference of the διὰ τὸν ὑποτάξαντα to man, to Adam,† does not remove this logical difficulty, since, in that case, the ὑποτάγη would have to relate to another subject than the ὑποτάξαντα. We therefore find ourselves driven, with Fritzsche, to the middle construction

* [The difference between 2 and 3 is slight. Both point to an actual curse at the fall; the latter only adds the thought, that the previous condition was not, after all, the final one, thus preparing the way for an explanation of "not willingly." Both should, it seems, include the thought that the glorification to ensue will transcend both the original state and that which could be attained by a normal development.—R.]

† [The objection to this reference is well stated by Alford: (1.) The verb implies a conscious act of intentional subjugation. (2.) The accusative (indicating the moving, rather than the efficient cause) is in keeping with the Apostle's reverence; thus removing the supreme will of God to a wider distance from corruption and vanity. Meyer suggests that the absence of any explanatory cause presupposes a well-known subject; God had subjected it. Jowett makes Christ the subject: "on account of whose special work the creature was made subject to vanity." This is novel, as much so, that it seems far-fetched.—R.]

of ὑπετάγη. Thereby we gain the idea, that even the disharmony which nature had suffered has become, in turn, a kind of order, since nature has been found in the service of corruption by virtue of its elasticity, relative dependence, plasticity, and pliability, and its absolute dependence upon God; and pious nature is all the dearer to God because it is subjected in hope. [So Hodge, accepting the middle sense: the creature submitted to the yoke of bondage in hope of ultimate deliverance.—R.]

[In hope, ἐν' ἐλπίδι. Not precisely in a state of, which would be expressed by ἐν, but resting on hope (De Wette: auf Hoffnung hin).—R.] This means not merely, "hope was left to it" (Tholuck), but it is also a motive of positive hope in suffering nature. Just as the fallen human world shall be led in its ἀποκατάστασις beyond its primitive paradisaical glory, so shall nature come through this humiliation to a richer elevation, namely, as the transformed organism of the glorified Christ and His joint-heirs. The ἐν' ἐλπίδι must be joined with ὑπετάγη, not with διὰ τ. ἵπoc. (Vulgate, Luther, and others.) [The question of connection is a difficult one. Of the two views here mentioned, Dr. Lange rightly prefers the former, since the latter would attribute the hope to the one subjecting, not the one subjected (Alford). Ewald, making all that precedes in this verse parenthetical, joins in hope with ver. 19, and thus finds a reason for the emphatic repetition of πίστις in ver. 21. See *Textual Note, where the view of Forbes is given. It seems to give greater clearness to the passage as a whole.—R.]

Ver. 21. That the creation itself also [ὅτι καὶ αὐτὴ ἡ κτίσις. See *Textual Note. The current of exegesis sets strongly in favor of the view which connects ὅτι with ἐν' ἐλπίδι, in the sense of that. Alford, who, in his commentary, defends because, is one of the authors of a revision which adopts that. Meyer suggests that the purport of the hope must be given, in order to prove the expectation of the πίστις as directed precisely toward the manifestation of the sons of God. Alford indeed objects, that this subjective signification of the clause would attribute "to the yearnings of creation, intelligence and rationality—consciousness of itself and of God;" but the same objection might be urged against the reference of πίστις to inanimate creation, in vers. 19, 20, 22, as well as here. If the figurative idea of longing be admitted at all, it may be carried out to this extent with equal propriety. The repetition may be readily accounted for, either by considering ver. 20 parenthetical, or by regarding αὐτὴ ἡ κτίσις as emphatic.—R.] This explains the hope of the creature-world introduced in the preceding verse. With Chrysostom, Theophylact, and others, we regard the καὶ αὐτὴ as a higher degree, itself also, and not merely as an expression of equality, also it. Meyer says, that the context says nothing of gradation. But the gradation lies essentially in the fact that the creature-world constitutes a humiliation in opposition to spiritual life, especially for contemplating the old world.

Shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption [ἐλευθερωθήσεται ἀπὸ τῆς δουλείας τῆς φθοράς]. We do not hold (with Tholuck, Meyer, and others) that τῆς φθοράς is the genitive of apposition. For the question is, in the first place, concerning a bondage under vanity; so that the creature, even in its deliverance, will remain in a state of the δουλεία in relation to the children of God himself. The φθορά is not altogether the same as ματαιότης, but its manifestation in the process of finite life is sickness, death, the pangs of death, and corruption; while the ματαιότης, as such, is veiled in the semblance of a blooming, incorruptible life. [There seems to be no good reason for objecting to the view of Tholuck, Meyer, Philippi, and others, that the bondage, which results from the vanity, and is borne not willingly (ver. 20), consists in corruption. This preserves the proper distinctions. The corruption is the consequence of the vanity; the unwilling subjection to a condition which is under vanity, and results in corruption, is well termed bondage.—R.] The alteration of the expression φθορά into an adjective, "corruptible bondage" (Köllner), is as unwarranted as the translation of the ἐλευθερία τῆς δόξης by glorious liberty (Luther [E. V.]).

[Into the freedom of the glory of the children of God, εἰς τὴν ἐλευθερίαν τῆς δόξης τῶν τέκνων τοῦ θεοῦ. The construction is pregnant. (So Meyer: Aecht Griechische Prägnanz. See Winer, p. 577.) We may supply: κατασταθήσεται, or εἰσαχθήσεται, shall be brought or introduced into, &c. The freedom is to consist in, or at least to result from a share in, the glory of the children of God. Hence the hendiadys of the E. V. (glorious liberty) is totally incorrect. It makes the most prominent idea of the whole clause a mere attributive. Besides, were the meaning that expressed by the E. V., we should find this form: εἰς τὴν δόξαν τῆς ἐλευθερίας τῶν τέκν. τ. θεοῦ.—R.] The εἰς τὴν ἐλευθερίαν can mean only the sharing in the liberty of God's children by the organic appropriation on their part, and by the equality with the children of God produced by means of the transformation; but it cannot mean an independent state of liberty beside them. Their freedom will consist in its helping to constitute the glory, the spiritualized splendor of the manifestation of God's children. As Christ is the manifestation of God's glory because He is illuminated throughout by God, and the sons of God are the glory of Christ as lights from His light, so will nature be the glory of God's sons as humanized and deified nature. Yet we would not therefore take the τῆς δόξης as the genitive of apposition, since the glory proceeds outwardly from within, and since it is here promised to nature as recompense, so to speak, in opposition to the corruption. It shall therefore share, in its way, in the glory belonging to God's children. But why is not the ἀφθαρσία, incorruption, mentioned (1 Cor. xv. 45), in opposition to the φθορά, corruption? Because the idea of corruption has been preceded by that of vanity. The real glory of the manifestation in which its inward incorruption shall hereafter be externally revealed, is contrasted with the deceptive, transitory glory of the manifestation in which the creature-world in this life appears subject to vanity. The elevation of the children of God themselves from the condition of corruption to the condition of glorification, constitutes the centre of the deliverance into this state of glory; but the creature is drawn upward in this elevation, in conformity with its dynamical dependence on the centre, and its organic connection with it.*

* [This verse, which, taken in its subjective sense, as the purport of the hope, seems to favor the reference of πίστις to humanity, and the longing to the instincts of immortality (so Stuart throughout), loses its force if thus un-

Ver. 22. For we know that the whole creation [οἶδαμεν γὰρ ὅτι πᾶσα ἡ κτίσις]. The Apostle furnishes, in ver. 22, for we know, the proof of the declaration in ver. 21. Since he has proved the proposition of ver. 19 by ver. 20, and of ver. 20 by ver. 21, Meyer, without ground, goes back with this for to ver. 20: ἐν' ἐλπίδι; De Wette [Philippi], to ver. 19. [If ver. 21 be taken as stating the purport of the hope, then Meyer's view is the most tenable one. Philippi finds here a more general affirmation of the existence of the "patient expectation," as an admitted truth.—R.]

Tholuck asks, Whence does the Apostle have this we know? and he opposes the view that it is an assumption of the universal human consciousness (according to most expositors), or rather, that the Apostle seems (according to Bucer, Brenz) to speak from the Jewish-Christian hope which rested on the prophets, as, even in chap. ii. 2; iii. 19; vii. 14; viii. 28, the οἶδαμεν is understood best as the Christian consciousness.* We must not subject the Apostle to the modern sense of nature. But we can still less reduce the Apostle's knowledge to that of the prophets. The modern sense of nature, in its sound elements, is a fruit of apostolical Christianity; and as the harmony between spirit and nature has been essentially consummated in Christ, so, too, has the knowledge of the language (that is, the spiritual meaning) of nature been consummated in Him—a knowledge which was reproduced in the apostles as a fountain, and ready for enlargement. This knowledge is, indeed, universally human chiefly in elect souls alone, under the condition of Divine illumination.

Groaneth together and travaileth in pain together [συσσινάξει καὶ συνωδίνει]. The συσ in συσσινάξει and συνωδίνει has been referred, by Eusebius, Calvin, and others, to the children of God; Köllner, and others, have viewed it as a mere strengthening of the simple word. Tholuck and Meyer explain it, in harmony with Theodore of Mopsvestia, as a collective disposition of the creature. The latter: βούλεται δὲ εἶναι, ὅτι σύμφωνος ἐπιδικᾶνται τοῦτο πᾶσα ἡ κτίσις. Estius: genitus et dolor communis inter se partium creatura. On the linguistic tenableness of this explanation, by accepting the presumed organization of nature in single parts, see Meyer, against Fritzsche. It is, indeed, against the reference of the συσ to the groaning of Christians that this derstood. The striking phrase: "the freedom of the glory of the children of God," becomes very vague, unless we adopt the view that nature is here personified as in expectation. And it is easier to believe that the verse is true of all nature, than of all men. Whatever may be our wishes, the sharing of nature in the future glory is more probable, judging from the facts of the material world, than the participation of all men in the same, judging from the facts of the moral world. The sighs after immortality among the heathen are audible enough; but had Paul referred to these, he would undoubtedly have spoken more distinctly of the future conversion of the heathen. He is too fond of references to his personal Saviour and His work, to omit every allusion to these, where his thought really concerns the salvation of persons. It seems, therefore, in the highest degree improbable that mankind (as distinguished from the natural world) is referred to at all.—R.]

* [Professor Stuart urges that the longing of the natural world was not so familiar to all, that the Apostle could thus appeal to consciousness. But this objection is of weight only in case the meaning of οἶδαμεν be extended to human consciousness in general. That Paul uses it in appeals to Christian consciousness, is evident from Rom. ii. 2; iii. 19; vii. 14; viii. 26, 28; 2 Cor. v. 1; 1 Tim. i. 8; comp. the frequent use of οἶδα in 1 Cor. vi.—R.]

groaning is introduced further on as something special.

Reiche holds that συνωδίνει refers to the eschatological expectation of the Jews, the דולורס משיחיים; against which Meyer properly observes, that those dolores messia are special sufferings which were to precede the appearance of the Messiah; but the travelling of nature had taken place from the beginning, since Gen. iii. 17. Yet Tholuck remarks, with propriety, that the Apostle must have been acquainted with that term of Rabbinical theology. Likewise the developing suffering of nature will ascend toward the end to a decisive crisis (see the eschatological words of Jesus). But the "dolores messia" comprise also ethical conflicts. Therefore this continuous travelling of the world's development is related to the dolores messia, as the preparation is to the fulfilment, or as the judgment of the world, immanent in the history of the world, is related to the final catastrophe. The ωδίνω denotes the birth-pangs of a woman in labor. The figure is happily chosen, not only because it announces a new birth and new form of the earth, but because it reflects in travelling Eve the fate of the travelling earth, and vice versa. Tholuck: "By pain, it will wrest the new out of the old; perhaps συναίω has reference to bringing forth (comp. Jer. iv. 81), but better, as Luther explains the συναίω, ver. 26, the groaning, earnest expectation, which is intensified by the being in travail which follows." Yet the groaning also indicates the painful announcement of positive sufferings, which subsequently arise from the groaning of Christians for redemption (συναίωμεν βαρύνοντες, 2 Cor. v. 4).

[Until now, ἄχρι τοῦ νῦν. Any reference to the future is forbidden by the use of οἶδαμεν, which refers to experience (Alford). While it is not necessary to insist upon an important distinction between μέχρι and ἄχρι (see p. 181), it would seem best to consider that the idea of duration* is the prominent one here. If any point of time is emphasized, it must be that of the beginning of the groaning, when the curse of wearying labor and travail came upon man, and through him the curse upon nature.—R.]

Ver. 23. And not only so, but even we ourselves [οἱ μὲν οὖν οὕτως, ἀλλὰ καὶ αὐτοὶ]. See Textual Notes* and †. The reading of the Vaticanus is followed here.] Meyer's mode of stating the connection with the preceding verse is utterly incorrect: "Climax of the previous proof that the κτίσις in ver. 21 is correct in the ἐν' ἐλπίδι, ὅτι. Even we Christians would, indeed, do nothing less than unite in that groaning." The principal thought is, not the deliverance of the κτίσις, ver. 20, 21, but the future glory of the children of God, ver. 18. The first proof therefore is the groaning of nature; the second, which now follows, is the groaning of spiritual life. Therefore Christians do not unite in anywise in the groaning of creation, but vice versa: the groaning of creation joins in the groaning of Christians. Consequently, we must not translate: "But also we (Christians) on our part," &c., but: even we Christians ourselves—namely, we who are most intimately concerned. The expression καὶ αὐτοὶ is αὐτοῖς brings out prominently the truth that these same Christians, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, are also saved by hope, though at heart they must still groan and earnestly expect. Thus αὐτοῖς ἐν, in chap. vii. 25, means: I, one and the same man, can be so different; with the mind I can serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin. Tholuck: "The difference between the readings seems to have arisen rather from purposes of perspicuity or style." Augustine, Chrysostom, and others, hold that the connection—in which the subject is Christians in general—is decidedly against the odd limitation of the αὐτοῖς to the apostles (Origen, Ambrose, Melancthon, and Grotius. Reiche, and others: the Apostle Paul alone. Others: Paul, with the other apostles). The former expositors maintain that the second καὶ ἡμεῖς αὐτοῖς consists, in a more intense degree, of the apostles.* But the addition is rather occasioned by the contrast presented: saved, and yet groaning ("the inward life of Christians shines").

Though we have the first-fruits of the Spirit [τὴν ἀπαρχὴν τοῦ πνεύματος ἔχοντες. The participle may be taken as simply defining the subject: we ourselves, those who have (Luther, Calvin, Beza, Hodge); or be rendered: though we have, despite this privilege. The latter is more forcible; the former sense would require the article οἱ (Tholuck, Philippi, Meyer, Alford). Απαρχή in itself occasions no difficulty; it means first-fruits, with the implied idea of a future harvest. Comp., however, chap. xi. 16.—R.] The ἀπαρχή τοῦ πνεύματος is differently interpreted.

1. The genitive is partitive, having this sense: the apostles (they alone, according to Origen, Eusebius, Melancthon, and Grotius), and the Christians of the apostolic period, have the first foretaste of a spiritual endowment, which, when complete, will extend to all future Christians (De Wette, Köllner, Olshausen, Meyer). But by this division the Apostle would not only have adjudged to later Christians the full harvest of the Spirit, which is contrary to the real fact, but he would also have obscured rather than strengthened his argument by a superfluous remark. For it is a fact, which will ever remain perfectly the same from the time of the apostles to the end of the world, that the life of Christians in the Spirit is related to their physical perfection and glorification, as the firstlings are to the harvest. But the following division has just as little force.

2. Our present reception of the Spirit is only preliminary, in contrast with the future complete outpouring in the kingdom of heaven (Chrysostom, and others; also Huther, Calvin, Beza, Tholuck, Philippi [Hodge, Alford, Stuart]). Apart from the fact that this view is not altogether apostolical, it adds nothing to the matter in question, and removes the point of view: the inference of the future δόξα from the present πνεῦμα.

3. Therefore the genitive of apposition.† The Holy Spirit is himself the gift of the first-fruits, if the completion of Christian life is regarded as the harvest (Bengel, Winer, Rückert, and others). The Spirit is the earnest, ἀρραβών, of the future perfection (2 Cor. i. 22; v. 5; Gal. vi. 8). Eph. i. 14, iv. 30; and 1 Peter iv. 14, τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς δόξης, are of special importance. Meyer's only objection to this explanation is, that the Apostle's expression would have been misunderstood, since the ἀπαρχή would have to be understood as a part of a similar whole. But the sheaves offered as first-fruits are not merely the first portions of the first sheaves collectively; they are the precious tokens and sure pledges of the full harvest, to which they constitute, if we may so speak, a harmonious antithesis. But the δόξα must be regarded as commensurate with the spiritual life; yet not as a new and higher outpouring of the Spirit, but as the perfect epiphany of the operation of the Spirit. Tholuck admits, at least, that this third explanation is also admissible with the second. On the singular explanations of Fritzsche and Schneckenburger, see Meyer.

Even we ourselves groan within ourselves [καὶ αὐτοὶ ἐν ἑαυτοῖς στεναζόμεν. We, although we have the first-fruits, are far from being complete; despite this, we groan within ourselves. The inward, profound nature of the feeling is thus emphasized.—R.] Groaning is the expression of the longing which feels that it is delayed in its course toward its object; expression of the inclination contending immediately with its obstacles.

Waiting for the adoption [νιοθεσίαν ἀπεκδεχόμενοι. Wait for, await, wait to the end of (Alford). The adoption is already ours (ver 15) as an internal relation, but the outward condition does not yet correspond (Meyer). Alford paraphrases: awaiting the fulness of our adoption.—R.] The object of the longing is the νιοθεσία, which believers wait for in perfect patience. This is here identified with the redemption of our body. It is the perfect outward manifestation of the inward νιοθεσία; it is the soul's inheritance of the glorified life which is attained on the perfect deliverance of the body from the bondage of the first state of nature, and from subjection to death and corruption; see 2 Cor. v. 4. The Apostle's addition of "the redemption of our body," proves that he does not mean merely the entire νιοθεσία, but this νιοθεσία viewed specifically as complete.

[The redemption of our body, τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν τοῦ σώματος ἡμῶν. Exegetical clause.] Τοῦ σώματος is explained by Erasmus, Luther, and others (also Lutz, Bibl. Dogm.), as redemption from the body; but this is totally foreign to the connection, and also to the matter itself. [Were this the meaning, there would probably be some qualifying term added, as Phil. iii. 21 (Meyer).—R.] Tholuck explains the redemption of the body as applying to its materiality; this is also the object

* [Alford, who adopts quæst with the second καὶ αὐτοῖς, says it is "inserted to involve himself and his fellow-workers in the general description of the last clause."—R.]

† [Both 1 and 2 take the genitive as partitive, which is undoubtedly the common usage. In every case in the New Testament where ἀπαρχή is followed by a genitive, it has this force; comp. xvi. 5; 1 Cor. xv. 20; xvi. 15; John i. 13. The same is true of the LXX. and classical authors. It is difficult to sustain any other view here. If we adopt the meaning, the first-fruits of a harvest, which is the Spirit given to us, and refer it to the common gift of the Spirit in this life, rather than to the gift of the Spirit in that particular age, all seems to be gained that Dr. Lange seeks in view 3, while we do not unnecessarily depart from the usus loquendi. The reference to the first Christians is perhaps slightly favored by adopting quæst at some point in the text, although Meyer rejects it, and yet upholds this reference. In his comments on ver. 36, Dr. Lange says that here the new spiritual life is spoken of, not the Holy Spirit itself. This subjective sense can only be admitted if the partitive sense of the genitive be given up. The term "body" cannot, in any case, be regarded as antithetical; did "flesh" occur, there might be some reason for taking "Spirit" in this sense of "spiritual life," a meaning for which our author has an unusual fondness.—R.]

of the earnest expectation of the κρίσις. Perhaps this is from Origen and Rothe; see, on the contrary, 1 Cor. xv. Tholuck's quotation from Augustine is better (De doctr. christ.): Quod nonnulli dicunt, malle se omnino esse sine corpore, omnino falluntur, non enim corpus suum sed corruptiones et pondus oderunt; Phil. iii. 21; 1 Cor. xv. The most untenable view is: deliverance from the morally injurious influence of the body by death (Carpov, and others). [It is so natural to refer this phrase to the glorification of the body at the coming of Christ, that it is unnecessary to state arguments in favor of this reference (comp. Phil. iii. 21; 2 Cor. v. 2 ff.; 1 Cor. xv. 42 ff.). The redemption is not complete until the body is redeemed. Any other view is not accordant with the grand current of thought in this chapter. The fact that even here, where the longing of Christians is described, so much stress should be laid on the redemption of the body, the material part of our complex nature, confirms the view of κρίσις, which takes it as including material existences. In fact, since "even we ourselves" are represented as waiting for an event, which shall redeem that part of our nature most akin to the creation (in the restricted sense of Meyer, and others), it would appear that the subject here is not necessarily in antithesis to "creation," but rather a part of it; "subjected in hope," like the whole creation, but also as having the first-fruits of the Spirit, "saved in hope" (ver. 24).—R.]

Ver. 24. For we were saved. (ἰσώθημεν.) Delivered, and participating in salvation. The dative τῇ ἐλπίδι, in hope, does not describe the means, but the mode of the deliverance. [So Bengel, and many others. Comp. Winer, p. 208. The phrase is emphatically placed. Luther is excellent: we are indeed saved, yet in hope.—R.] Even if we were to admit that the Apostle understood faith to be the hope here mentioned (Chrysostom, De Wette, and others)—which, as Meyer correctly observes, is controverted by Paul's definite distinction between faith and hope,—the admission of the dative of instrument would be too strong. But even if we accept the dative as denoting modality, it does not denote "that to which the ἰσώθ. is to be regarded as confined" (Meyer), but the condition: in hope of. Therefore the ἰσώθημεν must be here explained conformably to the conception of the νίθησις in ver. 23, not as being the principal attainment of salvation in the Spirit—which is already complete there—but as being the perfect attainment of salvation in glory. This has become the portion of Christians, but in such a way that their faith is supplemented by their hope. They have the inward νίθησις in the witness of the Spirit; but the νίθησις of δόξα in the pledge of the Spirit.

Now hope that is seen is not hope [ἐλπὶς δὲ βλεπομένη οὐκ ἔστιν ἐλπὶς]. Tholuck: the second ἐλπὶς is concrete, the object of hope. [This usage is common in emphatic phrases in all languages (Philippi). Comp. Col. i. 5; 1 Tim. i. 1; Heb. vi. 18, where ἐλπὶς is objective.—R.] Luther:

* [De Wette urges the instrumental sense, on account of the definite aorist; but the fact of salvation is regarded as placing us in a condition of hope. The hope differs from faith, but is inseparably connected with it. Alford says the hope is "faith in its prospective attitude." Philippi: "Inasmuch as the object of salvation is both relatively present and also relatively future, hope is produced from faith and indissolubly linked with it; for faith apprehends the object, in so far as it is present; hope, in so far as it is still future."—R.]

"The word hope is used in two ways. In one case it means great courage, which remains firm in all temptations; in the other, the finite salvation which hope shall get; here it may mean both." Seeing means, here, the acquired presence of the object, which can be "grasped with the hands;" however, the beholding also may momentarily afford heavenly satisfaction; see 1 Cor. xiii. 1; 2 Cor. v. 7.

For what a man seeth [ὃ γὰρ βλέπει, τὶς]. Thus the hope of believers proves that they are to expect a state of completion, but that they must wait for it perseveringly.

Why doth he still hope for? [τί καὶ ἐλπίζει]. See Textual Note 10. Adopting καὶ as well established, it seems best to take it as = etiam (Meyer). Why does he still hope, when there is no more ground for it? Comp. Hartung, Partikellehre, i. p. 187, on this use of καὶ. Bengel: cum visione non est spe opus.—R.]

Ver. 25. But if we hope for that, &c. Hope is no vain dreaming; it is proved as religious confidence in the ethical labor of patience. The ὑπομονή denotes perseverance amid obstacles; therefore always, also passiveness, or patience and steadfastness. But the connection here authorizes the predominance of the former idea. And though complete salvation comes from the future and from above, patience in this life must coöperate with its future—therefore: to persevere.* Grotius: Spes ista non infructuosa est in nobis, sed egregiam virtutem operatur, malorum fortem tolerantiam.

Ver. 26. Likewise the Spirit also [ὡσαύτως δὲ καὶ τὸ πνεῦμα]. Likewise [ὡσαύτως] introduces, as contemporaneous with the "waiting" (ver. 23), the divine assistance of the Holy Spirit (Tholuck).—R.] De Wette and Meyer explain: The Holy Spirit. The latter commentator appeals to vers. 16, 23. But, in ver. 23, the new spiritual life is spoken of,† which certainly consists in the fellowship of the human spirit with the Holy Spirit, but is, nevertheless, not the Holy Spirit itself. To say of the Holy Spirit in himself that He groans—indeed, that He gives vent to groanings which are unutterable by Him—is altogether inadmissible. Neither can we, with Nöeselt, substitute the gospel; nor, with Morus, the Christian disposition; nor, with Köllner, the Christian element of life. According to the opposition of πνεῦμα and ροῦς in 1 Cor. xiv. 14, it is the new basis of life, which constitutes to the conscious daily life an opposition of the life which, though apparently unconscious, is really the higher consciousness itself, the heavenly sense of the awakened soul. As, in the unconverted state, the influences of the unconscious basis of the soul invade the conscious daily life with demoniacal temptation, so, vice versa, does the unconscious spiritual life of the converted man come as a guardian spirit to the help of the daily life. Therefore the groaning of the spirit itself (see ver. 15) corresponds with the groaning of the consciousness

* [On ὑπομονή, see p. 162; also Col. i. 11; Lange's Comm., p. 19. Constancy seems to be always prominent in the word. The preposition καὶ with the genitive denotes that through which, as a medium, our waiting takes place (Alford). It is more than an accompaniment—it is the state which characterises the waiting throughout. On the connection of hope and patience, comp. 1 Thess. i. 3; Heb. x. 36.—R.]

† [Against this, see notes in loco, where Dr. Lange himself does not defend this view. It is opposed to the most natural grammatical construction of that passage, and objectionable on other grounds. Comp. the additional notes on vers. 16, 23, and the excursus, chap. vii.—R.]

its natural feeling. [This position of Dr. Lange is not in accordance with the view of the best modern commentators. Tholuck, De Wette, Ewald, Stuart, Hodge, Philippi, Meyer, Alford, Wordsworth, Jowett, as well as the older commentators in general, all refer it to the objective, Holy Spirit. Olshausen, however, adopts the subjective sense. The proof must be very strong which will warrant us in referring it to any thing other than the Holy Spirit itself; for the Apostle uses τὸ πνεῦμα, as he has done in vers. 23, 16, &c., where the Holy Spirit is meant. The only reason urged against such a meaning here is, that the "groaning," &c., cannot be predicated of Him. But we have no right to depart from the obvious meaning, because, in the next clause, that is predicated which, we fancy, cannot be predicated of the Holy Spirit. The predicate in this clause cannot, with strict propriety, be referred to any spirit save the Holy Spirit. That Dr. Lange's view weakens the thought, is also evident.—R.]

Helpeth our weakness [συναντιλαμβάνεται τῇ ἀσθενείᾳ ἡμῶν. See Textual Note 11. On the verb, comp. Luke x. 40, where Martha asks that Mary be bidden to help her—i. e., take hold of in connection with. It requires a weakening of its force to make this applicable to the new spiritual life. The subjective side has been brought out in vers. 23–25. Hence a reference to the Holy Spirit accords with the progress of thought.—R.] Meyer urges, with Beza, the syn in συναντιλ.: ad nos laborantes refertur. At all events, it would refer to only the conscious side of our effort. But it is clear, from the further definition, that ἀσθενεία is the only correct reading. Tholuck understands this ἀσθενεία as referring to occasions of invading faintness. But the Apostle speaks of a permanent relation of our weakness in this life, which certainly becomes more prominent in special temptations. This is the incongruity between the new principle and the old psychical and carnal life.

[The singular must be accepted as the true reading. It then refers to a state of weakness, already described (ver. 23). The dative, as in Luke x. 40, denotes not the burden which the Spirit helps us bear (so Hodge, and many others), but that which it helps. (Alford: "helps our weakness—us who are weak, to bear the burden of ver. 23." Meyer: "Er legt mit Hand an mit unserer Schwachheit.") It should not be limited to weakness in prayer (Bengel), but is the general weakness in our waiting for final redemption.—R.]

For we know not what we should pray for as we ought [τὸ γὰρ τί προσευξώμεθα καθὸ δεῖ οὐκ οἶδαμεν. Τό belongs to the whole clause. I ἄρ introduces an illustration of our weakness, and how it is helped. The aorist προσευξώμεθα, which we accept as the correct reading, is more usual than the future, but either is grammatically admissible. See Winer, p. 280.—R.] Tholuck holds that this not knowing refers to special states of obscure faith, and has a twofold meaning: ignorance of the object toward which prayer should be directed, and the language in which we should pray. But the supposition of special states is incorrect; otherwise the expression would be: we often do not know. But the language can by no means be under consideration, neither can a mere ignorance of the object be meant. Therefore De Wette and Meyer explain thus: we do not know what, under existing circumstances, it is necessary to pray for. We refer the καθὸ δεῖ as well to the heavenly clearness of the object of redemption as to the subjective purity, definiteness, and energy of desire corresponding to it.* The conscious, verbal prayer is related to the spirit of prayer, as the fallible dictate of conscience is to the infallible conscience.

But the Spirit itself intercedeth [ἀλλ' αὐτὸ τὸ πνεῦμα ὑπερεντυγχάνει. On the omission of ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν (Rec.), which Meyer finds in the verb itself, see Textual Note 12. The verb occurs only here. The simple verb means, to meet; then, compounded with ἐν, to approach in order to make supplication (Acts xxv. 24, ἐντυγχάνειν); the ὑπὲρ seems to show that the supplication is in favor of the persons in question. Dr. Lange rejects this, in order to avoid a reference to the Holy Spirit.—Αὐτὸ τὸ πνεῦμα brings into prominence the Intercessor, who knows our wants (Tholuck, Alford).—R.] Since the ὑπερεντυγχάνει must be read without the addition of the Recepta, we refer the ὑπὲρ to our want in not knowing what to pray for, as it is proper for us, and in harmony with our destiny. Tholuck regards the ὑπὲρ as merely a higher degree, as in ὑπερπερισσεύειν; Meyer [so Philippi] sees here a ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, according to the analogy of ὑπεραποκρίνομαι, &c.

With groanings which cannot be uttered [συναγμοῖς ἀλαλήτοις. Analogous to 1 Cor. xiv. 14; against which Tholuck remarks, that there the subject in question is the human πνεῦμα. Meyer even declares that those explanations are rationalistic which do not interpret the πνεῦμα to be the Holy Spirit (Reiche: the Christian sense; Köllner: the Spirit obtained in Christ). Chrysostom's calling it the χάρισμα εὐχῆς, and Theodore's not understanding by the expression the ὑπόστασις of the Spirit, are declared to be an arbitrary alteration. Meyer does not accede to the opinion of Augustine, and most commentators, that the sense is, that man himself, stirred up by the Holy Ghost, utters groanings. It is rather the Holy Spirit himself; but certainly He needs the human organ for His groanings. He claims that the analogy, "that demons speak and cry out of men," is adapted to this view. The analogy of demoniacal possession! Besides, Meyer, in his exposition of the ἀλαλήτοις, prefers the interpretation of most expositors, unutterable, to the opposite rendering, unuttered, dumb (Grotius, Fritzsche, and others), because it denotes greater intensity. But we get from this the result, that the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of God in His glory, not only groans, but also cannot utter His groans.

[Notwithstanding this attempt at a reductio ad absurdum, the view must still be held, that the Holy Spirit is here represented as interceding. To avoid this conclusion, Dr. Lange must first weaken the subject into the human spirit, and then the force of ὑπὲρ in the verb. It is far better to accept the obvious sense, and then explain it in a way which escapes the extreme conclusions of Meyer. The Holy Spirit is here spoken of as dwelling in us; in this indwelling He makes the intercession. This view presents no absurdity; it rather accepts the prominent thought of the previous part of the chapter (vers. 9, 11, 14, 16), and implies not only that, by this indwelling, we are taught to pray what would otherwise be unutterable (Calvin, Beza), but that the Holy Ghost "himself pleads in our prayers, raising us to higher and holier desires than we can express in words, which can only find utterance in sighings and aspirations" (Alford). So Hodge, Stuart, De Wette, and most commentators.—R.]

* [Dr. Hodge refers to the fact that heathen philosophers urged this as a reason why men ought not to pray. The Apostle intimates that what is true of men in general is true still of Christians (οἷδεμεν), because their knowledge is as yet in no respect such as to make their prayer (καθὸ δεῖ) as it ought to be. Hence the reference is to a continuing state, rather than to times of special weakness.—R.]

On the threefold view of ἀλάλητος (not utterable, not spoken, not speaking), see Tholuck.*

Ver. 27. But he who searcheth the hearts [ὁ δὲ ἐρευνῶν τὰς καρδίας. He is slightly adversative: These groanings are unutterable, but He, &c. The ἐρευνῶν describes God according to the Old Testament phraseology (1 Sam. xvi. 7; Ps. vii. 10; Prov. xv. 11), as omniscient.—R.] In 1 Cor. ii. 10 it is said of the Holy Spirit that He searcheth all things; here, according to the just cited reference of the groaning Spirit to the Holy Spirit, this very Holy Spirit would be an object of the searching God. [This objection is of little weight, since the object of the all-searching God is the mind of the Spirit, hidden (even to us) in the unutterable sighings, &c.—R.]

The mind of the Spirit. His φρόνημα; see chap. viii. 6. His purely divine and ideal striving, but here as clear thought, denoting the exco-gitated sense of that language of groans. [If the reference to the Holy Spirit be accepted, then the sense not even exco-gitated by us is included.—R.]

Because he pleadeth for the saints [ὅτι . . . ἐντυγχάνει ὑπὲρ ἁγίων. How can the human spirit, even when possessed by the Holy Spirit, be said to plead for the saints?—R.] The explanation of ὅτι by for [because], according to most expositors (De Wette, Philippi, &c.), is opposed by Meyer (in accordance with Grotius, Fritzsche, Tholuck, and others), who urges instead of it, that. A very idle thought: God knows the mind of the Holy Spirit, that He intercedes for the saints in a way well-pleasing to God. The οἷδε is perfectly plain in itself, even if not taken in the pregnant sense (with Calvin and Ruckert).† He knows well that He, as the searcher of hearts (Pa. cxxxix. 1) and as hearer, is conscious of the thought and pure purpose of these holy groans. Wherefore? Because it is well-pleasing to God.

[According to the will of God (καὶ ὁ θεός) is the correct paraphrase of the E. V.—R.] Not, according to Deity (Origen); nor before God, nor with God (Reiche, Fritzsche); nor by God, by virtue of God (Tholuck).—How can we hold that the Holy Ghost should intercede because of God's impulse?), but according to God, in harmony with the Divine will (Meyer).‡ The Divine impulse is, indeed, indirectly implied here; but then it follows again, that the groaning Spirit cannot be identical with the Holy Spirit. [Not with the Holy Spirit as without us, but as within us.—R.]

SECOND PARAGRAPH, VERS. 28-37.

Ver. 28. And we know [οἶδαμεν δὲ Meyer, Philippi, and others, take δὲ as introducing a general ground after the more special ones in vers. 26, 27. Alford finds it slightly adversative, the antithesis being found in ver. 22. The former is preferable. Οἶδαμεν, Christian consciousness.—R.] The subjective assurance of the future consummation reaches its climax in the fact that believers are lovers of God. But in this form it indicates the objective certainty, which is its lowest foundation. However, instead of the most direct inference, that those who love God are previously beloved by Him, and are established on God's love (an inference controlling this whole section; see vers. 29, 31, 32, 35, 39), the Apostle applies this inference to the condition of Christians in this world. The whole world seems to contradict their hope of future glory. All things visible, especially the hatred of the hostile world, seem to oppose and gainsay their faith. And yet this fearful appearance can have no force, since all things are subject to the omnipotent and wise administration of God, on whose loving counsel their confidence is established. Still more, if all things are subject to God's supreme authority, and this authority is exhibited in the development of His loving counsel, they know, with the full certainty of faith, that all things work together for their good. This follows, first, from the decree, plan, and order of salvation (vers. 28-30). It follows, second, from God's arrangement, act, and facts of salvation (vers. 31-34). It follows, third, from the experience proved in the Old Testament, that the Lord's companions in salvation and the covenant are His companions in suffering, as His companions in conflict; but as His companions in suffering, they are also His companions in victory, for whose glorification all surmounted obstacles are transformed into means of advancement (vers. 35-37). The conclusion (vers. 38, 39) expresses so strongly the subjective, and also the objective certainty of the future completion, that we believe it necessary to make it prominent as a special paragraph.

That all things, πάντα; not merely all events (Meyer), or all afflictions (Tholuck) [Calvin, Hodge, Stuart]; for, besides events (ver. 35), all the powers of the world are mentioned (vers. 38, 39).—Work together, συνεργεῖ. The beautiful and correct term, serve for the good of, must nevertheless follow the more specific definition. For the principal factor of the completion of Christians is the central one: Christ over them and in them, the love of Christ or the Spirit of glory, the free and dominant impulse of their new life. With this first and central factor there now coöperates the second

* [The meaning unutterable, which cannot be expressed in words, is favored by the analogy of verbals in -τος, and is adopted by Luther, Calvin, Beza, Meyer, Tholuck, De Wette, Hodge, Stuart, Alford, and many others. Philippi admits this sense, but includes with it that of unspoken, which are not expressed in words. Comp. 2 Cor. xii. 4; 1 Peter i. 8.—R.]

† [It is held by many commentators (among them Stuart, Hodge, Meyer), that if ὅτι be taken as causal, οἷδε must be rendered approves; i. e., He approves what is the mind of the Spirit, because, &c. Dr. Lange's estimate of Meyer's interpretation is very just, and he seems to be equally correct in denying the necessity for the pregnant sense of οἷδε. Comp. Alford in loco. The E. V. is exceedingly happy in its rendering of this verse.—R.]

‡ [Alford: "All these pleadings of the Spirit are heard and answered, even when inarticulately uttered. We may extend the same comforting assurance to the imperfect and mistaken verbal utterances of our prayers, which are no themselves answered to our hurt, but the answer is given to the voice of the Spirit, which speaks through them, which we would express, but cannot."—R.]

* [See Textual Note 14. Tholuck would refer the ὅτι to the loving God, but the simplest sense is that of coöperating (Bengel, Alford, and others). Meyer, however, finds in it the idea of the fellowship, in which He who supports necessarily stands to him who is supported. So Philippi and others, all taking συνεργεῖ as = βοηθεῖ.—R.]

and peripheral one—that course of all things and all destinies about them which is placed under God's authority and Christ's power, and constitutes their guidance to glorification.

For good, τις ἀγαθόν. Strictly, for good. The article is wanting, for the Apostle has in mind the antithesis: not for evil, injurious, and destructive working; and because every thing shall be useful to them, and promotive, in a special way, of their good. For the good is, the promotion of life. Every good thing of this kind relates, indeed, to the realization of their eternal salvation, but it is not directly this itself (Reiche). [Bengel: In bonum ad glorificationem usque.—R.]

Those who love God [τοῖς ἀγαπῶσιν τὸν θεόν]. Alford: "A stronger designation than any yet used for believers." Comp. 1 Cor. ii. 9; Eph. vi. 24; James i. 12.—R.] The Apostle defines this expression more specifically with reference to its purpose, by the addition:

To those who are called according to his purpose [τοῖς κατὰ πρόθεσιν κλητοῖς οὖσιν]. Yet the addition is not designed to furnish a definition for the explanation of the name, those who love God (Meyer); nor did the Apostle wish thereby to qualify the preceding clause (Rückert), but to represent more clearly the foundation of the life of those who love God, &c. (Tholuck, Fritzsche, Philippi, and others). The intention or purpose of God is the rock of their salvation, and the same purpose directs all things. The love of believers for God is therefore not the ground of their confidence, but the sign and security that they were first loved by God. But the Apostle uses for this another expression, which indicates as well the evidence as the firmness of the love which has gone out for them. The evidence of their salvation lies in the fact that they are called by God to salvation (in the operative κλησις with which the gospel has pervaded their hearts). This evidence refers to the firmness of their salvation in the purpose of God; the genuine κλησις of true Christians depends upon the πρόθεσις, and testifies of it. See Doctr. Notes.*

* [Tholuck: "They are not called merely according to a Divine decree (nude), but according to one whose stages are set forth up to the final goal of the δόξα." Meyer: "The πρόθεσις is the free decree, formed by God in eternity, of saving the believers through Christ (chap. ix. 11; Eph. i. 11; iii. 11; 2 Tim. i. 9, et). According to this, the call of God to the Messianic salvation through the preaching of the gospel (chap. x. 14; 2 Thess. ii. 14) is promulgated to those who are included in that decree. When, therefore, Paul calls the Christians κλητοί, it is self-evident that the call, in their case, meets with success (1 Cor. i. 24), and hence has been united with the converting effect of Divine grace; although this is not found in the word itself, which in that case would be equivalent to ἐλεεινός. . . . Weiss (Jahrbücher für D. Theologie, 1857, p. 79) aptly says: 'Election and calling are inseparable correlative ideas; where one takes place, the other does also; only the former, as a pre-temporal, internally Divine act, cannot be perceived, but the latter, as a historical fact, is made manifest.'" The remarks of Alford in loco may well be appended at this point in the exegesis of the Epistle: "It may suffice to say, that, on the one hand, Scripture bears constant testimony to the fact that all believers are chosen and called by God—their whole spiritual life in its origin, progress, and completion, being from Him; while, on the other hand, its testimony is no less precise that He willeth all to be saved, and that none shall perish except by wilful rejection of the truth. So that, on the one side, God's sovereignty, and, on the other, MAN'S FREE WILL, is plainly declared to us. To receive, believe, and act on both these, is our duty and our wisdom. They belong, as truths, no less to natural than to revealed religion; and every one who believes in a God, must acknowledge both. But all attempts to bridge over the gulf between the two are futile, in Vers. 29, 30. In the following grand and glorious exposition, the Apostle represents God's purpose as being unfolded and realized in its single elements. It is developed as the ante-mundane and eternal foundation of the historical order of salvation in the two parts, foreknowing and predestinating, with reference to the eternal limit, the glory. It is then historically realized in the saving acts of the calling and the justifying. It is finally completed in the glorifying of believers. The foreknowing proceeds, in truth, from eternity to eternity; the predestinating passes from eternity over into time; and finally, the glorifying passes from time over into post-temporal eternity, while in the calling and justifying the two eternities are linked together, and reveal eternity in time.

For whom he foreknew, he also predestinated [οὗς οὖς προέγνω, καὶ προόρισεν]. The twice-repeated πρό comes under the treatment before the examination of the single elements. Tholuck: "According to a later view of Meyer, the πρό expresses only precedence before the call; but it is against the analogy of προγνώσκω in chap. xi. 2; 1 Peter i. 20; and of προορίζω in 1 Cor. ii. 7; Eph. i. 5, 11." It is certainly clear that the Apostle will here establish the eternal end, the δόξα, upon an eternal beginning (ἀρχή).

First element: Whom he foreknew. Tholuck says, that "προγνώσκω has been explained in four different ways, and in such a manner that each of the accepted meanings has its predestinarian as well as its anti-predestinarian advocates." These four definitions are: 1. To know beforehand; 2. To acknowledge beforehand, approbare; 3. To select, or choose beforehand; 4. To determine beforehand, decernere, predestinare.

The knowing beforehand was understood by the Greek and Arminian expositors in an anti-predestinarian sense as the foresight of faith; and by the Lutheran exegetical writers as the foresight of perseverance in the bestowed faith. Meyer: Foreknowledge of those destined for salvation. A knowing of the predestinated beforehand, as, according to Tholuck, was accepted by Augustine in later life, and by Zwingli, is very tautological.* But this view passes over, in reality, into a second: approbavit; and we then have Tholuck's arrangement, by which eight antitheses—four predestinarian and four anti-predestinarian—must be limited, yet not carried out. The approbavit is, indeed, defended in both an Augustinian and an Arminian sense. But, in the former, it coincides with the third view, elegit (Calvin, and others). But if the decernere is also understood in a predestinarian sense, to determine concerning a person, it is only a stronger expression for the elegit in the predestinarian sense. With respect to further treatment of this point, we must refer to the well-known commentaries.

If we turn away from the verbal explanation, there are really but two constructions of this passage, the predestinarian and the anti-predestinarian; in addition to these, there comes at most only the

the present imperfect condition of man." See chap. ix. throughout. He who would understand the Epistle to the Romans, must assume this position, and remember that the difficulty belongs to Theism, not to Christianity alone, much less to the Calvinistic conception of it.—R.]

* [Jowett thus avoids the tautology: "Foreknow, as the internal purpose of God—if such a figure of speech may be allowed; and predestined, as the solemn external act by which He, as it were, set apart His chosen ones." See the view of Dr. Hodge, below.—R.]

term, or intimation of the possibility, of a third. The predestinarian explanation of the word προγνωσκω by "to acknowledge," approbare (Beza, and others), or by decernere, "to determine" (Luther: "ordained," not foreseen), is linguistically untenable; but it is linguistically tenable when explained by to elect beforehand, to choose (Calvin, Rückert, De Wette);* and now means predestination as a doctrinal truth, now as a temporary Pauline view, and now, in the most universal sense possible, the general election for salvation (De Wette, and others).

The anti-predestinarian interpretation of the expression is also varied: the seeing or knowing beforehand of those who are worthy through faith, of those endowed with faith, &c.; and again, in the sense of loving or approving beforehand (Grotius, and others).

As far as a third exposition is concerned, the observation has been made that God's foreknowledge is a loving knowledge (see Tholuck, p. 449), or a creative knowledge, a being placed in the idea of Christ (Neander, Apost. Zeitalter, p. 832).† Yet Neander's explanation does not go to the bottom of the matter. It is this: "Those whom God, in His eternal view, has known as belonging to Him, through Christ, have been predestinated thereto by Him." We are, indeed, in want of a term which definitely expresses the truth that the loving or fixing knowledge is an absolutely original one, which determines the idea of the one to be perceived, but does not predetermine it.‡ Meyer's reminder, that προγνωσκω, in the classical sense, never means any thing but foreknowledge, has no weight here, where we have to do with an ἀπαξ λεγόμενον in the centre of the Christian doctrine of salvation. [See Meyer's note.] The one collective Hebrew term for knowing, loving, being present at, and begetting (Gen. iv. 1), is only a modification of the theocratic thought that God calls by name those who do not yet exist, as if He would be, and in order that He may be, their God (Jer. xxxi. 8; Ps. cxviii. 9; cxlviii. 6). "To call by name" (Isa. xliii. 1) "to grave upon the hands" (Isa. xlix. 16), and similar expressions, denote figuratively the unity of that knowing and loving which fix in idea the subject in its peculiarity (certainly in Christ), in order that, in consequence of the idea, they may be called into existence. The distinction of prescience and predestination in the first foundation of the world, is connected with a defective comprehension of the peculiar character of personal life. (See the Doctr. Notes.)

Second element: He also predestinated. The προορίσειν presupposes God's first determination of man,* which establishes his individuality in relation to other individualities, and to Christ, the centre. Here the question is the predetermination of the historical destiny of the individual, the establishment of the historical guidance to salvation, just as all kindred definitions, together with προορίσειν in Acts iv. 28; 1 Cor. ii. 7; Eph. i. 5-11; ἀπορίσειν in Rom. i. 1; Gal. i. 15; and ὀρίσειν in Acts x. 42; xvii. 26 (where we have ὁρατορία also), are determined by the fundamental thought of the ὅρος, which is the limitation and condition in time and space, that are identical with the destiny in its relation to salvation, the object of man—a relation which reaches its climax in the τάσσειν (Acts xiii. 48). Therefore the Apostle also adds here the destination to conformity to the image of God's Son, undoubtedly with reference to the definite conformity of the historical way of life—through sufferings to glory (chap. vi. 4 ff.; 2 Tim. ii. 11; Heb. ii. 9-11), and to historical confirmation and completion (Phil. ii. 5-11, and elsewhere).

[To be conformed to the image of his Son, συμμορφους τῆς εἰκόνος τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ. The word σύμμορφος is followed by the genitive here; by the dative, Phil. iii. 21. Hence Stuart thinks it is to be taken as a substantive in this case; but Alford remarks that it is like σύμφοτος (chap. vi. 5), in being followed by either. Comp. Kühner, ii. p. 172. It is the accusative of the predicate; see Winer, p. 214.—R.] Evidently, we have to deal here with a specifically new ordination on God's part, though it is in harmony with the previous one. The meaning of μορφή comes into consideration in order to explain more definitely the συμμορφους (to which we need not supply an εἶναι, because the predestination involves a predescription). Tholuck: "The term μορφή means frequently, but not invariably, the phase of the human form, as well as the form in general, and even the μορφή ἐπὶ τῶν (see Plato,

* [So Jowett, Stuart (substantially), and Calvinistic interpreters generally. Dr. Hodge thus presents this view: "It is evident, on the one hand, that προγνωσκω expresses something more than the prescience of which all men and all events are the objects; and, on the other, something different from the προορίσειν (predestination) expressed by the following word: 'whom he foreknew, them he also predestinated.' The predestination follows, and is grounded on the foreknowledge. The foreknowledge, therefore, expresses the act of cognition or recognition—the fixing, so to speak, the mind upon, which involves the idea of selection. If we look over a number of objects with the view of selecting some of them for a definite purpose, the first act is to fix the mind on some, to the neglect of the others; and the second is, to destine them to the proposed end. So God is represented as looking on the fallen mass of men, and fixing on some whom He predestines to salvation. This is the προγνωσκω, the foreknowledge, of which the Apostle here speaks. It is the knowing, fixing upon, or selecting those who are to be predestinated to be conformed to the image of the Son of God." As little can be gained by a philological discussion of the word, and as theological bias will affect the views of many, it need only be added, that the ἀπορίσειν of ver. 28 gives the best clue to the meaning of πρό, in the compounds of this verse; that the words should be as little as possible confused by the introduction of the ideas of approving, loving, &c.; that chap. xi. 2, where προφύσει is used of Israel, most of whom were not saved, does not affect the specific sense here; for there, the matter under discussion is a whole people as a chosen people; here, individuals, who are first of all brought into prominence as personal lovers of God, then as "called according to His purpose;" that the idea of the certainty of salvation is so clearly the main thought of the passage, as to warrant us, where two meanings are presented, in leaning to that which offers the best ground for such security. Hence we adopt the predestinarian view throughout.—R.]

† [This seems to be the view of Wordsworth, and many Anglican divines, who would avoid both Calvinism and Arminianism. Wordsworth is very full, both in his Introduction and notes, upon this subject, but lacks clearness.—R.]

‡ [If any thing is gained in clearness by this distinction, it should by all means be accepted, as distinguishing the foreknowledge from the predestination; but many will fail to find more than a verbal difference in the phrases employed.—R.]

* [Alford: "His foreknowledge was not a mere being previously aware how a series of events would happen, but was coordinate with, and inseparable from, His having pre-ordained all things." That the word means foreordained, predestinated, is certain; that it is here applied to individuals, is obvious; that it implies a preterrestrial act of the Divine mind, is in accordance with the current of thought in the chapter, the scriptural conception of God's purpose, and the use of the word in other passages. It is only one side of the truth, indeed, but the other side is not more firmly established by ignoring this. The only reconciliation of the difficulty is in practical Christian experience, and Paul is addressing himself to this throughout. And we know (ver. 28).—R.]

Phad., pp. 103, 104). Aristotle distinguishes ἰδός, the inward forming power; μορφή, the phenomenal form; and ἐνέργεια, its concrete reality, &c., and συμμορφοῦσθαι, from the conformity of appearance or situation.*

The further definition, conformably to the image, or conformity of the image, which is still stronger, brings the idea of the phenomenal form still more strongly into the light. Therefore Theodoret, Augustine, Fritzsche, and Meyer, would confine the expression merely to a share in the glorified corporeality of Christ (Phil. iii. 21), or to the δόξα (ver. 10). Meyer and De Wette maintain, contrary to Calvin, Grotius, Calovius, and others, that "fellowship of suffering is here remote;" against which view Tholuck observes, that the object is expressed by the subsequent ἰδοῦσθαι. Tholuck, p. 450, says, in speaking of συμμορφούς, "that the grand thought of Christ, as the prototype of all humanity, elevated through sufferings to the δόξα and to the συμβασιλευν τῷ θῷ, occurs in the Scriptures in interchangeable forms; John xii. 26; xvii. 22-24; Rom. viii. 17 (Eph. iv. 13); 2 Tim. ii. 12; 1 John iii. 8; Rev. iii. 21." He also says, on p. 451: "Since mention was made of the sufferings of Christians, many expositors (Calvin, and others) have been led, by reference to Heb. ii. 10, to suppose a conformity to the glory to be obtained through sufferings; but, as Cocceius remarks, this declaration of gradation is justified neither by the expression, nor by the Apostle's purpose." These two statements do not harmonize well. But the predestination of the suffering life, and of the end to be attained, is here a collective idea. The end is historical confirmation "the Lamb that was slain," Rev. v. 12; "these are they which came out of great tribulation," Rev. vii. 14), and the way thither is nothing else than the following of Christ crucified (comp. Heb. ii. 10, 11). A sundering of the two elements thus destroys the specific character of the determination. As doubts in regard to the apparent conformation of believers with Christ himself have been raised into prominence, and attempts have been made to solve them, they will disappear of themselves, if we adhere closely to the idea of the συμμορφούς (see Tholuck, p. 451; Chrysostom: "Ὅτις γὰρ ὁ μονογενὴς ἦν φύσει, τοῦτο καὶ αὐτοὶ γιγνῶσκει κατὰ χάριν, &c.).

[The word σύμμορφος occurs only here and in Phil. iii. 21, where the reference is to the body of Christ. (The cognate verb is found in Phil. iii. 10, in connection with the death of Christ.) The view which restricts the meaning to the glorified corporeality of Christ (Meyer, De Wette), seems scarcely in keeping with the context. Doubtless this is included. We may then choose between the reference to "that entire form, of glorification in body and sanctification in spirit, of which Christ is the perfect pattern, and all His people shall be partakers" (Alford; so Philippi); or may extend it also to the present partaking in sufferings and moral character like His (Stuart, Hodge, Webster and Wilkinson, following Calvin, &c.). There seems to be no objection to this wide reference; in fact, the immediate context rather favors it, but the latter idea (moral character) has perhaps gained too great prominence, in the effort to justify thereby the fact of predestination, as predestination to holiness. The thought of sufferings is not so "remote," as, besides being the keynote of the section (ver. 18), it is implied in ver. 28, and recurs in ver. 31, to be the prominent thought throughout the rest of the chapter.—R.]

That he might be the first-born among many brethren. The εἰς τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸς πρωτότοκον ἐν πολλοῖς ἀδελφοῖς is, at all events, a clause not merely of result, but of purpose. [The reference in the aorists to the past decree of redemption requires us to take this clause as telic.—R.] According to De Wette, the principal thought is, that He, the first-born, might be among many brethren; according to Meyer, that He might be the first-born among many brethren. Tholuck: The chief thought is, the share of the ἀδελφοί in the possession of the First-born. The πρωτότοκος (Col. i. 15-17) implies not merely the element of time and rank (Tholuck), but also that of causal priority; and this element cannot be wanting in the present passage.* The expression therefore denotes, according to the prominence given to His conformity with believers, also his elevation above them; but it is an elevation which is in harmony with inward uniformity, a true fraternization.

We do not think it advisable to lay stress on either the many brethren or on the first-born. The real aim, after all, is Christ (for him, Col. i. 16), but Christ as the first-born (not merely the μονογενὴς of God) among many brethren; therefore the people of His kingdom, a choir of brethren, are to be with Christ, and all around Him. [The end of the foreknowing and predestining is the glorification of Christ in us, His people. The ideas become as inseparable as the glorified brethren themselves are.—R.]

Ver. 30. Them he also called [τούτους καὶ ἐκάλεσεν]. The καλεῖν, like the κλῆσις, is without suffix, since the idea, prepared by the Old Testament קָרָא, is generally known and elucidated; in addition to this, there is a still greater New Testament fundamental conception. The sense is this: called to the community of Christ as to the communion of salvation, to the Supper of the Lord, to life, &c. But as election comprises a twofold idea, a historical (John vi. 70) and a mystical or transcendental one, so does κλῆσις also comprise a twofold conception (Matt. xxii. 14). Evidently, we have here to deal with the idea of an inward κλῆσις; that is, a κλῆσις become inward from a merely external one. Meyer denies that this κλῆσις relates to the inward operations of grace, but holds that the effects of the call result from the relation of preaching to the existing qualification of men. But such an effect is hardly conceivable without the operation of grace. Tholuck opposes any distinction between a vocatio externa and interna, between a vocatio inefficax and efficax. The idea may have been represented one-sidedly by predestinarian theologians; but the fact of the distinction is continually corroborated in every village church where the gospel is preached. We gain no clearer view by the remark, that the spirit of Plato is contained in the Platonic writings, for thousands have not found the Platonic spirit in them. This remark applies only to such spiritualists as, on the one hand, place the "dead" word without the spirit, or, on the other, the spirit without the word. We may enlarge by saying, that if the κλῆσις stands midway between προσκήρυξις and the δικαιοσύνη, the specific idea necessarily becomes apparent. The καλεῖν is that effect of God's word completed in the gospel, which is divided into illumination and awakening. It is prepared by the effect of the προοπίαν: Laboriousness and burdensomeness (Matt. xi. 28); it unites with these, and, by conversion through penitence and by believing confidence, prepares the δικαιοσύνη for saving faith.* But, of course, if the question is concerning the κλητοί, the κλητός also comprises the δικαιοσύνη, and even the beginnings of the δοξάζειν.—In that case, also the idea of the δικαιοῦν between καλεῖν and δοξάζειν results in the most definite way (see chap. iii.).

* [Comp. Lange's Comm., Colossians, p. 21 ff. on πρωτότοκος, where all three ideas are involved, that of time being specially prominent there.—R.]

[Them he also justified, τούτους καὶ ἰδικοῖσιν. See the exhaustive notes of Dr. Schaff, pp. 180 ff., 188 ff.—R.]

And whom he justified, them he also glorified [οὓς δὲ ἰδικώσιν, τούτους καὶ δόξασιν]. The exegetical writers begin here to wonder at the aorist, while their surprise ought to have begun at least with the ἐκάλειν. For, at the time when the Apostle wrote these words, only a very few of the whole future body of believers were really called. Therefore the aorist ἰδόξασιν cannot stand here for the future (according to Vorstius and Glass), nor for the present (according to Köllner), nor in the sense of taking care of (according to Platt). Meyer holds that the Apostle here describes the actually certain future glorification as so necessary and certain, that it is the same as if it had already taken place.† Tholuck regards the aorist here as the prophetic preterite. [So Stuart.]

We will now consider more particularly the antithesis which Meyer calls special attention to—that Grotius, and others, have regarded the act of δοξάζειν as having only happened in the purpose of God,‡ but that Chrysostom, and others, on the contrary, have referred the δόξα to the gift of grace in this world. The Apostle's starting-point is evidently his present time, the fellowship of the κλητοί and of the δικαιοῦμενοι in which he stands. This is even literally established, in a certain relation, by the expression, καὶ ἰδόξασιν. For δοξάζειν means not merely to invest one with δόξα at the end of time, but to lead gradually by the πνεῦμα τῆς δόξης (1 Peter iv. 14) to glory. The whole guidance of believers is δοξασμός in the biblical sense. This δοξασμός had therefore already begun for the companions of the Apostle, and, in his believing confidence, it was just as good as completed (see vers. 38, 39).* But if the Apostle had merely wished to describe this standpoint of the Christians of that day—that is, merely the standpoint of experience—he would have had to commence with the οὓς ἐκάλειν, and return from the οὓς ἰδικώσιν to προέβλεπον, and finally to προέγνω. But he has changed the statement of his experience of that period into a doctrinal statement for all time, in order to exhibit the πρόθεσις of God in its full splendor. His aorists has then chiefly a historical meaning. Many had already completely passed over this stationary way; for example, Stephen, and James the Elder. In the same manner this way had, and will always have, to many, a distinguishing meaning; that is, it applies to the secure developing progress of the elect in a special sense. It has, finally, for all: a. a methodological meaning; that is, they experience here the final consequence of God's saving acts in the ordo salutis; b. the meaning of evangelical promise. If they stand in the circle of the κλητός and δικαιοσύνη, they can be certain, retrospectively, of their election and foreordination (historical determination), and prospectively certain of their guidance to glory. Paul assumes throughout the ethical facts and conditions that correspond to these acts of God; but he does not name them here, because the connection requires that the superiority of the Divine ground of salvation to human weakness should alone be glorified † (see Doctr. Notes).

Ver. 31. What then shall we say to these things? [Τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν πρὸς ταῦτα. On τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν, comp. chap. iii. 5; iv. 1; vi. 1; vii. 7; ix. 14, where it introduces a false conclusion; here, and chap. ix. 30, a correct one; De Wette.—R.] Tholuck: "Τί ἐροῦμεν is used here, contrary to the Apostle's custom, in a conclusion which has not a doubtful character." But the apparently doubtful element lies in the conclusion which might be drawn, that the Christian can have no opposition. He has, indeed, says Paul, no veritable opposition; all the opposition that he really has, only helps him. What follows from the fact that God has so securely established our salvation through all its stages?‡ The conclusion is this:

If God is for us, who is against us? [Εἰ ὁ θεὸς ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, τίς καθ' ἡμῶν;] (Ps. xci. 1-7). Every thing which is against us, in

* [As the Apostle is speaking of God's acts, not ours, there is no mention of faith, or any other human exercises, and there need be none; for who can misunderstand him, when this side of the matter is in question? The justice of Dr. Lange's view of "called" is apparent. For the whole verse with remarkable particularity declares that the same persons were predestinated, called, justified, glorified; and to understand by the calling only the general invitation to believe and accept the gospel, weakens the force of the passage. Besides, it is not true that those whom God invites to believe through the gospel, He justifies also, and glorifies. To admit this, is to obliterate the distinction between the wayward and fruitful hearers (Matt. xiii. 18-23)—to fly in the face of fact, as well as the plain teaching of the Word of God. Dr. Hodge, and Calvinistic interpreters generally, make "called" = effectually called. Undoubtedly the call is effectual, linked inseparably with predestination and justification; but since the technical meaning of effectual calling is really regeneration, we may hesitate in giving to the word here used a force so extended. The subjective aspect of effectual calling is not introduced, at all events, we have only the order of the Divine acts respecting the salvation of individuals, as presenting the objective certainty of that salvation.—R.]

† [So Philippi, De Wette. Alford combines with it that of Grotius, much as Dr. Lange does: "The aorist ἰδόξασιν being used, as the other aorists, to imply the completion in the Divine counsel of all these, which are to us, in the state of time, so many successive steps—simultaneously and irrevocably."—R.]

‡ [Dr. Hodge adopts a modification of this view, though he suggests that the aorist may imply frequency, almost = the present. Neither of these seem so satisfactory as that of Meyer, or that of Lange himself.—R.]

* [The omission of "them he also sanctified" which we would expect to find in the chain, were "glorified" limited to the future, is a sufficient ground for this position of Dr. Lange, and favors also the view, that the certainty is prominent, rather than the completion of all these in the purpose of God. Of course, the objective certainty rests on this completion in God's purpose, but the latter is included only by implication.—R.]

† [As the whole passage can only be of encouragement when viewed in this light, Wordsworth deprives it of its force entirely, when he says that the Church of England teaches: "She considers these things as done; for in God's will, and, on His side, they are done, for all members of the visible Church of Christ;" and then makes the whole matter so dependent on us, "that, unless we perform our part, all God's gracious purposes toward us will fail of their effect." See his lengthy notes, which touch (scarcely grapple) this difficult subject.—R.]

‡ [Meyer takes vers. 31-39 as a conclusion from vers. 29, 30; "The Christian has, then, nothing to fear that can be detrimental to his salvation, but he is, with the love of God in Christ, certain of this salvation." This whole passage (notice the logical relation of ἐν, ver. 29, and ὅτι, ver. 31.) is a commentary on v. r. 28;—and what a commentary.—R.]

an earthly sense, must, in a heavenly sense, promote our welfare through God's sovereignty. [How God is for us, has been set forth; the question therefore implies, not doubt, but joyous certainty. Hence the E. V. is not strong enough.—R.] This confidence of the Apostle, in opposition to the hostile forces of the world, assumes a bold and almost challenging tone. Tholuck: "There begins with this expression a series of victorious questions and triumphant answers, in reference to which Erasmus exclaims: 'Quid unquam Cicero dixit grandiloquentius?' Just such a triumphant acclamation is found in 1 Cor. xv. 54."

[Philippi: "In fact, as vers. 19-23 may be called a sacred elegy, so we may term vers. 31-39 a sacred ode; that is as tender and fervent as this is bold and exalted in matter and in manner; that, an amplification of 'we do groan, being burdened' (2 Cor. v. 4); this, a commentary on 'this is the victory that overcometh the world' (1 John v. 4). Augustine, De doctr. christi, iv. 20, cites ver. 31 as an example of the grandi cuncti genus, quod non tam verborum ornatibus cerutum est, quam violentum animi affectibus.—Satis enim est ei propter quod agitur, ut verba congruentia, non oris eligantur industria, sed pectoris sequantur ardorem. Nam si aurato gemmatoque ferro vir fortis armatur, intentissimus pugna, agit quidem illis armis quod agit, non quia pretiosa, sed quia arma sunt."—R.]

Ver. 32. He who spared not his own Son [ὅς γε τοῦ ἰδίου υἱοῦ οὐκ ἐφείσατο. Meyer, and others, take this as an interrogative answer to the preceding question. It does indeed answer it, but is, at the same time, an advance (see below). The enclitic γε has the force of even, quippe qui, but Alford is not justified in saying that this takes "one act as a notable example out of all;" for this is the crowning proof of love, including all the others, and hence establishing the main clause: how shall he not, &c.—R.] After the Apostle has described negatively, in ver. 31, the elevation of God's children above the hostile world, he portrays it positively in ver. 32. The logical construction is as follows: God, who has already established our δόξα, is for us, with the whole energy of His purpose. a. He is for us in person as our protector, and therefore no person and no thing can be against us; b. He is for us to such a degree that He gave His Son* for us. Οὐκ ἐφείσατο involves here two ideas: He did not save Him (Bengel: paterno suo amoris quasi vim adhibuit), and, He did not spare Him.

But delivered him up for us all [ἀλλὰ ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν πάντων παρέδωκεν αὐτόν. On the verb, comp. chap. iv. 25. On the preposition ὑπὲρ, in behalf of, comp. chap. v. 6.—R.]. Deliverance to death for us, for our redemption.† The notion which would explain John iii. 16 as a "deliverance to finiteness" (mentioned by Tholuck on p. 455), belongs rather to the philosophy of Schelling in his early period, than to the christological standpoint.

[Freely give us all things? τὰ πάντα ἡμῖν χαρίζεται; A question a majori ad minus (Meyer). Philippi and Meyer join καὶ with πῶς οὐχί, not with σὺν αὐτῷ. It is perhaps more grammatical, but the thought is still the same: that with Christ, and because of Christ, all else shall come.—R.] Τὰ πάντα. Tholuck: "Every thing which we need." This is against Brenz, who explains thus: "All the blessings comprised in Christ." But why not simply, every thing, in harmony with ver. 17 and 1 Cor. iii. 22? For, after all, we "need" every thing, and the "blessings comprised in Christ" are the whole universe. Therefore the σὺν is not merely based on the idea of the προσθήκη.

Vers. 33-35. Two lines of the certainty of salvation have been drawn from the one fundamental idea of the ἀλλῶς κατὰ πρόθεσιν; that is, of the assurance of salvation. There is, first, the line of the certainty of individual, inward, and personal salvation (vers. 28, 30); the causa principalis: grace. Then we have, second, the line of historical salvation, which corresponds with the first line as the causa mediatrix. This latter appears as the almighty gift of salvation, in opposition to the contradiction of the world. As the Apostle looks at the fearful appearance of this contradiction, he now presents throughout the negative character of the historical salvation. That is, he develops the thought placed at the outset—that nothing can be against us, because God is for us; so very much for us, that He delivered even His Son for us. But the Apostle then brings out the fact, though more indirectly, that God will, with Him, also freely give us all things. Thus there is, first of all, the exalted mediation of salvation. "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?"

Different constructions of the following three verses (vers. 33-35):

a. Vers. 33 and 34 are antitheses which must be read as question and answer, according to our translation. [So E. V.] (See Luther, Castalio, Beza, Calvin, Fritzsche, Philippi [Stuart, Hodge], and others.)

b. The three answers also stand in the form of questions, thus: Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? Will God, who justifieth, do it? Who is He that condemneth? Will Christ, who died for us, do it? (This is the view of Augustine, Ambrose, Koppe, Reiche, Olshausen, De Wette [Alford, Webster and Wilkinson, Jowett], and others.)

c. An altered form of presenting the antitheses: 1. Who shall lay any thing to the charge? Answer: It is God that justifieth; who, therefore, is He that condemneth? 2. Answer: It is Christ that died, &c., who also maketh intercession for us; who, therefore, shall separate us from the love of Christ? This construction of the antithesis, which was laid down by Origen, Chrysostom, and Theodoret, has been neglected by nearly all recent expositors, but is urgently recommended by Meyer. [Wordsworth follows it in his text, but is impressively silent on the subject in his notes. See Meyer, not only in defence of his own view, but for a resumé of other opinions.—R.]

Tholuck very properly remarks, in opposition to

* [His own Son. Tholuck, Olshausen, Philippi, Stuart, Hodge, and many others, find an implied antithesis here, viz., his adopted sons (ver. 19, &c.), to which Meyer and De Wette object. At all events, the emphasis resting on ἰδίου requires us to understand it as son in a specific sense, μονογενῆς. The christological bearing of the passage is unmistakable.—R.]

† [Most commentators admit the special reference to death. It is not necessary to restrict it to this, but the thought is certainly prominent in Paul's expressions concerning Christ.—Us all, evidently means believers here. The value or the efficacy of the atonement is not brought into view at all. To this commentators of all doctrinal tendencies agree.—R.]

this third combination of sentences, as follows: "It can be least satisfactory of all; for, if we adopt it, that rhetorical conformity of the sentences is lost which is apparent in the other constructions," &c. But this construction not merely obliterates the grand simplicity of the antitheses, but also obscures their real order. The question, Who shall lay any thing to the charge? remains totally unanswered. But, on the contrary, the question, Who is He that condemneth? would receive two answers: first, the expression, "it is God that justifieth," and afterward, "it is Christ that died," &c. In addition to this, the clear thoughts, justification, in ver. 33, the atonement, in ver. 34, and holiness or glorification, in vers. 35-37, would be totally confused.

The second construction appears to be favored by the fact, that the third question, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" seems, in turn, to be answered by a rhetorical question (tribulation, or distress, &c.). But the third question is continued through vers. 35 and 36, and the answer to it follows in a positive declaration in ver. 37.

Thus elegance of both form and matter pronounces in favor of the antithesis of three questions and three answers. If it be objected, that the answers would be still strengthened by the form of rhetorical questions, we might reply, that they would indeed be strengthened even to overstraining and obscurity. For there are, indeed, accusers and condemners enough against believers, which is plain from what follows: tribulation, distress, persecution, &c. But the principal thing is, that they stand as accusers against the justifying God himself, and as condemners of the future Judge of the world, Christ the Messiah, who is the Saviour of believers; and therefore, that their charge and condemnation are not only impotent, but must even advance the glory of believers, just as tribulation, distress, persecution, &c., are not only unable to separate them from the love of Christ, but must establish them in His love as decided victors. But Paul could hardly have expressed, even in the form of a rhetorical question, the thought that God could be the accuser of believers, and Christ could be their condemner, even if we consider the question apart from the fact that he would thereby have destroyed the antithesis: if God be for us, who can be against us? Meyer remarks, against the former construction, that ὁ θεὸς ὁ δικάων and τίς ὁ κατακρίνων would be essentially correlative. This is altogether incorrect. The δικαίωσις removes the charge of condemnation; the atonement made by Christ abolishes the condemnation itself. That Paul did not write τίς κατακρίνει to correspond with the τίς ἐξυπακούει, is not only unimportant, but is based upon the supposition that there could be many accusers, but that there could be only one condemner at the tribunal. Meyer holds that, by the first construction, Christ must have been represented as Judge, in harmony with the ὁ κατακρίνων in ver. 34. But apart from the consideration that Christ opposes all the worldly condemnations of men pronounced on unbelievers, by interceding for them at God's right hand, we hold that the reading Χριστὸς Ἰησοῦς (the Sinaiticus favors the same), which seems to have been early given up from a misconception, serves as a satisfactory explanation. As, therefore, the first sentence is: God is the justifier, the second is this: Christ the Messiah, the expected Judge of the world, is Ἰησοῦς ὁ ἀποθάνων. The article before Ἰησοῦς is given with the adjective designations.* Tholuck has declined to decide concerning the punctuation.

[The pointing adopted in the E. V. has been fully defended by Dr. Lange, that the following remarks will suffice in addition. (1.) Even the most rhetorical style would scarcely indulge in seventeen successive questions, without an answer, as view δ. would maintain. (2.) View c. disturbs the flow of the passage, without adding to this force. (3.) The grand thought of the certainty of salvation seems to be even more fully established by accepting three questions and three answers following each in turn, while there is no reasonable objection to the correspondence thus claimed between each question and its answer.—R.]

Ver. 33. Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? [τίς ἐξυπακούει κατὰ ἐλεγκτῶν θεοῦ; The verb is usually followed by the dative, only here with κατὰ. The article is omitted with ἐλεγκτῶν, giving prominence to the attribute of the persons (Meyer). That it refers to the persons under discussion throughout, is obvious.—R.] The idea of the ἐκτίσθαι theocratically resting on the Old Testament יְהוָה, corresponds with that of the προνομία; but in the concrete name of the ἐλεγκτοί, it denotes the deepest establishment of the whole character of believers in the εὐδοκία of God (see Doctr. Notes).

It is God that justifieth! [θεὸς ὁ δικάων!] The expression is more energetic than ὁ θεὸς δικάων; comp. Matt. x. 20 (Philippi). The θεός, occurring immediately after θεοῦ, has a rhetorical emphasis (Meyer).—R.] According to Tholuck, the question really is the intercessor in opposition to the charge, and, on the other hand, the δικαίων in opposition to the κατακρίνων. But this would not correspond with the connection. As the authorized accusers, the law and the conscience, are silenced in the δικαίωσις, which God himself executes, we must here have in mind principally the weakness of the unauthorized accusers, at whose head stands Satan, κατήγορος (Origen), who opposes Christians not only in heathen adversaries (Photius, Theophylact, Grotius), but also in Jewish adversaries. The δικαίων has evidently here also a forensic meaning. Tholuck: "Luther excellently says, in harmony with the sense, 'God is here.'"

Ver. 34. Who is he that condemneth? The ὁ κατακρίνων declares, that in an authorized form there can only be one, the Messiah, but it is just He who is their propitiator and intercessor.

It is Christ, &c. [Χριστὸς ἀποθάνων, &c.] The Apostle expresses complete deliverance from condemnation in four essential elements of Christ's redeeming work. In the two elements of His death and resurrection there is comprised full deliverance from the real guilt of condemnation (see chap. iv. 25); and in His sitting at the right hand of God, and in His intercession, there is comprised

* [As remarked in Textual Note 16, this view is doubly doubtful. The reading is quite uncertain, and to render Χριστὸς Ἰησοῦς, Christ is Jesus, is almost fanciful. Dr. Lange's remark that the article (which might have been expected before Ἰησοῦς, were this the meaning) is found in the attributive clause (ὁ ἀποθάνων), will not meet the grammatical objection. So forced a construction would be admissible only in the absence of any other satisfactory explanation. Certainly the thought that the slain yet risen Christ shall judge the world, that our Intercessor is really the only Condemner, is not so unscriptural or unapostolic as to create a difficulty from which we must escape by this singular exegesis.—R.]

His protection against the unauthorized accusers from without, and the condemnatory results of the injury of the new life from within.—Meyer: “μᾶλλον δὲ καὶ,” a higher degree of importance: immo adeo. The δὲ καὶ has a somewhat festive sound.”

Ver. 35. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? [τίς ἡμᾶς χωρίσει ἀπὸ τῆς ἀγάπης τοῦ Χριστοῦ;] The reading τοῦ Θεοῦ is but weakly supported. Meyer, with Tholuck, De Wette, Philippi, and others, properly says in favor of the construction Χριστοῦ, that it is the genitive subjective; and, therefore, that it denotes Christ's love toward His followers (see vera. 37, 39). But when he says that this forbids the interpretation of others who understand it to be love for Christ (Origen, Köllner [see Forbes, p. 332, on this view], and others), his remark is only correct in form; for, in reality, confidence in love on Christ's part for His children cannot be separated from love for Him (see ver. 28).† The afflictions which now follow are personified by τίς [instead of τι, which we might expect].

But how is the possibility of this separation to be regarded? Meyer: A possible sundering of men from the influx of Christ's love by intervening hindrances. De Wette: The joyous sense of being beloved by Christ. Philippi: Afflictions can seem to us to be an indication of Divine wrath, and thus mislead us into unbelief in Divine love. Tholuck: The firmness of the consciousness of this Divine relation of love. The sense of the question is this: Can an affliction lead us to fall from the operation and experience of Christ's love? By answering in the negative, there is assumed not merely the Divine purpose of grace according to the predestinarian view, and also not merely the purity and perseverance of faith according to the Arminian view, but the connection between the two, the new bond which is secured by the recognition of tribulation, distress, &c., as powers overcome by Christ, and made serviceable to His love itself.

Shall tribulation, &c. [Θλίψις, κ.τ.λ.] The forms of affliction are in harmony with the relations of Christians at that time, and especially of the Apostle; there is the apparently fearful number seven, but the seventh leads to the triumphant conclusion in martyrdom. First of all, believers are pressed into anxiety by the world. [On Θλίψις and στενοχωρία, see ii. 9, p. 99, the former external, the latter internal.—R.] Then there comes persecution itself, which drives them out to famine and nakedness; the end is peril, the danger of death, and sword, death itself.

Ver. 36. As it is written [καθὼς γέγραπται ὅτι. “Ὅτι” is the usual quotation-mark.]

* [See Textual Note 17. The καὶ before δοτὶν is also omitted in N¹. A. C., but inserted in the majority of MSS.—R.]

† [Calvin adds a third meaning: our sense of Christ's love to us. This is implied in the excellent remarks of Dr. Hodge: “The great difficulty with many Christians is, that they cannot persuade themselves that Christ (or God) loves them; and the reason why they cannot feel confident of the love of God, is, that they know they do not deserve His love; on the contrary, that they are in the highest degree unlovely. But it is the very thing we are required to believe, not only as the condition of peace and hope, but as the condition of salvation. If our hope of God's mercy and love is founded on our own goodness or attractiveness, it is a false hope. We must believe that His love is gratuitous, mysterious, without any known or conceivable cause, certainly without the cause of loveliness in its object.”—R.]

Psalms xlv. 22, according to the Septuagint.* This Psalm contains a description of the sufferings which God's people had to suffer for the Lord's sake, and is therefore correctly regarded by Paul as a typical and prophetic prelude to the sufferings of the New Testament people of God for God's sake. De Wette does not regard the passage as a prophecy (Tholuck),† but thinks that Paul probably cites it as prophecy. But even Tholuck's expression, “a real parallel to the conflicts of God's ancient people,” is by no means sufficient for the idea of typical prophecy, for the type is much more than a parallel.

Ver. 37. Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors [ἀλλ' ἐν ταῦτοις νᾶσιν, κ.τ.λ.]. Some connect this with ver. 35, and hence ver. 36 has been made parenthetical; but there is no necessity for this, since the course of thought is unbroken, and this verse is antithetical to both vera. 35 and 36.—R.] That is, far beyond the necessary measure (ὕπερμετρον). Recollection of prayers for persecutors (Stephen), hymns of praise in prison (Paul and Silas), and the joyous spirit of the martyrs.

Through him who loved us [διὰ τοῦ ἀγαπήσαντος ἡμᾶς. See Textual Note 17.] Meyer refers the aorist to “the distinguished act of love which Christ has performed by the offering of His own life.” Though this reference is undoubtedly correct, there is something inadequate in the translation, loved. The aorist ἐτίθει does not merely affirm that they believed, but that they became believers (see John x. 42); and thus the act of our Lord's only revelation of love also involves here the continuation of that relation: who has proved and bestowed His love.—Through him. The reading διὰ τὸν (Semler, Koppe: propter) is a smoother exegetical interpretation.‡ Chrysostom, Theodoret, Bengel, and Fritzsche, refer the expression ἀγαπήσας to God; but on account of ver. 39, Rückert, De Wette, Tholuck, Meyer, and Philippi, on the contrary, refer it to Christ. This latter view is favored by the relation of the present passage to τοῦ Χριστοῦ in ver. 35, as the aorist serves as an intimation of the historical fact of redemption. The expression, “through Him that loved us,” denotes not only Christ's assistance in general, but the power of His victory. As His death is principally our death, and His resurrection is our resurrection, so is His victory also our victory through faith (1 John v. 4). But the power of this victory is divided into the subjective principle of victory in the heart of believers, and the objective victorious principle of Christ's rule at the right hand of God. Nevertheless, the Apostle does not say, “through Him who hath conquered for us,” because Christ's love shall be manifested as the permanent motive of the free and ethical loving life of Christians in their faith.

* [In the LXX., Ps. xlii. 22. The only variation is δοτὶν here, on the authority of N. A. B. D. F. L., while (Ecc.) O. K. have ἔνεκα. It must be remarked, however, that the reading of the LXX. itself varies in the same manner.—R.]

† [So Alford: “It is no new trials to which we are subjected: what if we verify the ancient description?”—R.]

‡ [This would refer to Him as the efficient cause; but since the context clearly upholds the reference to Christ, it scarcely seems a “smoother exegetical interpretation” than that which presents Him as the instrumental cause. It represents the union in victory as more intimate to follow the better supported reading, διὰ τοῦ ἀγ.—R.]

THIRD PARAGRAPH, VERS. 38, 39.

Tholuck: "Ἐνθὺς γενόμενος, as Chrysostom says, embraces the whole world—who can rob him of his consciousness of the love of God?" But he has here passed beyond the consciousness of opposition which he had uttered in vers. 38-39. He rather proclaims here the absolute subjection of all the powers of the world to the consciousness, or rather conscious being, of God's love in Christ.

The Apostle declares the immovableness of his confidence, first of all by the decided πίπισμα, I am persuaded. He follows this up by portraying the powers of the world in great antitheses, which not only describe the victorious career of the individual Apostle through the world and through time, but, in prophetic sublimity, comprise the whole victorious career of God's people until the end of the world.

Tholuck distinguishes the antitheses thus: 1. Human events (death and life); 2. Superhuman spheres (angels, principalities; afterwards δυνάμεις); 3. Time (things present, things to come), in which he thinks that the δυνάμεις belonging here, according to A. B. C., &c., disturbs the sense; 4. Space (height and depth). The more general form of this description in relation to the oppositions represented above, appears especially in the fact that here the question is evidently not merely concerning threatening or hostile powers, but also such as can exert a seductive, misleading, and relaxing influence. Accordingly, we have not merely to regard an objective influence of these forces, but also the possibility of the subjective misconstruction of their operations.

Neither death, nor life, [οὐτε θάνατος, οὐτε ζωή]. If we look closely at the possibilities above referred to, we shall see that, first of all, with death there is connected the fear of death and the darkness of the kingdom of death; and, with life, that there is connected the charm of life and the love of life, or even the apparent distance from the Lord (Heb. ii. 14; John xvi. 33; 2 Cor. v. 5, 6). On death and life, see chap. xiv. 8. Grotius: metus mortis, spes vitæ, which Meyer objects to; but his objection to Koppe's interpretation, which is as follows, is more appropriate: quidquid est in rerum natura: aut vivat, aut vitæ careat.

Nor angels, nor principalities, [οὐτε ἄγγελοι, οὐτε ἀρχαί. See Textual Note ¹⁹, and below.] As far as the second category is concerned, the Apostle could not think that God's angels should desire to separate him from the love of Christ, but, according to Col. ii., the Gnostic Jews soon opposed a morbid adoration of angels to a pure and full resignation to Christ as their head; and even Pharisaic Jewish Christians would have been quite capable of adulterating the pure gospel, according to Gal. i. 8, by an appeal to angelic revelation. But it is well known how the subsequent worship of angels really led to an obscuring of the sun of Christ's love.

The threat of the powers of the Gentile world then takes its place beside the Jewish angelic visions. It is plain enough that the ἀρχαί named with the ἄγγελοι, cannot again mean "angelic powers" (Meyer). The Apostle had to deal more and more with the powers of the Gentile world (2 Tim. iv. 17). The ἄγγελοι are interpreted by Chrysostom, Theophylact, Beza, Meyer, and others, as good angels, "because the evil angels are never called ἄγγελοι without some qualifying expression." Meyer opposes the objection of Reiche, and others, that good angels could not make such an attempt to separate Christians from God, by saying that Paul, in Gal. i. 8, did not believe this possibility, but only presented it hypothetically. According to Clement of Alexandria, Grotius [Stuart], and others, the ἄγγελοι denote evil angels; but according to Bucer, Bengel [Hodge], and others, good and evil angels. Melancthon has interpreted the ἀρχαί as human tyrants, because he correctly saw that they, being placed beside ἄγγελοι, could not themselves be angels.

[The difficulty in deciding the meaning of the word ἀρχαί arises from the fact that it is used in the New Testament in all the senses given above. The prevailing reference is undoubtedly to superhuman creatures (Eph. iii. 10; vi. 12; Col. i. 16; ii. 10, 15). It seems more natural to take δυνάμεις (in its separate position) as "earthly powers," especially as that meaning here gives an anti-climax. The disposition to insert δυνάμεις immediately after, shows that a classification of angels was assumed here (comp. Eph. i. 21; Col. i. 16). Whether we should understand good angels, or bad, or both, is more difficult to determine. To take "angels" as referring to the former, and "principalities" to the latter, gives an abrupt antithesis; to refer both to good angels, leaves evil spirits out of view in this extended catalogue, unless we find them named in δυνάμεις; to refer both words to both classes (Bengel, Hodge), is perhaps least objectionable, yet with this view the absence of any attribute is remarkable. Still, we infer from other passages that both good and bad angels were classified somewhat in this manner, ἀρχαί denoting a superior order. Comp. Lange's Comm., Colossians, i. 16, p. 22.—R.]

The δυνάμεις, which Melancthon interprets as the warlike hosts of tyrants, do not belong here, and therefore still less in the category of angels. They belong in the third category: Nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers [οὐτε ἐνστώτα, οὐτε μέλλοντα,* οὐτε δυνάμεις]. (See 1 Cor. iii. 22.) The present time was so grievous to Paul and the believers of his period, that they earnestly longed for the second coming of our Lord (1 Thess.).; but even the future had a gloomy aspect, for our Lord's coming was to be preceded by the apostasy, and by the appearance of Antichrist (2 Thess. ii.). But with this appearance there were to come just these gloomy, seductive, and Satanic forces (ἐν πάσῃ δυνάμει καὶ σμύτῃ καὶ τέρασι ψεύδους). We thereby hold that Tholuck's objection, that the δυνάμεις† would here "disturb the sense in a threefold way," is removed (p. 463). The one objection, that it would disturb the bipartite rhythm, is removed by Meyer's observation, that the Apostle first arranges by couples, and then combines the three parts twice more. According to Tholuck, the δυνάμεις would be first introduced, and then removed. Meyer urges that ἐνταύθα does not mean things present, but things standing before—those which are about to enter. Thus things present are distinguished from things to come. De Wette opposes to Glöckler's interpretation of δι' αὐτῶν as miracles, that of powers.

† [Meyer takes δυνάμεις in its widest sense: powers of every kind. Undoubtedly, if the order of Rec. could be adopted, a difficulty would be avoided. (Dr. Hodge takes no notice of the correct reading.) It seems strange that the evil forces should be introduced here. The simplest solution, to my mind, is that which refers this word to earthly powers, since it is connected with "things present, things to come." This is still more probable, if "angels" and "principalities" be taken as including all superhuman created beings.—R.]

Fourth category: [Nor height, nor depth, οὐτὶ ὕψωμα, οὐτὶ βάθος.] The Apostle looks down from the height of an inspired sense of life, many times elevated to heaven (2 Cor. xii. 2), which could well have become to him a temptation (2 Cor. xii. 7), into the depth of the demoniacal kingdom, with which he had to fight a spiritual conflict with his contemporaries (Eph. vi. 12), as well as into the depth of the realm of the dead in which he had, at all events, to pass through a painful unclothing (2 Cor. v. 4); but he saw in the future altogether new forms of the world arise, whose strangeness and splendor, by their attractiveness, could be regarded as dissipating his view from Christ, the centre.

Tholuck: "ὕψωμα, βάθος. Explanations: Heaven and hell (Theodoret, and others; Bengel, Baumgarten-Crusius); heaven and earth (Theophylact, Fritzsche); happiness and unhappiness (Koppe); honor and shame (Grotius); lofty and lowly (Olearius); higher and lower evil spirits (Origen). Sapientia hæreticorum et communis vulgi furor (Melancthon)." [The generic idea here is that of space. If a more specific definition is required, heaven and hell is the simplest explanation, though this cannot be insisted on as the precise meaning.—R.]

Nor any other created thing. In connection with the great antithesis of height and depth, the τίς τις ἄλλος can hardly mean merely "any thing else created" (Meyer), or a creature in general (Luther, Tholuck).

Shall be able . . . love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. The love of God in Christ, or Christ himself, is now perceived by believers as the all-prevailing principle, and is therefore spiritually appropriated by them (Eph. i.).—The absolute δι' αὐτοῦ is for them also in the ethical sense. It is the completed revelation of the love of God in Christ, overcoming the world and bringing it into their service, by which believers are embraced, and which they in turn have embraced (chap. v. 8).

[Alford: "God's love to us in Christ; to us, as we are in Christ; to us, manifested in and by Christ." Stuart thus sums up: "This is indeed 'an anchor sure and steadfast, entering into that within the vail;'—a blessed, cheering, glorious hope, which only the gospel and atoning blood can inspire."—On the parallelism between chaps. v. and viii., see Forbes, pp. 338 ff.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

FIRST PARAGRAPH, VERS. 18-27.

A. The groaning of the creature* (vers. 18-22).

1. The Scriptures ascribe to the whole universe, even to the heavenly regions, the necessity of the renewal of created being by transformation (Ps. cii. 26-28; Isa. li. 6; Rev. xxi. 6); but they distinguish between the regions of glory, which are renewed, and the present form of the world, which must be renewed by passing through corruption and the destruction of the world (2 Peter iii. 10, 23). The throne of God, the ascension of Christ. Even astronomy recognizes this great contrast between the regions of prevalent growth and of prevalent completed existence in the nature of light (see my work, Das Land der Herrlichkeit, pp. 42 ff.). But also in reference to the sphere of humanity, which does not embrace merely the earth (also Sheol), we must distinguish between the pure condition of nature in its antithesis to perfection (1 Cor. xv. 47 ff.), and the obscurity which nature has experienced in consequence of sin; see the present passage. According to the nature of the ἀνθρώπος χοϊκός, his whole sphere stood in need of development—in need of a metamorphosis (2 Cor. v. 1 ff.; 1 Cor. xv. 50); but this development has become abnormal through sin; and the metamorphosis has, by a metastasis, become death in the pregnant sense, θάνατος, corruption. But from this correspondence of nature with the human world in the state of fall and decay, there also follows an expectation of their correspondence in the delivering restoration which will be also the completion of the normal development.

2. The Holy Scriptures everywhere render prominent the coherence and correspondence between the spiritual and natural world. There must be a heaven, because there are heavenly objects—because there is a God—because there are angels and saints. There must be a hell, because there are devils. Thus Paradise corresponded with Adam in his state of innocence; the cursed ground, with fallen man; the Promised Land, as the type of the future Paradise, with the typical people of God; a darkening and desolation of the land with every religious and moral decline of the people (Deut. xxviii. 15 ff.; Isa. xxiv. 17; Joel ii.; Zeph. i. 14, &c.), and with every spiritual period of salvation an exaltation of nature (Deut. xxviii. 8 ff.; Ps. lxxii.; Isa. xxv. 6 ff.; Isa. xxxv.; Hosea ii. 21, &c.); and thus the sun was darkened at the death of Christ, and the renewal of the earth was announced by the earthquake at His death. Now this parallelism extends in a more intense degree through the New Testament period, both as to the overthrow of the old form of the world, and the sufferings preceding it (Luke xvi. 25; 2 Peter iii. 10; Rev. xvi. 1 ff.), and as to the renewal succeeding it (Isa. xi. 6; Rev. xx.-xxii.).

3. It corresponds to the connection of the impersonal creature-world with the personal life of man, that the former participates in the anxious expectation of believing humanity for perfection. As nature in space aspired beyond itself, in so far as it received the impress of man's nature, so also does it aspire, even in time, beyond itself, in so far as it shares with man his progress toward the change or transformation into the super-terrestrial and glorified form. The waiting of the creature for that perfection, as with erect head, just as it is with the human outlook, may be called prosopopeia; the fundamental thought itself, namely, its suffering, its sense of the impulse toward development—an impulse confined and disturbed by the abnormal condition—is a real relation, an actual course of conduct. We do not include herein the normal forms of death in the brute world. The fundamental idea of this appearance of death is no selfish struggle for existence, but the idea of sacrificing love. The weaker beast which becomes a prey to the stronger, cannot and should not voluntarily offer itself upon the altar of life, even though it be only a beast; but when the beast in a torpid state pays to the stronger, as though in a dream, its tribute for the joy of its existence, there is reflected the voluntary deliverance to death in a higher region. The most apparent phenomena of the sufferings of the creature, next to the innumerable sufferings of human nature in subjection to diseases, wars, battles, pestilences, are the sufferings of the brute world as they appear to be 'immersed in the fate of the human world, and are represented in the noblest form in the sacrifice of the brute, and in the grossest form in the pangs of the brute. Yet not only over the brute world, but also over the whole realm of vegetable life, there has extended, with the morbid tendency of the human centre of the world, a morbid development of the most subordinate forms, such as we find in parasites and dwarfs, together with the rapid increase of the common and lowest forms above the more noble, and, in fact, an increase of degenerations of all kinds. But the apostolical, as well as the modern Christian and humane apprehension of nature, extends still beyond the perception of the real groaning of brutes and the degeneration of vegetable life. The sense of the most profound life perceives a groaning of the creature in the most general sense, first, as a longing, developing impulse of the creature-world toward perfection and to the second higher form of existence, and secondly, as a painful suffering under the law of an abnormal and more intense corruptibility, and thirdly, as a mournful concert, a harmony of all the keynotes of the κόσμος, in its homesickness for a new paradise. These keynotes were heard by the prophets (see No. 2, above); Christ has definitely characterized them in His eschatological discourse (Matt. xxv. 29, and the parallels in Mark and Luke); and Paul sketches them here in brief outline, while the Book of Revelation speaks of them in great figures. Through all the periods of the Church there extends a profound sense of this earnest connection between the moral and physical decline of the human world, and we notice its réecho in the voices of the poets (Shakespeare, for example), down to the Romantists of recent date (Fr. von Schlegel, Bettina). But in the department of the most recent literature, in which the sense of this anxious expectation and sadness is blunted, there has arisen on the side of the degenerating extreme a fantastical and gloomy view of the "battle for existence," and it would not be surprising if even this materialism should, in turn, degenerate into dualism. Moreover, the expectation of the last catastrophe refers back to the catastrophes underlying the creation of the world, and whose reflection in the Deluge is still proved by our recollection of the most remote antiquity.

4. The Apostle has described the δόξα in 1 Cor. xv. 54 as ἀφθαρσία. Peter speaks of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away (chap. i. 4). Here the δόξα means, on the one hand, the deliverance of the body, and, on the other, the freedom of God's children. The body, therefore, in its new form, shall be exempted from the natural necessity of physical life; for, as the real body, it has put off, at death, the old bodily form with its sinful propensities. In this life it has become in many ways, a source of temptation and hindrance to the inward life; but in its higher form it shall become the perfect outward expression of the inward life. To be wholly adapted to the spirit, and therefore not only exempt from the corruption, but also the constraint of nature, and to be wholly an organ, an expression, and an image of the spirit—these are the individual characteristics of the glorification in which nature also shall participate, since it is rendered free to share in the freedom of the glory of God's children. In general, the conception of real ideality is the object to which they shall be raised; that is, an ideality in which its idea shall not only be delivered from all deformity, but shall even be elevated above the symbolism of the beautiful splendor in which poetry involuntarily becomes prophecy, into the real nature of the beautiful appearance. We shall find an analogue to the representation of the new form of things, if we compare the present form of the earth and of the creature-world with the rough forms of the earth and the gross forms of the creature, which, according to the testimony of paleontology, have preceded the present form of our cosmos (see my Land der Herrlichkeit; Vermischte Schriften, vol. ii.).

5. The different eschatologies of antiquity here come in for consideration. As for the relation of the Persian to the Jewish eschatology, it seems, after all, demonstrable that the originality of the theocratic eschatology is reflected in Parsism (Vendidad, Bundeheah), just as the Christian eschatology is reflected in the old German Edda. On the development of the Old Testament eschatology, see Tholuck, note on p. 422; Pa. lxxii.; Isa. xi. 6; xxv. 8; lxx. 66; Hosea ii. 21 ff.; Amos ix. 13; Zephaniah, &c.; and on the Jewish-Rabbinical eschatology, see Tholuck again, p. 428. It is noteworthy that Rabbinical Judaism has even assimilated itself to heathendom, in that its expectation has become chiefly retrospective, like the longing of the heathen for the golden age (that is, an expectation of the grotesque restoration of sensuous glory), while the Old Testament anticipation of Israel, the "people of the future," has been consummated in the eschatology of the New Testament. On the eschatology of the New Testament, we must refer to biblical and dogmatic theology (see Commentary on Matthew, pp. 418-434; 1 Cor. xv.; 2 Peter, pp. 46 ff.). For remarks on ecclesiastical eschatology, especially on Luther's discourses concerning the future form of the world; on the question de duratione brutorum; on the distortion of the end of the world into the gross representation of an utter destruction of the world by the Lutheran doctrinal writers of the seventeenth century; and on the restriction of the Apostle's entire description to mere human relations, &c., see Tholuck, pp. 425-428.—It is a beautiful idea of Theodore of Mopsvestia, that "things visible and invisible" constitute a κόσμος, for the comprehension of which (consisting, as it does, of all created things together), in one pledge of love, man (consisting, as he does, of both worlds) was created; that, after his fall, the higher spirits alienated themselves from him; but at the prospect of his restoration, they dedicated themselves to his service, and now rejoice in his restoration, &c. This idea is more in place in the passage relating to the original founding of the new world in the absolute atonement (Col. ii. 20), than in the present passage, relating to the glorification of the present world.—We can avoid all fanciful ideas in regard to the question de duratione brutorum, and apply Christian principles only, by treating it in brief allusions:

(1.) The morbid sundering of types analogous to the formation of human heathendom. The opposite must therefore be a return of nature to collective fundamental types.

(2.) The morbid increase of individuals, analogous to the extravagant generation of the human proletariat. The opposite is the preponderance of constant existence over an excited growth.

(3.) The rise of a preponderance, of the most subordinate forms, of parasites, of forms doomed to decay. The opposite is the dynamical dominion of pure forms, the negation of parasites.

(4.) The reflexive formation of the morbid form of death in original, ideal forms.

(5.) The absolute connection of the creature thus idealized with man, and its appropriation by man.

Here, as well as to the following paragraph, belong Pa. lxxli.; Isa. lxx. 66; John Walther's hymn, "It makes one heartily rejoice;" G. Arnould's hymn, "O Breaker of all bonds;" Schiller's poem, "Oh, from this valley's depths;" and expressions of Fr. von Schlegel, Bettina, and others, on the anxious expectation of nature.

6. The most prominent views on eschatology may be distinguished thus: (1.) The Gnostic-dualistic view, with which we must also unite the recent theosophic views in general; (2.) The Positivist, which holds to an absolute catastrophe without interpositions; (3.) The Rationalistic, which does not get beyond the notion of a gradual idyllic improvement of nature and humanity; (4.) The Christologico-dynamical, which defines eschatology from the centre (which operates as a principle), of the death, the resurrection, and the glorification of Christ. This is also essentially the patristic view. To modern philosophical unbelief the beginning of the world, as well as its end, is sunk in mist and night, because to it the centre of the world—the historical Christ—is sunk in mist and night.

The christological and dynamical view stands in particular need, at the present time, of a vigorous development. It appears everywhere throughout the Scriptures, and is strongly expressed in Eph. i. 19, and also in Phil. iii. 21. Tholuck: "It is noteworthy that in Phil. iii. 21 the same ὑποτάσσουσιν, which here expresses subjection to matter, denotes the operation of Divine power through which matter shall be glorified."

B. The groaning of believers themselves (vers. 23–25).

1. The Apostle speaks of a twofold testimony of the language of groans, which is further divided into a threefold one. The creature groans in its painful struggle for perfection; the life of believers groans. But as believers groan in their consciousness and conscious sense of life, so also does the spirit, in its ethical struggle, groan in the ground of its life.

2. The groaning is related to tears, as labor is to rest. Tears relieve the passive resignation of the soul to God's counsel amid its conflict with the hindrances of life; the groaner labors in his recourse to God's act in heaven against the power of hindrances. Tears flow from this opposition, since they come from God; the groaner protests against the opposition by appealing to God. Both are twin children of the ὑπομονή, which now proves itself as patience and now as steadfastness. Compare the history of the groans and tears of Christ. On the great power and importance which tears and groans have as signals of the most extreme distress of the invisible world in conflict with the visible, and of the higher in conflict with the lower, compare the evidences of the Holy Scriptures by the aid of a concordance. Herder: "The smoke from the burning forest does not rise so high heavenward as does the burdened man's groan" (see James v. 9).

3. The idea of the ἀπαρχή denotes not merely the first beginning—harvest, for example—and not only the most excellent, but also the pledge and representation of the future totality which is assured in the successful beginning. But so is God's Spirit the pledge of glory. See the Exeg. Note.

4. Without a comprehension (which is often very defective) of the relation between the principal Christian life and the same life in its broadest completion—which is suggested even by the development of every grain of wheat—it must appear a wonderful thing that the believer already possesses adoption, according to ver. 16, and that, according to ver. 23, he first expects the adoption with groaning; that he has righteousness, and yet must strive after righteousness (2 Tim. iv. 8); that he is truly delivered and saved, and yet is only delivered and saved in hope. The grand and mysterious elaboration of this development renders its comprehension more difficult, and therefore many speak of an ideal possession, and the like. The principal possession is, indeed, also an ideal one, in so far as the idea of perfection is contained in the principle, and always appears more grand from it, but the realization of the idea is only begun in it; it perfectly exists as a foundation in the germ. On the variety of such antitheses as βασιλεία, σωτηρία, and ἀπολύτρωσις, see Tholuck, p. 436. Theodoret has even perverted the antithesis into that of δύστρομα and πράγμα; the Socinians distinguished tenerē fide and frui; Tholuck speaks, with De Wette, of a "partial definition of the idea of ὑιοθεσία;" and Luther translated thus: "We patiently wait for the adoption, and expect," &c. The Codd. D. F. G., in surprise at the expectation of the adoption, leave out the ὑιοθεσίας.

5. No grander and more glorious thing can be said of the original state of the human body, than that its full deliverance (from sinfulness, misery, death, decay, and perishableness) shall be its transformation to the glorious freedom of the children of God. That the resurrection of the flesh is also declared with the glorification of the body, comp. my Vermischte Schriften, vol. ii. pp. 232 ff.

C. The groaning of the Spirit imparted to believers (vers. 26, 27).

1. On the contradictions arising from the identification of the groaning spirit with the Holy Spirit itself, comp. the Exeg. Notes. We are led here to the antithesis which the Apostle brings out in 1 Cor. xiv. 15. It is the Christian, religious-ethical formation of an antithesis, whose physical foundation is the twofold form of consciousness originally peculiar to the present human life.* Compare, on this point, Deutsche Zeitschrift für christliche Wissenschaft, &c., 1851, p. 242.

2. According to Tholuck's view (p. 438), when the believer is in the greatest distress, he knows least of all how to find a verbal expression of his prayer. But, according to the Psalms, necessity teaches how to pray; the greatest distress becomes prophetical when recourse is had to God. But it is just in the calmest states that the believer needs most of all the interceding Spirit. Indeed, distress gives to prayer a strong expression of human feeling, and in so far Tholuck's view is applicable to the prayer of distress in a more special sense. The intercession of the Spirit denotes the more direct access which God's children, in their inmost heart, have gained to the Father through Christ, according to John xvi. 26. For the real Advocate with the Father is Christ (1 John ii. 1); the Holy Spirit, as such, is the present Comforter of believers, in opposition to the world (John xiv. 16).*

* [This view of Dr. Lange is one to which exception has been taken throughout the Exeg. Notes, from chap. vii. 14 to the close of chap. viii.; it is not necessary, then, to enter upon a new discussion of it here.—R.]

3. The real nature of true prayer is the union of the human and divine Spirit, prompted by God's Spirit. Hence the prophetic confidence of the Amen. This union, according to which God is not only the author and finisher, but also the disposer of prayer, is represented most of all in the mystical adoration of a spirit absorbed in communion with God. On this point, see the expression of Jelaledin, in Tholuck, p. 443.

4. On the groaning of the creature, see Bucer's beautiful expression, in Tholuck, p. 440.

SECOND PARAGRAPH, VERS. 28-37.

A. The certainty of salvation in the saving purpose of Divine grace, as the causa primaria (efficient) of salvation (vers. 28-30).

1. The certainty of salvation is divided into two lines, one of inward and individual life, and the other of external relations. Both have three starting-points in common: a. The causa primaria, the purpose of God (ver. 29); b. The causa meritoria, the gift of His Son (ver. 32); c. The causa apprehendens, or organica, faith in its development into the life of love (ver. 28). Believers are here called those who love God, because, in their love for God, the reflection of God's love has become manifested in them. The progress of the expectation and joyfulness of personal life toward the dark and concealed ground of life, as to the absolute and spiritually clear personality, which is one with love itself, is not the ground, but the sign and evidence that our personal life has been appointed and called into being by God's eternal counsel of love and grace. In our love for God there is revealed His love for us, and in our personality there shines the reflection of His personality. But with this there appears the dynamical central line of life—that of the Divine determinations of the persons allied to God—to which the whole succession and course of things is made subservient.

2. The divine πρόθεσις denotes the eternal relation of God to the course of the world called into being by Him, but also called to free self-development under His authority; just as is the case with the two terms βουλή and εὐδοκία. All these definitions denote God's eternal thought and plan of the world; but they denote it in different relations. The εὐδοκία designates the central point of the Divine purpose, its anticipating love, the ideal perception and contemplation of the personal kingdom. Beside it there stands, on the one hand, the βουλή, God's going to himself for counsel, the look of His intelligence at the necessities of the free development of the world; and, on the other hand, there stands the πρόθεσις, as the establishment of His government over the beginning, the middle, and the ultimate object of His institution of love. The εὐδοκία settles the children of salvation; the βουλή perceives the conditions of salvation; and the πρόθεσις determines the stages of salvation. But that this is not the decree of fate, but rather qualified and communicated according to the stages of the free spiritual kingdom, is plain from the very term used to describe Christians: that they are called according to the purpose—called, not compelled. Tholuck: "πρόθεσις. The πρό is not the temporal before, as in προϊένω, which Beza and Pareus hold, but as the prefix in προτίσθαι. Yet they are not merely nud, called according to a Divine decree, but according to one whose stages to the ultimate object of the εὐδοκία are laid down." But the idea of the κλήσις appears here in a narrower sense as a definition of God's children, characterized by penitence and faith, baptism and confession; the more general idea, on the contrary, appears in ver. 28.

3. All things and events must be subordinate and subservient to, and promotive of, the highest purposes of God—the realization of His kingdom of love, and therefore the salvation of His elect. Augustine: Deus est adeo bonus, quod nihil mali esse permetteret, nisi adeo esset potens, ut ex quolibet malo possit elicere aliquod bonum (Tholuck, p. 444).

4. And we know (ver. 28). We know not what we should pray for as we ought; but God knows the meaning of the groaning of our spirit, and we know, too, that all things work together for good to them that love God. This knowledge is not merely a direct confidence of the spirit, but is based upon the most certain argument: a. In our love for God, His love for us appears; b. But God reigns omnipotently, and disposes all things according to the counsel of His love; c. Consequently, all things must become providences of the loving God.

5. We hold that the passage in vers. 29 and 30 contains the whole Divine plan of salvation, from the first foundation to the ultimate object, and we have repeatedly treated it from this point of view (see my Positive Dogmatik, p. 956). We remark first of all, exegetically, that the passage in Eph. i. 4-14 is an explanatory parallel to the present passage. As the foreknowing here precedes the predestinating, so there the choosing (ver. 4) precedes the predestinating (ver. 5); from which it follows that both the foreknowing and the electing mean essentially the same thing—an act preceding the predestination. To καλέω or κλήσις in the present passage there corresponds in that passage ἐξαρίθμησεν, accepting, &c., in ver. 6, which the Apostle resumes in ver. 11, and specially elaborates. To the justifying here, there then corresponds there the following: "in whom we have redemption," &c., in ver. 7. But finally, the glorifying here is reflected in the "wherein he hath abounded toward us in all wisdom," &c. But Paul also there refers all these individual parts to the "good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself" (in ver. 9). So that it plainly follows there that the "predestinating" relates specifically to the "purpose," while the "purpose" appears to be qualified by the βουλή, "counsel," as this latter is qualified by the "good pleasure." But we learn, in reference to the first act, the "choosing" in the Epistle to the Ephesians, that election took place in Christ before the foundation of the world (see John xvii.), just as we learn that the glorifying or guidance of believers to "glory" will be identical with being led "to the praise of his glory," according to the idea that the beholding of the glory of God will constitute the glory of believers, and that the former will be revealed in the latter (1 John iii. 2).—We may further observe, that a real difference exists between election and foreordination, or predestination, and that the προγνωσκω cannot possibly mean foreknowledge, in God's idea, of subjects already present (for whence would they have come into God's idea?), but that it can only mean the loving and creative sight, in God's intuitive vision, of human personalities for a preliminary ideal existence. The doctrine of predestination of Augustine, of the Middle Ages, and of the Reformers, could not reach this idea of election intellectually (Christian faith has always reached it in spirit), because the distinction between the idea of the individual personality of man and the idea of the "specimen of every kind" had not yet been definitely attained. It is now clear that such a "foreknowing" of God in relation to all human individuals must be accepted, because man is an individual thought of God; and that the same must hold good of "electing," in so far as each individual is distinct in his solitary separation from all other individuals, and has a solitary call (see Rev. ii. 17). But it follows from this that the foreknowing of the "elect," when it has become manifest, must be accepted in the most emphatic sense, analogously to the fact that Abraham is, in God's typical kingdom, the elect καὶ ἔσθ' ἡμεῖς, and that Christ is the elect in God's real kingdom in the absolute sense, so that all His followers are chosen together with Him as organic members, according to their organic relations (Eph. i.). From both propositions it follows, further, that election does not constitute an infinite opposition between such as are ordained to salvation and such as are ordained to condemnation, but an infinite difference of destinations for glory; which difference, however, can be the basis of an actual opposition (see Matt. xxv. 24), and therefore is also combined with this. As the foreknowing expresses the collective foundation, the godlike spiritual nature of the elect as the product and object of Divine love, there is comprised in the electing not only their election from the mass of the world, but also the distinguishing feature of their χαρίσματα and characters. In addition to the earlier perversions of this doctrine of the eternal foundation of personal essence—a doctrine of the highest importance to our times—we may add the recent assertion of Hofmann (Schriftbeweis, vol. i. p. 227), that the ἐκλογή relates not merely to individuals, but to the entire body, and, accordingly, to individuals as members of the body. The Apostle says οἱς four times, and τούτοις three times. After the ideal determinations of personalities themselves, there can now follow the predestination of their ἔσος in time and space, their whole lot (including the previously determined permission and control of the fall). For the foundation of the world corresponds to the history of the world. But the fate of each individual is designed to mature him, under gratia praeveniens, for conversion, and when this object is reached, it is his turn; he is τεταγμένος (Acts xiii. 48). From this it now follows that the "calling," in a special sense, first makes its appearance with the theocratical and evangelical revelation and its preaching of salvation. Those in whom the outward call of God has become an inward one, are "called" in the specific sense; yet the typical "call" first becomes perfectly real in the New Testament. As the life-sphere of election is the spiritual kingdom, and the life-sphere of foreordination is the history of the world, so is the Church the life-sphere of the call. But if godly sorrow leadeth to salvation, and germinating faith to saving faith, the justifying will be realized. This becomes decided by the Spirit of "adoption," which spirit, however, now begins to operate also as πνεῦμα τῆς δόξης, and in reciprocal action with it even the whole historical experience of God's children becomes a δοξάζεσθαι, a guidance to glory. On the modes of this guidance, which have been but little developed doctrinally, see my Positive Dogmatics, p. 1064.

As far as the five divine saving acts are concerned, five human elements must correspond with them, according to the sphere of love and freedom. According to the christological idea, the Divine acts and human elements should come together in five points of union, somewhat as follows:

Election.	Ordination.	Call (as awakening and illumination).	Justification.	Glorification.
Religious Foundation.	Destiny.	Conversion.	Faith.	Holiness.
Determination to salvation.	Pilgrimage, or striving.	Life of Prayer.	Peace, Adoption.	Godly life of Love.

If we reduce the five elements to three: foundation, execution, and (ἀρχή, τρόπος, τέλος), the two elements of execution—call and justification—denote the incipient and decided new birth (from water and the Spirit). The δόξα denotes regeneration in the sense of completion (Matt. xix. 28). The sum of all the Divine operations taken together is grace; the sum of all the human elements is the growing freedom of God's children; and the sum of all points of union is eternal life.

It is only from the standpoint of the call and of justification that man can look retrospectively at his ordination and election in the light of God's love, and prospectively at his object, the δόξα. But if, on the other hand, he would infer his own justification from his assumed election, this would be a standpoint of self-deception, and he would make his own justification out of the fragmentary work of holiness, and this would become self-torment or self-righteousness. The believing sinking into the image and righteousness of Christ, is a sinking into the fountain of eternal life, which then sinks thereby, as though unobserved, into the heart.*

* [These Notes of Dr. Lange are very just, in their opposition to such a sundering of the acts of God in our salvation (here represented, as they necessarily must be to our finite minds, as successive), as will make of election and predestination something arbitrary on the part of God. The guard he sets about the doctrine of human personality is very necessary, especially for minds trained in the school of hyper-Calvinism. Still he has not solved the problem. The Apostle himself does not do it. He but presents, for the security of believers, the objective ground of their confidence. Those rightly read, who read to learn for their comfort what God has done for them in eternity. How He, to whom all time is present, whose eternity enters into

B. The certainty of salvation in its historical gift and establishment in Christ, in opposition to historical contradiction in persecutions (vers. 31-37).

1. The thesis of the perfect historical securities of the salvation of Christians. Ver. 31 says: If God be for us, all the hindrances and restrictions to our salvation are nullified as such. Nothing can harm us. Ver. 32: Since God did not spare His own Son for us, He has given us already every thing in principle, in order to give it to us in His own time in reality; all the aids for our salvation are given to us; every thing contributes to our good.

2. The Apostle represents, in four distinct elements, the complete security of our perfect salvation in Christ. His death removes our deserved condemnation. His resurrection raises us above the sense of condemnation into the confidence and spiritual life of adoption. His sitting at the right hand of God protects us against all condemning powers, and is the pledge of our acquittal at the judgment. His intercession abolishes the last remains of condemnation in our life, and secures us against relapse. On the diversus between the Reformed and Lutheran theology in reference to Christ's sitting at the right hand of God, see Tholuck, p. 458. Tholuck decides in favor of the view that the right hand of God is ubique, and the sitting at the right hand of God indicates the Saviour's entrance into absolute freedom from all restraint. But if we will not regard the "absolute freedom from all restraint" in a purely negative sense, we are driven with this freedom itself to the positiveness of an absolute situation and standpoint in glory. On the views relating to the intercessio, see Tholuck, p. 459. According to Tholuck, the intercessio must be strictly regarded only with reference to Heb. vii. 25; ix. 24; 1 John ii. 1: according to Meyer, it is vocalis et oralis. But it may be asked, Is it analytical, or synthetical? The glorified Christ, in His eternal purpose of love, is himself, as the personal and complete Word, the personified intercession. He appears in the presence of the Father for us (Heb. ix. 24). For statements relating to this subject, see Tholuck, p. 461.

C. Conclusion.

1. The Apostle has enumerated seven oppositions that can operate against us as temptations to relapse. There are seven, from the beginning of labor to rest. He here enumerates the forces which can oppose us in our fellowship of love with the Lord; these are ten in number. But this is the number of the finished course of the world. By height we might have in mind the ύψωμα, in the sense of 2 Cor. x. 5; and by depth, Rev. ii. 24. Yet both terms are essentially the same, and we prefer the explanation given in the Exeg. Notes.

2. The assumption that different classes of angels are spoken of in this passage, has resulted in various changes of the text. Also in Eph. i. 21, the Apostle has chosen expressions which comprise as well present powers of the world as future spiritual powers. The same holds good in reference to Col. i. 16.

these very acts, did these gracious acts, is beyond our comprehension. Why He did them, is answered, so far as it can be answered here, only by the responsive love of a believer's heart. We need only hold fast to the fact; that it is a fact in general, the Apostle makes abundantly clear; that it is a fact in our case, can only be clear according to the measure of our consciousness of being in Christ, "in whom he hath chosen us, before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy, and without blame before him in love" (Eph. i. 4). Comp. chap. ix. on the more difficult phases of this subject.—R.

Paul has given no ground for a definite hierarchy of angels; neither has Peter done so in 1 Peter iii. 22. On Tholuck's discussion concerning angelic classes, see pp. 461 ff.

3. There is a special need, in our day, of bringing forward the absolutely dynamical view of the world in opposition to a groundless and illimitable atomistic one. But the vital way to bring about this view, is the experience and developed perception of the absolute operation of the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord.

4. Thus chap. viii. advances from the certainty of freedom from condemnation, in ver. 1, to the certainty of eternal salvation, in ver. 39.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 18-23. The groaning of the creature.

1. What are we to understand by "creature" here? 2. Why does it groan? 3. For what does it groan? (vers. 18-23).—The magnitude of the future glory of God's children. 1. It makes us forget all the sufferings of this present time; 2. It satisfies not only our expectation, but also the anxious expectation of the whole creation (vers. 18-23).—Why are the sufferings of this present time not worthy to be compared to the future glory? 1. Because our sufferings, however great, come to an end with this present time; 2. The glory, on the contrary, will continue forever (ver. 18).—Comparison of the sufferings of this present time with the glory which shall be revealed in us: 1. The former bring pain, cares, and tears; 2. The latter brings eternal health, peace, and joy (ver. 18).—The revelation of God's children is a revelation of their life (concealed with Christ in God) of courageous faith, fervent love, and calm hope; Col. iii. 8 (ver. 19).—The creature in the service of corruption (ver. 21).—The creature transformed to glory (ver. 21).—Believers in the possession of not only the first-fruits of the Spirit (faith, knowledge, love, patience, chastity, &c.), but also in the possession of God's full adoption, since the body also will be delivered from the bondage of corruption (ver. 23).

LUTHER: God will not only make the earth, but also heaven, more beautiful. This present time is His working garb; afterward He will put on an Easter coat and a Pentecostal robe (vers. 18-23).

STARKE: Wonder and rejoice, ye cross-bearers, for your heavy and wearisome sufferings are only a drop compared with the boundless sea of joys, and as a grain of sand in the balance against hundreds of thousands of pounds (2 Cor. iv. 17). "Non sunt condignas passionibus hujus sæculi ad præteritam culpam, quæ remittitur; ad præsentem consolationis gratiam, quæ immittitur; ad futuram gloriam qua promittitur;" BERNH., De Convers. ad cleric., c. 36 (ver. 18). The creature will not be utterly annihilated, but renewed, and placed in a more glorious state (ver. 21).—HEDINGER: Woe to those who revile, torment, and abuse God's creatures! (ver. 19).

SPENER: What would not a soldier suffer, if he knew that he should become a General? But here is a glory succeeding suffering, beside which all the glory of the greatest emperors and kings is only a shadow (ver. 18).—ROOS: The sufferings of this present time are infinitely small compared with this infinite weight of glory (ver. 18).—The glory is contrasted with the corruption, and freedom with bondage. That which is glorious will last eternally; and that which is free may indeed be used and enjoyed by others, but is not in a state of bondage or slavery (vers. 20, 21).—What is spiritual, will become completely spiritual, and, consequently, will be revealed in great glory. Paul calls this state of glory the state of adoption, because God's children will then completely show their honor in themselves, fully enjoy their Father's love—in a word, will be heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ (vers. 22, 23).

GERLACH: As the mother in travail delivers the living child, as it were, from death, so does nature, groaning under the power of death, struggle to bring forth from itself a new and incorruptible creation. "Not you alone, but what is much lower than you are, and without reason and conscience, shall share with you your blessings. The creation will be free from the bondage of corruption; that is, it will no more be corruptible, but will keep pace with the glorification of your body. For as it became corruptible when you did, so will it again follow you when you become immortal. As a nurse who fostered a king's son will herself enjoy his possessions as soon as he attains his father's throne, so will it be with creation. Do you see how man everywhere goes ahead, and every thing happens for his sake? Do you see how the Apostle comforts the struggling one, and points him to the unutterable love of God? But he does not merely comfort; he also shows the certainty of what he says. For if the creature which was created for your sake has hope, how much more do you have hope for whose sake the creature shall enjoy all these blessings! Thus, when the son appears in his glory, shall men clothe their servants in more glorious robes to the honor of the son;" Chrysostom (vers. 18-23).

LISCO: The magnitude and universality of the future perfection (vers. 18-23).—All the sufferings of this present time, both physical and spiritual, which we must endure on the way to our future glorification, bear no comparison to this perfection. The proof of this is, that the creature, the whole creation, both irrational creation and every thing which is still outside of fellowship with Christ, is anxiously waiting for the revelation of the still concealed glory of God's children, the truly new-born; in which glorification the whole creation will participate, for it is universal and great. The ground of this anxious expectation of the whole creation is partially owing to the subjection of the latter to vanity, and in part to the hope that it shall be delivered from that state which is subject to vanity, and shall participate in the glorious freedom of God's children (vers. 18-21).

HEUBNER: "Temporal sufferings are a differential of the future glory which shall be revealed; that is, they are so infinitely small that they have no value compared with the future glory" (SILBERSCHLAG, Dreieinigkeit, vol. iv. p. 188).—The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us: 1. In respect to duration; 2. Quantity; and 3. Quality.—The sufferings are a mote, the glory is a hundred-weight; the former are but a drop, the latter a sea (ver. 18).—Paul designs to show: 1. The certainty of this future in opposition to doubters, as in 2 Peter iii. 4, who say that all things continue as they were; he answers, by saying: No; nature does not remain unchangeable; nature itself has a tendency to transformation and completion; 2. The magnitude of salvation, for it is the object and limit of the whole creation; it must therefore be exceedingly abundant.—Revelation of the children of God. What will then be revealed? 1. The inmost and deepest nature of their hearts; 2. The distinguished grace of God toward them, which is the glorious destination to which God elevates them. To whom will the revelation be made? To themselves, to the angels, to the believing children of God, to the world, and to all devils (ver. 19).—The vanity to which the creature is subject is manifested specifically as follows: 1. The creation has lost its original charm, its beauty, its durability, and its uniformity; 2. It has become corrupted by much that is injurious or useless; 3. It is now given over to abuse (vers. 20, 21).—How is the self-anxiety of nature to be regarded? We must suppose nature to have a consciousness, a feeling, and that it would say: "What must I suffer! how must I be abused!" Supposing particular objects to speak, the sun would say: "How must I shine upon the wicked works of men! how am I compelled to see every thing!" The earth: "What must I bear! what blood must I absorb!" The gardens and fields: "How are we wasted in excess!" Gold and silver: "How are we perverted into idols!" Beasts: "How are we tormented and abused!" If the Almighty were to open the mouths of many beasts of burden, how would the irrational brutes complain against rational man! (ver. 22).—The Christian is l'homme de désir (St. Martin), a man of longings.

BESSER: The martyrdom of the creature is twofold, and its coronation will also be twofold: 1. It suffers death, under whose pains the elephant groans and the worm writhes; 2. It suffers violence and injustice from the ungrateful and malicious; and it suffers involuntarily, for it is subject to these through God's authority (ver. 19). The glory of God's children is freedom—freedom from sin and death—freedom from the tyranny of the devil and the world (ver. 21).—The Apostle says: We are waiting for the adoption. It is the mystery of Christianity, that we wait for what we already have, or that we are and at the same time are not what we shall be. We are righteous and sinful; we are holy and impure; we are kings and slaves; we are free and bond; we are living and dead; we are saved and condemned;—we are all the former, apart from ourselves, in Christ; we are all of the latter in ourselves, apart from Christ (ver. 23).

Vers. 24-28. The salvation of Christians in the present life is a salvation: 1. In hope; 2. In patience; 3. In prayer (vers. 24-28).—The one Christian hope in distinction from the many worldly hopes. 1. It has a good ground—Christ, on whom we can build; 2. A certain object—eternal salvation (ver. 24).—What a man seeth he cannot hope for; if we therefore hope, the object of our hope must be invisible (vers. 24, 25).—Christian patience: 1. In what does it consist? 2. In whom is it found? (ver. 25).—Intercession for us by the Spirit of God. 1. How does it take place? 2. With what results? (vers. 26, 27).—It is only when we perceive our infirmities that God's Spirit intercedes for us with unutterable groans (ver. 26).—A glance at the inmost life of prayer of God's saints. We here perceive. 1. Our great weakness; 2. The comforting intercession by the Spirit of God; 3. God's friendly hearkening to our prayer (vers. 26-28).—Praise God for His compassion shown in the Spirit's helping us in our infirmities (ver. 26).—The unutterable groanings of the Spirit (ver. 26).—God knoweth the heart (ver. 27).—Are we also saints? Does God's Spirit also intercede for us? Can we also hope that our prayer will be answered? (vera. 26, 27).—Under what circumstances do we, too, know that all things work together for our good? 1. When we love God; 2. When we are conscious of our call (ver. 28).—The Christian view of human destiny (ver. 28).—How many men are still very far from knowing that all things must work together for good to them that love God! 1. Proof that such is the case; 2. Statement of the grounds of this phenomenon.

STARKE: Impatience in distress arises from want of hope; 2 Kings vi. 29, 31 (ver. 26).—SPENER: We do not know what would always be useful to us, and, if left completely to our own choice, would often pray for things which might be injurious, rather than useful. We also do not understand how prayer should be best formed, and in such a way as most likely to be heard, especially in seasons when necessity is great, and the heart is perplexed; but the Spirit intercedes for us in the best way, with unutterable groanings (ver. 26).—We, in whom there are such groans, often do not ourselves understand what we pray for, for the anxiety of the heart is so great that it can express nothing more than a sorrowful but confident desire for the grace of God; but the remaining prayer is shaped by the Holy Spirit, and brought before God's throne (ver. 27).—ROOS: Here (ver. 27) the Holy Spirit intercedes for us as a wise father intercedes for his child, who does not know how to address a great nobleman as he should, when he puts into his mouth refined language and a fitting compliment.

BENGL: In this purpose of God lie concealed the very first roots of the justification and glorification of believers (ver. 28).

GERLACH: The personality of man is no passing show, and does not pass away into universal life; but it only lives truly a life of the spirit when the personal Spirit of God is the soul of its life—when God is in it—when the Spirit of the eternal fellowship of the Father and of the Son, of God and of His creation, is in it (ver. 26). By this means the prayer of the believing Christian first receives a strong and sure ground that the Spirit prays out of him; and by this means it becomes clear how such great petitions as the first three of the Lord's Prayer are placed by the Lord in the mouth of the weakest believer (ver. 27).—It is God who worketh all in all for our salvation (Phil. ii. 13); therefore all things, His creatures who live, move, and have their being in Him, coöperate for the same end; not with Him, or beyond Him, but in Him and through Him. Even all the evil that takes place on the earth coöperates for good; for the will of the creature, which tears itself asunder from its Creator, is evil, and the evil continues to exist in this will; but the evil that results as the work of this will is, in so far as it interferes with God's order of the world, God's own work, is overruled by Him for good. If a child or friend of ours is struck by lightning, or killed by a murderer, it is God's work in both cases, so far as the matter concerns us; even God's own retributive judgments, which requite the evil deed with evil, become a blessing to him who learns to love Him under the blows of His rod, so that then His penal justice is no more revealed therein, but purifying love and grace (ver. 28).

LISCO: Patience waits; it is established on hope, which is the direction of the spirit toward a future good. Hope is established on faith, which is the grasping of the promise that holds out the blessing;

this promise, which is contained in God's word, is the ground of faith; God's word is therefore the ground of all (ver. 25).

HEUBNER: Hope is advanced faith (ver. 24).—To hope, and to act in hope, are the strength of the soul (ver. 25).—The heart of the Christian is a sanctuary, a dwelling-place of the Holy Spirit (ver. 26).—Divine omniscience has a very comforting side God knows the inmost faithfulness of the Christian's heart. The true Christian desires to be searched, and to have his heart seen; the false Christian fears this (ver. 27).—"Deus nihil mali sinit accidere, ex quo non aliquid boni possit et velit elicere;" AUGUSTINE (ver. 28).

VERA. 29-39. Summary of the Christian order of salvation. 1. Election; 2. Ordination; 3. Call; 4. Justification; 5. Glorification (vera. 29, 30).—The Only-begotten of the Father is at the same time the first-born among many brethren (ver. 29).—Let us never forget that we should be brethren of our Lord Jesus Christ (ver. 29).—The call, justification, and glorification correspond to the threefold office of Christ (vera. 29, 30).—Why do we, as Christians, not need to fear? 1. Because God, who delivered His only Son for us, and with Him will also freely give us all things, is for us; 2. Because Christ is here, who has finished His work for us; 3. Because we ourselves, for the sake of Him who hath loved us, are able to endure every danger, and to allow nothing to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord (vera. 31-39).—If God be for us, who can be against us? 1. Ask whether God is for us; 2. Look at the enemies (ver. 31).—The gracious gift of God's Son (ver. 32).—Four believing and joyous questions of the Apostle, with the same number of answers evincing certainty of triumph (vera. 31-39).

STARKE: The precious chain of the blessings of salvation, which far excels all golden chains and jewels (1 John iii. 1, 2) (ver. 30).—Even the smallest child of God can defy the whole world; therefore, what a great privilege all the children of God have! O man, be converted, and this day become a child of God! (ver. 31).—Though the whole world condemn you, and cry out against you: "Crucify him! crucify him! away with him!" smile at it; for if God justifies you, nothing can condemn you (ver. 33).—"Hoc habet proprium ecclesia: dum persecutionem patitur, floret; dum opprimitur, crescit; dum contemnitur, proficit; dum ladicur, vincit; dum arguitur, intelligit; tunc stat, cum superari videtur;" HILARIUS, l. 8, De Trinit. (ver. 37).—Strong heroic faith, which will allow nothing to separate from the love of God in Christ. Oh, Almighty God, arm us with the same sense, in order that we may remain true to death! 2 Tim. iv. 8 (ver. 39).—LANGE: What will it help you, poor man, if you have many great, rich, and mighty men in the world, and even a partial judge at the judgment? If God and your own conscience be against you, how soon will the table be turned against you? Job ix. 4 (ver. 31).—OSIANDER: Even though Satan should make a row against our sins before God's judgment-seat, he will not be able to accomplish any thing, but will be compelled to pack off to hellish fire with his charge (ver. 33).

SPENER: It is the order of Divine beneficence that foreknowledge and foreordination take place in eternity, but the call, justification, and glorification occur in time (ver. 30).—He who has not hesitated to give the greatest blessing, will also not be sparing of smaller ones (ver. 32).

Roos: Many would be against us, but they are nothing against God (ver. 32).—Paul had previously spoken (vera. 32-34) of judicial charges, but now he speaks of hostile powers that would violently snatch us away, and separate us from the love of Christ, which he afterward calls the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord (vera. 35-39).

GERLACH: The Apostle has now, in spirit, reached the top of the mount of glorification, and looks back once more at the transitory hindrances, and the victory of believers, in the midst of their unfinished conflicts. That which here disturbs the peace of believers, and threatens to deprive them of their comfort, is of a twofold character: it is inward and outward. Inwardly it is sin, outwardly it is tribulation; in part it is the necessity of life in general, and in part it is the temptations specially appointed for the Christian (vera. 31-39).

LISCO: The blessed certainty of the grace of their God strengthens believers to conquer all temptations and embarrassments (vera. 31-34).—As Abraham's love of God strengthened him for the greatest and sorest sacrifice, so is the greatest expression of God's love for us the gift of His Son; it is an act of love which infinitely exceeds all else that God has done for us as Creator, Preserver, and Ruler (ver. 32).—With the strongly established conviction of God's grace toward us Christians, temporal sufferings, still less than those temptations (vera. 33, 34), cannot lead us astray in our certainty of salvation and glorification (vera. 35-39).

HEUBNER: Christ is the true and real Ideal of human virtue; to whom we should be conformed, and to whom we are appointed as Christians to be conformed. The higher we think of Christ, the higher must we think of ourselves (ver. 29).—The Christian is a brother of Jesus Christ (ver. 29).—"Faith," says Luther, "puts such courage into a man, that he can say, 'Though all devils should pounce upon me, and all kings, emperors, heaven, and earth, were against me, I nevertheless know that I shall be sustained.' He who has faith is in the Lord, and although he dies immediately, he must live again" (ver. 31).—Compare also PAUL GERHARD's excellent hymn, "If God be for me, I tread on all against me" (ver. 31).—The power of the Christian reaches further than his trials; his strength will never be wholly exhausted. And this strength is called love through Him who hath loved us; He, whose love raises us above all sufferings, strengthens us (1 Cor. xv. 57; 2 Cor. ii. 14; 1 John iv. 4; v. 4).

BESSER: The triumph of faith (vera. 31-39).

The Pericope for the 4th Sunday after Trinity, ver. 1. 18-23.

HEUBNER: How the Christian regards the evils and imperfections of this world—the future rejuvenation of the earth.—The history of the earth. 1. What was the earth? A scene of God's glory. 2. What has it become? A scene of sin and death. 3. What shall it become? Renewed, glorified, and a part of heaven. 4. Who will live on it? Matt. v. 5.—The comfort which the gospel gives the suffering Christian.—APPUHN: The connection of the creation with man: 1. The creature has fallen with man; 2. It serves him against its will; 3. It bears his image in itself: as men contend and fight together, so is it among the lower orders of creation;

4. It anxiously expects deliverance with man.—GENZKEN: The token of future glory: 1. The anxious expectation of the creature; 2. The expectation of believers.—KAPFF: The deliverance of the groaning creature: 1. In nature; 2. In humanity in general; 3. In believers.—RANKE: The hope which Christians have of their future glory: 1. What is implied in this hope; 2. Its connection with the life of the Christian; 3. Its blessings.

The New Rhenish Pericopes: 1. Vers. 24-30, for New-Year's Day. DEICHERT: The great privilege of God's children, to be able constantly to hope for the best. 1. It is only God's children who know what is best; 2. It is only they who hope for it is a proper way; 3. Their hope rests upon the strongest grounds.

2. Vers. 31-39, for the 13th Sunday after Trinity. DEICHERT: The blessedness of God's child, who lies in His bosom in full faith of eternal love. 1. Such a child of God has every thing which can truly benefit him; 2. He is no more afraid that any thing can harm him; 3. He continues unseparated from eternal love.

On chap. viii. 28. SCHLEIERMACHER: On improving occasions of public calamity. 1. They appeal to us to know ourselves; 2. They greatly benefit us by making us better acquainted with God himself. (Delivered in Halle soon after the French occupation.)

LANG: Christians, as God's children, are heirs of future glory. 1. The right of inheritance established on the New Testament; 2. Anxious waiting for the decision; 3. Its eternal institution; 4. The opponents of the right of inheritance; 5. Its assurance; 6. The infinite value of the inheritance.—The anxious expectation of the creature, as contrasted with man without this expectation in our day, is the same picture on a large scale which Balaam's ass presents on a small one. The Spirit in nature in opposition to the worldly-mindedness of skeptical natural philosophy.—Unspirituality in the garb of pretended natural philosophy, judged by its declarations: 1. Nature was not called into being by the Spirit of the Lord; 2. It does not testify to the dominion of the Spirit; 3. It does not strive for the revelation of the glory of the Spirit.—The true meaning of the groans: 1. Of the creature; 2. Of believers; 3. Of the Divine Spirit in their new life.—How does the case stand in reference to the battle of your life? 1. If God is not for you, every thing is against you, though every thing seems to be for you. 2. If God be for you, nothing is against you, though every thing seems to be against you. Nothing can harm us, for nothing can separate us.—Our fortress of rock: God's love in Jesus Christ our Lord.

[BURKITT: How will God's adopted children be made manifest? 1. In their persons; 2. In their actions; 3. In their condition.—The Holy Spirit intercedes for us: 1. By assisting us in duty; 2. By quickening our affections; 3. By enlarging our desires; 4. By setting us to groaning after the Lord.—Groaning denotes the strength and ardency of desire, which, through its fervency, puts the soul to pain and to a holy impatience till it is heard. If we want words, let us not want groans; Lord, let Thy Spirit help us to groan out a prayer when we want ability to utter it; for silent groans, proceeding from Thy Spirit, shall be heard in Thine ears when the loudest cries shall not be heard without it.

[HENRY: Though the soul be the principal part of man, yet the Lord has declared himself for the body also, and has provided for it a great deal of honor and happiness. The future adoption of God's children is: 1. The adoption manifested before the world, angels, and men. Their honor is now clouded, but God will then publicly own all His children. The deed of adoption is now written, signed, and sealed; then it will be recognized, proclaimed, and published. 2. It is the adoption perfected and completed. The children of God have bodies as well as souls, and the adoption is not perfect until those bodies are brought into the glorious liberty promised the children of God.—Difference between faith and hope: 1. Faith has regard to the promise; hope, the thing promised. 2. Faith is the evidence of things not seen; hope is the expectation of them. 3. Faith is the mother; hope is the daughter.—SCOTT: All that we owe to the flesh is a holy revenge for the injuries already done, and the hindrances continually given us; and instead of rendering our state doubtful, by living after it in any degree, we should, by the Spirit, continually endeavor more and more to mortify it, and repress all its actions.—Sin has filled the world with suffering, yea, with unspeakable disorder and misery; all creatures seem to proclaim man's fatal apostasy, and to recommend the inestimably precious salvation of Christ. But the gospel opens a brighter prospect; a glorious crisis approaches, of which all things seem in anxious expectation.—CLARKE: Fluency in prayer is not essential to praying; a man may pray most powerfully in the estimation of God, who is not able to utter even one word. The unutterable groan is big with meaning, and God understands it, because it contains the language of His own Spirit. Some desires are too mighty to be expressed; there is no language expressive enough to give them proper form and distinct vocal sound. Such desires show that they came from God; and as they came from Him, so they express what God is disposed to do, and what He has purposed to do (ver. 27).

[HODGE: Observe, 1. As there is a dreadful pressure of sin and misery on the whole creation, we should not regard the world as our home; 2. It is a characteristic of genuine piety to have exalted conceptions of future blessedness, and earnest longings after it; 3. The reason why all things work together for the good of God's children is, that all things are under His control; 4. The plan of redemption, while it leaves no room for despondency, affords no pretence for assumption; 5. As there is a beautiful harmony and necessary connection between the several doctrines of grace, so must there be a like harmony in the character of the Christian.—The gospel is: 1. Wonderful; 2. Glorious; 3. Secure.—BARNES: Reasons why we are continued here in this state of vanity: 1. Christians are subjected to this state to do good to others; 2. Their remaining here shows the power of the gospel in overcoming sin, and in thus furnishing living evidence to the world of the power and excellence of that gospel; 3. It furnishes occasion for interesting exhibitions of character, and for increasing and progressive excellence; 4. It is a proper training for heaven.—Reasons why Christians do not know what to pray for: 1. They do not know what would be really best for them; 2. They do not know what God might be willing to grant them; 3. They are, to a great extent, ignorant of the character of God, the reason of His dealings, the principles of His government, and their own actual wants; 4. They are often in real and deep perplexity; and, if left alone, would neither be able to bear their own trials, nor know what to ask at the hand of God.—J. F. H.]

FIRST SECTION.—The dark problem of God's judgment on Israel, and its solution.

CHAP. IX. 1-33.

A.

1 I say the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in 2 the Holy Ghost, That I have great heaviness [grief] and continual sorrow in 3 my heart. For I could wish¹ that [I] myself² were accursed from Christ for 4 my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh: Who are Israelites; to whom 5 pertaineth [whose is] the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants,³ and the giving of the law, and the service of God [of the sanctuary], and the promises;
6 Whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning [as to] the flesh Christ came
[is Christ], who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen.⁴

B.

6 Not as though [It is not however so, that]¹ the word of God hath taken none effect [come to nought]. For they are not all Israel, which are of Israel [For 7 not all who are of Israel, are Israel]:² Neither, because they are the seed of 8 Abraham, are they all children: but, In Isaac shall thy seed be called.³ That is,
They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God [Not those who are the children of the flesh, are children of God]: but the 9 children of the promise are counted for the seed [reckoned as seed]. For this is the word of promise [this word was of promise], At this time [season]* will 10 I come, and Sarah shall have a son. And not only this;* but when Rebecca 11 also had conceived by one, even by [omit even by] our father Isaac, (For the children being not yet born, neither having [Without their¹⁰ having as yet been born, or] done any [any thing] good or evil,¹¹ that the purpose of God according 12 to election might stand, not of works, but of him that [who] calleth;) It was 13 said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger.¹² As it is written,

Jacob have [omit have] I loved,
 But Esau have [omit have] I hated.¹³

14 What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid.
 15 For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will [omit will] have mercy, 16 and I will have compassion on whom I will [omit will] have compassion.¹⁴ So then it is not of him that [who] willeth, nor of him that [who] runneth, but of 17 God that [who] sheweth mercy.¹⁵ For the Scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same [very] purpose have I raised [did I raise] thee up,¹⁶ that I might shew my power in thee [in thee my power],¹⁷ and that my name might be de-18 clared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy [Therefore on whom he will he hath mercy], and whom he will he hardeneth.

19 Thou wilt say then unto me, Why [then]¹⁸ doth he yet find fault? For 20 who hath resisted [resisteth] his will? Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed [or, moulded, πλάσμα] say to him 21 that formed it, Why hast thou made [didst thou make] me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour 22 and another unto dishonour? What [But what] if God, [although]¹⁹ willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known [make known his power], endured with much long-suffering the [omit the] vessels of wrath fitted to [for] 23 destruction: And [Also, i. e., he endured for this purpose also]²⁰ that he might make known the riches of his glory on the [omit the] vessels of mercy, which he had 24 afore prepared unto [before prepared for] glory, Even us, whom he hath called [As such, i. e., vessels of mercy, he also, besides preparing, called us] not of [from among] the Jews only, but also of [from among] the Gentiles?

25 As he saith also in Osee [Hosea],²¹

I will call them my people, which [who] were not my people;
 And her beloved, which [who] was not beloved. [;]

26 And it shall come to pass,²² that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people; there shall they be called the children [called sons] of 27 the living God. Esaias also [And Isaiah] also crieth concerning Israel,

Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea,
 A [The] remnant²³ shall be saved:

28 For²⁴ he will finish the work [is finishing the word],²⁵ and cut [cutting] it short in righteousness:

Because a short work [word]²⁶ will the Lord make upon the earth.

29 And as Esaias said before [And, as Isaiah hath said],
 Except²⁷ the Lord of Sabaoth had left us a seed,
 We had been [become] as Sodoma [Sodom],
 And been made like unto Gomorrah.

30 What shall we say then? That the Gentiles, which followed not [who were not following] after righteousness, have [omit have] attained to righteousness, 31 even the righteousness which is of faith. But Israel, which followed [following] after the law of righteousness, hath not attained [attained not] to the law 32 of righteousness [omit of righteousness].²⁸ Wherefore? Because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law [or, as by works].²⁹ For³⁰ 33 they stumbled at that stumbling-stone [stone of stumbling]; As it is written, Behold,³¹ I lay in Sion a stumbling-stone [Zion a stone of stumbling] and [a] rock of offence: and whosoever believeth [he who believeth]³² on him shall not be ashamed [put to shame].

TEXTUAL.

² Ver. 3.—[The Rec. has this order: $\alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{o}\varsigma \epsilon\upsilon\chi\acute{o}\mu\alpha\iota \epsilon\upsilon\chi\acute{o}\mu\alpha\iota$ (C. K. L.); but the preponderant authority N. A. B. D. E. F. G. favors: $\alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{o}\varsigma \epsilon\upsilon\chi\acute{o}\mu\alpha\iota \alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{o}\varsigma \epsilon\upsilon\chi\acute{o}\mu\alpha\iota$ (N., however, puts $\epsilon\upsilon\chi\acute{o}\mu\alpha\iota$ first). So Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Tregelles, Lange. This order, if it has any special force, probably emphasizes the fact, that he could wish himself accursed, rather than that he himself could wish it. Hence the Amer. Bible Union is unfortunate in placing myself after the first I. Noyes: I could wish to be myself accursed.

⁴ Ver. 5.—[Lange considers God blessed forever, Amen, a synagogical form, to be put in quotation marks. His exegesis accords better with the E. V. than with Luther's der da ist Gott über Alles, gelobet in Ewigkeit, Amen. On the disputed punctuation, see Exeg. Notes. Noyes, naturally, puts a period after Christ.

⁵ Ver. 6.—[See Exeg. Notes.

⁷ Ver. 7.—[For convenient reference, the Hebrew text is appended. Gen. xxi. 12: $\text{בְּיָצֵאֲךָ יִצְחָק לְךָ יִרְצֶנּוּ}$. The LXX. is quoted literally here by Paul, and it is an exact translation. The only question of accuracy which can arise, is respecting the force of יִרְצֶנּוּ , whether it means through or in. See Exeg. Notes. Noyes: "Thy offspring shall be reckoned from Isaac."

⁸ Ver. 9.—[This is freely quoted from the LXX., Gen. xviii. 10, 14. The LXX. reads $\text{ἐπεὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν τούτοις οἱ ἀπ' ἀβραάμ, καὶ ἔστιν ἐν τούτοις ὁ υἱὸς σου}$ (ver. 10); but ver. 14 cloes, $\text{καὶ ὅτι οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν τούτοις οἱ ἀπ' ἀβραάμ, καὶ ὁ υἱὸς σου}$. The choice of this latter clause was probably for reasons of emphasis, to indicate that the promise was to Sarah (Alford), which is the main thought here. The Hebrew phrase $\text{בְּיָצֵאֲךָ יִצְחָק}$, when the time (shall be) resuscitant, occurring in both verses clearly implies what the LXX. expresses: at this season of the year. Comp. Gesenius, Thesaurus, i. p. 470, Knobel on Gen. xviii. 10.

⁹ Ver. 10.—[Ὁ $\mu\acute{o}\nu\omicron\varsigma \delta\epsilon$. The passage is elliptical. On what should be supplied, see Exeg. Notes. As the case to be introduced is not strictly of the same kind as that of Sarah, but stronger, this is preferable to so (Alford, Amer. Bible Union); the former seems to imply the difference more clearly than the latter.

¹¹ Ver. 11.—[Instead of ἐκείνῳ (Rec., D. F. K. L., Wordsworth), ἐκεῖνός τε is found in N. A. B. and cursives; adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Tregelles, Lange. The former is the more usual word, in contrast with ἐκεῖνός τε ; hence, likely to be inserted. And and ill best express the slight difference, since ἐκεῖνός τε , like ill, does not always imply something immoral, and yet has the same wide range of meaning. It must have a moral signification here, however. (See Alford in loco.)

¹³ Ver. 13.—[From the LXX., Mal. i. 2, 3; the only variation is, the inversion of the first clause. It reads in the LXX.: $\text{ἐγγαμίσθη ὁ κύριός σου}$. The Hebrew text is:

יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵינוּ
אֶתְּנָתָנוּ
אֶתְּנָתָנוּ

I loved Jacob,
But Esau I hated.

¹⁴ Ver. 15.—[An exact quotation from the LXX., Exod. xxxiii. 19. The Hebrew of the original passage is of importance in the exegesis. It reads: $\text{וַיֹּאמֶר יְהוָה אֶל־מֹשֶׁה אֶת־אֱלֹהֵינוּ אֶת־יִצְחָק אֶת־יַעֲקֹב}$. Alford thinks ἐν , inserted in LXX., refers to pure mercy; Meyer, and many others, join it with ἐν : "whomsoever, in whatever state;" thus describing not merely the mercy, but the choice of its individual objects, as the free act of God; for the emphasis in the relative clause rests on the repeated ἐν , since ἐν generally has its position after the emphatic word (Kühner, ii. § 457). We are certainly justified in making the relative clauses present instead of future; for the future force of the Hebrew verbs is doubtful, while the Greek verbs (both in LXX. and the text) are present. See Exeg. Notes.

¹⁵ Ver. 16.—[The Rec., B. K., read ἐκείνῳ (from ἐκεῖνός); N. A. B. D. E. K. L. ἐκείνῳ τε (from ἐκεῖνός τε). The latter is adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford, Tregelles; the former by Meyer and Wordsworth. Meyer urges that Paul would not use two forms, one here, and the other in ver. 18 (where the reading ἐκεῖνός is well established, only D. F. G. having ἐκεῖνός), and concludes that ἐν was substituted for ἐν through a mistake of the transcriber, and thus readily preserved, since it corresponded with a form in actual use.

¹⁷ Ver. 17.—[Here Paul deviates from LXX., writing ἐκείνῳ instead of ἐκείνῳ τε .

¹⁸ Ver. 18.—[There is some confusion about ἐν . B. D. F. insert it in both clauses; Rec., N. A. K. L. omit it the second time. All have it in the first clause, but the position varies. Rec., D. F. K. L. put it before ἐν ; N. A. B., Tregelles, after. The above rendering adopts it in both clauses.

¹⁹ Ver. 22.—[The participle ἐκείνῳ is interpreted: since, because he was willing (i. e., purposed) or: although he was willing (not yet purposed). The latter is adopted by Lange: obsequen (bereits) des Willens; Meyer, and others.—After what, supply: will thou reply? or something to that effect. See the Exeg. Notes on both points.

²⁰ Ver. 23.—[It was necessary to supply this much in the text, in order to vindicate the view taken of this difficult passage. See Exeg. Notes.

²¹ Ver. 25.—[This is a free quotation from Hosea ii. 25 (23, LXX. E. V.). The Hebrew text is followed more closely than the LXX.; the clauses are transposed, &c. It is not necessary to insert the LXX. text here, as it differs in almost every word, though containing the same general thought: $\text{וַיֹּאמֶר יְהוָה אֶל־מֹשֶׁה אֶת־אֱלֹהֵינוּ אֶת־יִצְחָק אֶת־יַעֲקֹב}$. In rendering Le-ruchama, Paul follows the LXX.

²² Ver. 27.—[Isa. x. 22. Paul follows the LXX., which reads: καὶ τὰς πόλεις αὐτῶν ἡμεῖς ἐκδοῦμεν αὐτοῖς, καὶ ἐκδοῦμεν αὐτοῖς τὰς πόλεις αὐτῶν. The variation from the Hebrew is slight; רָשָׁעִים, shall return, is strengthened by the LXX. into ἐκδοῦμεν αὐτοῖς, which, of course, means still more as Paul uses it. M^t. A. B. Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Tregelles, Lange, read ἐκδοῦμεν αὐτοῖς; the more probable reading, as the LXX. differs. It is a stronger word, apparently.]

²³ Ver. 28.—[The variations from the Hebrew are so extensive, that it will be best to give the text entire]

בְּלִיֹּךְ חַרִּיץ שׁוֹטֵף צֶדֶקָה :
עַי כָּלָה וְנִחְרָצָה אֲדָרָךְ יְהוָה צְבָאוֹת עֲשֵׂה :
בְּקֶרֶב בְּלִיֹּחָרֶץ

"The consumption is decided, overflowing with righteousness;
For a consumption and a decree shall the Lord of Hosts make,
In the midst of all the land."

See Exeg. Notes for other renderings, and also for text of the LXX., which Paul quotes closely; inserting γὰρ at the beginning, however, as better continuing the proof, and substituting ἐν τῇ γῇ for ἐν τῇ πόλει καὶ ἐν τῇ πόλει.

²⁴ Ver. 28.—[The E. V. is unfortunate in rendering ἀλογον, work. (So Amer. Bible Union.) The word has a wide range of meaning, but this is not included. Lange: Abrechnungssprach, word of reckoning. See Exeg. Notes.]

²⁵ Ver. 28.—[The words: ἀλογον σουφραμῶν, are wanting in M^t. A. B., rejected by Lachmann, Tregelles; bracketted by Alford, but retained by most editors on the authority of M^t. D. F. K. L. The suspicion of an addition from the text of the LXX. is outweighed by the probability of the transcriber's confusing σουφραμῶν with the σουφραμῶν.]

²⁶ Ver. 29.—[A verbatim citation from the LXX., Isa. i. 9, where the Hebrew שָׁרִיר is rendered σῶμα.]

²⁸ Ver. 32.—[The authorities for ῥῆμον (Rec.) are M^t. D. K. L., a number of versions. It is omitted, however, in M^t. A. B. F., by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Lange, Tregelles, Wordsworth. Alford prefers to omit, but does not deem the evidence sufficiently strong to decide. The word would readily be inserted as an explanation.]

²⁹ Ver. 32.—[Lange prefers to retain γὰρ (Rec.), mainly on the ground that it must be supplied in thought, even if rejected. It is found in M^t. D^t. K. L., many versions and fathers; retained by Tischendorf, Wordsworth, Lange. It is omitted in M^t. A. B. D^t. F., some cursives, &c. Lachmann, Meyer (with decision), Alford, Tregelles, reject it. If omitted, the period also must be omitted, and the verse be rendered, as by Alford: "Because (pursuing it) not by faith, but as by works, they stumbled, &c.]

³⁰ Ver. 33.—[Paul here combines Isa. xxxviii. 16 and viii. 14 in one, varying, to suit his purpose, both from the Hebrew text and the LXX. There is no variation in thought, except that the Apostle gives it as his exegesis, that the "stone of stumbling" of the one passage is the "corner-stone elect," &c., of the other. Comp. 1 Peter ii. 6-8.]

³¹ Ver. 33.—[The Rec. inserts ἡμεῖς, on the authority of K. L., versions and fathers. It is omitted in M^t. A. B. D. F., by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer (4th ed.; Lange quotes him as retaining it), Alford, Wordsworth, Lange, Tregelles. It does not occur in the LXX., but, in chap. x. ii., no MS. omits it. The probability is, that it was inserted here to conform to that passage. Lange suggests that the emphasis upon ἡμεῖς, were it retained, would weaken that upon πιστεύουσιν.—R.]

[PRELIMINARY NOTE on the whole chapter, and its connection with the rest of the Epistle.—In order to understand this chapter, which is in many respects the most difficult section of the whole Epistle, its connection with the preceding context, but especially with chaps. x. and xi., must not be overlooked. Before passing from the doctrinal part, which reached its culmination in the song of triumph at the close of chap. viii., to the practical exhortations (chaps. xii. ff.), the Apostle institutes (in chaps. ix.-xi.) a profound inquiry into the historical course of development of the kingdom of God, seeking especially to enlighten and satisfy his readers respecting the enigmatical phenomenon, that the greater part of the people of Israel rejected salvation in Christ.* The thought might readily arise, that the promises given to the covenant-people had to come to nought, or that Jesus was not the Messiah, who had been promised principally to the Jews. After expressing his sorrow at the exclusion of so many of his people from the Christian salvation, he shows:

1. That God's promise was not thereby rendered void; for (a.) it refers, not to all of Abraham's descendants, but to those chosen by God of free grace, as Isaac and Jacob (vers. 6-18). (b.) God is not unjust in this election, for He is the Sovereign over

His creatures, who can make no rightful demands of Him (vers. 14-29).

2. The ground of the exclusion lies in the unbelief of the Jews themselves, who despised the true way of salvation through the righteousness of faith, and substituted their own righteousness; while the gospel announced to them, as indeed the Old Testament frequently indicated, that salvation could be attained only through faith (chap. ix. 30-x. 21).

3. God had not, however, cast off His people; for (a.) there is a remnant elected of grace, though most are hardened (chap. xi. 1-10); (b.) the unbelief and fall of Israel, in the wisdom and mercy of God, turns out for the salvation and reviving of the Gentiles, who should not, however, boast themselves (chap. xi. 11-24); (c.) finally, the rejection is only temporary, since, after the conversion of all the Gentiles, grace will come to the whole of Israel (chap. xi. 25-32). In conclusion, the Apostle breaks forth into a doxology to the grace and wisdom of God, who in such a manner will solve the enigma of the world's history, and lead all things to the glory of His name and the best interest of His kingdom (chap. xi. 33-36).—P. S.]

De Wette on chaps. ix.-xi.: A supplement (1) to the foregoing discussion: lament, explanation and comfort concerning the exclusion of the greater portion of the Jews from Christian salvation. Meyer, likewise: A supplement on the foregoing non-participation of the greater part of the Jews in the Christian institution of salvation, containing: a. The lament on it (chap. ix. 1-5). b. The theodicy accounting for it (chap. ix. 6-29). c. The guilt of it

* [His theme, as announced in chap. i. 16, 17, necessarily led him to such an inquiry. It concludes: "to the Jew first, and also to the Greek." Having discussed the great truth of "the righteousness of faith," he must justify this additional clause, which seems to be incorrect, in view of the present exclusion of the Jews. So Philippi, and others.—R.]

which rests upon the Jews themselves (chap. ix. 30-33, and chap. x. 1-21). d. The consolation arising from it (chap. xi. 1-32), with praise offered to God (chap. ix. 33-36). While De Wette regards the section of chaps. ix.-xi. as only a supplement, Baur considers it the real centre and kernel of the Epistle. If this be so, the kernel would indeed have a very massive shell.

[Forbes (following Olshausen) finds a parallel between chap. i. 18-iii. 20, and these three chapters. "We have here an instance of the Epanodos, the object of which is to bring the main subject into prominence by placing it first and last. In both sections the subject is the relation of Israel, and of the Gentiles, to the new way of salvation. But in chap. i. 18-iii. 20 it is regarded more on the side of the Law—as condemning Israel equally with the Gentiles, and necessitating them equally to have recourse to the gospel. In chaps. ix.-xi. it is regarded more on the side of Grace (on the part of God, as possessing a right to prescribe His own terms of acceptance), and of Faith (on the part of man, as the one only condition for attaining salvation, and which is demanded equally of Israel as of the Gentiles). Another point of resemblance between the two sections consists in the striking parallelism between the three objections of the Jew in chap. iii. 1-8, and those in chap. ix. 1-23."—Jowett: "The Apostle himself seems for a time in doubt between contending feelings, in which he first prays for the restoration of Israel, and then reasons for their rejection, and then finally shows that, in a more extended view of the purposes of God, their salvation is included. He hears the echo of many voices in the Old Testament, by which the Spirit spoke to the Fathers, and in all of them there is a kind of unity, though but half expressed, which is not less the unity of his own inmost feelings toward his kinsmen according to the flesh. As himself an Israelite and a believer in Christ, he is full of sorrow first, afterwards of hope, both finally giving way to a clearer insight into the purposes of God toward His people." As respects the relation of these chapters to the preceding part of the Epistle, in an experimental view, Luther well says: "Who hath not known passion, cross, and travail of death, cannot treat of foreknowledge (election of grace), without injury and inward enmity toward God. Wherefore take heed that thou drink not wine, while thou art yet a sucking babe. Each several doctrine hath its own season, and measure, and age."—R.]

Summary.—A. The painful contrast between the misery of the Jews and the described salvation of the Christians, most of whom had been Gentiles. The Apostle's sorrow over the apparently frustrated destiny of his people (vers. 1-5).

B. The exultation of the Apost's in the thought that God's promise to Israel would nevertheless remain in force (vers. 6-33). Proof: 1. Differences in the election: they are not all Israel which are of Israel (vers. 6-13). 2. Antithesis in the ordination (predestination): God is not unrighteous in showing mercy and in hardening, and in His manner of connecting judgment and compassion (vers. 14-18). 3. God's freedom in the actual call of salvation (vers. 19-29): a. Proof from the existing fact (vers. 19-24); b. Proof from the witnesses of the Old Testament (vers. 25-29). 4. The correspondence of God's freedom in His administration, and the freedom of men in their faith or unbelief. The firmness of the fact that the Gentiles believe, and the greater part of Israel do not believe (vers. 30-33).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A. The Apostle's sorrow over the apparently frustrated destiny of his people (vers. 1-5). Winzer, Programm in Röm. ix. 1-5, Lipsa, 1832.

After the Apostle has portrayed the glory of believers in the New Testament, he must return to the surprising phenomenon, that it is just the majority of the people of the Old Testament who are absent from this feast of salvation—from the Supper of the Lord in the New Testament. The Jews, however, have already come into view (chap. viii. 33) as among the accusers and persecutors, and thus the way has been prepared for this transition. In a systematic reference, the Apostle turns from the consideration of the consummated salvation, to the most extreme contrast—sin in its third potency, the judgment of hardening.

Ver. 1. I say the truth in Christ [ἀληθεύω ἐν Χριστῷ]. Dr. Lange retains the article, as is done in the E. V., and in most revisions (except Noyes). It seems required by the genius of both the German and English languages.—R.] The Apostle strengthens his subsequent declaration in a threefold way: I say the truth in Christ; I lie not; my conscience bears me witness. The energetic battle which the Apostle waged against the Jews' righteousness of their works, and their claim to prerogatives in God's kingdom, made him odious to the Jews and an object of opposition and suspicion to many prejudiced ones among the Jewish Christians; while biased Gentile Christians might be tempted to regard him as one of their partisans. He meets all this by the solemn asseveration of his pain.

[Alford: "The subject on which he is about to enter, so unwelcome to Jews in general, coupled with their hostility to himself, causes him to begin with a deprecation, bespeaking credit for simplicity and earnestness in the assertion which is to follow. This deprecation and assertion of sympathy he puts in the forefront of the section, to take at once the ground from those who might charge him, in the conduct of his argument, with hostility to his own alienated people."—R.]

But the Apostle treats also of a further great progress in the glorification of Divine grace, which, in its third potency, glorifies as compassion that gloomy judgment of hardening which the Apostle can only disclose by an expression of the greatest pain. The Apostle is doubly assured of the sincerity of his declaration. First, he expresses his feeling in the consciousness of the fellowship of Christ* (Eph. iv. 17; 1 Thess. iv. 1), while he, so to speak, transfers himself into the feeling of Christ (Luke xix. 41). Second, he proves and tests the truth of his feeling by his conscience, and by the strong and clear light of the Holy Spirit. Now, is this declaration an oath, according to most of the earlier and many of the later expositors (Reiche, Köllner, and others); or is it not, according to the exposition of Tholuck, De Wette, and Meyer? This much is clear, that the Apostle's asseveration is not a formal taking of an oath, and not in the form of an oath. [The form of an oath would be πρός with the accusative.—R.] It will be remembered, in favor of this view, that the ὁμνέω (Matt. v. 34) is here wanting; and that the Apostle does not swear by Christ, nor by the Holy Ghost. Neither does he swear in a legal sense in general; we may only ask, whether he does not here give a solemn assurance in God's presence, and whether such an assurance is not an ideal oath?

I lie not [οὐ ψεύδομαι]. (1 Tim. ii. 7.) White lies being very much in vogue at the time, this addition surely meant that he was perfectly conscious of his responsibility for his declarations, since he called on Christ as a witness.

My conscience also bearing me witness [συμμαρτυροῦσός μοι τῆς συνειδήσεώς μου]. Meyer: Since my conscience bears me witness. But Paul's conscience could not bear witness to the Romans apart from Paul himself. The distinction between his own declaration and that of his conscience, means that he has proved his feelings in regard to his people by the light of conscience and of the Spirit of God. [Alford: The σύν in composition, denoting accordance with the fact, not joint testimony.—R.]

In the Holy Ghost [ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ]. This is not an addition to συνειδήσεως itself (a conscience governed by the Holy Ghost; Grotius), and still less to οὐ ψεύδομαι (although this is favored by many: ὡς ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ ὢν), but to συμμαρτ. μου (Tholuck, Meyer, and others). [Meyer: "Paul knows that the witness of his conscience is not outside the Spirit which fills him, but spirito sancto duces et moderatore (Beza) in it."—R.]

Ver. 2. That I have great grief and continual sorrow in my heart [ὅτι λύπη μοι ἔστιν μεγάλη καὶ ἀδιάλειπτος ὁδύνη τῇ καρδίᾳ μου]. The position of the words is solemnly emphatic.—R.] The Apostle does not immediately and directly mention the subject or occasion of his grief. Why not? Meyer: "From tender compassion." Tholuck: "In lively emotion." But the object is indicated by the ὑπὲρ τ. ἀδ. μου (ver. 3), and it is the ἀπώλεια threatened them (ver. 22). But the great pain relates not only to the great fall of his glorious people, which had already occurred, but to the Apostle's tragical position toward his brethren according to the flesh, and to the hard prophetic call now to disclose publicly the whole judgment of hardening pronounced on Israel, with its incalculably sad consequences. Christ also wept as

He prophesied Jerusalem's fate. Comp. Isa. vi. [How noble the Apostle appears here, with this holy patriotism and hearty love to those who, from the day of his conversion, had persecuted him with relentless hatred; who, soon after the composition of this Epistle, occasioned him a long imprisonment, and who were the immediate cause of his martyrdom!—P. S.]

Ver. 3. For I could wish. [Lange: Denn ich that ja das Gelübde, for I made the vow]. See the discussions on this difficult passage, quoted by Tholuck. For an elaborate account of the earlier expositions, see Wolf's Cura, iii. p. 164. Explanations of the ἠύχομην:

1. I have wished, namely, formerly (Vulgate: optabam; Luther: I have wished). This explanation divides, again, into two:

a. When I was a Jew, I wished to keep the Jews far from Christ; yea, to be myself the personal medium of the alienation; ἀνὰ θεῖμα = χωρισμός (Pelagius, Abelard, and others). In this case he appeals to his former blind zeal for Israel against Christ, in order to prove that he loves his people, and, in his love, that he now sorrows for their fate.

b. In my pain I have gone so far, as a Christian, that I wished, &c. (Significat, se aliquando hoc orasse, nimirum cum dolor iste singulariter invaluerat) Bucer, Meyer, and others, suggest, to the contrary, that there is here no potē, or any other word of similar import. Philippi adds: it must then mean ἠύχαμην potē.*

2. I wished, namely, even now.

a. Tholuck: Dum modo fieri posset, si liceret.

b. Meyer: I would wish, if the import of my wish could contribute to the good of the Israelites.

c. Philippi: But ἠύχομην is also not identical with ἠύχομην ἄν; that is, I would wish, if the wish were possible; but since it is not possible, I do not wish. But it is = I wished, namely, if the wish could be realized, and therefore really wish on this supposition.

The difference between the explanations is this: a. If the wish were possible (Tholuck); b. If the thing wished for were possible (Philippi); c. If the thing wished for, and also the wish itself, were possible (Meyer). There has, perhaps, not been enough regard to analogies in Paul's method of expression. Paul says ἠύχαμην ἄν (Acts xxvi. 29), for I wished, in the sense of I would wish, and why not here, too? Luke relates, on the contrary, Acts xxvii. 29, in the imperfect: ἠύχοντο, they wished (at that time); and why should not the imperfect be used here in the same sense? If, indeed, the word should mean here, I have wished, or even, I have prayed (Theodoret, and others), the presence of potē might be insisted upon. But if the Apostle wishes to say, I made a vow—i. e., if he speaks of a definite fact—the potē lies already in the emphasis of the ἠύχομην itself, especially as joined with the added

* (Under (1) belongs an interpretation, suggested by the venerable S. H. Cox, D. D., taking the verse as a parenthetical explanation of Paul's sorrow, in this sense: "for I myself once gloried as a persecutor to be banished from Christ." Besides the objections against the past sense as given above, it may be added, that this puts myself in the wrong place (see Festual Note); that, while εἰς μέγα has this meaning: to boast, to glory, in Homer, yet even there it is often little more than to profess, maintain, while in the New Testament it does not occur in this sense. The probabilities, both lexical and grammatical, are very strong, therefore, against such a meaning here.—R.]

* 1. Christ, i. e., in fellowship with Christ, who is truth itself, and transfers His members, at all events, into the element of truth and sincerity (comp. 2 Cor. xii. 19).—P. S.]

αὐτὸς ἐγώ. It is very probable that he made some pledge, when he (according to Acts ix. 2) received from the high priest authority to persecute the Christians; for a hierarch of exalted station does not confide in a young man without some such pledges. His present perception of the fearful import of that engagement is immediately expressed in ἀνάθεμα, κ.λ.λ.

If we disregard such an acceptance, the exegetical difficulty will really begin with ἀνάθεμα. [Dr. Lange prefers, yet does not commit himself to, this view of the imperfect. It is far-fetched; and were there no other grounds to influence the interpretation than those of grammar, as Alford hints, any school-boy could tell that the imperfect does not refer to a definite past act, but represents "the act unfinished, an obstacle intervening." In support of the grammatical correctness of this view, see Buttman, N. T. Gramm., p. 187; Kühner, ii., § 488, 3; Bernhardt, Syntax, p. 378; Kruger, § 54, 10; Winer, p. 266. It seems perilous to give up the obvious meaning, I could wish, for one barely allowable. The aorist was at hand, if Paul wished to refer to a past vow. If there be a difficulty in the passage, it is met most fairly by Meyer's view, that the verb implies an impossibility, or at least an insurmountable obstacle, both as to the wish and the thing wished for. We can then take ἀνάθεμα in its obvious sense, without putting it also on the rack to extort another meaning. See the final Exeg. Note on this verse.—R.]

That I myself were accursed from Christ [ἀνάθεμα εἶναι αὐτὸς ἐγὼ ἀπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ]. Ἀνάθεμα, Attic ἀνάθημα, dedicated to God; hence, also, dedicated to the Divine judgment, and consequently to ruin; in the latter sense = קָרַם (Gal. i. 8, 9; 1 Cor. xii. 3; xvi. 22). Though the later sense of קָרַם "must not be construed as the Jewish curse of excommunication" (Meyer), yet the theocratic idea: to excommunicate from the Church of God, and to dedicate to ruin, cannot be separated. In the Christian sphere the ἀνάθεμα is, indeed, in the ecclesiastical form, a temporally qualified exclusion: "for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved" (1 Cor. v. 5).

[EXCOURSUS ON ANATHEMA.—The proper understanding of this passage may be furthered by discussing at this point the precise meaning of the word ἀνάθεμα. The following dissertation is from Wieseler, Commentary on Galatians (i. 8, 9, pp. 39 ff.). The fact that it is founded upon another passage, adds to its weight in determining the meaning here, since the discussion of Gal. i. 8 is not beset with the prejudices which arise here.

"Ἀνάθεμα* is the Hellenistic form for the Attic ἀνάθημα (comp. εὐθημία and εὐρημα, πρόσθημα, and πρόσθημα, Lobeck, Ad Phrynich., p. 249, and Paralip., pp. 391 ff.), and, like the latter form, denotes in general 'something dedicated to God, a votive offering;' but in the Bible it is usually the translation of the Hebrew קָרַם, as ἀναθ-ματίαν is of קָרַר, and then denotes something dedicated to God in a bad sense, as we shall presently see more particularly; comp. the Latin sacer. When any thing consecrated in a general sense is to be denoted, however, the form ἀνάθημα, in the Scriptures and their dependent literature, is wont to prevail; in the other case, the form ἀνάθεμα, although the genuine reading, on account of the divergence of manuscripts, is often very difficult to determine. Ἀνάθημα as translation of קָרַר is found, e. g., in the LXX., Levit. xxvii. 28, 29, where, however, the reading ἀνάθημα also appears. At all events, this use of ἀνάθημα is the exception throughout, as appears also from the fact that ἀναθρηματίαν is nowhere used, but ἀναθεματίαν. We are more apt to find ἀνάθεμα also in the sense of a customary votive offering; e. g., 2 Macc. ii. 13, and Judith xvi. 19, Codex Alex. Luke uses ἀνάθημα, Luke xxi. 5 (yet Cod. A. and D. [so α.], and also Lachmann, read ἀνάθημα) of a customary votive offering, and Acts xxiii. 14, ἀνάθεμα, of a consecration in a bad sense. Suidas therefore says, with essential correctness: ἀνάθεμα καὶ τὸ ἀναθεμίον τῷ θεῷ καὶ τὸ ἐκ ἀπονομήν ἐσόμενον ἀμφοτέρω σημαίνει· λέγεται δὲ καὶ ἀνάθημα τὸ τῷ θεῷ ἀναθεμιόμενον. [ἀνάθεμα signifies both that which is hung up as an offering to God, and that which is destined to destruction; but that which is hung up as an offering to God is called also ἀνάθημα.] So Theodoret, respecting the usage of his time on Rom. ix. 3: τὸ ἀνάθεμα διακρίνεται ἐν τῇ διανοίᾳ· καὶ γὰρ τὸ ἀμυρόμενον τῷ θεῷ ἀνάθημα ἐνομαζέται, καὶ τὸ τοῦτο ἀλόγιον τῇ αἰσῇ ἐστὶν προσήγοριον. [The word ἀνάθεμα has a twofold sense: for both that which is consecrated to God is named ἀνάθημα, and the contrary of this has the same appellation.] So much respecting the distinction between ἀνάθεμα and ἀνάθημα."

"The ἀνάθεμα in the passage before us has been understood principally (1.) of excommunication.* So Grotius, Semler, Burger (waveringly), Rosenmüller, Flatt; the rationalismus vulgaris in the well-known Bremen controversy occasioned by F. W. Krummacher's Gastpredigt, upon this passage, represented by Paniel, Weber, and Paulus (comp. Gildemeister, passim, and also Baumgarten-Crusius). Either an actual excommunication was understood, as by Rosenmüller (excludatur e castu vestro), which Flatt thinks possible with regard to a teacher, or it was even explained as by Grotius (cum eo nihil vobis sit COMMERCII, non magis, quam cum iis quos Synagoga aut Ecclesia penitus abscidit) and by Semler (fugite, abhorrete talem doctorem); in which case we should at least have expected ὡς περ ἀνάθεμα (ὡς περ ὁ ἀναθεματισμένος) ἴστω ὑμεῖς; comp. Matt. xviii. 17."

"In particular in recent times, it is explained (2.) almost universally and also correctly: 'to have

Burger, who wavers between this explanation and that of Grotius and Semler, thinks that Paul in both cases meant: talem hominem perquam esse coelestem atque adeo penitendum, non vero indicare, QUAMVIS sit pama placendum. We see, in the case of the ἀνάθεμα, how thoroughly the unscientific exegesis of all times and all places is dependent on all the wishes and prejudices of the individual."—R.]

become obnoxious to the wrath or curse of God; Winer, Schott, Rückert, De Wette, Usteri, Meyer, Gildemeister; so that, therefore, Luther, with his: 'der sei verflucht', according to Krummacher's interpretation, is justified. Luther would be right also in the main matter, according to Olshausen's assertion, which he presents without proof, and which stands midway between Nos. 1 and 2, that in this formula (3.) we are not merely to understand ecclesiastical excommunication, but that this is only so far included in the signification as it presupposes Divine reprobation."

"All these explanations, notwithstanding their divergences, proceed from the correct assumption that this ἀνάθεμα is the translation of the Hebrew חֵרֵם. The question is therefore this, what this חֵרֵם among the Jews was, and whether it denoted—i. e., in the time of Paul—the Jewish excommunication. If the latter were disproved, Nos. 1 and 2 would fall; but if this should really be the case, the question would be whether ἀνάθεμα here is used of excommunication, or of what it is used. But, in the first place, it is clear that, in the whole Old Testament, חֵרֵם and חֲרִיִּים are never used of excommunication. Indeed, they are used with at least as frequent reference to the idolatrous apostasy of the heathen nations, especially of Canaanitish ones, as with reference to idolatry and impiety within Israel. חֵרֵם is used of every thing, person or thing, which, on account of its worthiness of death, founded in God's Word—the thing usually in connection with, and on account of, its impious possession—was, whether of free resolve, or at the express command of God, consecrated to Jehovah, without capability of being ransomed; Levit. xxvii. 21, 28. The person who had become a חֵרֵם might not continue to live; Levit. xxvii. 29; and only the thing—to which class, according to ancient view, the slave also belonged—could, if a living creature, remain alive, falling then forever to Jehovah—that is, to the priests; Levit. xxvii. 28; Num. xviii. 14; Ezek. xlv. 29. From this it arises, that חֵרֵם, as to its sense, signifies simply 'to destroy,' and is not seldom connected with לְחַיֵּי (comp. the Hebrew חַיִּים, which also originally signifies 'to be holy; Exod. xxx. 37; xxx. 29; and חֵרֵם is rendered in the LXX. not simply by ἀνάθεμα, or ἀπόρισμα, Ezek. xlv. 29, but also by ἀπάνωμα, Deut. vii. 2; ἐξολόθρευμα, 1 Sam. xv. 21; and ἀπόλημα, Isa. xxxiv. 5. From this it appears that, according to the Old Testament, חֵרֵם neither literally nor by derived use can signify excommunication, as exclusion from the fellowship of the chosen people. Nay, the latter is expressly mentioned, Ezra x. 28; but the verb חֵרֵם is not used of the excommunicated persons, but, in contrast with it, the verb בָּרַל; the former verb, on the other hand, is used in its true sense (see above) of their property, because this sequestered forever to the sanctuary. Had the חֵרֵם been decreed against the persons in question on the part of the Jewish assembly, they would thereby not have been excommunicated, but destroyed in honour of the God whom they had outraged. On the other hand, in the Talmud, חֵרֵם is unquestionably used formally of excommunication. According to Elias Levita, the three grades of excommunication among the Jews have not seldom been assumed as (1.) the חֵרֵם, (2.) the חֵרֵם, and (3.) the חֵרֵם. Paniel and Weber also assumed them, asserting that only the highest grade, as the Shammatha, was conjoined with those 'fearful curses' which we read in the Talmudists, but that Paul, with his ἀνάθεμα, meant no other than the חֵרֵם. On the other hand, Gildemeister, passim, preceded by Selden, and others, has lately thoroughly demonstrated anew that the Talmud and the Jews, by those three names, do not designate three different grades of excommunication, but that the Shammatha is only another word (the Chaldaic translation) for Niddui; that, therefore, if the Apostle, by his ἀνάθεμα, meant the Cherem as excommunication, the highest grade of excommunication—that accompanied with these 'curses'—must have been meant."

"The next question is, therefore, whether the Cherem, as excommunication, already existed among the Jews at the time when the Epistle to the Galatians was written. Although the primitive history of Jewish excommunication is veiled in great obscurity, we certainly shall not err if we ascribe to it, from its first documentarily attested appearance under Ezra (Ezra x. 8), up to the time of Paul, a certain course of development, and that a more extensive one than Gildemeister appears to do."

"According to New Testament testimony there were, then, the two grades of excommunication: (1.) The exclusion from the worship in the Temple and synagogue, John ix. 22; xii. 42; xvi. 2; and (2.) what, as it was already practised under Ezra, can least surprise us, the expulsion † from the congregation of the people, Luke vi. 29 (ἀποτίθειν), which concluded with obliteration of the name in the δύλως δημοσίου (ἐκβαλεῖν τὸ ὄνομα ἐς το- νηρόν, L. c.); which latter circumstance is here expressly added, that the hearers may not understand the excommunicatio minor. Quite as certainly, however, is the Jewish excommunication at Paul's time not yet designated as Cherem, which even antecedently is improbable, on account of the above developed Old Testament use of חֵרֵם, which could only gradually, and after a longer time, be so considerably modified. For in the Mishna, where excommunication is largely handled, Cherem is as yet never used of excommunication, but this is denoted by Niddui; it is in the Gemara that Cherem appears as excommunication, and that the sharpest form of the same—that joined with fearful 'curses' having reference to everlasting destruction, from whence also its name—is explained. With this alone agrees, moreover, the New Testament use of ἀνάθεμα and ἀναθεματίζω, Rom. ix. 3; 1 Cor. xii. 3; xvi. 22; Gal. i. 8, 9; Acts xxiii. 12; xiv. 21; Mark xiv. 71, which in none of these passages signify excommunication, or to excommunicate. On the other hand, ἀνάθεμα, in entire congruity with the Old Testament Cherem, is used of a person who is dedicated to God, subjected to the Divine curse for his death, not, however, to bodily, as in the more ancient formula—which reference, however, was not necessarily contained in the root, but resulted only from the historical relations of the Jews in ancient time—but to spiritual and eternal death. The ἀνάθεμα, 1 Cor. xvi. 22, cannot signify excommunication, since otherwise it would be denounced against a temper of mind, the ὁ φιλῆν; nor yet 1 Cor. xii. 3, since no one could have wished to excommunicate Jesus, no longer dwelling on earth; nor Rom. ix. 3, as appears sufficiently from the defining ἀπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ. In the case of the verb ἀνάθεματιζέτω, indeed, it has not yet come into any one's head, in respect to the New Testament passages, that it signifies, to excommunicate; but ἀνάθεμα ὄν, Mark, i. c., signifies, 'under self-imprecations (by his soul's salvation) to attest, that;'^{*} ἀνάθεματιζέτω ἑαυτὸν, Acts, i. c., 'under self-imprecations to oblige himself.' Quite as little can ἀνάθεμα, Gal. i. 8, 9, be used of excommunication, on this account, if no other, because one cannot excommunicate an angel from heaven (ver. 8), but can very well call down God's curse of damnation upon him, in the ἀνάθεμα. Ver. 9 must have been used in the same sense as in ver. 8. Independently of the subjective participation expressed by the imperative, ἀνάθεμα ἴστω expresses neither more nor less than Gal. v. 10, where Paul denounces against the same false teachers the judgment of God at the end of days; comp. 2 Thess. i. 9. In form, as in meaning, the Pauline ἀνάθεμα ἴστω (or ἴτω, 1 Cor. xvi. 22) reminds us strongly of the אָרֵר, LXX: ἐπικατάρατος, Deut. xxvii. 15 ff.; only that not every אָרֵר in the Old Testament needs, like our ἀνάθεμα, to be taken as invoking the highest and most intensive evil—eternal damnation—but may very well, according to the connection, be used of that; comp. Gal. iii. 13; Matt. xxv. 41; it being, of course, understood that, by the ἀνάθεμα, the loss of eternal life and the blessed fellowship of God is meant to be invoked against the sinner, only so far and so long as he persists in his wickedness, or this in its nature is irremissible. As to the rest, when Rückert and Schott, in the case of the ἀνάθεμα in this passage, will have it that it does not mean excommunication, for the additional reason that that age was not yet acquainted with this among the Christians, this assertion is unquestionably erroneous; 1 Cor. v. 2 ff.: 1 Tim. i. 20; 3 John 10; Jude 22; comp. Matt. xviii. 17, 18; 2 Thess. iii. 14; 2 John x. 11. The Church fathers afterwards used the ἀνάθεμα, doubtless deriving the use through the Pauline passages, of Christian excommunication, similarly as the Jews their אָרֵר, but these commonly misunderstood the proper sense of this expression. Comp. the criticism of them in Fritzsche, i. c., tom. ii., p. 249, Note."

With this well-established view of the meaning of our word, we can pass to the exegesis of this passage, remembering that the burden of proof now rests with those who, to avoid difficulties, assign any other meaning than that so ably defended by Wieseler.—R.]

Meyer: "The destruction to which Paul would commit himself for his brethren must not be understood as a violent death (Jerome, Limborsch, Platt, and others), but as the eternal ἀνάθεμα, as is required by the ἀπὸ τ. Χ. It has often been objected that the wish of this ἀνάθεμα is unreasonable, and Michaelis even says that it would be a raving prayer. But the standard of selfish (!) reflection does not harmonize with the emotion of boundless self-denial and love in which Paul here speaks." (Comp. Chrysostom and Bengel in loco.) Tholuck quotes Chrysostom's expression on this point, and adds: "Thus interpret the vast majority of expositors of ancient and modern times, even the Socinians, with Socinus himself." We nevertheless hold unhesitatingly that the explanation of Michaelis is more admissible than Meyer's well-nigh unmeaning overstraining of the idea of self-denial.

The justifiable hesitation in accepting the explanation, that Paul wished to be eternally cast out from Christ—that is, given over to the devil, to be damned—has led to mitigations of the real meaning of the ἀνάθεμα. It has been interpreted:

1. As temporal death, as already mentioned: Analogies in 2 Cor. xii. 15: the death of Christ as κατάρα (Jerome, Nösselt, and others). Tholuck, on the other hand: With temporal death as Christum, there is connected the accursing, which is additionally comprised here in ἀπὸ τ. Χ.

2. Banishment from church fellowship (deotius, and others; apparently, Luther also).

On the controversies arising from a ban by Fr. Krummacher on Gal. i. 8, in regard to this explanation, comp. Tholuck, p. 471 ff. There is, now, no question that the supposition of an exclusion to injury is always connected with a true exclusion from church fellowship. But if we explain the Old Testament Cherem and the ecclesiastical ban according to the New Testament—that is, specifically according to the words quoted from 1 Cor. v. 5—then it becomes evident that the Old Testament Cherem did not declare eternal condemnation when it declared extermination from the congregation of the people, and that devotion to eternal condemnation could never have been the meaning of an authorized ecclesiastical Christian ban. If the explanation, I wished to be accursed from Christ, were therefore correct, it would nevertheless not be the same as: I wished to be eternally damned; but: *I would be willing to be cast into boundless misery for the brethren. From the overstrained interpretation of the accursed, it would follow, that the Apostle regarded the brethren in question as eternally damned. See, on the contrary, Rom. xi.—Tholuck refers to the Jewish and Arabic manner of speaking: May we be thy ransom; may my soul be the redemption of thine! Evidently, hyperboles of Oriental politeness. He cites the reference of Origen to the example of Moses (Exod. xxxii. 32): Paul has spoken like Moses, says Origen: devotione, non praverticatione. But Moses spoke thus at a moment of the deepest emotion, and just as Moses, in the Old Testament sense of the theocratic judgment of reprobation. Jerome takes the value of many souls against one into account; Cyril accepts a hyperbole; and Thomas Aquinas distinguishes between a separatio a damnatis per culpam and a separatio a fructibus gloriae.† Tholuck remarks, that Feneleon

* [So Hodge, who, while advocating the common interpretation, would make the meaning very general, and the words express not "definite ideas," but "strong and indistinct emotions."—R.]

† [There seems to be some abstract ground for this distinction. The first, separation from Christ's holy will, is opposed to love to Christ and striving after sanctification; it is godless, and, of course, excluded here. The second, separation from the enjoyment of Christ, is not in itself immoral, yet can, indeed, be distinguished from the first only abstractly and in thought, being also invariable, as has referred to this passage in order to defend the mystical idea of amour déinteressé,* and that Bosuet replies, by saying, that fellowship with God cannot be separated from participation in saving blessings (salvation). Yet Tholuck returns at last to Fenelon's distinction, after quoting many other theological explanations (Calvin: eruptio animi confusi; later moralists, especially Dannhauer, Spener, and Bengel: virtus heroica). Most expositors, by their reference to the hypothetical si fieri posset, return to the acceptance of a hyperbolic expression.

The αὐτός ἐγώ leads us back to the simplest rendering.

The current explanation is incorrect at the very outset. Meyer is nearest right: The antithesis is the brethren, the majority of whom are seen by Paul as ἀνάθεμα ἀπὸ Χριστοῦ going to the ἀπώλεια. In this case the ἐγώ would still be superfluous. Our present expression refers to the αὐτός ἐγώ (chap. vii. 25). We have seen how the expression there designated the opposition of spiritual and carnal life in the identity of the same individuality. And thus it denotes here the antithesis of his earlier and of his present standpoint, in the identity of an individuality which, at that time, acted from a love for Israel.† For I even pledged myself, I, the same Paul who must now pronounce the following judgment on Israel, &c.—His former wish to destroy the Christians by means of the Cherem, he now denominates in its true meaning:

least in permanency. For holiness and blessedness are inseparable, and it is the will of Christ that we become Meared through fellowship with Him.—P. 8.]

* [Compare Madame Guion (died 1717):

"I consent that thou depart,
Though thine absence breaks my heart,
Go, then, and forever, too;
All is right that thou wilt do."

"My last, least offering, I present thee now—
Renounce me, leave me, and be still adorned!
Slay me, my God, and I applaud the blow."

Cooper's Translation.

The doctrine of disinterested affection has been supported in America by Samuel Hopkins, D.D., and his system is commonly called Hopkinsianism. He holds that self-love, which cannot be distinguished from selfishness in his view, "is the root and essence of all sin;" that holiness consists in disinterested benevolence. He makes the possession of this benevolence a test of religion and religious exercises, and says, that though a benevolent person "could know that God designed, for His own glory and the general good, to cast him into endless destruction, this would not make him cease to approve of His character; he would continue to be a friend of God, and to be pleased with His moral perfections." (System of Doctrines, 2d ed., Boston, 1811, l. p. 479.) But he puts certain limitations respecting proper personal interest, and nowhere implies that one must reach this point of experience in order to be converted. The current opinion of his view is, that he teaches: "a man must be willing to be damned, in order to be saved;"—a logical sequence which he does not affirm. Nor does he quote this passage, which would seem to favor his position. It is probable that he, too, would admit the impossibility of such a wish being granted, and claim no other meaning for this passage than that which many of the most judicious commentators adopt, and which is of the most literal and obvious one. It may well be held that Paul reached such a pitch of feeling as this, without insisting that this is the constant and conscious state of the Christian heart.—R.]

† [This obviates one difficulty, urged by Dr. Hodge, against the sense I wished: "No Jew would express his hatred of Christ and his indifference to the favors which He offered, by saying he wished himself accursed from Christ." But it makes the grammatical difficulty still greater. An imperfect is made to do service not only as an aorist, but in a sense very unusual; while what is closely joined with it—vis, the purport of the wish or vow—derives its significance from the present standpoint. Extremely doubtful, to say the least!—R.]

to be accursed, ἀπὸ τοῦ Χ., away from Christ; as he is not aware of any other ban from the Church of God than banishment from Christ. Nösselt, and others, have understood by the expression, that Christ would be the author of the ban; which would increase the harshness of the expression. With our view, the ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν μου can only mean this: for my brethren, as one zealous for their interests. Even with the opposite view, Meyer explains ὑπὲρ as for the good of; but Tholuck, on the contrary, says that the idea of substitution underlies the ὑπὲρ, at least indirectly. [Olshausen makes ὑπὲρ = anti.—R.] This would render the idea still more intolerable. Paul would not venture to utter the thought, that his ruin might still bring salvation to the people for whom even the death of Christ brought no salvation.

[The interpretations of this difficult passage may be classified as follows:

(1.) Those which take ἡνέχονην in the past sense. The grammatical objection to this is so decided, that, unless the gravest difficulties attend every other view, it must be rejected. The view of Dr. Lange, which makes it equivalent to a definite aorist, is grammatically less admissible than that which takes it as = optabam, I was wont to wish.

(2.) Those which give to ἀνάθεμα some less strong sense than accursed, devoted to destruction. Dr. Lange has cited most of these. The least objectionable among these is that which interprets the word as meaning: untold misery, not necessarily eternal. The lexical objection here is very strong; see EXCURSUS above. If Wieseler's statements are reliable, all of these are necessarily excluded. There remains, then,

(3.) The obvious meaning, I could wish myself devoted to destruction from Christ for my brethren's sake; implying either that the wish was not formed, because it was impossible to wish, or of impossible fulfilment; ὑπὲρ, involving, not necessarily substitution, yet such a suffering for the benefit of others as would turn to their corresponding advantage; for Paul often speaks of what he does for (ὑπὲρ) his readers. The question then arises, Are the difficulties attending this view so great, that it must be abandoned for such doubtful exegesis as (1.) and (2.) present? Dr. Lange objects:

(a.) That it implies a senseless overstraining of the idea of self-denial. But who shall put the limit? "It is the expression of an affectionate and self-denying heart, willing to surrender all things—even, if it might be so, eternal glory itself—if thereby he could obtain for his beloved people those blessings of the gospel which he now enjoyed, but from which they were excluded. Others express their love by professing themselves ready to give their life for their friends: he declares the intensity of his affection by reckoning even his spiritual life not too great a price, if it might purchase their salvation" (Alford). Surely we dare not let our assumption of how far his self-denial would go, limit words, which, if they do not mean this, have always borne this as their obvious meaning.

(b.) It is further objected, that then the Apostle would regard the brethren in question as eternally damned. But it is Paul who says that those out of Christ are already perishing (1 Cor. i. 18); and Christ himself speaks of the wrath of God aliding on men (John iii. 18, 36). This objection sunders too widely the present and the future state of unbelievers. Paul would, at all events, feel the power of the future state of retribution in the case of these brethren, just to the extent that he attached a definite meaning to ἀντίθεμα; so that this objection is of no weight.

(c.) The implication suggested above, that Paul then would deem his ruin more powerful than the death of Christ, involves the strongest meaning of ἵπτο. If the idea of substitution be excluded, this objection falls to the ground. But if Paul could not use ἵπτο here, in the sense that his sufferings might produce certain beneficial results to others, he could not use it elsewhere in the same sense (Eph. iii. 13; Col. i. 24 twice). The objection, in any case, lies not against the degree, but the quality of the suffering.
